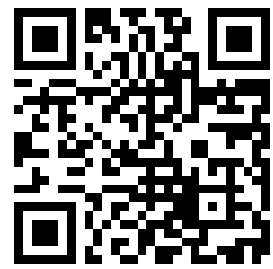
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google™ books

https://books.google.com



3 rub 7.50

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Binding Instructions	Lettering for Back

Ticket No. B 1606/92

Lot No.

Size 3

Full ½ ¾ Pamphlet

MATERIAL

Cowhide
Buffing
Morocco
Pigskin
Keratol
Calf
Sheep
Fabrikoid
Lby. Buck
Art Canvas
Art Vellum
Cloth
Duck

COLOR

Black
Red
Maroon
Light Blue
Dark Blue
Tan
Light Brown
Med. Brown
Dark Brown
Light Green
Olive Dark Green
Grey

50

SIDES

Cloth Vellum Marble Paper

BACK

Raised Bands or Smooth Back

FINISHING TO BE IN

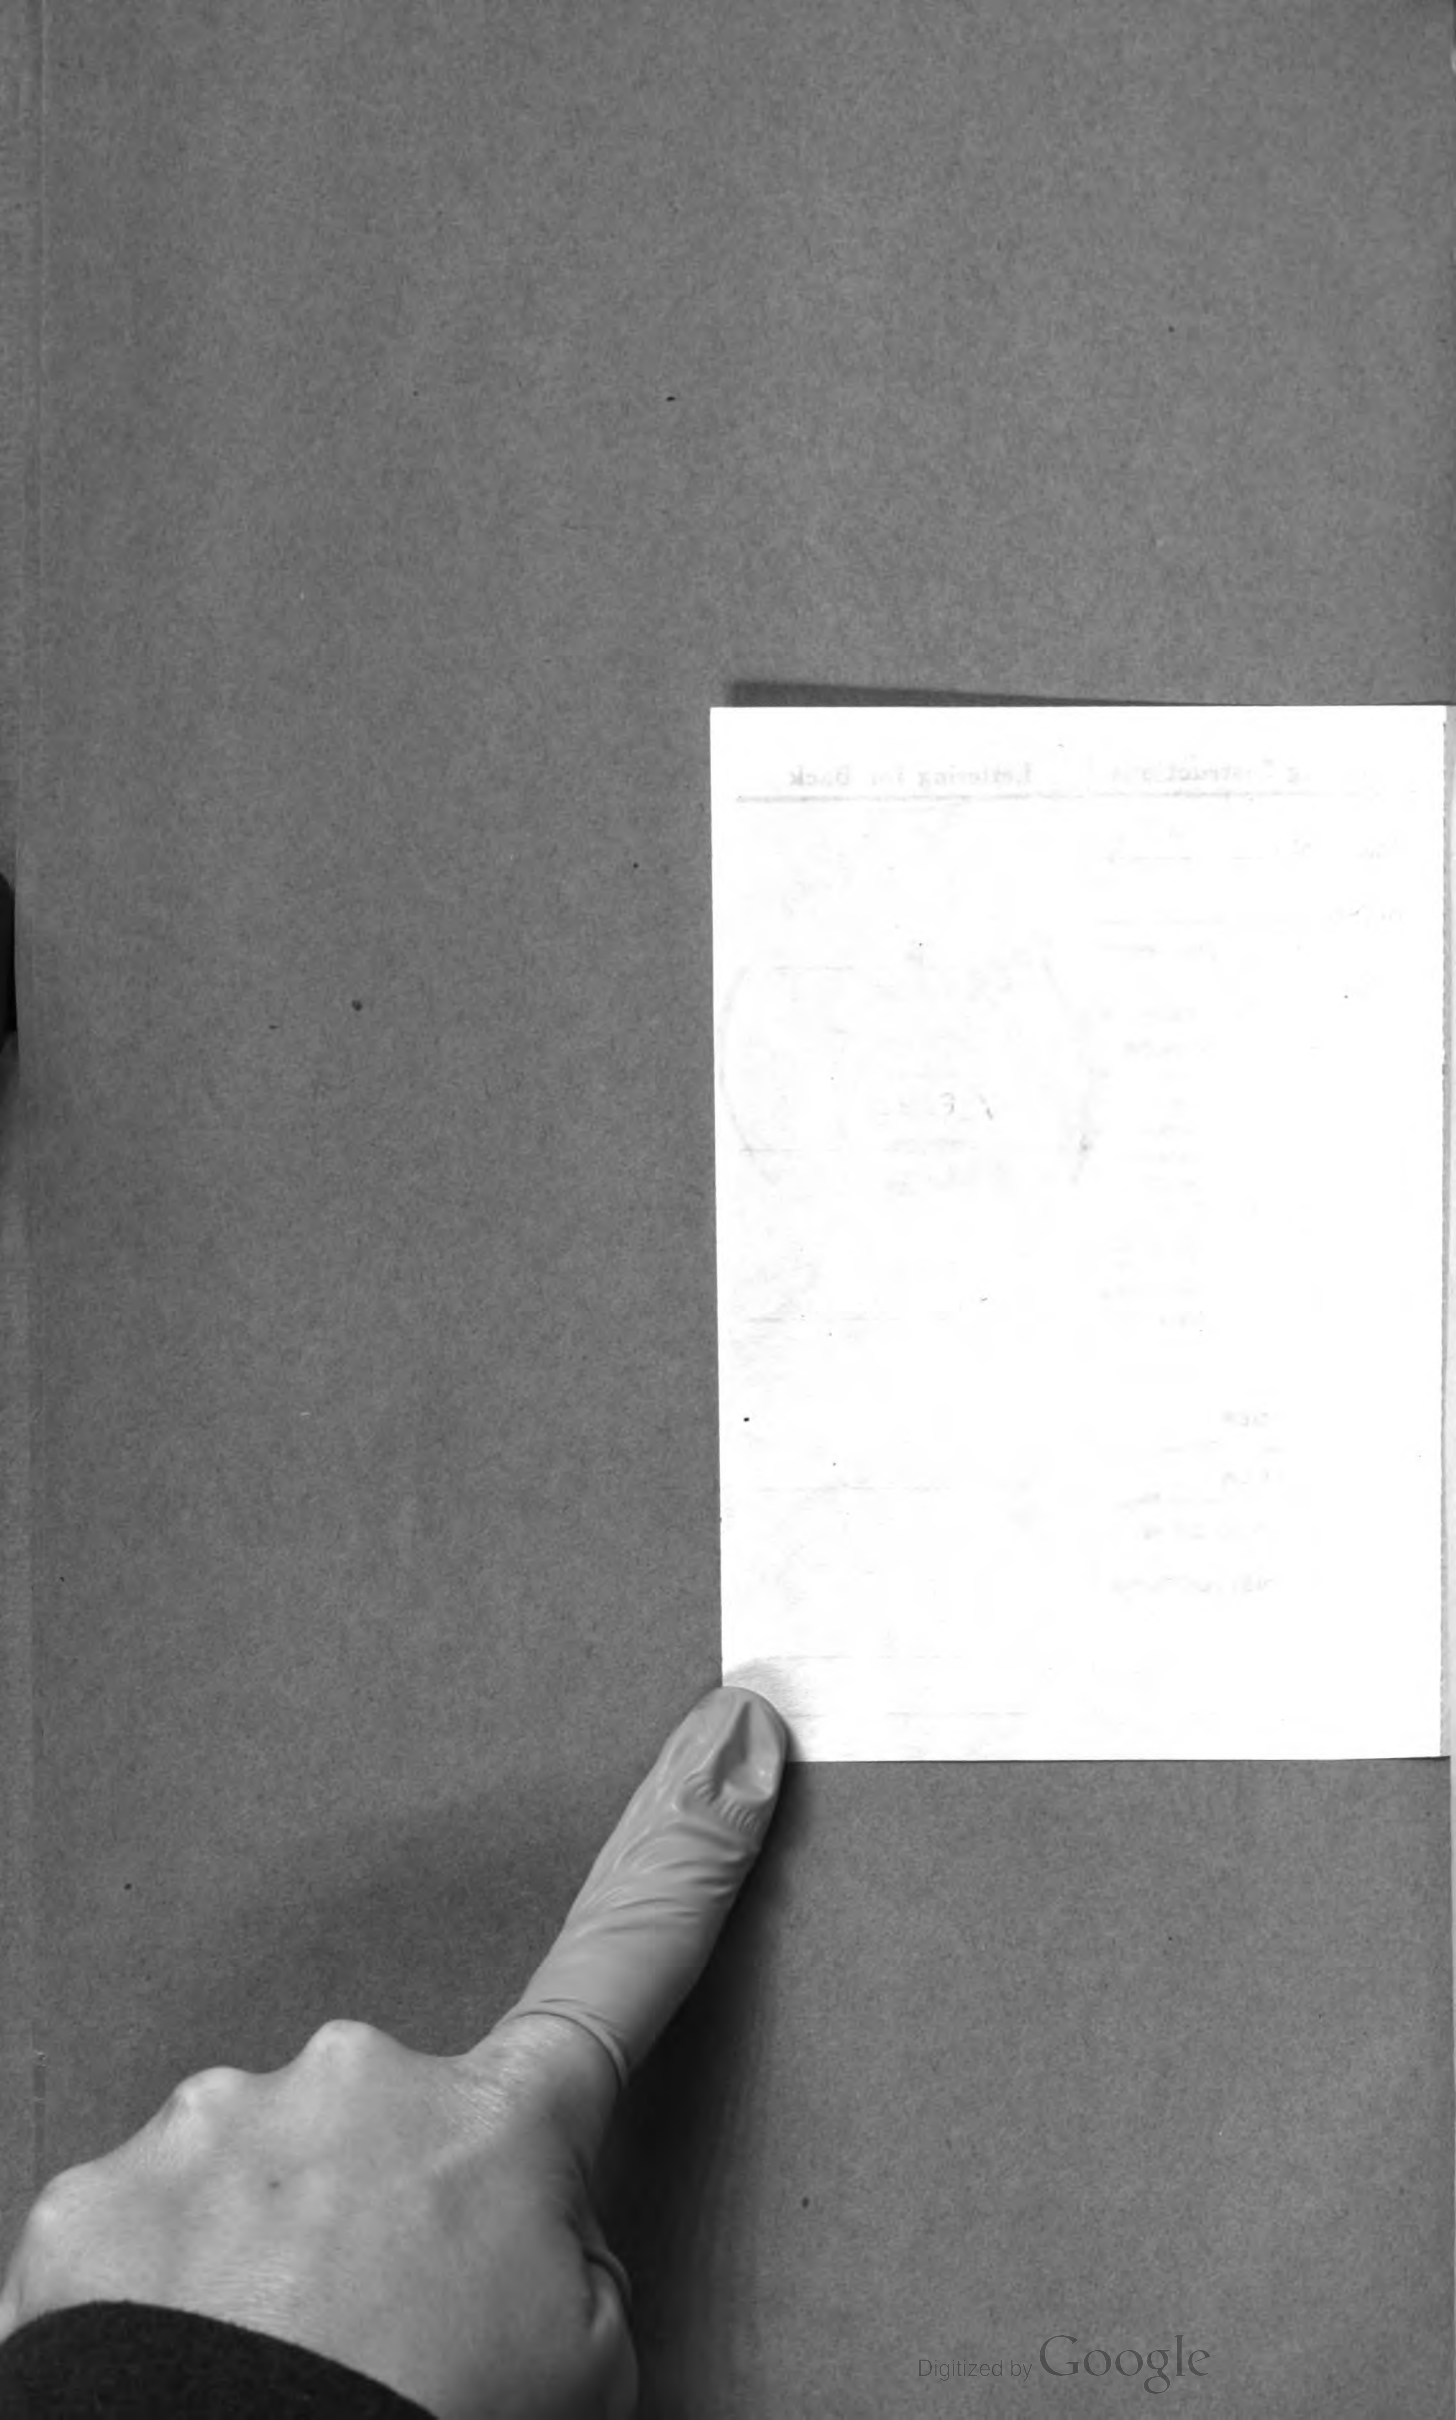
Gold or Ink

SPECIAL INSTRUCTIONS

Lettering for Back:

The Tatler
1891
Vol 2

Digitized by Google



Digitized by Google

THE TATLER.

A DAILY PAPER OF LITERATURE, FINE ARTS, MUSIC, AND THE STAGE.

FROM JANUARY TO JUNE 1831.

VOLUME THE SECOND.

LONDON:

PUBLISHED BY R. SETON, AT THE OFFICE, 26 BRYDGES STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

MDCCCXXXI.

Digitized by Google

LONDON:
PRINTED BY C. AND W. REYNELL, BROAD STREET, GOLDEN SQUARE.

Digitized by Google

INDEX.

ESSAYS, TALES, &c.

FOR THE MOST PART ORIGINAL.

Advertisements, on, 653. Abernethy, Mr, 801. Anonymous Criticism, 829. Advice to a Journalist (from Voltaire) 895. Ancient World, a Page from the History of the, 909. Appalling famine in Ireland, 959, 985.

Bonnets, large ones, at Theatres, 687. Benefit nights, 987.

Children, (The) and the Watch, 713. Chimney Sweepers, 825. Chronology of the Patent Theatres, 525. Coleridge, Mr, his Lecture on the Changes in English Prose-Writing, 893; on Rabelais, Swift, Sterne, &c. 897.

Dramatists, Specimens of the Old,—No. 1, Cyril Tourneur, 817. Do Nothings, and Do Muches, 821.

East wind, on the, 861. English Politeness, 866.

Foote, (Miss) marriage of, 757.

Green's Poems, on, 930.

Illuminations, The, 811. Indians at a Play, 555.

Jews, on the Emancipation of the, 701. (by Mr Hazlitt)

Lafayette, 702. Lafontaine, 771. Law versus Justice, 990.

Moorish and English Beauty, 905.

New Year's Day, 409.

Patent and small Theatres, on the, 497. Public Press, (The) 761. Periodicals, success of, 777. Parliamentary Candidate Society, 970. Poland, and Kosciusko, 1025.

Reading, Dangers of, (from Voltaire) 888. Royal Society of Literature, case of, 945. Rammohun Roy, 1010.

Shakspeare's Twelfth Night, 431. Slave, (The) a Tale, 502. Scott, (Sir Walter) v. Reform, 705, 711, 713, 718. School of St Simon, 877. Saint Making, (from Voltaire) 889. Society as it is and as it may be, 889. Sailors at a Play, 563. Slanderers worse than Housebreakers, 905. Scene Painting in England, 913.

Theatrical critics, 698. Theatres, their claims to consideration, 839. Twelfth Night at Home, 431.

Vauxhall Gardens, 967.

Walk from the Regent's Park to Finchley, 849.

POETRY,

ORIGINAL AND TRANSLATED.

Lines to W. Macready Esq., 455. Epigram, 546. On Madame Vestris, 567. Lines written in a Lady's Diary, 578. Song for Music, 719. Solitude, 724. Shelley and Keats, and their Reviewer. 743. To C. R. H. on Miss M., 746. A Prophesy, 749. A Lament, 754. A Love Message, 760. Shelley, 763. Reality, 767. Delight, 778. Hymn to God, 782. A Dilemma, 782. Paupers' Jubilee, 787. To my Country, 790. Calvus, 802. Answer to do. 802. The Brother, 810. Sleepy School Boy, 835. The Disinterred Warrior, 866. The Forsaken Hearth, 892. A N-Ice Voice, 918. Beauty, 922. The Curate and his Bishop, 938. The American Indian, 963 Expostulation and Candour, 966. The Hearts' Reverie, 995. Insecurity of Property, 1010. Chaucer's Knight, 1027.

SELECTED.

Improvidence left without excuse. Beaumont and Fletcher, 527. True Courage, ibid, 530. Praise of Patriotism, Chapman, 531. Ludicrous Fancy, 695. A pretty picture, Drummond, 927. Preferment spoiled, Prior, 939. Amphion's House-Building. Swift, 968. Dreams. Dryden, 971. Self Knowledge, the Highest Philosophy. Wordsworth, 990. Robin Hood. Drayton, 998. Dejection. Beaumont and Fletcher, 998. Imperfection of Knowledge. Butler, 1000. A National Picture. Spenser, 1004. A Hermitage. Spenser, 1010. Incitements to early rising. Fletcher, 1019. The Bag of the Bee. Herrick, 1020. Praise of Mirth. Beaumont and Fletcher, 1023. Night. Browne, 1023. Lips and eyes. Spenser, 1027. An Arbour. Spenser, 1027.

LETTERS.

Boai, Michel, 749.

Chess Playing, 446, 475, 522. Commencements of Conversation, 487. Curiosity of Language, 712. Characteristic Epithets, 899.

English Song, Addition to the Oldest, 582. Exquisites, The, 820.

Finishing Education, 510. French Plays, 751.

Green, Mr, 655.

Howitt's Book of the Seasons, 530. Hints to the Dyspeptic, 566. Hazlitt, writings of, 602. Highways and Byways, 667.

Ice Witch, 764. Invaluable Discoveries, 834.

Juvenile Theatricals, 829.

Kean, Mr, at the City Theatre, 936.

Longitude lengthened, 459. Late Theatrical hours, 522, 896. Lawrence, Sir Thomas, 638.

Musical Mysteries, 419, 427. Musical Performances, 658 Minor Theatres, 819, Materialists, Last of the, 830. Managerial Mismanagement, 851. Nettlewig Hall, 764, 783. Napoleon, Lives of, 805. New Anecdote of Shakspeare, 671.

Objection to an Oratorio Custom, 634. Orchestra at the Haymarket, 783. Omnibuses, Pearson, Miss, 635. Pronunciation of Italian, 675.

Societa Armonica, 571, Star System, 579, 615. Stage Costume, inconsistencies of, 732.

Theatrical Chat, 546. Tree, Miss M., 766. Tory Anomaly, 771.

Violent Temper, 506.

Wrleck upon Wreck, 704.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Annual Retrospect of Public Affairs, 629, 634, 637 833, 869. Arcana of Science and Art, 765, 769. Abernethy's Lectures, 809, 818. Alfred the Great, by J. S. Knowles, 857. Æschylus, Specimen from, 907. Atherton, a Novel, 929. Aldine Poets, (Pope) 966. Alcock's Lectures on Surgery, 1026.

Byron, Moore's Life of, 441, 445, 449, 453, 457. Black Book, Extraordinary, 605, 613. Byron, Lord, Works of, 841. Biographical Memoirs of the Rev. T. Buckminster, S. C. Thatcher, and I. A. Abbot, 965. Beale's Observations on Disorders of the Spine, 997.

Caleb Williams, by Godwin, 738. Currency Question, on the, 858. Church of England, Letter on the Corruptions of, by R. M. Beverley, Esq. 925. Collier's History of Dramatic Poetry, 962, 969, 973, 978, 985, 989, 999.

Davy, Sir H., Paris's Life of, 785, 797, 789. Divines, of the Church of England, 994. Domestic Gardener's Manual, 1009. Drummond's Letter to a Young Naturalist, 994.

Edinburgh Review, 565, 797, 845. Essay on the State of the Country, 625. England, Mackintosh's History of, 837, 841. Englishman's Magazine, 873, 877. English Dramatic Poetry, History of, by J. P. Collier, 962, 969, 973, 978, 985.

First French Revolution, Bell's History of, 942. Festivals, Games, &c. by Horace Smith, 413, 418. French Revolution, Carpenter's Anecdotes of, 589, Flogging and its Substitute, by John Shipp, 597. Fuseli's Life and Writings, 729, 733, 737. Family Classical Library, 955. Friend at Court, 1023.

George the Fourth, Memoirs of, 521, 530, 541, 545, 549, 1101, 1005. Godwin's Thoughts on Man, 530, 533, 561, 577, 581, 674, 754. Gorton's Topographical Dictionary, 621, 635, 643.

Harmonicon, 422. History of France, by E. E, Crowe, 525, 553, 557. Hydrostatics, Treatise on, by Dr Lardner, 721. Hill's Speech on Reform, 774.

Italian Poets, Stebbings' Lives of, 501, 509, 513, 519.

Knowledge for the People, Part 3, Origins and Antiquities, 437.

Letter to Lord Althorpe, 481. Letter on Taxes on Knowledge, 586. Ledyard, Sparks' Memoirs of, 645, 649. Lives of Scottish Worthies. By P. F. Tytler, 933.

Massinger Family, 677.

Natural Philosophy, Herschel's Discourse on, 465, 469. Nobleman, Journal of a, 682, 685, 702, 719. Normandy, a Residence in, by J. A. St John, 689. Napoleon Buonaparte, Life of, by Bourrienne, 741. Novels, New Series of, 946. Novels, another Series, 954. New State of Society, Outlines of a Plan for a, 982.

Observations on the Duty on Coal, 434, 437. Ornithological History of British Birds, 946. Optics, Treatise on, by Dr Brewster, 953.

Poland, Fletcher's History of, 1013, 1018, 1021, 1025. Plan for benefiting the Agricultural Labourers, 985. Painters, Cunningham's Lives of British, 530, 533, 569, 573. Pilot, The, by J. F. Cooper, 738. Playwright's Adventures, by F. Reynolds, 745. Pickering's Inquiries of an Emigrant, 813. Pestalozzian System of Education, 957. Philip Augustus, a Novel, 982.

Quarterly Review, 565, 885.

Romance of History, France, by Leitch Ritchie, 717, 722, 725.

Seaward's Narrative, 1017. Sketch of the Danish Missionaries on the Coast of Coromandel, by the Rev. Mr Grenfeld, M. A. 957, Sunday Library, 461, 838. Select Vestries, Speech on, by H. Revell, Esq. 506. Sinclair, Correspondence of, 665, 669, 673, 694, 698. Stanley's Speech at Windsor, 841. Surplus Population, a Comedy, by W. Cobbett, 921. Switzerland, by Derwent Conway, 922. Shakspeare's Sonnets, 961. Tennyson, Alfred, Poems of, 593, 601. Tennyson, Charles, Poems of, 609, 617. Trial of Mr Carpenter, 949. Taylor, Jeremy, Works of, 994.

Voyages and Travels of the Companions of Columbus, by Washington Irving, 473, 477. Venetian History, Sketches of, 709, 713. Voyages and Travels, by the Rev. D. Tyerman and George Bennet, Esq. 933.

Wellington, Sherer's Memoirs of, 425, 446. Wilson's Ornithology, 883. Wordsworth, Selections from, 937.

Year Book, by W. Hone, 429.

EXTRACTS FROM NEW BOOKS.

Beechey's Voyage to the Pacific, 704, 714. Bennet and Tyerman's Voyages and Travels, 923. Beaumont's Buenos Ayres, 783. Brother Jonathan, 815. Brooke's Spain and Morocco, 866, 874, 881, 890, 894, 898. Baillie's Lisbon, 603, 611, Boston Traveller, 514.

Conway's Switzerland, 895, 959. Conder's Italy. 822, 850, 866, 886. Critical Disquisitions, 471, Campbell's Tour in Scotland, 658.

Dobell's Travels in China, 704, 707, 770.

Edinburgh Cabinet Library; Africa, 845, Egypt, 855, 859, 895.

Forster's Natural Phenomena, 763.

Gilly's Waldensian Researches, 458. Garden and Menagerie of the Zoological Society delineated, 545.

Hall's Voyages and Travels, 806, 843. History of Kouli Khan, 423. Harmonicon, 521. Historical Sketch of the Bank of England.

Journal of a Nobleman, 658, 702, 714, 719, 727, 751, 755, 769, 791, 802.

Keppel's Journey across the Balkan, 714, 723, 726, 727.

Lives of Scottish Worthies, 894, 902, 906, 910, 966. Library of the Fine Arts, 913. Lawrence, Sir Thos. Life of, 871, 883, 887, 901, 906, 910.

Memoirs of Van Halen, 815. Metropolitan, The, 827. Macfarlane's Constantinople, 615, 618, 619, 654, 658. Musical Biography, 427, 434, 439 455. Mayor of Garratt, 486.

Natural History, 715, 716.

Ritchie's Romance of History, 716.

Scientific Gazette, 485.

Traveller, Historical, 822, 826, 878.

Westminster Review, 447. Year in Spain, 720, 750.

FINE ARTS.

LIVING PAINTERS.

No. 1. Modern Art, 918. 2. R. Westall, T. Phillips, 926. 3. J. S. Newton, A. W. Calcott. A. E. Chalon, 938. 4. W. Collins, W. Daniell, A. Cooper, 950. 5. J. M. W. Turner. J. Martin, J. Danby, T. Stothard 962, 6. W. Hilton, W. Etty, H. Howard, C. L. Eastlake, 974. 7. Sir M. A. Shee, Sir W. Beechey, Messrs. Jackson, Reinagle, Wilkie, Pickersgill, Chinnery, Morton, and Rothwell, 986.

EXHIBITIONS.

Animals at the Egyptian Hall, 919. Mr Hollins' Exhibition of Sculpture, 923. Leading points in the Exhibition of the Royal Academy, 931. Pictures in Shreds and Patches, 934. Mr Robertson's improvement in Water Colour Painting, 934. Lodge's Illustrious Portraits, 958.

MUSIC.

Bucher, Mr, the Flutist, 1010. Concerts: City, 519. Philharmonic, 591, 639, 686, 694, 759, 807, 902, 951. Paganini's, Signor, 939, 955, 963, 1003, 1011, 1015. Signor Begrez, 923.

Review of, 831, 919, 930, 966, 987, 1003.

DRAMATIC PIECES NOTICED.

Azor and Zemira, 739. Alfred the Great, 815. At home, Mathews and Yates, 779, 791.

Billy Taylor, 479. Barbiere di Seviglia, 535, 539. Ballet, a, 639. Bayadère, La, 943. Bourgmestre de Sardam, 975. Beneficiaire, 975. Beggar's Opera, 1019.

Clarissa Harlowe, 419. Cinderella, 447, 463, 471. Castle of Steinberg, 467. Chaste Salute, 475. Chancery Suit, 503. Comrades and Friends, 555. Ci-devant Jeune Homme, 983. Chiffonier, Le, 983.

Der Freischutz, 671. Dead Shot, 439. Dioramas Stanfield's, 487. Devil's Brother, 531, Duke for a Day, 611. Decorum, 631. Double or Quits, 755.

Everybody's Husband, 767. Emissary, 867.

Fra Diavolo, 455. Fazio, 459. Female Freemason, 683. French Spy, 759.

Grenadier, 491. Galatea, 527, 567. Gipsy Father, 927.

Henri Quartre, 415. Hundred Pound Note, 435, 439. Heretière, l', 443. Hour of Twelve, 511. Highways and Byways, 663.

Irishman in London, 499. Iron Chest, 535. Ice Witch, 731.

King of the Alps, 495. Kind Intentions, 599. King John, 695, 763.

Love in a Village, 999. Lost Son, 482. Legion of Honour, 775. L'Homme de Soixante ans, 991.

Marriage of Figaro, 991. Medea, 863. Macbeth, 659. My Grand Aunt, 635. Mrs G. 623. Marinette, 419. Mary Queen of Scots, 423. Merchant of Venice, 523, 900. Misapprehension, 550. Married Lovers, 539. Much Ado about Nothing, 575. Merry Wives of Barbican, 591. Matrimonio Segreto, 607. My Friend from [illegible] 917.

Digitized by Google

New Way to Pay Old Debts, 539. Neuha's Cave, 735. Nettlewig Hall, 743, 855. Napoleon Buonaparte, 875.

Olympic Revels, 418. Oratorios, 579, 598, 627, 651. 667, 691, 697. Othello, 583.

Pantomimes, 411. Pledge, The, 747. Pirata, Il, 823. Plaideurs. Les, 991.

Richard the Third, 515, 518. Romance of a Day, 527, 551. Reformation, 935.

Somnabule. 535. Semiramide, 943. Three to One 527, 796. Tact, 563. Taken by Surprise, 587. The Times, 803. Timour the Tartar, 879. Ultimo Giorni di Pompei, 679. Tailleur de Jean Ja ques, 1007

William Tell, 343. Williams's Morsels of Mirth, 619. Widow Bewitched, 979.

PERFORMERS NOTICED, WITH DRAMATIC AU THORS, COMPOSERS. DANCERS, &c.

Albert, 447. Albert, Madame, 811. Abbott, 827.

Blanchard, T. 411. Blanchard, 435, 999. Buckstone, 439, 495. Baker, 503. Begrez, 519. Bishop, 526. Braham, 579, 595. 627, 643, 667, 699, 807 999. Barrymore, Mrs, 732. Byfield, Miss, 691. Brunet, 871. Bennett, 567, 639. Blagrove, 902. Bernard (author) 935. Brocard, Miss, 944. Bosi, Michel, 967. Baudin, Madame, 1007.

Collier, 476. Cooper, 543. Cooper, J. 483, 991. Cawse, Miss H., 487, 519, 527, 551, 740. Cooke, 518, 559. Cramer, Miss, 759. Constance, Mademoiselle, 843. Celeste, Mademoiselle. 759, 843, 862. Cooke, T. 732. Curioni. 535, 863.

De Begnis, 535. David, 571, 607, 679. Dowton, 415, 513, 775, 999. Davison, Mrs, 467. Dragonetti, 519, 591. Dando, 519. Dix, Miss, 791.

Elliston, 467. Edwin, Mrs, 511, 635. Egerton, 827.

Farren, 415. 775, 980, 983, 1019, 1024. Foote, Miss, 418, 423, 467, 487. Fredericks, 423, 455, 467, 491, 635. Fitzwalter, 423. Fitzwilliam, Mrs, 439. Forde, Miss, 527. Forrester, 527, 623. Fay, Léontine, 847, 871. Faucit, Miss, 543.

Glover, Mrs, 418, 455, 527, 623, 755, 767, 996, 1020. Gibbs, Mrs, 827, 999. Green, 563, 655, 767, 791, 935, 947. Grant, Miss, 571. Gattie, 1019.

Harley, 415, 535, 732, 775, 996, 1020. Horn, 476. Hill, Benson, 775. Hemmings, 599. Huddart, Miss, 659, 815. Hughes, Miss, 579, 651. Humby, Mrs. 563, 996, 1019. Hummel, 807, 903.

Inverarity, Miss, 427, 447, 463, 471, 487, 740, 799. 902. 999.

Josephine, Madame, 455. Jordan, Mrs, 467. Johnstone, 499.

Knowles (author) 543. Knight, Mrs, 483. King, 411 Keeley, 427, 435, 447, 527, 551, 735, 827, 999. Keeley, Mrs, 827. Kemble, Mis', 459, 575, 695, 763, 787. Kemble, 518, 519. Kemble, C. 695, 819, 996. Kean, 515, 518, 523, 535, 583. 659, 900. Keppel, 759. Kenney (author) 747.

Land, Miss, 991. Livius, Barham (author) 867. Lindley, 579, 591. Liston, 569, 663. Lee, A. (composer) 531, 699, 776. Lablache, 535, 571, 607, 679, 873, 943, 951 Laporte, 984, 991, 1007.

Morton (author) 415. Macready, 415, 515, 543, 659, 815. Meadows, 463. Mordaunt, Miss, 487. Mathews, 495. Mesi, Madame, 519. Morley, 740. Mapleson, Mrs. 691. Montessu, Madame, 535. Mori, 591, 807. Martini, 699. Marschner (composer) 807. Massingham (box-office) 932. Marshall, 935. Mason, 995.

Nicholson, 595, 999.

Orger, Mrs, 663. Oury, 579. Onslow (composer 951.

Perlet, 984. Pelissié, 984. Puzzi, 807. Phillips, H. 579, 591, 595, 627, 651, 699, 807, 867. Paul, 539. Pearson, Miss, 415, 579, 627, 643, 651. Peake (author) 427. Pasta, Madame, 487, 863, 943, 951, 967. Pincott, Miss, 491. Power, 499, 827. Parry, 519. Phillips, Miss, 523, 535, 583, 815. Poole, Miss, 775. Penson, 740. Paton, Miss, 579, 595. 643. Paulin, 871, 991. Potter, 975, 983, 991, 1007.

Reeve, 479, 868. Raymond, 483. Russell, J., 527, 591, 623. Russell, Miss, 595. Rubini, 823, 863, 951. Rubini, Madame. 943. Ries, F. (composer) 951.

Spagnoletti, 475, 391, 559. Sidney, Miss, 475, 980, 1019. Smith, O. 495. Seguin, E. 527, 567, 607, 791. Sapio, 759. Schulz, 759. Stohwasser, Miss 756, 759. Spencer, 759. Stanfield, 732. Sinclair, 531, 651. Stockhausen, Mademoiselle, 591, 759, 951. Santini, 807, 823. Spohr, (composer) 902. Siddons, Mrs, 956, 959. St Ange, Miss, 991. 1007. Stephens, Miss, 1019.

Taylor, Miss, 435, 527, 555, 735, 999. Tree, Miss E. 527, 827, 927. Trueba, de (author) 819, 820. Taglioni, Miss, 824, 919, 943, 967. Taylor, B. 1019.

Vestris, Madam, 418, 435, 455, 487, 491, 567, 587, 611, 702. Vining, 535, 980. Vining, W. 483. 1020. Vernon, Miss, 567.

Webster, 1020. Willman, 591, 639. Wallack, 531, 827. Waylett, Mrs, 415, 627, 643, 651, 667, 669, 775. Wrench, 435. Wilson, 447, 527, 740. Warde, 763, 875. Wilkinson, 599, 755, 759, 947. Weber, (composer) 671. Wood, Mrs, 679. Westmacott, C. M. (author) 743, 855, 881, 902. Wells, Miss, 991, 1019.

Yates, 439. Yates, Mrs, 495.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Adjectives and Substantives, 431. Antimony, 439. Antipathies, 462. Actors, valuation of, 462. Advertising Husbands, 467. Alter et Idem, 491. A-gin-court, battle of, 498. Actress, a feeling one, 534. Acrostic, Nihil, 539. Authors, Treatment of, 539. Absent Lady, 546, Apology for Absence, 547. Affinities, Moral, 547. Arithmetic, New, 573. Authorship, three Estates of, 583. Author, revenge of a neglected one, 619. Ætna, 667. Angel, 671. Affectionate Wolf, 679. Adventure of a Scotch Privateer, 707. Abraham, various accounts of, 743. Atmospheric letter-carrying, 754. American Drawing-room, 762. Ancient Irish, 839. Artist Bewitched, 907 Ancient Carriages, 940. Abuse of Privilege, 995.

Brutality mistaken for Valour, 423. Beauty, A, 424. Brutality and Falsehood, 435. Bath, how to enjoy one, 511. Betterton, 523. Benevolence, 559. Bookseller, a liberal one, 570. Bruce and the Spider, 570. Burns, Illness and Funeral of, 570. Bit of Real Christianity, 595. Bentham, Mr., 622. Boiardi, 695. Bold Experiment, 707. Bears, 708. Beggar and his Dog, 923. British Museum, 930. Boar's Head in Eastcheap, 939. Boulevards of Paris, 994.

Chancellor. reason for making one, 559. Chinese Jests, 566. Absurdities, 699. Funerals 707. Dinner Party, 707. English, 971. Chess, an eternal Game of, 571. Compliment Off-hand, 619. Charlemagne, 620. Ceremony, 630. Curious Experiment, 663. Cobbett, Mr, 679. Curious Ceremonies, 695. Cranmer, 728. Curran, 795. Counterfeit Gold, 802. Clerical Anecdote, 802. Case for the Lawyers, 816. Creed, 851. Charity Prevalent, 867. Coptic Christening, 867. Celsus on Physical Conduct, 876. Charlotte, Princess, 901. City Crows, 924. Cool Revenge, 940. Courtier reproved by a King, 948. Cunning a Poor Quality, 948. Cholera, 1015. Choice of Companions, 1015. Conjugal Affection, 419. Catalepsy on Speculation, 419. Civil Authority, 423. Carissimi Giacomo, 424. Candour, 427. Conversation, 444, 499, 562. Constantine, Grand Duke, 447, Corporal Punishment, 447. Carlo Dolce, 462. Cromwell, Character of, 462. Coffee and Tea, 471. Comets, 483. Court Caution Penetrated, 486. Common-place Novels. 494. Court Courtesy, 498. Cure for Scandal, 499. Clergy, The, 503. Chemical Dangers, 518. Convincing Proof, 527. Conclusive Answers, 530. Castles in the Air, 538. Curious Clock, 538. Consolation under Calumny, 539. Communication with Posterity, 551.

Dance Tune, 427. Diffidence Philosophical, 486. Delicate Flatting, 537. Disloyal Punctuation, 538. D'Urfey, Tom, 539. Double Entendre, 549. Divorce in China, 554. Despot Answered, 654. Doctors, 655. Dramatic Incident in Real Life, 871. Diet to Procure a grateful Old Age, 871. Dry Humour, 899. Dramatists and Managers, 911. Doubly Alone, 919. Divided Unity, 923. Dignity, 939. Dignity and Propriety, 1019.

Extempore Bullet, 419. Equivocal Respect, 434. English Notion of Kings, 462. Echo and a Glutton, 530. Experience v. Nature, 547. Epitaph on a Miser, 547. Ecclesiastical Pastime, 610. Enlightening Question, 658. Extraordinary Rescue, 658. Enemy's Opinion, 687. Effects of Habit, 707. East Wind, 767. English and Continental Meals, 870. Emulation extinguished by Perfection, 971. Etiquette, 1015. Etherege, 915.

Fine Singing 415. Fear, 415. Friendship, Capacity for, 483. Effect of Absence, on, 486. False Punctuation, 498. Fine Sense, 499. Fox, George, 511. Fitzherbert, 530. Force of Habit, 534. 638. Foote and Johnson, 534. Falsehood Branded, 558. Five, the number, 558. Family Antiquity, 562. Female Advancement, 571. Flint Soup, 571. False Position, a, 610. French and English understanding, 631. Female Ingenuity, 654. Four-footed Pauper, 682. Flecher, 703. Floral Calendar, 771. Father's Impulse, 838. Fairyland, 859. Fruit, how to keep in Winter, 862. Flame, (The) and the Tallow, 955.

Good and Bad Books, 463. Good in Evil, 483. Guess, a Shrewd one, 491. Grasping at Too Much, 537. Galileo, 571. Gaming, 611. Good Manners, 630. Garrick, 667, 879.

Handel, 434, 734. Homage to Good Sense, 444. Horne Tooke. 451. Honesty Saves Time, 471. Hope, 471, 851. How will you be Tried, 547. Head Shaking, 599, Happy Combination, 618. Human Musical Instruments, 654. Humility in a Bishop, 911.

Invisible Pavements, 411. Inward Blindness, 423. Injuries from Friends, 451. Integrity, a common species of, 507. Intuition and Sagacity, 530. Innocent Old Woman, 551. Inequality, 570. Ingenious Reckoning, 615. Indifference a Questable Virtue, 661. Infallibility Corrected, 948. Interjections, 538.

Jenyns Soame, 642. Judicious Precaution, 647. Jewish Brandy, 888.

Kit Cat Size, 467. Kosciusko, 546, 767. Kindness of the Venetians, 838.

Letter of the Law, 434. Law, 439. Liking and Dislike, 439. Lully, 463. Love at First Sight, 467. Lilliputian Newspaper, 563. Lavater and Lord Thurlow, 527. Love and Cruelty, 531. Linnæus, 558. Least Happiness Principle, 562. Laughter, 583. Language of Precious Stones, 611. London Sparrows, 928. Lawrence, Sir T., 955.

Merciless Supplanter of Beauty, 415. Maternal Love, 462. Music and Murder, 499. Men of Genius. 530, 554. Mistaking Shells for Kernels, 531. Mind your Q's, 615. Moralist, a Contented one, 662. More, Sir Thomas, 707. Matrimony, 751. Mysterious Numbers, 754. Merit and Demerit, 768. Missionaries in Otaheite, 795. Mehul, 803. Marmontel's Azor et Zemire, 836. Mozart, 871. Metropolis of Rats, 923. Mara, Madame, 955. Marriages for Money, 998. Musical Small-coal Men, 499.

Napoleon's Barber, 534. Natural Mistake, 537. Names and Faces, 538. Newspaper Wonders, 606. Napoleon's Learning English. 622. Name Exchanged for a Title, 895. New Fish Sauce, 915. Not Yet, 955. Nobility Sprung from Trade, 971. Not so Bad, 990. Nothing in Common, 1010.

Ostrich Feathers, 675. Odour from the Rainbow, 851. Opera, The, 924. Oak, The, and the Grass, 971.

Pleasant Blunder, 671. Playhouse, A, 694. Presence of Mind, 724. Petrarch's Library, 768. Pope, 788. Pleasure, 788. Privilege of the Fishes, 979. Poetry and Pastry, 1015. Pride in the Right Place, 419. Porter, 424. Pertinent Answer, 434. Patriots, Whole and Half. 447. Plain Psalm-Singing, 459. Paradise, 463, 771. Politic Resolution. 498. Poet's Criticism, 507. Paste and Diamonds, 534. Partisans, Error of, 554. Prudence Vindicated. 562. Plain-dealing. 590. Parental Severity, 606. Pocock, Dr, 622.

Quid pro quo. 423. Quartett, a pleasing one, 483. Queensberry. Duchess of, 527.

Respect your Friends, 411. Retort Courteous, 427. Royal Sports, 451. Religious Unity, 483. Rising and Falling. 534. Ruling Passion, 538. Royal Play-going, 630. Remarkable Prediction, 654. Racine's Recitation, 661. Religious Liberty, 682. Restored Sight, 682. Ribaldries of Old Writers. 687. Rotten Tree, Attack on, 754. Rammohnu Roy, 806. Rump-steak and Beef-steak, 838. Raffles, Sir S., his Children, and Wild Animals, 915. Republican Equality, 995. Renaud, Mrs, 1011. Romantic Story, 1024.

Salvator Rosa, 439, 462. Striking Reflections, 451. Swan like End. 462. Sluggishness of the People, 479, Seeing the Good One Does, 498. Singular Coincidence. 503. Splendid Image, 507. Saxony, Ladies of, 507. Sleeper, a great one, 527. Self-knowledge, 534. Sleeping in the Right Place, 538. Sidney, Sir Philip, 538. Sympathy, an Affair of Proximity, 547. Spare Diet. 551. Slander, 554. Swift Travelling, 587. Scotch Latin, 587. Single-legged Ladies, 626. Suspicious Speed, 651. Shirt without Seam, 654. Singular Wager, 654. Summary Injustice, 662. Spontaneous Combustion, 662. Students in Painting, 671. Steam Carriages, 679. Strange Countries, 679. Strange Taste, 682. Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, 703. Siberian Butter-Drinkers, 708. Slander nobly Rebuked, 724. Sufficing Reason, 734. Susceptibility, 771. Seamless Boots, 783. Scott, Sir Walter, 803. Sleep Productive of Corpulence, 859. Swift, Dean, 862. Stone, Jerome, 862. Sable Hunting, 886. Scottish Waggery, 907. Social Improvements, 923. Siddons, Mrs, Death of, 956. Funeral of, 983. Singular Will and Funeral, 1019.

Touching Writer, a, 419. Twelfth Night, 431. Tyrant made Useful, 435. True Despatch, 479. Temperance, 503. Turkish Musical Gusto, 527. True Courage, 530. Talma, 534, 611. Thin House, 537. Truth, Real and Seeming, 554. Titles by Prescription, 562. Tragedy and Comedy in One, 691. Tea and Sleep, 691. Theatricals at Santiago, 691. Tables Turned, 703. Terrible Crocodile, 942. Tea and Travellers, 992.

Unenviable Resemblance, 419. Under the Rose, 546. Ugly Disappointment, An, 998.

Voltairiana, 583, 790. Visible Invisibility, 671. Vaucluse, 958.

Wisdom of the Wisest, 435. Worse and Worse, 446. Wit and Luxury, 471. Woman, 503. Words and Actions, 507. Witchery of Genius, 527. Wisdom Shut Out, 658. Wine, How to Cool, 763. Wild Bees, 783.

Young and his Booksellers, 467. Yermalow, General, 810.

Digitized by Google

No 103.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1831.

NEW YEAR'S DAY.

Good morrow, dear Readers, and a happy new year! We believe this is not a very fashionable salutation, but it is a very natural one, and very consistent with natural politeness; and politeness and fashion are two different things, whatever the footmen may think of it. We were going to add another person; but there will be time enough to be disagreeable. The first two days of the year we are resolved to devote to their proper enjoyment. Our illustrious neighbours the French, who now lead the world in serious things as they have long done in lively, have wisely retained the most cheerful of their customs, and, among them, are famous for the vivacity and generosity of their New Year's Day. It has often struck us as an amusing fancy, to consider what the rest of the world are about at such and such a time; what they are doing in China, in Persia, in Italy, in the South Sea Islands. The French, while the reader is perusing this passage (supposing him to be at breakfast), are all preparing for one of the merriest, most social, and most profuse days of the year,—an earnest of that good humoured regard for one another, which will be kept up all the year round, and which distinguishes them so enviably above other nations. It is idle to talk of French vanity; and we are glad to see the phrase going out. No sulky person is ever more foolishly vain, than when he compares himself with the French in this respect, and casts up the account in his own favour. The French think of one another: that is enough. They are in the habit of sympathizing with each other's feelings, of studying each other's wants and inclinations: the pleasure of their fellow-creatures is necessary to their own. Let gloomy egotism be silent before such virtue, and learn to know its teacher.

"To the credit of the kindly and amiable feelings of the French," says Mr Horace Smith, in his new work on Festivals and Games, "they bear the palm from all other nations in the extent and costliness of their new year's gifts." He proceeds to give some account of this festival in Paris; but as the day itself is before us, and the French are concerned, we shall do what he found incompatible with the notices he had to take of so many other holidays, and lay before our readers the passage from which his account is abridged.* We thought to have given our readers, on these Christmas occasions, nothing but what is new, and to have dispensed with extracting from Mr Hone's Every-day Book; not because we have not a regard for it, (we have a great one,) but because it is so well known. For the two reasons however, just mentioned, and to furnish our readers with as lively a sense as possible of what is taking place this day in the great metropolis of freedom and good sense, the passage is here presented them.—The old sentiment is at hand to excuse us;—

"Let those read now who never read before;
And those who always read, now read the more."

'A communication in an English Journal of January 1824 relates, that in Paris on New Year's Day, which is called le jour d'étrennes, parents bestow portions on their children, brothers on their sisters, and husbands make presents to their wives. Carriages may be seen rolling through the streets with cargoes of bon-bons, souvenirs, and a variety of et cæteras, with which little children and grown up children are bribed into good humour; and here and there pastrycooks are to be met with, carrying upon boards enormous temples, pagodas, churches, and play-houses, made of fine flour and sugar, and the embellishments which render French pastry so inviting. But there is one street in Paris to which a New Year's Day is a whole year's fortune; this is the Rue des Lombards, where the wholesale confectioners reside; for in Paris every trade and profession has its peculiar quarter. For several days preceding the 1st of January, this street is completely blocked up by carts and waggons laden with cases of sweetmeats for the provinces. These are of every form and description which the most singular fancy could imagine; bunches of carrots, green peas, boots and shoes, lobsters and crabs, hats, books, musical instruments, gridirons, frying pans, and sauce-pans; all made of sugar, and coloured to imitate reality, and all made with a hollow within to hold the bon-bons. The most prevailing device is what is called a cornet, that is, a little cone ornamented in different ways, with a bag to draw over the large end and close it up. In these things, the prices of which vary from one franc (tenpence) to fifty, the bon-bons are presented by those who choose to be at the expense of them. It would not, perhaps, be an exaggeration to state that the amount expended for presents on New Year's Day in Paris, for sweetmeats alone, exceeds 500,000 francs, or 20,000*l.* sterling. Jewellery is also sold to a very large amount; and the fancy articles exported in the first week in the year to England and other countries, is computed at one fourth of the sale during the twelve months. In Paris it is by no means uncommon for a man of 8,000*l.* or 10,000*l.* a year to make presents on New Year's Day which cost him a fifteenth part of his income. No person able to give, must on this day pay a visit empty-handed. Everybody accepts, and every man gives according to the means which he possesses. Females alone are excepted from the charge of giving. A pretty woman, respectably connected, may reckon her New Year's presents at something considerable. Gowns, jewellery, gloves, stockings, and artificial flowers, fill her drawing-room; for in Paris it is a custom to display all the gifts, in order to excite emulation, and to obtain as much as possible. At the palace the New Year's Day is a complete jour de fête. Every branch of the royal family is then expected to make handsome presents to the king. For the six months preceding January 1824, the female branches were busily occupied in preparing presents of their own manufacture, which would fill at least two common-sized waggons. The duchess de Berri painted an entire room of japanned pannels, to be set up in the palace; and the duchess of Orleans prepared an elegant screen. An English gentleman who was admitted suddenly into the presence of the duchess de Berri two months before, found her, and three of her maids of honour, lying on the carpet, painting the legs of a set of chairs, which were intended for the king. The day commences with the Parisians, at an early hour, by the interchange of their visits and bon-bons. The nearest relations are visited first, until the furthest in blood have had their calls; then friends and acquaintances. The conflict to anticipate each other's calls, occasions the most agreeable and whimsical scenes among these proficients in polite attentions. In these visits, and in gossiping at the confectioners' shops, which are the great lounge for the occasion, the morning of New Year's Day is passed; a dinner is given by some member of the family to all the rest, and the evening concludes, like Christmas Day, with cards, dancing, or any other amusement that may be preferred.'—Hone's Every Day Book.

While we are about it, we will extract another passage relative to the extraordinary amount of New Year's Gifts received by Queen Elizabeth. But first, the reader shall have the remainder of Mr Smith's general account of the holiday.

'It is at once so natural and so laudable,' says he, 'to commemorate the nativity of the new year, which is a sort of second birth-day of our own, by acts of grateful worship to heaven, and of beneficence towards our fellow-creatures, that this mode of its celebration will be found to have prevailed, with little variety of observance, among all ages and people. Congratulations, visits, and presents of figs and dates, covered with gold leaf, are said to have distinguished New Year's Day even in the times of Romulus and Fabius, and to have continued under the Roman emperors, until the practice, being abused into a mode of extortion, was prohibited by Claudius. Yet the Christian emperors still received them, although they were condemned by ecclesiastical councils on account of the pagan ceremonies at their presentation; so difficult was it found, in the earlier ages of Christianity, to detach the newly-converted people from their old observances. The Druids of ancient Britain were accustomed on certain days to cut the sacred misletoe with a golden knife, in a forest dedicated to the gods, and to distribute its branches with much ceremony as new year's gifts to the people. Among the Saxons and northern nations this anniversary was also observed by gifts, accompanied with such extraordinary festivity, that they reckoned their age by the number of these merry-makings at which they had been present. The Roman practice of interchanging presents, and of giving them to servants, remained in force during the middle and latter ages, especially among our kings and nobility; Henry III appearing to have even imitated some of the Roman emperors by extorting them,* and Queen Elizabeth being accused of principally

* We shall notice Mr. Smith's book more particularly on Monday.

* According to Mr Ellis, who quotes Mat hew Paris in proof of his assertion.

Digitized by Google

supporting her wardrobe and jewellery by levying similar contributions. Pins were acceptable new year's gifts to the ladies, as substitutes for the wooden skewers, which they used till the end of the fifteenth century. Instead of this present, they sometimes received a composition in money, whence the allowance for their separate use is still termed "pin-money." In London, New Year's Day is not observed by any public festivity, the only open demonstration of joy is the ringing of merry peals from the belfries of the numerous steeples late on the eve of the old year, until after the chimes of the clock have sounded its last hour. We may have done well to drop what Prynne, in his Histrio-Martix, calls "a mere relique of paganisme and idolatry, derived from the heathen Romans' feast of two-faced Janus, which was spent in mummeries, stage-plays, dancing, and such like interludes, wherein fidlers and others acted lascivious effeminate parts, and went about the towns and cities in women's apparel;" but, however the celebration of New Year's Day may have been disfigured in the earlier ages by pagan associations and superstitious rites, nothing can be more truly Christian than to usher it in with every cheerful observance that may express gratitude towards heaven, and promote a kindly and a social feeling among our friends and fellow-creatures.'—pp. 131—133.

Now for her most gifted Majesty Queen Elizabeth :—

'It appears that the greatest part, if not all the peers and peeresses of the realm, all the bishops, the chief officers of state, and several of the queen's household servants, even down to her apothecaries, master cook, serjeant of the pastry, &c. gave new year's gifts to her majesty; consisting, in general, either of a sum of money, or jewels, trinkets, wearing apparel, &c. The largest sum given by any of the temporal lords was 20*l.*; but the Archbishop of Canterbury gave 40*l.*, the Archbishop of York 30*l.*, and the other spiritual lords 20*l.* and 10*l.*; many of the temporal lords and great officers, and most of the peeresses, gave rich gowns, petticoats, shifts, silk stockings, garters, sweet-bags, doublets, mantles embroidered with precious stones, looking-glasses, fans, bracelets, caskets studded with jewels, and other costly trinkets. Sir Gilbert Dethick, garter king at arms, gave a book of the States in William the Conqueror's time; Absolon, the master of the Savoy, gave a bible covered with cloth of gold, garnished with silver gilt, and plates of the royal arms; the queen's physician presented her with a box of foreign sweetmeats; another physician presented a pot of green ginger, and a pot of orange flowers; her apothecaries gave her a box of lozenges, a box of ginger candy, a box of green ginger, and pots of other conserves. Mrs Blanch a Parry gave her majesty a little gold comfit-box and spoon; Mrs Morgan gave a box of cherries, and one of apricots. The queen's master-cook and her serjeant of the pastry, presented her with various confectionary and preserves. Putrino, an Italian, gave her two pictures; Ambrose Lupo gave her a box of lute strings, and a glass of sweet water; each of three other Italians presented her with a pair of sweet gloves; a cutler gave her a meat knife having a fan haft of bone, with a conceit in it; Jeromy Bassano gave two drinking glasses; and Smyth, the dustman, presented her majesty with two bolts of cambrick.'—Hone's Every Day Book.

Mr Horace Smith thinks, that "unless these donations were upon the calculating principle of do ut des, their reception implies great meanness." Dr Drake, Mr Hone's authority, says that Elizabeth did make returns, but took sufficient care that the balance should be in her favour. It has been part however of the education of royalty, and was still more so in those times, to consider the people's property its own, and that merely to accept a favour was conferring one. Numberless instances might be collected from the History of the Court of England in the time of George III and Queen Charlotte. The case is becoming different now. People gave presents to one another as well as to royalty, in the olden time; but we hear little of them. The monarch was everything. Now we read little of the presents to royalty, and much of those among the French people. Generous and excellent people! The globe will as surely warm and enlighten itself by your example as it goes round the sun.

What presents will not La Fayette have to day! and O'Dillon Barrot! and Dupont de l'Eure, and the gallant students of the schools, and their friends, and their loves, and all the manhood and womanhood of glorious France! We confess we envy them: not for the substance of their gifts, not for the bon-bons, nor the ivory or the gold, nor caskets, nor even the books,—but for the soul of them; for the kind words and encouraging devices; for the power to give, and the understood generosity in receiving; for all which shews them in advance of their species, and able to carry it forward. So far are we in England behind-hand with true sentiment of liberality, that the very word "a gift," whether implying something to give or to receive, makes people recoil with all sorts of doubts of one another; nor can we ourselves, who write as we do, give way to the admiration we have just expressed towards the French nation, without feeling under the revolting necessity of demanding, that nobody will misinterpret us. Were we writing in Paris, we should fear nothing: and into Paris accordingly we pitch ourselves in indignation, taking with us all such of our readers as have a regard for the feelings of others, and know how to multiply their own happiness in witnessing happy faces.

MR PEPYS'S NEW YEARS.

New Year's Eve at the Court of Charles II.—(1662.)—Mr. Povy and I to Whitehall, he taking me thither on purpose to carry me into the ball this night before the king. He brought me first to the duke's chamber, where I saw him and the duchess at supper; and thence into the room where the ball was to be, crammed with fine ladies, the greatest of the court. By-and-bye comes the king and queene, the duke and duchesse, and all the great ones; and after seating themselves, the king takes out the duchesse of York, and the duke, the duchessetof Buckingham, the duke of Monmouth, my lady Castlemaine; and so other lords other ladies; and they danced the brantle.* After that, the king led a lady a single covanto; and then the rest of the lords, one after another, other ladies: very noble it was, and great pleasure to see. Then to country dances, the king leading the first, which he called for, which was, says he, "Cuckolds all awry," the old dance of England. Of the ladies that danced, the Duke of Monmouth's mistress and my lady Castlemaine, and a daughter of Sir Harry de Vicke's, were the best. The manner was, when the king dances, all the ladies in the room, and the queene herself, stand up; and indeed he danced rarely, and much better than the duke of York. Having staid here as long as I thought fit, to my infinite content, it being the greatest pleasure I could wish now to see at court, I went home, leaving them dancing.

Conscientious Precaution.—(New Year's Eve, 1664.)—This Christmas I judged it fit to look over all my papers and books; and to tear all that I found, either boyish, or not to be worth keeping, or fit to be seen, in case it should please God to take me away suddenly. [Yet the Diary, in which this record appears, contained numerous passages which the editor withheld, as being exceedingly unfit to be seen.]

Winding up of Accounts.—(New Year's Eve, 1666.)—To my accounts, wherein at last I find them clear and right; but to my great discontent do find that my gettings this year have been 573*l.* less than my last, it being this year in all but 2986*l.*, whereas, the last I got 3560*l.*; and then again my spendings this year have exceeded my spendings the last, by 644*l.*, my whole spendings last year being but 509*l.*, whereas this year it appears that I have spent 1154*l.*, which is a sum not fit to be said that ever I should spend in one year, before I am master of a better estate than I am. Yet, blessed be God! and I pray God make me thankful for it. I do find myself worth, in money, all good, above 6200*l.*, which is above 1800*l.* more than I was the last year. Thus ends this year of public wonder and mischief to this nation. Public matters in a most sad condition; seamen discouraged for want of pay, and are become not to be governed: nor, as matters are now, can any fleet go out next year. Our enemies, French and Dutch, great, and grow more by our poverty. The Parliament backward in raising, became jealous of the spending of the money; the city less and less likely to be built again; every body settling elsewhere, and nobody encouraged to trade. A sad, vicious, negligent Court, and all sober men there, fearful of the ruin of the whole kingdom this next year, from which God deliver us! One thing I reckon remarkable in my own condition is, that I am come to abound in good plate, so as at all entertainments to be served wholly with silver plates, having two dozen and a half.

SWIFT'S NEW YEARS.

Jan. 1st, (1710-11).—Morning. I wish my dearest, pretty Dingley and Stella a happy new year, and health and mirth, and good stomachs, and Fr's company. Faith, I did not know how to write Fr. I wondered what was the matter; but now I remember I always write paid for, (a mysterious signature, for himself.) Patrick wishes me a happy new year, and desires I would rise, for it is a good fire, and faith it is cold. I was so politick last night with M. D., never saw the like; get the Examiners and read them; the last nine or ten are full of the reasons for the late change, and of the abuses of the late ministry, and the great men assure me they are all true. They are written by their encouragement and direction. I must rise and go see Sir Andrew Fountain, but perhaps to night I may answer M. D's letter; so good morrow my mistresses all, good morrow.

I wish you both a merry new year
Roast beef, mince-pies, and good strong beer,
And me a share of your good cheer,
That I was there, or you were here;
And you're a little, saucy dear.

New Year's Eve. (1712-13.)—I sat with him (Harley, Earl of Oxford, who was ill) while the young folks went to supper, and then went down, where they were all merry together, having turned Lady Oxford up to my Lord; and I stayed with them till twelve. There was the young couple, Lord and Lady Carmaerthen, Lord and Lady Duplin, and Lord Harley and I, and the old folks were together above. It looked like what I have formerly done so often; stealing together from the old folks, though indeed it was not from poor Lord Treasurer, who is as young a fellow as any of us; but Lady Oxford is a mere old woman.

* Branle, Espèce de danse de plusieurs personnes, qui se tiennent par le main, et qui se menent tour-à-tour.—Dictionnaire de l'Academie.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Werner—Davy Jones, or Harlequin and Mother Carey's Chickens.
COVENT GARDEN.—The Chancery Suit—Harlequin Pat, and Harlequin Bat.

For the reasons assigned yesterday, we have nothing fresh to criticise at the theatres. In our next we shall notice the fourth appearance of Miss INVERARITY; and on Tuesday the opening of the Olympic. Meanwhile we have another word or two to say on pantomimes.

There are three faults in the present race of pantomimes: first, their want of any necessary connexion with the exordium; second, the relaxation of the old ties between Harlequin and Columbine on the one hand, and the Pantaloon and Clown on the other, so that there is no eternal running away as formerly on the part of the lovers, nor is the pursuit so zealous on that of the old man and his attendant: and third, the new and preposterous juvenility which Pantaloon has acquired,—his former "lean and slippered state" being nearly gone, and his limbs contradicting his old face with almost as many tricks and gymnastics as those of Harlequin. The Pantaloon at the Adelphi, Mr KING, is a vigorous posture-master; and Mr T. BLANCHARD at Drury Lane is old in nothing but his beard. His hobble is a condescension to his beard. We see plainly he has no occasion for it.

Now in all pantomimes it is material that the original characters be preserved, because the great cause of their popularity is their appeal to a certain large and familiar view of life, and of the persons incidental to different ages and pursuits. Pantaloon is carking old age—the Clown a gluttonous and cowardly mixture of simplicity and cunning,—gross bodily worldliness;—Harlequin, a lover defying obstacles, and turning the most of them to account; or in other words, youth and animal spirit;—and Columbine, female youth, giddy and graceful, who will go through all things for love. Then the pantomime is a perpetual picture of life; its acquired and ignorant sophistication, and its early joy. To alter its characters is to diminish the secret of its attraction.

We know not when the Fairy Tale came to be a common exordium of this lively species of entertainment: perhaps the custom originated with it, in the Italian region common to both. It is a good commencement, because it adds to the youthfulness of the general impression, and accounts for the utmost whims and metamorphoses that ensue.

For all these reasons we take the perfection of a pantomime to consist,—first, in some fairy or other fabulous tale, in which the interest is serious, childish, and wonderful; secondly, in the intermixture of some love-story with this tale, in order to account for the loves of Harlequin and Columbine; thirdly, in a strict adherence to the old age, the gluttonous cowardice, animal spirits, and graceful giddiness of the respective dramatis personæ; fourthly, in the extremest mixture possible of the familiar and the supernatural, in order to shew the extremes affecting the common mind, and the activity with which life goes on in spite of them; and lastly, in fanciful satires upon existing folly, by means of the scenes and transformations, so that the general picture of the world may acquire the force of passing experience.

For the groundwork of his plots, the more works the author gets acquainted with, the better; but he should at all events be a master of the Fairy Tales, of the Arabian Nights, and of popular national stories. Mr Dunlop's History of Fiction is a good book to consult: and he should have a good collection of Mr Newberry's golden books of the nursery.

Almost all the tales of Perrault, we should think, would draw out into good pantomimes, by the help of a love-story, if wanting,—such as Blue Beard, Puss in Boots, the Sleeping Beauty, Ricquet with the Tuft, &c. Cinderella would make such an excellent one, that we suppose it must have been used; which, indeed, is likely to have been the case with those we have named. The story of the Prince Camaral-Yaman and the Princess Badoura, with their beds taken through the air by the Fairy and the Genius, to compare them in, would make a good groundwork. A capital pantomime might be made of Robin Hood. Maid Marian would be the Columbine. She should be the daughter of some rich old lord, and the Clown should have been the gluttonous father confessor.

☞

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

INVISIBLE PAVEMENT.—In some parts of the old town of Lisbon, in which hogs and stray dogs are the only scavengers, it is supposed that the inhabitants have never seen the pavement.—Beckmann's History of Inventions, &c.

RESPECT YOUR FRIENDS.—A young man went to read to Piron a tragedy that was about to be performed; at the continually repeated plagiarisms, the poet took off his cap, and made a courteous bow. The author of the piece, astonished at this perpetual gesture, asked him the reason of it. "It is only a habit I have of saluting my acquaintance," returned the poet.

LEGISLATION OF HENRY VIII.—By the act for annulling the marriage of Henry the Eighth with "the Lady Anne of Cleves," (32 Hen. 8, c. 25), it was enacted that "if any, do by word or deed, accept, take, judge, or believe the said marriage to be good, or procure or do anything for the repeal of this act, he shall be adjudged guilty of high treason, and suffer DEATH accordingly." [The same tyrant, in the following year, procured the attainder of his wife, Katharine, of high treason.]

ONE OF THE USES OF HISTORY.—The villain who has imposed on mankind by his power or cunning, and whom experience could not unmask for a time, is unmasked at length; and the honest man who has been misunderstood or defamed, is justified before his story ends. Or if this does not happen,—if the villain dies with his mask on, in the midst of applause, and honor, and wealth, and power, and if the honest man dies under the same load of calumny and disgrace under which he so undeservedly lived, driven perhaps into exile and exposed to want,—yet we see historical justice executed; the name of the one branded with infamy, and that of the other celebrated with panegyric to succeeding ages.—Bolingbroke. (On the Study of History.)

MILD LEGISLATION OF "THE VIRGIN QUEEN."—In the 14th year of Queen Elizabeth's reign, (cap. 5, anno 1572) a statute passed, by which it was enacted, that "if any be a vagabond above the age of 14 years, he shall be adjudged to be grievously whipped, and burnt through the gristle of the right ear with a hot iron of the compass of an inch, unless some credible person will take him into service for a year. And if, being of the age of 18 years, he after do fall again into a roguish life, he shall suffer death as a felon, unless some credible person will take him into service for two years. And if he do fall a third time into a roguish life, he shall suffer death as a felon." (unconditionally). This abominably cruel statute, to which Elizabeth of course gave her assent and sanction, was permitted to disgrace the Statute-book for many years, and when it was at length repealed, a most severe enactment was substituted. Of a verity, "Law is the perfection of reason!"

HAMMER-CLOTHS.—In this country, a whimsical etymology has been assigned to the modern ornament of the hammer-cloth. It has been supposed, that "when coaches were first introduced, our frugal ancestors used to load the carriage with provisions for the family on their journies; the hamper, covered with a cloth, was both a convenient repository, and a seat for the coachman, and this was afterwards converted into a box: Hammer-cloth is, therefore, very probably, a corruption of hamper-cloth." Into the validity of this conjecture it would be futile to enquire, but whatever may be its merit, it affords, at least, an amusing specimen of the ingenuity exercised by the critics, in their researches into the perplexities of the unde derivata.—Beckmann's History of Inventions, &c.

PRICE OF WINES IN 1553.—By the 7 Edw. VI. c. 5, it was enacted that "no person in England or Wales should utter by retail any wines called Gascoin, Guyon, or French wines, but after the rate of eight pence per gallon at the proof, by any manner of means, colour, engine, or craft; nor any Rochel wines but after the price of four pence the gallon at the most; nor any other wines but at the price of twelve pence the gallon at the most; upon pain that every person doing the contrary thereof, shall forfeit for every such offence £5 of lawful money of England." The same statute enacted that no person, unless possessed of £100 marks a year, or unless he be a peer, or the son of one, should have or keep in his house any greater quantity of any wine than ten gallons, under penalty of £10. [Were it not for the impolitic duties and restrictions on its importation, the people of England might, at the present time, drink French, and other Continental wines, at little more than the price they pay for the drugged compounds called ale and porter.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We must see the great Star of "Brighton" for ourselves, before we can venture to be its harbinger. Perhaps we should hurt its effect, even by repeating our correspondent's announcement.

Digitized by Google

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, the Historical Play, entitled

HENRI QUATRE.

Florence St. Leon, Miss PEARSON,
Clotilde de Biron, Miss MORDAUNT, Louison, Mrs WAYLETT.
Henri Quatre, Mr MACREADY, Duke de Sully, Mr HAMMERTON,
General D'Aumont, Mr LATHAM, Eugene de Biron, Mr COOPER,
Frederick St. Leon, Mr J. VINING. Moustache, Mr FARREN,
O'Donnell, Mr H. WALLACK, Pinçeau, Mr WEBSTER,
Gervaise, Mr BEDFORD, Germain, Mr SALTER,
Jocrisse, Mr HARLEY, Lafleur, (a Page) Miss POOLE.

In Act II—An Incidental Peasants' Dance, by Mons. SIMON.
Principal Dancers—Mr GILBERT, and Mademoiselle ROSALIA GUET.

Previous to the Opera, P. Lindpaintner's Overture to Der Bergkonig, and the National Air, "Vive Henri Quatre."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES;

OR, HARLEQUIN AND MOTHER CAREY'S CHICKENS.

[By Mr Barrymore.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL.
Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY, and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker, 36.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway. Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Allegorical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsters.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr Stanfield.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo. Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands.

On Monday, Pizarro; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, (12th time) a New Play, in Three Acts, called

THE CARNIVAL AT NAPLES.

[By Mr Dimond.]
Duchess di Fontana, Mrs LOVELL,
Aurora di Cosenza, Miss HUGHES,
Zoranthe, Miss H. CAWSE, Rodriga, Mrs TAYLEURE,
Nina, Miss TAYLOR.
Duke di Fontana, Mr EGERTON,
Count Cosenza, Mr BLANCHARD, Manfredi, Mr DIDDEAR,
Valentine, Mr WILSON,
Benedetto, Mr G. BENNETT, Harry Fortescue, Mr ABBOTT,
Dermot O'Donovan, Mr POWER,
Rufo, Mr EVANS, Gasparo, Mr F. MATTHEWS.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN PAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT;

OR, THE GIANT'S CAUSEWAY.

[By Mr Farley.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.

With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr Peake.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr POWER.

Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight.—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and West India Docks.—XI. A Market.—XII. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XIII. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XIV. Windsor Park and Castle.—XV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XVI. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Fog.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

On Monday, Romeo and Juliet; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a New Romantic Allegorical Burletta, in Two Acts, called

THE DEVIL'S DUCAT!

OR, THE GIFT OF MAMMON.

[By Mr Jerrold.]
The Music by Mr G. H. Rodwell.
Sabina, Miss DALY.
Nibbio, (an Usurer) Mr DOWNE, Botta, (a Notary) Mr BAYNE,
Astolpho, Brothers, ruined by Nibbio and Botta. Mr YATES,
Leandro, Brothers, ruined by Nibbio and Botta. Mr HEMMINGS,
Mammon, Mr O. SMITH,
Grillo, (Botta's Servant) Mr BUCKSTONE,

After which, a Domestic Burletta, (in two Acts) called

WRECK ASHORE.

[By Mr Buckstone].
The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.

Act I.—Winter.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Bernard, Mrs DALY. Miles Bertram, Mr YATES,
Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS, Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH,
Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act].

Act II.—Summer.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT!

OR, HARLEQUIN AND THE KING OF THE CATS!

[By Mr Buckstone].
The Overture and Music, by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON, Clown, Mr SANDERS,
Pantaloon, Mr KING.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse Trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night.)—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle, (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring —V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain —VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, the interesting Drama of

INKLE AND YARICO.

[By Colman the Younger.]
Yarico, Miss SOMERVILLE, Wowsky, Mrs VALE,
Narcissa, Miss VINCENT.
Sir Christopher Curry, Mr WILLIAMS, Inkle, Mr C. HILL,
Campley, Mr EDWIN, Medium, Mr GOUGH, Trudge, Mr VALE.

At the end of the First Act of 'Inkle and Yarico,' the SIAMESE YOUTHS will be presented to the Audience. They can only be seen previous to the Half-Price.

After which, a Romantic Drama, entitled

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr Osbaldiston.]
Principal Characters, Miss VINCENT, and Madame SIMON.
Mr OSBALDISTON, and Mr DIBDIN PITT.

To conclude with a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitl

THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT!

OR, HARLEQUIN, JACK OF NEWBURY!

[By Mr W. Barrymore.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr Blewitt.
Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I. Regions of Time.—II. The Town of Newbury (Sunrise).—III. Cabinet in the Widow's Mansion.—IV. Splendid Temple of the New Year.—V. Picturesque Roadside Inn.—VI. Exterior of Public House and Sadler's.—VII. Suspension Bridge over the Menai.—VIII. Quiet Lodgings in a retired Neighbourhood.—IX. Race Course and Grand Stand.—X. Splendid Falls of Tivoli.—XI. Cavern, (Moonlight).—XII. and last. Realms of Bliss in the Regions of Light.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

Coburg Theatre.—Vidocq—Harlequin Silver Penny, Or the Old Woman in the Bottle.

Sadler's Wells Theatre.—Skimmer of the Seas.—Golden Pippin — Harlequin and Mother Goose.

Published by J. Onwhyn, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. Chappel, 98 Royal Exchange; A. Hays, 165 Regent street; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at Ebers's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. Reynell, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

No. 104.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, JANUARY 3, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Festivals, Games, and Amusements, Ancient and Modern. By Horatio Smith, Esquire, 12mo. pp. 382. (Fifth Volume of the National Library.) Colburn and Bentley.

This is a very agreeable compendium of one of the most agreeable of all histories, the amusements of mankind, the holiday part of existence, the sunny side of our moral planet. It is the first work which has comprised such a history in a single volume, or indeed, we believe, in any shape; and has the advantage of being written by a man, who to his known talents adds an especial relish of the subject. The game is not spoiled for want of a good cricket-master. The volume is printed in the usual excellent type of the publishers, which unites modern elegance with the ancient harmlessness to the eye; and, besides a topography of Olympia, and a plate of outlines from the pastimes on the tomb of Scaurus, is adorned with a frontispiece of the Hawking Party, after Wouvermans, fresh with the breath of morning. Wouvermans' landscapes have the "shining morning face" of Shakspeare's school-boy. We fancy the air upon our faces, the horses impatient beneath us, and the cheeks of our fair companions hard and cool with health. Sedentary eyes, hot with reading and late nights, are refreshed with looking at such a print: and yet we cannot add, that the engraving is as good as it might be. It has a worn look. However, it is a great advance beyond the other libraries to have a print after an old master. But why did not Messrs. Colburn and Bentley give us a good sprinkle of cuts out of Strutt and others? They might have been very cheaply done, especially as a selection, and, we are persuaded, would have added extremely to the popularity of the work. We are sorry, also, that Mr Horace Smith has said so much about the Roman pastimes, and so little about those of the East. The Romans were a hard ungenial people, compared with the inhabitants of Asia; and we miss the amusements of other livelier nations, such as the Southern Italians, and the inhabitants of the South Sea Islands. However, these objections are only the result of the abundance he has given us; and not to be ungrateful, we must repeat our approbation of the work, as being highly acceptable, and even unique of its kind; nor can we content ourselves with but one allusion to the lessons of cordial wisdom, which the author takes frequent occasion to inculcate. To take one of the first passages of the book:—

'The greatest minds are known." says Mr Smith, "to have stooped to simplicity," and even to childishness, in their sports. None but a pompous blockhead or solemn prig will pretend that he never relaxes, never indulges in pastime, never wastes his breath in idle waggery and merriment. Such gravity is of the very essence of imposture, where it does not spring, as is frequently the case, from a morbid austerity or morose ignorance. "Let us be wise now, for I see a fool coming," said Plato, when he was once joking with his disciples, and saw a churl of this stamp approaching them. Occasional playfulness indeed seems to be natural to all strong minds. "The most grave and studious," says Plutarch, "use feasts and jests and toys, as we do sauce to our meat." Agesilaus, as everybody knows, amused himself and his children by riding on a stick; the great Scipio diverted himself with picking up shells on the sea shore; Socrates used to dance and sing by way of relaxation; the facetious Lucian and the grave Scaliger have both confessed the pleasure they found in singing, dancing, and music. Mæcenas, with his friends Virgil and Horace delighted in sports and games. Shakespeare played on the bass-viol which he accompanied with his voice; (we should like to know the authority for this) and the witty Swift amused himself with hunting and chasing his friends, the two Sheridans, through all the rooms of the deanery.'—P. 2.

Among the chapters which have most pleased us, on a cursory inspection, is the one upon the amusements of the ancient Jews. "It is pleasing to find a people, the idea of whom has been associated with every species of indignity and severity, so full of hilarity in their natural condition. In our thoughts of old clothesmen and despised shop-keepers we are accustomed to forget that the Jews came from the East, and that they still partake in their blood of the vivacity of their Eastern origin. We forget that they have had their poets and philosophers both gay and profound, and that the great Solomon was one of the most beautiful of amatory poets, of writers of Epicurean elegance, and the delight of the whole Eastern world, who exalted him into a magician. There are plentiful evidences, indeed, of the vivacity of the Jewish character in the Bible. They were liable to very ferocious mistakes respecting their neighbours, but so have other nations been who have piqued themselves on their refinement; but we are always reading of their feasting, dancing and singing, and harping and rejoicing. Half of David's imagery is made up of allusions to these lively manners of his countrymen. But the Bible has been read to us with such solemn faces, and associated with such false and gloomy ideas, that the Jews of old become as unpleasant though less undignified a multitude in our imaginations as the modern. We see as little of the real domestic interior of the one as of the other, even though no people have been more abundantly described to us. The moment we think of them as people of the East, this impression is changed, and we do them justice. Moses himself who notwithstanding his share of the barbarism above-mentioned was a genuine philolospher and great man, and is entitled to our eternal gratitude as the proclaimer of the Sabbath, is rescued from the degrading familiarity into which the word Moses has been trampled, when we read of him in D'Herbelot as Moussa Ben Amran, and even Solomon becomes another person as the Great Soliman or Soliman Ben Daoud, who had the ring that commanded the genii, and sat with twelve thousand seats of gold on each side of him, for his sages and great men. But to our author:

'The Hebrews, so far from being an austere or unjoyous people, seem to have eagerly seized every opportunity that afforded them a reasonable excuse for festive hospitality. That this natural cheerfulness sometimes pushed them to excess, even in their religious festivals, is sufficiently attested by the mode in which they celebrated the feast of Purim, which it must, however, be recollected was not of Mosaic Institution; after several strange, and not very decorous, indignities heaped upon the effigy of Haman, they were accustomed to spend the rest of the day in feasting, sports, and dissolute mirth, each sex dressing themselves in the clothes of the other, and practising a variety of mad frolics, while the Rabbins, pretending that Esther obtained the deliverance of her countrymen by intoxicating Ahasuerus, allowed the people to stupify themselves with drink. Excesses such as these, especially in connexion with religious observances, it is not intended to vindicate; they are merely introduced as tending to exculpate the Jews from the charge of ascetical severity, to which they have been sometimes subjected.'—P. 22.

When the clergy write their next pamphlets about the present distresses they will do well to consider the following highly interesting passages:—

'When Job wishes to describe the avarice and hard-heartedness of the wicked, he says, "They take away the sheaf from the hungry, which make oil within their walls, and tread their wine presses, and suffer thirst;" and in proof that this construction of the Mosiac ordinance is supported by the practices of the Ancient Jews, Michaelis (art. 130) quotes the following Rabbinical doctrine:—"The workman may lawfully eat of what he works among; in the vintage he may eat of grapes; when gathering figs he may partake of them; and in harvest he may eat of the ears of corn. Of gourds and dates he may eat of the value of a denarius." Moses has not even forgotten the poor wanderers who were exposed to casual hunger, in which case he seems to have imagined that the natural right of food superseded all laws of property; and has allowed the eating of fruits and grapes in other people's gardens and vineyards without restraint.

'Not content with these ordinances, so obviously meant to secure to all animated beings stated periods of rest, and an equal enjoyment of the produce of the earth and the blessings of existence Moses extended his benevolent regulations even to inanimate nature, by ordering that in every seventh year the land itself should remain untilled, that it might enjoy the sabbath of the Lord. During this fallow year, the corn fields were neither sown nor reaped; the vines were unpruned, and there were no grapes gathered; the whole of Palestine continued a perfect common, and everything reverted, as it were, to a state of nature. This repose of the soil was to be consecrated to God, who declared that all his creatures, both of the human and inferior species, might then assert an equal right to the spontaneous produce of the earth. Whatever grew, instead of being the property of any individual, belonged alike to all, to the poor, the bond-man, the day labourer, the stranger, the cattle that ranged the fields, the very game that no man durst then scare from his grounds. During this continued festival, debts were forborn or forgiven; and bond-servants, who had served a certain number of years, might demand their manumission. It has been conjectured, that the chief object of this singular law was not only to teach the Hebrews, that their land was the Lord's property, but to promote the accumulation of corn in stores, and thus guard against a famine, the importance of which precaution Moses must have known from Joseph, and the practice of Egypt. The liberated bond-servants, whose masters were bound by the benevolent injunctions of Moses, to present them among other things with one or two sheep, were enabled also, during this year of release, not only to procure a maintenance for themselves, but to find pasturage for their cattle, and to lay the foundation of a little flock. How a nation of husbandmen could find occupation without tillage, or avoid the pernicious effects of a whole year's idleness, we have no means of judging. Their games and amusements, whatever was their nature, must have been called into active exercise.

Digitized by Google

'But the greatest, most general, and most glorious festival ever recorded in history, or practised by any people, was the demi-centennial jubilee, at the commencement of which the glad sound of trumpets and of rams' horns proclaimed liberty throughout the whole land; whatever debt the Hebrews owed to one another, was to be wholly remitted; hired as well as bond servants were set free; and the inheritances that had been alienated, reverted to their original proprietors. During this whole period, as in the sabbatical year, no servile work was to be performed, the land was to remain untilled, and its spontaneous produce belonged to the poor and needy.

'By this law Moses probably intended to bring back the nation to its original state, to preserve equality among the people, and to prevent that tendency to accumulation which rapidly divides a community into a few rich and numerous body of poor.—P. 24.

The following is a good account of the favourite and ferocious pastime of the much over-rated Romans:

'Some time before the day of engagement, the president of the games announced by handbills, or occasionally by a picture of the intended engagement, exposed in some public place, the number and quality of the gladiators, as well as their names and the marks by which they were distinguished—for each assumed a particular badge, such as the feathers of the peacock or some other bird. On the morning of the spectacle, they began by fencing and skirmishing, as a sort of prelude, with wooden foils and staves, after which they armed themselves with real weapons of all sorts, and proceeded to action. The first blood drawn produced the cry of "he is wounded;" and if at the same time the wounded party lowered his arms, it was considered as an acknowledgment of his defeat. His life, however, depended on the spectators, or on the president of the games; but if, at this moment, the Emperor happened to arrive, the gladiator was spared as an act of grace, sometimes unconditionally, sometimes with the understanding that if he should recover from his wounds he was not to be exempted from future combats. In the ordinary course of things, it was the people who decided upon the life and death of the wounded combatant; if he had conducted himself with skill and courage, his pardon was almost always granted; but if he had betrayed any cowardice in the engagement, his death-warrant was generally pronounced. In the former case, the people displayed the hand with the thumb doubled under the fingers; in the latter, they extended the hand with the thumb raised, and pointed towards the bleeding wretch, who so well understood the fatal nature of this signal, that he was accustomed, as soon as he perceived it, to present his throat to the adversary, in order to receive the mortal thrust.'—P. 98.

Here follows another excellent lesson to the clergy or rather to the rigidly righteous who to do the church of England justice are not so abundant in their ranks as out of them.

'From the time of the Revolution there has been an increasing tendency to compel a vigorous observance of the sabbath, until in the present days it begins to savour strongly of puritan bigotry and intolerance. Deeply as we respect the motives of the good and pious men who would restrict the bulk of the people from all recreations, however innocent, on the only day when they can enjoy them, we still presume to think they may push this austerity too far. If our universal Father and Creator delights, as he unquestionably must do, in the happiness of his creatures, what can be more acceptable to him than the sight of those innocent enjoyments in which they may indulge after the performance of public worship?—what devotion so pure and ardent as the harmless of a grateful heart? "Cheerfulness," says Addison, "is the best hymn to the Divinity." Even Dr Watts admits that, "religion never was designed to make our pleasures less:" and if this be true, why should we object, after performance of the stated worship, to any recreation, any amusement whatever, provided always that it be of an unobjectionable nature? It is high time, even for the sake of religion herself, to shake off those pharisaical austerities, which, in the minds of the vulgar, tend to associate her with gloom, sadness, mortification, and ennui.

'The great demoralization of the age has not unfrequently been attributed to sabbath-breaking, in which offence are included the after church water-parties of the cooped-up Londoners, who, on this only day of relaxation, crowd to Richmond to walk in the meadows, and admire the beautiful scenery. Surely this is a lamentable mistake! An habitual disregard of its enjoined observances, and a desecration of the Sabbath by dissolute indulgencies may doubtless lead to all sorts of immorality and vice; but such profanation is not the prevailing characteristic of the lower classes in England. On the contrary, there is perhaps no country in the world where the Sunday is in general more rigorously observed; and, unfortunately, there are few which stand so low in the scale of morality when compared with other nations. For many centuries the sabbath afternoon was appropriated, in our own country, to all sorts of sports and pastimes, as it still continues to be throughout the greater part of modern Christendom. If we weigh present England, as to morality, crimes, and misdemeanors, either with her former self, or her modern neighbours, shall we find that the severity and gloom of her sabbaths have afforded an increased security against crimes? Alas, we fear not. May there not even be a suspicion, that by denying open and innocent recreations to the people on their sole holiday, we have driven them into ale-houses and other covert haunts of vice, and thus aided the demoralization we were seeking to prevent.'—P. 127.

We take no notice at present of the Holiday Sports, the dancing, &c. which we shall have occasion to refer to from time to time, but shall conclude with two passages respecting card playing and chess.

'The celebrated Mr Locke is reported to have been once in company with three distinguished noblemen, Lords Shaftesbury, Halifax, and Anglesea, who proposed cards; when Mr Locke declined playing, saying, he would amuse himself by looking on. During the time these noblemen were at play, he was observed to busy himself by writing in his table book. At the conclusion of the play, Lord Anglesea's curiosity prompted him to ask Locke what he had been writing. His answer was, "In order that none of the advantages of your conversation might be lost, I have taken notes of it;" and producing his note book, it was found to be the fact. The inanity of such a collection of disjointed jargon, it is said, had the desired effect on the three noble philosophers; the reproof was not lost upon them; and cards were never again attempted to be substituted for rational conversation; at least in the presence of Mr Locke.—P. 325.

'In the chronicle of the Moorish Kings of Grenada, we find it related, that in 1396, Mehemed Balba seized upon the crown in prejudice of his elder brother Juzaf, whom he ordered to be put to death, that he might secure the succession of his own son. The alcaid despatched for that purpose found the prince playing at chess with a priest. Juzaf begged hard for two hours respite, which was denied him; at last, though with great reluctance, the officer permitted him to play out his game; but, before it was finished, a messenger arrived with news of the sudden death of Mehemed, and the unanimous election of Juzaf to the crown.

'We record the following anecdote as a warning to such of our male and married readers as may be in the perilous habit of playing chess with a wife. Ferrard, Count of Flanders, having constantly defeated the countess at chess, she conceived a hatred against him, which came to such a height, that when the count was taken prisoner at the battle of Bovines, she suffered him to remain a long time in prison, though she could easily have procured his release.'—P. 332.

'Our Charles I was thus occupied when he was informed that the Scots had finally resolved to sell him to the parliament; but he was so intent upon the game, that he finished it with great composure. Innumerable are the similar instances that might be adduced to prove the deep fascination which this bewitching game exercised over the minds of those who lend themselves to its seductions.

'The chess-board, the number of pieces, and the manner in which they are played, do not appear to have undergone much, if any, variation for several centuries, though the forms and names have suffered material change. The rock, or fortress, we have corrupted into a rook; the bishop was with us formerly an archer, while the French denominated it alfin and fol, which were perversions of the original oriental term for the elephant. The ancient Persian game of chess consisted of the following pieces, which were thus named when they reached Europe:

'1. Schach. The King. 2. Pherz. The Vizier or General. 3. Phil. The Elephant. 4. Aspen Suar. The Horseman. 5. Ruch The Dromedary. 6. Beydal. Foot-soldier.

The public are much indebted to Mr Horace Smith, not merely for an abundance of amusing information now brought together for the first time from the pages of Messrs Brand, Strutt, Hone, &c. and Michaelis, and Barthelemy, but for the spirit in which it is which executed, and the genuine good-heartedness and cheerful philosophy by which the writer has shown himself the friend of his species.

Digitized by Google

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

VOLTAIRE'S STATUE.—The King of Prussia having desired D'Alembert to fix the amount of his subscription to Voltaire's Statue, the philosopher said, "A crown, sire, and your name."

FINE SINGING.—The Abbé Galiani being one day present at the French Court Theatre, when everybody round him was in ecstacies at Mademoiselle Arnoud's singing,—his opinion of it being asked, he answered, "It is the finest asthma that I ever heard."

LASTING FONDNESS.—A Senator of Dijon having been buried a whole year, lifted up his hand to embrace his wife's neck when she was laid in the same tomb.—[This is the old story of Abelard.]

The passion of fear determines the spirit to the muscles of the knees, which are instantly ready to perform their motion; by taking up the legs with incomparable celerity, in order to remove the body out of harm's way.—Descartes.

A MERCILESS SUPPLANTER OF BEAUTY.—A sour gruff look is very unnatural, and to put it on often, will make it settle, and destroy the beauty and pleasantness of the aspect to that degree, that 'tis never to be recovered: from whence you may conclude it a foolish custom.—Marcus Antoninus.

AN AWKWARD MISTAKE.—Some persons having dressed up a figure in a wig, which they called Tom Paine, and set fire to it, a mob collected. A spectator seeing one individual particularly delighted, enquired of him who the person was they were thus burning in effigy? The fellow replied, he did not exactly know, but he supposed he was some Bishop!—Something like this occurred when Rousseau obtained leave to return to Paris. He showed himself in the public walks, where he was followed by crowds. The people were asked what had brought them there? They answered that they came to see Jean Jacques. When interrogated who this Jean Jaques was, they answered, they did not know, but they came to see him!

ECCLESIASTICAL ESTABLISHMENT IN HOLLAND COMPARED WITH THAT IN ENGLAND.—Our ecclesiastical polity in Holland, is, in my opinion, preferable to your's in England, on several accounts. First, in the people's having a share in choosing their own teachers for themselves. Secondly, in the clergy's not being so subject to intrigue, rivalship, and fawning for preferments as they are with you. Thirdly, in the greater equality of their incomes, which renders them less subject either to pride or contempt. No clergyman in the province of Holland has less than forty pounds a year, and no one more than 240*l.* Fourthly, in the manner of receiving their income, in settled sums quarterly from the magistrates; which lessens their concern about temporal matters,—prevents all law suits—disputes with their parishioners. Fifthly, in their being wholly unconcerned with the civil government, which keeps them out of party quarrels, and gives them more time to attend to their proper employment.—From M. Sayer.—See Spence's Anecdotes, p. 81.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Henri Quatre—Davy Jones, or Harlequin and Mother Carey's Chickens.

COVENT GARDEN.—The Carnival at Naples—Harlequin Pat, and Harlequin Bat.

DRURY LANE.

THE play of Henri Quatre, which was performed here on Saturday evening, is an agreeable production. Its title announces what it is,—a display of Henry the Fourth under his most favourable aspect; wishing well to his subjects, winning his way to the throne by kindness as well as valour, and making a little love as he goes. There is nothing said of his famous speech, "I am the state:" nor of his stinginess to D'Aubigne; nor his indifference to men of letters; nor his wishing to hinder people from marrying young ladies on whom he had set his eye; nor his manifestoes against his wife. And in truth Henri was a very good King, inasmuch as he had been bred like a man; though he turned out in many respects an indifferent man, inasmuch as he became a King. He was, however, a gallant captain, a generous conqueror, and a most excellent Bourbon; justly prized by his posterity, and thrust forward by them on all occasions, to procure them a little popularity. We believe the present piece is from the French, by Mr MORTON; and conclude it to have been written during the reign of the late house, for we remember it coming out some years back. We began thinking the other night how long this best of the Bourbon Kings would last as a stage hero; and at what time the great republicans would come into play, or the poets and philosophers. There have, indeed, been symptoms of this kind of novelty of late years, which were also imitated from the French. Somebody gave us the younger days of Shakspeare. In France, there have been several stage personations of men of genius. We do not desire it much for the sake of the men of genius. It is less perilous for an actor to personate a King than a poet. But, as in the case of the proposed monument of Shakspeare (by the bye, what is being done with it?) we desire it for the sake of the world.

Mr MACREADY, with his fine feeling voice, and his intermixtures of dignity and familiarity, makes a very good Henry. Probably a little more quickness occasionally is wanting,—a little more bluntness and brusquerie, as in the scene with the old grumbling soldier. Our first impulse, when he showed an intimation to shake off the familiarities of the villager, who does not know him, was to think it wrong; but a moment's reflection convinced us that he had taken a right view of the matter. Kings, however they may choose to be familiar when it pleases them, and however superior to their tribe in general they may be in themselves, never heartily allow of familiarities in a subject. The best of them cannot afford it,—by office. Mr HARLEY makes a good presumer; Mr FARREN a good Moustache, though no robust character suits him as it does DOWTON; and Mrs WAYLETT is much to be commended in the village wife, who is so proud of being kissed by his Majesty. She took her seat well by his Majesty's side, dancing upon it, as she sat, in the joy of her heart; and it was very good bye-play, when she adjusted and fairly patted the train of her fine dress upon the ground, to make it lie well, and then looked back upon it as she went strutting along. But has she no other pretty song to give us, than Come where the Aspens Quiver? If Miss PEARSON does not get a little more animation, we must positively begin to protest.

Either the procession at the end of this piece is altered from what it used to be, or a critic of a very lively sort, whose remarks it called to mind, took the friars in it for bishops. There is a bishop in it now; but on the occasion we allude to, there was, if we mistake not, a whole bench of them in motion. Probably a similar temptation to be lively on the part of the spectators in general, to the one in question, put an end to it. We shall relate the criticism, precisely as we overheard it, trusting that due allowance will be made for the blunt profession of the critic, and that the plain-spokenness of the recital will be forgiven for the sake of the irresistible gaiety of effect, which the words had upon the polite persons all round him. We speak of a young midshipman, round-faced and jovial, who came in at half-price during the first representation of this piece, evidently after his second bottle, and seated himself at the back of one of the boxes in the dress circle. He had given divers intimations of a wish to express his opinion, by certain inarticulate mutterings, accompanied with giggle, which the ladies heard not without trepidation. The gentlemen looked angry, but the good humour of his face disarmed them. A just consideration was had also for the bit of white on his collar. "Oh ho," said he, at length becoming audible,—though with an articulation suitable to his two bottles,—"here comes a procession."—A dead silence all round him,—a great gravity. At this juncture, on came the bishops.

"Ecod"—(and here he laughed) "there are those damn'd fellows the bishops!"—Here the ladies put their hands to their mouths, and the gentleman could not help smiling.

The bishops were followed by an archbishop, or by some prelate moving by himself, and this reverend personage happened unfortunately to be a big man. Our midshipman was highly tickled at this sight, though the weight of his port kept him motionless; and in a tone indescribably mingling glee, astonishment, and intoxication, he uttered as loudly as he could,

"What a damn'd large bishop!"

The effect was irresistible. The ladies laughed out; the gentlemen rolled. We forget what ensued; but it was nothing to the disadvantage of the speaker. His good-humoured face had secured his pardon. ☞

Digitized by Google

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, the Tragic Play of PIZARRO.
[By Mr Sheridan].
Cora, Miss PHILLIPS, Elvira, Mrs FAUCIT.
Rolla, Mr WALLACK,
Ataliba, Mr YOUNGE, Orozembo, Mr J. VINING,
Alonzo, Mr COOPER,
Las Casas, Mr THOMPSON, Sentinel, Mr SALTER,
Pizarro, Mr H. WALLACK,
In Act II—The Temple of the Sun.—High Priest, Mr HORN,
Priests, Virgins, Matrons, &c.—Misses BYFELD, S. PHILLIPS, RUSSEL, Mrs BEDFORD.—Messrs BEDFORD, BLAND, YARNOLD.

Previous to the Play, (1st time in this Country) P. Lindpainter's Overture to "Der Vampyr."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called
DAVY JONES;
OR, HARLEQUIN AND MOTHER CAREY'S CHICKENS.
[By Mr Barrymore.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL,
Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY, and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker, 36.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway. Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Allegorical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsters.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr Stanfield.
The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long,—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo. Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, The School for Scandal; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, the Tragedy of
ROMEO AND JULIET.
[By Shakspeare].
Juliet, Miss FANNY KEMBLE,
Lady Capulet, Mrs LOVELL, Nurse, Mrs GIBBS.
Romeo, Mr ABBOTT,
Prince Escalus, Mr HENRY, Paris, Mr DURUSET,
Mercutio, Mr C. KEMBLE.
Benvolio, Mr BAKER, Tybalt, Mr DIDDEAR,
Montague, Mr TURNOUR, Capulet, Mr EGERTON,
Friar Lawrence, Mr WARDE,
Page, Miss FORTESCUE, Friar John, Mr MEARS,
Apothecary, Mr MEADOWS, Balthazar, Mr IRWIN,
Samson, Mr ATKINS, Peter, Mr KEELEY.
In Act I. A Masquerade and Dance.
In Act V. The Funeral Procession of Juliet, and a Solemn Dirge.

Previous to the Tragedy, Mozart's Overture to "Die Zauberflote."

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called
HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT;
OR, THE GIANT'S CAUSEWAY.
[By Mr Farley.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.

With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr Peake.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.

Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight.—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and West India Docks.—XI. A Market.—XII. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XIII. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XIV. Windsor Park and Castle.—XV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XVI. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Fog.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, The Chancery Suit; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, (in two Acts) called
WRECK ASHORE.
[By Mr Buckstone].
The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.

Act I.—Winter.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Bernard, Mrs DALY. Miles Bertram, Mr YATES,
Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS, Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH,
Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act].

Act II.—Summer.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called
WAS I TO BLAME?
[By Mr G. H. Rodwell].
Julia, Mrs YATES.
Melville, (a Banker) Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Matthew Multiply, (Melville's head Clerk) Mr BAYNE.

To which will be added,
A DEAD SHOT.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called
GRIMALKIN THE GREAT!
OR, HARLEQUIN AND THE KING OF THE CATS!
[By Mr Buckstone].
The Overture and Music, by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON, Clown, Mr SANDERS,
Pantaloon, Mr KING.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse Trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night.)—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle, (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn. Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, (1st time) an entirely new Drama, entitled
NANCY OF PORTSMOUTH.
Nancy Bloomfield, Miss SOMERVILLE, Constantia, Miss JORDAN,
Kitty Bustle, Miss VICENT, The Widow Crabjuice, Mad. SIMON,
Old Margery, Mrs ROGERS, Becky Sims, Miss NICOL,
Sir Edward Gayton, Mr GOUGH, Frederick Gayton, Mr EDWIN,
Captain Splashaway, Mr HICKS, Joe Barton, Mr C. HILL,
Fiary Ned, Mr D PITT, Tim Tipple, Mr VALE,
Bounce, Mr ROGERS, Capt. Friendly, Mr LEE. Tapwell, Mr HOBBS
Jemmy Gonimble, Mademoiselle ROSIER,
Long Bill, Mr ALMAR, Short Bill, Mr WEBB.
After which, the much admired Petite Drama, entitled
"NO!"
The Principal Characters by Miss SOMERVILLE. Mad. SIMON, and Miss NICOL. Messrs D. PITT, WILLIAMS, EDWIN, and ROGERS.

To conclude with a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled
THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT!
OR, HARLEQUIN, JACK OF NEWBURY!
[By Mr W. Barrymore.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr Blewitt.
Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I. Regions of Time.—II. The Town of Newbury (Sunrise).—III. Cabinet in the Widow's Mansion.—IV. Splendid Temple of the New Year.—V. Picturesque Roadside Inn.—VI. Exterior of Public House and Sadler's.—VII. Suspension Bridge over the Menai.—VIII. Quiet Lodgings in a retired Neighbourhood.—IX. Race Course and Grand Stand.—X. Splendid Falls of Tivoli.—XI. Cavern, (Moonlight).—XII. and last. Realms of Bliss in the Regions of Light.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

Coburg Theatre.—Richard Turpin—Ambrose Gwinett—Harlequin Silver Penny.

Sadler's Wells Theatre.—Skimmer of the Seas.—Harlequin and Mother Goose.

Published by J. Onwhyn, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. Chappel, 98 Royal Exchange; A. Hays, 165 Regent street; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at Ebers's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. Reynell, Printers, Bread street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 105.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 4, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

MOORE'S LIFE OF BYRON.

In consequence of a mistake with the advertisement respecting it, which was not sent to the daily papers in time to appear on the proper day, the review of this work will not appear in the TATLER till next Thursday.

Festivals, Games, and Amusements, Ancient and Modern. By Horatio Smith, Esq., 12mo. pp. 382. (Fifth Volume of the National Library.) Colburn and Bentley.

[Second Notice.]

Of a work written in the spirit we have described, we cannot give a better recommendation than by enumerating the contents of the chapters. These are, — Festivals, Games, and Amusements, Ancient and Modern—Ditto of the Ancient Jews—Ditto of the Ancient Greeks — Ancient Greek and Roman Drama — Public Games of the Grecians — The Olympic Games — Games of the Ancient Romans—Gladiatoral Games—Modern Festivals, Games, and Amusements — Holiday Notices — Field Sports, Hawking, Archery, &c.—Bull-fights and Baiting of Animals — Dancing — Morris Dancers — Jugglers — Sedentary Amusements; Music, Minstrels, &c. — Cards — Chess — English Drama — Play-house Notices.

Besides the omissions before spoken of, we miss a notice of the humbler amusements out of doors, cricketing, tennis, &c., and within doors, blind-man's-buff, the Christmas forfeits, &c., which, however childish they may seem, are often curious and amusing in their origin, may be very gracefully treated of, and certainly would not be reckoned beneath his notice by the good-natured sense of Mr Smith. But in first works of this sort, especially of so comprehensive a nature, there is naturally something left undone. The author has explained in the preface how it is that he has said nothing of Tilts and Tournaments, which fall within the province of another volume of the National Library.

We proceed to make some further extracts, equally creditable as the former ones to the author's wise humanity.

FIELD SPORTS.—'Field sports are, perhaps, the most ancient of all bodily exercises. Upon this point the holy Scripture agrees with the fabulous traditions of the poets, for it tells us that Nimrod was a "mighty hunter before the Lord," and it is worthy of remark, that he was the first who oppressed or enslaved his own species. Hunting, proscribed in the book of Moses, is apotheosised in the pagan theology, under the special patronage of Diana. In the early ages of the world it was a necessary labour of self-defence, rather than a pastime. To protect the flocks, herds, and crops from the ravages of those beasts which were in a state of natural hostility to man, was a measure of the first urgency. Some of these wild animals supplied a wholesome food, the skins of nearly all were valuable for clothing, and thus interest soon began to add new incentives to the task of hunting. By the law of their nature the different species destroyed one another, and man destroyed them all, availing himself for this purpose of the advantages ensured to him by the possession of reason, and calling to his assistance all the resources of art. Every nation has practised hunting, but it has invariably been addicted to it in the exact proportion to the want of civilization. With barbarians, it is a business on which they often depend for food and necessaries: in a more advanced state of society, when this excuse no longer exists, and when it is solely directed against inoffensive creatures, it becomes a wanton cruelty.'

* * * * * *

'Hunting constituted an essential part of the education of a young English nobleman so early as the ninth century, and probably long before it. Although it had not been thought necessary to teach Alfred the Great his letters before he was twelve years of age, we learn from his biographer, that he was already "a most expert and active hunter, and excelled in all the branches of that most noble art." When his grandson, Athelstan, had obtained a signal victory over Constantine, King of Wales, he imposed upon him a yearly tribute of gold, silver, and cattle, to which was added a certain number of hawks, "and sharp-scented dogs fit for hunting of wild beasts." Deriving their origin from the same source as the Saxons, the Danes evinced a similar predilection for the pleasures of the chace; and Canute imposed several restrictions upon the pursuit of game, which were equally severe and unprecedented. During the short restoration of the Saxons, field sports maintained their ascendancy. Edward the Confessor, though he was more of a monk than a monarch, "took the greatest delight to follow a pack of swift hounds in pursuit of game, and to cheer them with his voice." He was equally pleased with hawking, and every day after Divine service, he spent his time in one or other of these favourite pastimes. Harold, his successor, rarely travelled without his hawk and his hounds, which, indeed, were the usual companions of a nobleman at this period.

'But it was during the tyrannical government of William the Norman, and his immediate successors, that the game laws assumed their most oppressive and cruel character. Under the pretext of hindering the destruction of the game, but in reality to prevent popular resistance to the new government, they disarmed the people; while they reserved the exclusive right of hunting and sporting to the king, and to those on whom he should bestow it, who were only his barons, chiefs, and feudatories. This was part and parcel of the feudal system, exercised over a conquered nation, and well adapted, perhaps, to the ferocious and ignorant victors, who delighted in a sport which, by its pursuit and slaughter, bore some resemblance to war. In all feudal institutions, the commonalty are forbidden from carrying arms, as well as from using dogs, nets, snares, or other engines for destroying the game. A law so unnatural, and one which there was such constant opportunities to infringe, could only be inforced by the most sanguinary and inhuman edicts; and we find, therefore, that the Norman conqueror exercised the most horrid tyrannies, not only in the ancient forests, but in the new ones, which he made by overthrowing churches and villages, and depopulating whole tracts of country. To destroy any of the beasts of chase within the wide limits of these royal hunting grounds, was as penal as the death of a man; a stag, indeed, although only kept to be killed for pastime, was deemed a much more valuable life than that of a peasant; and even the dogs of the poor obtained more lenient treatment than that of their owners. All those found in the royal chases, except such as belonged to privileged persons, were simply subject to be maimed, by having the left claw cut from their feet, unless they were redeemed by a fine. In the extension of this usurped state of royalty, King John laid a total interdict upon the winged as well as the four-footed creaturks: capturam aviuin pas totam Angliam interdixit, says Matthew Paris. By the charters extorted from this odious tyrant, many of the royal enclosures were dis-afforested or stripped of their oppressive privileges, while the general regulations touching the ferræ naturæ were considerably modified in their severity. Such was the worthy origin of our game-laws, whereof enough still remains to make them a demoralizing curse to the commonalty, and a crying shame to the legislature.

'The despotism of the monarch in all that bore relation to field sports, soon began to be imitated by the nobles, on whom was devolved the royal cruelty as well as right, as we learn from a writer of the twelfth century, when the rigour of the law was somewhat abated. "In our time, says the author, the nobility think it the height of worldly felicity to spend the whole of their time in hunting and hawking; accordingly they prepare for them with more solicitude, expense, and parade, than they do for war; and pursue the wild beasts with greater fury than they do the enemies of the country. By constantly following this way of life, they lose much of their humanity, and become as savage nearly as the very beasts they hurt. Husbandmen, with their harmless herds and flocks, are driven from their well-cultivated fields, their meadows and their pastures, that wild beasts may range in them without interruption." And he continues, addressing himself to his unfortunate countrymen; "If one of these great and merciless hunters shall pass by your habitation, bring forth hastily all the refreshment you have in your house, or that you can readily buy or borrow from your neighbours, that you may not be involved in ruin, or even accused of treason."

'Edward III took so much delight in hunting, that even at the time he was engaged in war in France and resident in that country, he had with him sixty couple of stag hounds, and as many hare-hounds, and everyday amused himself with hunting or hawking. Many of the great lords in the army had hounds and hawks, as well as the king, and Froissart, an eye-witness of the fact, tells us that Gaston, Earl of Foix, a foreign nobleman, contemporary with

Digitized by Google

King Edward, kept upwards of six hundred dogs in his castle for the purpose of hunting.

'This passion for the chace soon extended itself to the clergy, the bishops and abbots of the middle-ages going out to hunt in great state, with a large retinue of servants and retainers, and some of them becoming celebrated for their skill in this fashionable pursuit, a propensity for which they are frequently rebuked by contemporary poets and moralists. Chaucer, who lost no opportunity of taunting the priesthood, frequently accuses the monks of being much more addicted to riding, hunting, hawking, and blowing the horn, than to the performance of their religious duties. There must have been good ground for this censure, for in the thirteenth year of Richard II, an edict prohibited any priest or other clerk not possessing a benefice to the yearly amount of ten pounds, from keeping a greyhound or any other dog for the purpose of hunting; neither might they use "ferrets, hayes, nets, hare pipes, cords, or other engines to take or destroy the deer, hares, or rabbits, under the penalty of one year's imprisonment." This enactment was in the perfect spirit of the game laws, for it did not affect the dignified clergy, who retained their ancient privileges, which were so extensive that Henry II, in order to restrain the prerogatives of these sporting ecclesiastics, enforced against them the canon law, by which they were forbidden to indulge in such pastimes. But these haughty and pleasure-loving priests were not to be thus baffled. In their own parks, and enclosures they retained at all times the privilege of hunting, and took good care, therefore, to have such receptacles for game attached to such priories. The single see of Norwich, at the time of the Reformation, was in possession of no less than thirteen parks, well stocked with deer and other animals of chase.'—P. 165.

Angling.—'Instructions in the angler's art are generally appended to the treatises on hunting; but as even Strutt, the elaborate historian of English sports and pastimes, could not find any particulars sufficiently deviating from the modern modes of taking fish to find a place in his work, still less can they be expected in a volume like the present. The reader requiring information upon this subject may be referred to Isaac Walton, of whose favourite art, however its features may be disguised by making them wear the mask of poetry, piety, and pastoral, the present writer has little inclination to become the teacher, even if he were qualified for the task.'—P. 180.

Cock-Fighting.—'Sir Richard Steele, reprobating the inhumanity of throwing at cocks, makes these pertinent observations: "Some French writers have represented this diversion of the common people much to our disadvantage, and imputed it to a natural fierceness and cruelty of temper, as they do some other entertainments peculiar to our nation: I mean those elegant diversions of bull-baiting and prize-fighting, with the like ingenious recreations of the bear-garden. I wish I knew how to answer this reproach which is cast upon us, and excuse the death of so many innocent cocks, bulls, dogs, and bears, as have been set together by the ears, or died an untimely death only to make us sport." '—P. 226.

Cards.—'The commonly received opinion that cards were invented in France, about the close of the fourteenth century, for the amusement of Charles VI, while he was afflicted with mental derangement, is proved to be erroneous. Their existence being traced to a much earlier period. Mention is made of them in the Annals of Province, about the year 1361, when it appears that the knave (valet) was designated by the name of Tuchem, an appellation bestowed upon a formidable band of robbers who were then ravaging the Contat Venaissin, and a recent discovery in a MS. belonging to M. Lancelot, shows that they were known twenty years earlier. It appears that the Germans became acquainted with them about the same time as the French. That they originated with the latter has been inferred from the fleur-de-lis being found in every court-yard: but these are likewise found among the ornaments of the Romans, at a remote period; on the sceptres aud crowns of the emperors of the west, in the middle ages, and on those of the kings of England before the Norman conquest. The earliest cards, moreover, of which specimens are extant, do not bear this mark of French origin.

'Spain has found a champion for her claims to the honour of this invention in the Abbé Rine; and it is certain that a prohibitory edict against the usage of cards was published by John I, King of Castile, in 1387. In favour of the Spaniards, it is urged that their language has supplied the names of some of the cards, and of many of the most ancient games, such as primero, and the principal card in the game, quinolaombre, and the cards spadille, manille, basto, punto, matador, quadrilla, &c. The suit of clubs upon the Spanish cards, is not the trefoil, as with us, but positively clubs or cudgels, of which we retain the name, though we have lost the figure; the original name is bastos. The spades are swords, called in Spain espadas, in which instance we retain the name, and some faint resemblance of the figure. These being proofs of early adoption rather than invention, it has been surmised that the Spanish derived their knowledge of cards immediately from their Moorish invaders; especially as the name bestowed upon them in the Spanish language seems to be Arabic. At that time, the Moors were an enlightened people, compared with the inhabitants of Europe; and as it is acknowledged that we are indebted to them for the dawn of science and letters, and certainly for the game of chess, why may not playing cards have proceeded from the same source?'—P. 311.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

Drury Lane.—Pizarro—Davy Jones, or Harlequin and Mother Carey's Chickens.
Covent Garden.—Romeo and Juliet—Harlequin Fat, and Harlequin Bat.

Olympic Pavilion.

What a phrase is this, the Olympic Pavilion! and how smoothly it flows over the tongue, especially since a lady has become the womanager (for manager we must not call her)! It is truly a "silken term precise;" for pavilion, besides its implication of draperies and colours, means a moveable habitation; and though the Olympic be a gay and comfortable-looking place inside, it seems, outside, just such a box as Gulliver was carried away in by the Brobdingnagian bird. You seem as if you could lift it from the street.

We do not remember what the interior was, when we last saw it; nor did it appear very probable, when we got in last night, that we should be able to refresh our memory; for we beheld nothing but a crowded lobby, with a multitude of men and hats filling up the spaces over the open backs of the boxes. The house was overflowing. When we afterwards got a view of it, we found one of the prettiest interiors we are acquainted with, a perfect circle all but the stage, with the fronts of the boxes painted in medallions, and the whole presenting an aspect warm and cheerful. The lobbies are not so well. The backs of the boxes are no higher than pews; and although this be convenient for increasing the number of spectators, and perhaps for ventilating the house, yet it is bad for the hearing of those who sit farthest from the stage, and presents obstacles in the way of such as like to have everything smooth and pleasant in the way to the seats they have taken. However, we cannot but think that Madame Vestris has made a good speculation. She has pitched her tent midway (as it were) between city and west-end; will entice the one to come and look for the gaieties of the other, and the sprightly part of the town to come and see what attractions can take place so near the city. At least we hope so: for we cannot see a woman making the attempt, and two others helping her, and all three of so good-humoured a kind, without wishing them success. If last night is to be a specimen, there is no fear; for there seemed an absolute rush from all quarters. Several young noblemen were there; one of the Fitzclarences; and various Olympic thunders proclaimed the presence of rival gods. We heard the people complaining, that nobody had respected the box-book. The rush took place, they said, the moment the doors were opened, and those who got possession of the seats were inexorable to the after-comers.

There were four pieces performed, 1st Mary, Queen of Scots; 2nd (we know not what to call this, for bare want of a bill, but it was all about Pandora and Olympus, Madame Vestris being Pandora;)* 3rd, Marinette or the Jockey, in which Miss Foote performed the heroine; and 4th, Clarissa Harlowe; Clarissa (a preposterous old maid) Mrs Glover. Of the first we can say nothing, for we missed it entirely. It shall be noticed another time. The second piece, we conceive, was the main business, and this we saw, and a very pleasant, lively thing it is. It is written in rhyme, after the fashion of the old burlettas; and the author is a master of his rhymes, makes very good puns, and got his roars of laughter at will. The story is the famous one of Pandora, the woman made by Vulcan, and sent down to earth with her box of evils, Hope remaining at the bottom. Madame Vestris, of course, is Pandora; and has to undergo a great many compliments, in the shape of gifts from the Gods; Cupid gifting her with a loving heart, Apollo, with song,

* We are told, that it is called Olympic Revels. Our bills are sadly deficient to-day; for we have no announcement of the French theatre, but this fault will be instantly mended: and our last page presents the proper fund of information,—now getting more abundant every day.

Digitized by Google

&c. The scene presents all the deities assembled on Olympus' top, with their clouds about them; and Vulcan produces his statue in the midst, which love animates. They are all in classical costume, a little, the worse for the gilding; but this suited the burlesque; and they made a brilliant shew. The burlesque is in the speeches, not in the dress; though Jupiter's and Juno's crowns are a little excessive. Mercury's wings at his ancles were very well done, spiritedly rising backwards, as if he could be up with them in an instant. How charming are these Pagan personations, reminding us of OVID and old TOOKE's Pantheon! We cannot but respect them, even in a burlesque. Well:—Madame VESTRIS stands very prettily and like the statue she ought to be, and Cupid touches her heart, and then she lives and loves, and Phœbus touches her lip, and then she speaks, and so on; but we must not forget that Vulcan brings in a bill for making her, which is a touch we do not remember in Hesiod.

Vulcan to Jupiter.—I've done my best your wishes to fulfil:
I'm glad it pleases:—Here's my little bill.

Pandora is finally gifted with the fatal box. Juno now comes in, jealous; and after making a great noise, and singing a violent song to Jupiter and Pandora, in which the audience laughed heartily at some happy rhymes, presents the heroine with the gift of curiosity. Mercury then conducts her to earth, describing her as a star from heaven newly flown

To form a little system of her own.

They encounter a milk-man, with whom they sing a trio to a Tyrolese air, which the milk-man's cry is ingeniously made to fall in with. Mercury, on being asked by him who he is, says

Why, I
Come from the blue sky;
And you
Come from the sky-blue.

These sallies may not all tell very grandly, when thus reported, but they are pat in their places, and made the audience merry. In fine, Pandora is introduced to Prometheus, who stole the sacred fire; she marries him, opens the box, and the "Blue Devils" come out, and frighten her, leaving Hope at last to come forward, and lean upon her anchor. We confess we were children enough (nay old enough rather) to find this pathetic, and to look upon the most common place of allegories thus vivified before us with emotion.

We must add, that the music of the songs is well selected from MOZART, WEBER, and others, and excellently adapted to the words. Furthermore, it is witty music, for the mere striking up of the air sometimes furnishes a droll association of ideas with what is going forward. Madame VESTRIS performed and sung her part with all the applause she could desire.

The piece of Marinette, or the Jockey, in which Miss FOOTE performed the principal part, was the one that came next. It is not much; and the plot is soon told. A lover runs away with a wild sort of young lady, who to screen herself from his uncle's prying, and defeat his plans for marrying him to another, disguises herself as his jockey. The uncle takes a liking to the jockey's face, which he says is one that cannot deceive him, and endeavours to secure his interest in behalf of the authorized match. A scene or two of equivoque ensues, and the pretended jockey sings a turf song, which we confess is not to our taste in a lady's mouth. However, Miss FOOTE has little voice, and cannot sing unlike a woman; neither did she over-do the slang action. After a variety of exits and entrances, and dislikes to marry on both sides (for the new lady has a lover), the last scene presents the unwilling proposed couple, first keeping as far apart from one another as possible, and then bringing their chairs close together and affectionately embracing, on the strength of the delightful discovery that they are indifferent to each other. At this juncture, the fair jockey and the other lady's lover come in at opposite sides, overhear the affectionate conversation, and disclose themselves in a passion of jealousy. The rest may easily be conceived. This piece, besides being not over new, drags in its progress. It does not seem to excite Miss FOOTE to do her best; and we do not think the jockey dress becomes her. In a word, Miss FOOTE is by nature one of those females who are designed to be more charming as females than as actresses. They make, on that very account, very pleasing actresses of a certain class;—Miss CHESTER is one of them; and Miss BRUNTON was another; but unless the part given them be of a womanly description, they are not the persons to give it full effect. They cannot with impunity be anything else but themselves. Miss FOOTE, with her beautiful arching eyes, the finest of the kind we ever saw, would have looked as handsome as ever, if she had not grown thinner. Perhaps she would have looked more interesting on that very account, if it had not been for her jockey cap and boots. We unfortunately missed seeing her in Mary Queen of Scots; and the boots did not repay us.

Clarissa Harlowe is a story of a very ancient description;—the heroine is a second Mrs Malaprop, (language apart) who fancies an officer is in love with her, while his passion is directed to another. The part is performed with Mrs GLOVER's usual force and relish; and it is pleasant to see her coming on the stage, after the two other popular names of her sister performers. Otherwise there is nothing to say of this afterpiece.

The Olympic Revels are to be performed every night till further notice. ☞

MUSICAL MYSTERIES.

TO THE TATLER.

SIR,—As you are deemed the "Magnus Apollo" in everything relating to Theatrical matters, perhaps you will be pleased to assign the reason why the Overture and all the original music of the Covent Garden Pantomime, which is known to every person connected with that establishment to have been composed by John Barnett, is stated in the bills to be by Mr Stansbury: also "the wherefore" that the music of the Drury Lane Pantomime should bear the single name of Hughes, when it is in fact, the combined efforts of Messrs. Bishop, Cooke, Lee, &c.?

Yours,

Thursday, Dec. 29. MOWSHA.

[Notwithstanding the oracular character which our correspondent is pleased to assign us, we must confess that

"Apollo from his shrine
Can no more divine"

the secret of these matters, than he does. The truth is, we are as ignorant as a child of the mysteries behind the scenes; and, for the better enjoyment and description of what passes before them, are willing to remain so.]

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

AN UNENVIABLE RESEMBLANCE.—Obstinacy of opinion, and heat in argument are the surest proofs of folly. Is there anything so assured, resolute, disdainful, contemplative, serious and grave as an ass?—Montaigne.

PRIDE IN THE RIGHT PLACE.—I find I am much prouder of the victory I obtain over myself, when, even in the ardour of dispute, I make myself submit to my adversaries' force of reason, than I am pleased with the victory I obtain over him through his weakness.—Montaigne [This is a beautiful remark. The pleasure is very great, if obstinate people would but try it.]

AN EXTEMPORE BULLET.—A Portuguese soldier, at the siege of Diu in the Indies, being surrounded by the enemy, and having no ball to charge his musket, pulled out one of his teeth, and with it supplied the place of a bullet.—Note to Mickle's Lusiad. [This hero ought to have had the name of Dentatus given him.]

CONJUGAL AFFECTION.—Mons. Legros, "whose fame in the art of dressing hair was spread over all Europe," was found dead one evening, while absent from home. His wife arrived, when some one broke the matter to her with due care. "'Tis well," said she; "but I must feel in his pockets for the keys of the house, or else I cannot get in."

A TOUCHING WRITER.—It must be owned, said D'Alembert, that nobody ever succeeded better in the doleful style than Mons. Arnaud, since every time that one reads anything of his, one is extremely sorry.

CATALEPSY ON SPECULATION.—The Baron de Grimm fell desperately in love with a nymph belonging to the Paris Opera. The lady rejected his addresses, which so affected the Baron, that he took to his bed, where he remained stretched out for several days, with his eyes fixed, neither speaking, eating, nor showing any kind of sensibility. Raynal and Rousseau watched by the afflicted man for several nights, fearing for his life. His physician, however, knew better; and the Baron was shortly on his legs again. "This adventure," says his biographer, "gave him great renown among the fair sex."

Digitized by Google

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, the Comedy of

THE SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL.

[By SHERIDAN].

Lady Teazle, Miss CHESTER,
Lady Sneerwell, Mrs FAUCIT, Mrs Candour, Mrs ORGER,
Sir Peter Teazle, Mr FARREN, Sir Oliver Surface, Mr DOWTON,
Sir Benjamin Backbite, Mr HARLEY,
Joseph Surface, Mr MACREADY, Charles Surface, Mr WALLACK,
Crabtree, Mr W. BENNETT, Careless, Mr YARNOLD,
Trip, Mr BALLS, Snake, Mr THOMPSON,

Previous to the Comedy, (1st time in this Country) F. Schneider's Grand Overture to "A la Chasse."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES;

OR, HARLEQUIN AND MOTHER CAREY'S CHICKENS.

[By Mr BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL,
Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY, and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker, 36.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway. Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Allegorical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsters.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long,—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo. Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, Werner; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, (7th time) a Comedy, (in Five Acts) called

THE CHANCERY SUIT.

[By Mr PEAKE].

Emily Travers, Miss E. TREE, Mrs Post, Mrs GIBBS,
Mrs Snare, Mrs PINDAR, Jenny, Mrs J. HUGHES.
Miss Willowly, Mrs DALY, Miss Sallowfield, Mrs BROWN,
Mrs Gravebury, Miss APPLETON, Mrs Tapsley, Mrs TAYLEURE.
Sir Bernard Blazoncourt, Mr EGERTON,
Frederick Blazoncourt, Mr ABBOTT,
Guy Thistlebloom, Mr BARTLEY,
Jeremy Thistlebloom, (his Brother, under the assumed name of Courtington) Mr WARDE,
Murphy O'Doggrely, Mr POWER, Snare, Mr MEADOWS,
Winterfield, Mr BLANCHARD, Tapsley, Mr F. MATTHEWS,
Michael, Mr ADDISON, Ben, Mr EVANS,
Sheriff's Officer, Mr FULLER, Beadle, Mr ATKINS,

Previous to the Comedy, Rossini's Overture to "Il Barbiere di Siviglia."

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT;

OR, THE GIANT'S CAUSEWAY.

[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.

With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.

Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight.—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and West India Docks.—XI. A Market.—XII. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XIII. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XIV. Windsor Park and Castle.—XV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XVI. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Fog.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, Cinderella; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, (in two Acts) called

WRECK ASHORE.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].

The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.

Act I.—WINTER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Bernard, Mrs DALY. Miles Bertram, Mr YATES,
Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS, Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH,
Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act].

Act II.—SUMMER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called

WAS I TO BLAME?

[By Mr G. H. RODWELL].

Julia, Mrs YATES.
Melville, (a Banker) Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Matthew Multiply, (Melville's head Clerk) Mr BAYNE.

To which will be added,

A DEAD SHOT.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT!

OR, HARLEQUIN AND THE KING OF THE CATS!

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].

The Overture and Music, by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON, Clown, Mr SANDERS,
Pantaloon, Mr KING.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse Trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night.)—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle, (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn. Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, (1st time) an entirely new Drama, entitled

NANCY OF PORTSMOUTH.

Nancy Bloomfield, Miss SOMERVILLE, Constantia, Miss JORDAN,
Kitty Bustle, Miss VICENT, The Widow Crabjuice, Mad. SIMON,
Old Margery, Mrs ROGERS, Becky Sims, Miss NICOL.
Sir Edward Gayton, Mr GOUGH, Frederick Gayton, Mr EDWIN,
Captain Splashaway, Mr HICKS, Joe Barton, Mr C. HILL,
Fiary Ned, Mr D PITT, Tim Tipple, Mr VALE,
Bounce, Mr ROGERS, Capt. Friendly, Mr LEE. Tapwell, Mr HOBBS
Jemmy Gonimble, Mademoiselle ROSIER,
Long Bill, Mr ALMAR, Short Bill, Mr WEBB.

After which, (6th time) a new Comic Drama, entitled

"PS. COME TO DINNER!"

The Principal Characters by Miss VINCENT, Mad. SIMON, and Miss ELLIS.—Messrs D. PITT, WILLIAMS, VALE, and C. HILL.

To conclude with a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled

THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT!

OR, HARLEQUIN, JACK OF NEWBURY!

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr Blewitt.
Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I. Regions of Time.—II. The Town of Newbury (Sunrise).—III. Cabinet in the Widow's Mansion.—IV. Splendid Temple of the New Year.—V. Picturesque Roadside Inn.—VI. Exterior of Public House and Sadler's.—VII. Suspension Bridge over the Menai.—VIII. Quiet Lodgings in a retired Neighbourhood.—IX. Race Course and Grand Stand.—X. Splendid Falls of Tivoli.—XI. Cavern, (Moonlight).—XII. and last. Realms of Bliss in the Regions of Light.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

COBURG THEATRE.—Richard Turpin—Ambrose Gwinett—Harlequin Silver Penny.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—Skimmer of the Seas.—Harlequin and Mother Goose.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL, 98 Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

No. 106.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Harmonicon. A Monthly Journal of Music. For January 1831. 4to. pp. 20. Longman.

We take occasion from the current number of this work, to express our regard for the series in general, and to recommend it to such of our readers as may not happen to be acquainted with it. We have not seen it for a good while till the present month, but remember with pleasure some interesting biography in the earlier numbers (for we read a musician's life with almost as much zest as a poet's); and though we have recollection also (to use an Irishism very useful in criticism) that in the musical part of it there were too many original pieces of common-place, insertion of which in a publication of the sort it was perhaps difficult to avoid, yet they were accompanied with a plentiful supply of counteracting matter from the works of the best composers, and in the course of the critical remarks were quoted excellent little bits which highly stimulated the desire to see more. The work does not pretend to be literary: it is strictly muscial: yet a reader who joins the love of books with that of music, will find in its pages a just sense of the merits of both his inclinations, and a most liberal view of the connexion between a genuine passion for music, and for everything else, which can put the soul into its proper state of grace and harmony. Take the following as examples. The Editor, speaking of a song of Mr Attwood's entitled 'Humanity,' the words by Dr Dreznan, says that it "ought to be recommended, if only for the sake of the sentiment breathed in the poetry;" and then he exclaims, like an honest man, and one that has a right to speak of Mozart who relieved the beggar,—"Humanity! Would that our pulpits at the present serious juncture resounded with nothing save precepts inculcating the greatest of virtues, though one too much neglected amidst the idle ostentation, the bloating luxuries, of an age in which that religion which makes humanity its greatest object, is in the mouth of so many, in the heart of so few!"—P. 19.

And again, speaking of a circumstance highly discreditable to the heavy soul of my lord Grenville, and stated with equal spirit and delicacy,—

'In the English pension list, just published by Government, are the names of three females, wives, widows, or daughters of persons who were musicians in the private band of Queen Charlotte, and an allowance of fifty pounds per annum is granted to each. There may be reasons why these are strictly entitled to what is allotted them; though not very apparent; but I cannot observe this disposition of the public money without reflecting upon the fate of poor Dibdin, whose patriotic sea-songs, it was once said, assisted very materially in keeping alive, during the late war, the loyalty and gallantry of the British fleet. A pension of 200*l.* was granted to him in 1803, by George III, which, in 1806, was struck off by Lord Grenville, on the plea of its not being merited, leaving the highly talented bard literary to starve, had it not been for the kindness of a few friends, who raised a subscription that just saved him, his wife, and daughter, from absolute want. Mark the difference!—in the above year, when the country was in a comparatively prosperous state, 200*l.* a-year, given to one of the geniuses of the age—a man to whom not only the Government, but the nation at large, was deeply indebted—was thought improper, and accordingly withdrawn. In 1830, when distress is staring the great mass of the people in the face, 150*l.* per annum is not considered too much to bestow on three persons, relations of performers, two of whom were almost unknown, except in the precincts of the palace! Either Dibdin was very hardly dealt by, or the present case is one that demands explanation.'—P. 15.

Poor Dibdin indeed! The ponderous Whig statesman was certainly no "sweet little cherub" to him. In the present Ministry we have at least one person, who knows what belongs to the harmonies of this world, and who would have prevented the pension's being struck off, could he have been a ruler then.

The Harmonicon consists of every species of notice respecting music past and present, historical, biographical, and critical. It gives accounts of new musical instruments, criticises the latest musical publications and performances, has a foreign report, pleasant musical gossip, a list of the new music published during the month, and devotes about half of every Number to printed vocal and instrumental music, original and select; so that the purchaser who has been warming his love of the art with reading about it for the first twenty pages, may indulge the inclination he has excited, by sitting down to his piano-forte and playing the other.

Above all, the Harmonicon appears to be an honest publication,—a very difficult character to sustain in a work which must touch upon so many self-loves, and be beset with so many demands upon its good-will. The nice point to manage, is to be at once good-natured and independent, which can only be effected by the genuine love of truth which is founded on a zeal for the ultimate good of all. We are not able to speak peremptorily on this matter respecting the Harmonicon; we judge only from appearances, and those of the Number before us; nor have we the slightest knowledge of the Editor: we are unacquainted even with his name; but we are much mistaken if he is not a man really zealous for the interests of his art, and for everything else, true and good. In page 1, we meet with a very honest-looking passage on the Philharmonic Society:—

'The Philharmonic Concerts still maintained their superiority over every other performance in London, and, aided by a stranger, brought forward some new things of great merit, by Spohr, chiefly, while the established pieces were, a very few excepted, executed with all the zeal, fire, and precision which have ever so pre-eminently distinguished the Philharmonic band. But we have observed for some years past a germ in this society, which, if not speedily stopped in its growth, will swallow up all nourishment from the parent stock, and finally destroy the most laudable and best musical institution our country ever beheld. Favouritism and a selfish spirit are creeping in even here, the fruits of which were too frequently apparent during the latter seasons, the last especially, and the subscribers are beginning to be aware of the fact. It is by no means too late to suppress all this; but if the remedy be long delayed, the far-famed Philharmonic Society will ultimately fall by the inertness of many of its members, and the incapacity or narrow-mindedness of a few.'

We confess we do not expect this objection to grow less. The fault is inherent in societies of this nature. Literary societies, academies of painting, Royal societies of philosophy, and other anomalies, have all partaken of it; and men of genius have been made by none, though they sometimes have been degraded by coming in contact with them.

When bodies of men come together for some great object, apart from their individual talent and pretensions, as in attempting, for instance, some great public good, they may often succeed; nay, they will infallibly do so, if they are large enough, and hearty enough in the cause. But where the self-love of every member of the body is concerned, and his wish more or less to show off, the thing is sure to deteriorate before long, with whatever illusions as to a general and disinterested purpose it may begin. And the worst of it is, that discord, being natural to such a body, those who could best oppose it, begin to perceive that they are out of their sphere. The intriguing and the mechanical get the power into their hands, the men of genius and delicacy retire; and the scheme becomes nothing but a system wherewith to give mediocrity an unnatural ascendancy, and a power to patronize worse mediocrity than itself.

The two following accounts, one of a new musical instrument, inanimate, and the other of a most marvellous human set of instruments, are good specimens of one department of the work:—

THE NEW INSTRUMENT, THE ÆOLOPHON.

'When Lord Stanhope first launched his model-boat on the Serpentine, no one expected to see the time when steam and paddle should suffice to carry 'a tall ship' across the broad Atlantic. As little did we, when we were first amused by that very pretty musical toy, the German Eolina, anticipate that within three years we should hear such an instrument as the one we are about to describe. In shape, size, and compass, the Æolophon is the counterpart of a cabinet piano-forte, having six octaves of keys extending from FF to F; and its sounds are produced by a series of metallic springs, set in vibration by the action of the air produced from a bellows. It has three pedals—one for filling the wind chest, and the others regulating the swell. The tone of this instrument, particularly in the middle and lower parts of its compass, is among the most beautiful we have ever heard, and much superior, both in body and quality, to that of any chamber organ of equal size; added to which, the Æolophon has the inestimable advantage of never varying its pitch, or getting out of tune.

Digitized by Google

'From the nature of this instrument, it will be readily conceived that its best effects are displayed in slow movements, and the sustaining and swelling long notes; but to our surprise, as well as pleasure, we found that a running passage, even of semitones, could be executed upon it, if not with all the distinctness of a Drouet or a Nicholson, with as much clearness as on any organ. As an accompaniment to the piano-forte, it will be found an admirable substitute for the flute, clarinet, oboe, bassoon, or even violoncello; but perhaps its widest range of usefulness will be discovered in small orchestras, where the set of wind instruments is incomplete—the effects of any, or even all of which, may be supplied by one or two performers on the Æolophon reading from the score, or even from separate parts.

'It is now about a year since that a patent was obtained for the springs, and this peculiar mode of applying them, by Messrs Day and Co.; immediately upon hearing the effect of which, Mr Chappell, of Bond Street, entered into an engagement with the patentees for the agency of their patent, and the manufacture of instruments under it.

'On the 27th of November last, Mr Chappell was honoured with a command to exhibit the powers of this new instrument before their Majesties, his royal highness the Duke of Sussex, and a small circle of nobility, at St James's Palace; when it gave so much satisfaction, that some of the pieces played upon it were repeated by command, and the whole performance lasted from nine o'clock till past eleven, when the royal party retired.

'The Æolophon is exhibited daily at Mr Chappell's, for two or three hours, and we recommend all our readers to hear it; and all who can afford such a luxury, to add one of these delightful instruments to the contents of their music-rooms.'

RUSSIAN HORN MUSIC.

'This is indisputably a very curious exhibition, and it must be a genuine one. Change but the dress and the tunes, and the Tyrolese minstrels of to-day may become the Bohemian to-morrow; but of this horn-music, no country under the sun but Russia could furnish the genuine raw material, and no extent of receipts, should all London flock to hear it, could repay the outlay of getting up a counterfeit. Of all the ingenious devices for reducing man to the level of a machine, with which tyranny has at various times amused itself, this is, perhaps, the most curious: a number of persons are trained to hit with unerring precision, to the infinitesimal part of a second, the very instant when each is to produce a sound from a tube, the sounding of which, in exact time, is the whole business of his musical existence. The bare idea of devoting so many fellow-creatures to the drilling necessary to the acquirement of this clock-work regularity, could have been conceived only by one who had but to will and be obeyed; and the disheartening drudgery of learning the art, would have been submitted to only by those who were habituated to consider the commands of their superiors the sole law of their actions. Accordingly, it is in Russia that we find this instrument invented, and that at a period when the ancient hereditary tyranny of its princes and nobles was as yet unsoftened by their barbaric admiration of the arts and civilization of more favoured countries. The difficulty of originally manufacturing such an instrument, and the expense attending its support, confined the possession of it, of course, to the emperor, or the most wealthy nobles: but once made, we find it transferable like an article of commerce, by purchase and sale, human beings and all. Sir Robert Ker Porter, in his Travelling Sketches of Russia, gives the following account of one which he heard at an entertainment given by Prince Bagrazion, at Moscow, in March 1806.

'"We had also the horn music, which, as it is strange and curious, I will describe. It was invented by Prince Gallitzin in 1762. This instrument consists of forty persons, whose life is spent in blowing one note. The sounds produced are precisely similar to those of an immesne organ, with this difference, that each note seems to blend with its preceding and following one; a circumstance which causes a blunt sensation to the ear, and gives a monotony to the whole. However, the effect possesses much sublimity when the performers are unseen; but when they are visible, it is impossible to silence reflections which jar with their harmony. To see human nature reduced to such a use, calls up thoughts very inimical to our admiration of strains so awakened. I enquired who the instrument belonged to? (by that word both pipes and men are included,) and was told it had just been purchased by a nobleman, on the recent death of its possessor.

'Some of these individuals, thus destined to drag through a melancholy existence, play at times on several pipes of various sizes, which breathe the higher notes; but the base pipes have each their unchanging blower. They are extremely long, and laid on a machine or tressel, close to which the performer stands, and places his mouth to the smaller extremity of the pipe, in an horizontal position. The shape is exactly that of a speaking trumpet; a screw is inserted near the bell of the tube, to give it a sharper or flatter tone as may be required. The performers are generally thin and pale; and I have little doubt, but that the quantity of air the instrument takes, and the practice necessary for perfection in execution, must abstract many years from the otherwise natural term of their lives."

'So far Sir R. K. Porter. Dr Granville, who heard this instrument in St Petersburgh in 1827, mentions it as peculiar to the Russians, or rather the Imperial Family; and ascribes its invention to a Bohemian, named Maresch, who was a musician in the band of the Empress Elizabeth. He adds, that it was the subject of a treatise published about thirty years ago, by Henrichs, of St Petersburgh, who gave specimens of the manner in which the notes are set down for each performer. With respect to the invention, it is probable that both Sir R. K. Porter and Dr Granville are so far right, that the original idea was Gallitzin's, and the task of reducing that idea to practice confided to Maresch. The band now performing in London is said to come from Moscow, and has exhibited its powers in Hamburgh, and other cities of Germany. The performers arrived in London about a month ago; and after private exhibition at the New Argyll Rooms, and playing before their Majesties at St James's Palace on the 14th of December, gave their first public concert at the Opera Rooms on the 23rd, of which the following is the program:

'PART I.

Overture (Horns), (Calife de Bagdat), . . BOIELDIEU.
Russian Melody, with Variations, (Horns).
Russian Song, (Vocal), with Accompaniments.

PART II.

Overture (Horns), (Die Entführung aus dem Serail.) . MOZART.
Russian Melody, with Variations, (played on the Reeds).
Russian Song (Vocal), with Accompaniments.
Polonaise (Horns) . . . . . JULIUS MILLER.

PART III.

Russian Melody, with Variations (played on the Reeds).
Russian Song (Vocal), with Accompaniments.
Andante and Rondo (Horns) . . . . MULLER.

'The band consists of twenty-five individuals, who play upon about fifty-five horns, all formed of brass of a conical shape with the mouth-piece bent: the lowest of these horns is eight feet long, and nine inches in diameter at the larger end, and sounds double A; the highest, which sounds E, is two inches and a half long by one in diameter. Some of the horns, but not all, have keys for one or two semitones. When playing, the band is drawn up four deep, the trebles in front, and the very low horns laid on tressels at the back, so that the performer can raise the mouth-piece with ease, while the other end rests on the frame; one man plays the three lowest horns, blowing them in turns as they are wanted.—Not the least curious portion of this machinary is the conductor, who, with the score before him on a desk, stands fronting his troops at what soldiers would call the left flank of the company, and continues during the whole performance to beat the time audibly by tapping a little stick or cane on his deck. And this time he beats not according to the equal divisions of the bar but the number and quality of notes therein,—thus for a bar of $\frac{4}{4}$ time, containing one crotchet followed by four quavers, he makes five taps, the four last twice as rapid as the first.

'When the performance began, notwithstanding all we had read, although we knew that each demisemiquaver of a rapid octave must be breathed by a separate individual, we were astonished at the unity of effect, and correctness of time; and this feeling continued undiminished to the end. But to this our pleasure and approbation were confined, and, all moral considerations apart, we soon began to feel regret and pain that so much labour should have been bestowed on forming what may probably be a very first-rate band of Russian horns, but what is certainly a very second-rate band of wind instruments. There is no expression, no colouring in the performance, and though the tone produced by the bass horns is extremely fine and powerful, and the tenors are soft and mellow, the trebles are shrill and very frequently sadly out of tune. The reeds, which, like the horns, produce but one note each, were much more pleasingly toned and better in tune.

'The vocal part of the concert had nothing in its curiosity to atone for monotony of tune and mediocrity of performance. A feeble tenor sang a slow air, accompanied by one very indifferent clarinet, and sustained at intervals by a chorus. A quick movement in chorus followed, during which the noise was increased, but the effect not at all improved by one tambourine and a pair of cymbals.

'For the sake of these wandering harmonists we regret to say that the audienee was anything but numerous or distinguished. It cannot have much exceeded an hundted and fifty persons, and out of these we should think not one half were money visitors. Indeed the poor men were very ill advised to fix the highest sum given in this country for a first-rate concert, as the price of admission to their performance. Exhibiting in a morning during the holidays at half-a-crown or three shillings, children half price, they may earn some money, particularly if they will head their bills with the lithographed representation of their band which now adorns the music shop windows; but if they persist in demanding half a guinea, forsaken boxes and an empty pit will leave them, we fear, to pay the hire of the room out of their own proper funds.

'Pitying then most heartily the Russian gentleman who has engaged in such an enterprize, and more particularly for having lent his ear to advice which tempted him to fix the admission at so pre-

Digitized by Google

Posterous a sum, we, nevertheless, cannot but feel, at this crisis—when sacrifices are, or ought to be, making in all quarters to relieve our industrious population from distress, if not from actual want,—that to give to a band of strangers as much as would maintain a whole family for a whole week, merely for the sake of witnessing a curious degradation of a liberal art, would betray an utter disregard of what is due to the feelings of our own starving countrymen, and excite the derision of foreigners, who never fail to laugh at, though they profit so largely by, our gullibility.'

This, to be sure, is sounding the very "key-note of humility." A man converted into a crotchet! An A flat in the sixtieth year of his age! A fellow-creature of Shakspeare and Hampden and Lafayette, who has passed his life in acting a semitone! in waiting for his turn to exist, and then seizing the desperate instant, and being a puff!

Dobie's History of the Parishes of St Giles's and St George's Bloomsbury.

By a singular oversight, or rather inattention, owing to the hastiness with which we looked at a note which came to us while in the midst of writing, we complained the other day that we had no bookseller's name to refer to as the publisher of Mr Dobie's book, while this very note might have informed us that it was to be had of Mr Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange, and Mr Fenn, Charing Cross. Having accidentally looked over the note again, we lose no time in expressing our regret at the omission, and in again recommending Mr Dobie's book to attention.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Quid pro Quo.—Piron, after attending the rehearsal of the Metromanie, went into a coffee-house, superbly dressed, as was his custom. Every one surrounded and complimented him. The Abbé Desfontaines was present, and being disposed for a little raillery, he lifted up the skirts of the poet's dress, as though to examine its richness, and exclaimed with affected admiration, "What a dress for such a man!" Piron, raising the clerical robe of the Abbé, with a similar gesture, replied, "What a man for such a dress!"

The Limits of Civil Authority Defined.—When a nation forms a government, it is not wisdom, but power, which they place in the hands of the magistrate; from whence it follows, his concern is only with those objects which power can operate upon. On this account the administration of justice, the protection of property, and the defence of every member of the community from violence and outrage, fall naturally within the province of the civil ruler, for these may all be accomplished by power; but an attempt to distinguish truth from error, and to countenance one set of opinions to the prejudice of another, is to apply power in a manner mischievous and absurd.—Rev. Robert Hall.

Inward Blindness.—Talk to a blind man—he knows he wants the sense of sight, and willingly makes the proper allowances. But there are certain internal senses, which a man may want, and yet be wholly ignorant that he wants them. It is most unpleasant to converse with such persons on subjects of taste, philosophy, or religion. Of course, there is no reasoning with them, for they do not possess the facts on which the reasoning must be grounded. Nothing is possible, but a naked dissent, which implies a sort of unsocial contempt; or what a man of kind disposition is very likely to fall into, a heartless tacit acquiescence, which borders too nearly on duplicity.—Coleridge.

Brutality Mistaken for Valour.—It is common in Spain to see young gentlemen of the best families, adorned with ribbands, and armed with a javelin, or kind of cutlass which the Spaniards call machete, appearing as candidates for fame, in the lists of the bull-fight, in which these young caballeros are generally victorious, being very expert at this valorous exercise, and ambitious to display their dexterity, which is a sure recommendation to the favour and good opinion of the ladies.—Note to Mickle's Lusiad. [The writer does not inform us whether the bull, when victorious, is equally honored by female admiration.]

Porter.—Of the origin of that species of beer now so generally drank under the name of porter, the following account is given by the editor of the 'Picture of London:'—"Before the year 1730, the malt-liquors in general used in London were ale, beer, and two-penny; and it was customary to call for a tankard of half-and-half, that is, half of ale, and half of beer or two-penny. In course of time, it also became the practice to call for a tankard of three-threads, meaning a third of each; and thus the publican had the trouble to go to three casks for a pint of liquor. To obviate the inconvenience, a brewer of the name of Harewood conceived the idea of making a liquor which should partake of the united qualities of those already mentioned. He succeeded, calling it entire, or entire butt, meaning that it was drawn from the cask, or butt, and as it was a very hearty and nourishing beverage, and supposed to be very suitable for porters, and other working people, it obtained the name of porter."

Story of Phaeton.—The historical foundation of the fable of Phaeton is this: Phaeton was a young enterprising prince of Libya. Crossing the Mediterranean in quest of adventures, he landed at Epirus, from whence he went to Italy to see his intimate friend Cygnus. Phaeton was skilled in astrology, from whence he arrogated to himself the title of the Son of Apollo. One day in the heat of the summer, as he was riding along the banks of the Po, his horses took fright at a clap of thunder, and plunged into the river, where, together with their master, they perished. Cygnus, who was a poet, celebrated the death of his friend in verse,—from whence the fable.—Note to Mickle's Lusiad.

Decorum and Piety of Pope Julius III.—Two of his Cardinals found Julius in the Court of his palace in a very indecent condition, for it being hot, he had put off his clothes, and was walking in his drawers. He obliged them to do the same, and afterwards asked them, what the people would say, should they show themselves in that figure in the streets of Rome. "They would take us," answered they, "for rogues, and throw stones at us."—"Therefore," replied he, "'tis to our clothes that we are obliged for not being thought rogues. How much then are we indebted to our clothes?"—Julius was a great epicure. He had ordered that a peacock, which had been left at dinner, should be served up cold for his supper. At supper-time, hot peacocks were served up, but the cold one was missing. This threw Christ's Vicar on Earth into a bitter passion, and he uttered an execrable blasphemy. —One of his Cardinals observed, "Your Holiness ought not to be in so great a passion for so little a thing." Julius replied, "If God could be so very angry for an apple, as to turn our first father Adam out of Paradise, why should it not be lawful for me, who am his Vicar, to be in a passion for a peacock, since a peacock is much more than an apple?"

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

Covent Garden.—The Chancery Suit.—Harlequin Fat, and Harlequin Bat.
Drury Lane.—The School for Scandal—Davy Jones, or Harlequin and Mother Carey's Chickens.

Olympic Pavilion.

Last night we completed our acquaintance with all the new productions here, except the occasional address, which we shall take care to hear next time. We have little to say upon Mary, Queen of Scots, though we found it more interesting than it seems to have been to our brother critics. The public, to be sure, know the story well through the medium of Sir Walter's novel; but as we can read the novel many times, so we can see with renewed interest this piece of it on the stage. Miss Foote, too, makes a very good Mary, and this is not a little. It is much to find a woman on the stage, who can really be supposed to personate the genuine Mary,—the mixture of grace, weakness, beauty, gaiety, and melancholy, with womanhood prevailing over all. Miss Foote's weak, feminine tones give to the occasional vehemence into which the rebel lords provoke her, all the effect of the real character of Mary. She is dressed like her, with the shell-formed cap, and boddice of pearls; and what with her well-sustained mixture of rank and misfortune, of patience and complaint, and the general beauty of her countenance and loveliness of her eyes, the spectator might well imagine her to be the object of young Douglas's passion. This same Douglas is creditably performed by Mr Fredericks from the Tottenham Theatre, whose tone of voice and Northern distinctness of articulation, when he first appeared, reminded us so much of the present Chancellor, that remembering the name of Brougham among the Dramatis Personæ, and not knowing who was before us at the time, we began to think we had lighted upon some remote, run-away cousin of that eminent person: but the bill directed us to my Lord Lindsay, as Mr Brougham, and here the likeness failed.

Madame Vestris seems to have a generous taste for collecting handsome actresses in her establishment. There are several good-looking girls who perform minor parts; and in the last piece, the wife, Mrs Harlowe, is represented by a young lady of the name of Fitzwalter, who seems destined to add to the number of beautiful and by no means unclever actresses. As far as we can judge of a face under the sophistications of stage light, rouge, &c. Miss Fitzwalter is a very handsome girl, of the regular featured order, with fine eyes, and no ill figure, which she dresses in a gown of yellow crape, that contrasts well with her dark locks. Her smile is one of those that light up the face with a sudden liberal effusion of gaiety and good humour.

Digitized by Google

GIACOMO CARISSIMI was chapel master of St Apollinaire, in Rome, about the year 1640, and celebrated by the Italians as the best musician of his time. He composed a dialogue between Heraclitus and Democritus, in which the affections of weeping and laughing are contrasted in some of the most pleasing melodies that imagination ever suggested. He brought the style of recitative to great perfection, and was the inventor of moving basses.—Carissimi was truly excellent in imitating the inflections of the human voice, and in uniting the charms of music with the powers of oratory.—Musical Biography.

A BEAUTY.—Constantine Manasses, a Greek author, describing the exquisite beauty of Helen, says, that she owed nothing to art; that she had neat legs, a little mouth, a long and very white neck, large eyes, and a fine breast.—One line in Homer, which has nothing of a description in it, gives a much better idea of the fair one's charms, than all such particulars. The Poet makes Priam's venerable counsellors remark, on seeing Helen approach when they were in council, that neither Greeks nor Trojans could be blamed for enduring such evils on account of so divine a woman.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

COBURG THEATRE.—Richard Turpin — Ambrose Gwinett—Harlequin Silver Penny.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—Skimmer of the Seas.—Harlequin and Mother Goose.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

Act I.—WINTER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mr DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—SUMMER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

To which will be added, a New Comic Burletta, called

WAS I TO BLAME?

Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

After which, the Comic Burletta, called

A DEAD SHOT.

Louisa Lovetrick, Mrs FITZWILLIAM, in which character she will introduce her celebrated Description of "A Sunday Concert."

Chatter, Miss DALY.

Captain Cannon, Mr BAYNE, Mr Hector Timid, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Mr Wiseman, Mr S. SMITH, Charles, Mr V. WEBSTER.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE.]

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.

Columbine, Miss STALLARD.

Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, the Drama, entitled

THE ADOPTED CHILD.

[By Mr S. BIRCH.]

Clara, Miss SOMERVILLE,
Lucy, Madame Simon, Jeannette, Miss Rumens, Nell, Mrs Vale.
Michael (first time) Mr OSBALDISTON,
Sir Bertrand, Mr D. Pitt, Record, Mr Williams, Le Sage, Mr Lee,
Spruce, Mr Rogers, Flint, Mr Almar, Boy, Miss Ellis.

After which, a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,

THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE].

The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.

Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.

Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I. Regions of Time.—II. The Town of Newbury (Sunrise).—III. Cabinet in the Widow's Mansion.—IV. Splendid Temple of the New Year.—V. Picturesque Roadside Inn.—VI. Exterior of Public House and Saddler's.—VII. Suspension Bridge over the Menai.—VIII. Quiet Lodgings in a retired Neighbourhood.—IX. Race Course and Grand Stand.—X. Splendid Falls of Tivoli.—XI. Cavern (Moonlight).—XII. and last. Realms of Bliss in the Regions of Light.

To conclude with an Operatic Extravaganza, (in Two Acts) entitled

GIOVANNI IN LONDON.

[By W. T. MONCRIEF.]

Don Giovanni, Miss SOMERVILLE,
Miss Constantia Quixotte, Miss Jordan, Mrs Leporello, Mrs Rogers,
Mrs English, Miss Rumens, Squalling Fan, Mrs Vale, Proserpine, Miss Rumens, Mrs Drainemdry, Madame Simon, Mrs Porous, Miss Boaden,
Mrs Simpkins, Miss Perry.
Leporello, Mr Vale, Finikin, Mr Honor, Popinjay, Mr Hicks,
Deputy English, Mr Young, Pluto, Mr Almar, Charon, Mr Gough, Firedrake, Mr Ransford. Drainemdry, Mr Emden, Porous, Mr Webb, Simpkins, Mr Rogers.

In Act I. A MASQUERADE.

'The Minuet de la Cour, and Gavotte de Vestris,' by Mdle. Rosier and Miss Rayner.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, Lord BYRON'S Tragedy of

WERNER, OR THE INHERITANCE.

[Adapted by Mr MACREADY.]

Josephine, Mrs FAUCIT, Ida Stralenheim, Miss MORDAUNT.
Werner, Mr MACREADY, Ulric, Mr WALLACK, Gabor, Mr COOPER,
Baron Stralenheim, Mr H. Wallack, Fritz, Mr Younge, Otto, Mr Cohen,
Henric, Mr Salter, Eric, Mr C. Jones, Idenstein, Mr W. Bennett,
Rodolph, Mr Cooke, Arnheim, Mr Fenton, Meister, Mr Eaton,
Ludwig, Mr Cathie, Herman, Mr S. Jones.

Previous to the Tragedy, the Band will perform, (First Time in this Country) P. Lindpainter's Overture to "Sulmona."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.

Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.

Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker, 36.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands

To-morrow, The Brigand; The Illustrious Stranger; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, the New Grand Comic Opera, (in Three Acts) called

CINDERELLA.

The Music, by Rossini.

Cinderella, Miss INVERARITY, Clorinda, Miss CAWSE,
Thisbe, Miss HUGHES, Fairy Queen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Felix, Mr WILSON, Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. PENSON, Pedro, Mr KEELEY, Alidoro, Mr STANSBURY, Dandini, Mr MORLEY.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.

With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.

Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.

Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, The Fair Penitent; and the Pantomime.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely New Historical Burletta, called

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS.

Mary Stuart, (Queen of Scots) Miss FOOTE,
Lady Douglas, Mrs Knight, Catherine Seyton, Miss Pincott,
Lady Fleming, Miss King, Mattie, Miss Kinsey, Moggy, Miss Langley,
Jenny, Miss Slater. Lord George Douglas, Mr Fredericks,
Lord Lindsay, Mr Brougham, Sir Robert Melville, Mr Worrel,
Lord Ruthven, Mr Beckwith, Roland, Mr Raymond, Drysdale, Mr Newcombe,
Sandy, Mr J. Knight.

To which will be added, a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe,

To be followed by a Comic Burletta, called

THE LITTLE JOCKEY.

Arinette, Miss FOOTE, in which she will sing, "Why pretty Maiden," and "The Boy in yellow wins the day." Clotilda, Miss Nursey, Mause, Miss Kibrey.
The Baron D'Acourt, Mr W. VINING,
De Limburg, Mr Paget, Floriville, by a Gentleman, Jocose, Mr Collier,
Denis, Mr W. Young, Pierre, Mr Brown.

The whole to conclude with a Comic Burletta, called

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER, Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond, Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget, Captain Cape, Mr W. VINING.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL, 98 Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 107.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 6, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

MOORE'S LIFE OF BYRON.

We are sorry to postpone, a second time, our notice of this work; but we have had to get together some stray books and papers, and were not prepared for the interruption. To prevent the chance of any further apology, the reader is informed, that the first article on the subject will appear on Tuesday next.

Military Memoirs of Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington. By Captain Moyle Sherer. First Volume 12mo. pp. 295. (First volume of Dr Lardner's Cabinet Library.) Longman.

This is the commencement of a new monthly series of publications, under the superintendance of the Editor of the Cabinet Cyclopædia. The reader will naturally enquire what the distinction is between the two works. The Editor thus explains it in his prospectus:—

'The object of the Cabinet Cyclopædia is to form a systematic work, including, within moderate and definite limits, every subject of utility and interest in the circle of human knowledge. A proportion will be observed among its several divisions, and each subject will be treated, as nearly as possible, with that degree of detail to which its general importance and its relation to the other parts of the Cyclopædia entitle it.

'It has been found, however, that besides the subjects, numerous and important as they are, which such a plan embraces, others have, from time to time, presented themselves, possessing considerable claims to attention, and requiring to be treated with a different degree of detail. Amongst these may be mentioned Personal Memoirs, detached Historical Pieces, and Voyages and Travels.

'With a view, therefore, to open a field for such useful and interesting subjects, the Proprietors of the Cabinet Cyclopædia have determined on publishing—at an equally cheap rate, and in the same form—a Companion to that work, under the title of 'The Cabinet Library.'

'The volumes of the Cabinet Library will be supplied by the same class of literary contributors as those of the Cabinet Cyclopædia, and it is hoped that the embellishments and typographical qualities of the work will not be inferior to those of any similar publication of the present day.'

The credit here claimed for the mechanical part of this new work will be readily allowed by every body. The volume is got up with the usual neatness, is elegantly printed, and has a handsome engraved title page, presenting a spirited though flattering bust of the Duke of Wellington, executed by Finden, after a design by Henry Corbould. The author seems to think, that there is much in a face, and we think so too; but there is not so much in the Duke of Wellington's, as he would make out. There is force and decision in parts of it; but observers, not dazzled by the notion of "patrician" looks, discern in it a want of moral dignity, of an intellect corresponding with the force, and even of the force itself in the expression of the mouth. Good, however, as the mechanical part of the work is, we cannot say that the authorship of it is on a par with that of the Cyclopædia. The gallant writer is, we dare say, a good officer, and qualified to speak of military movements. We take him also to be an honest man; otherwise, in a work eulogizing the denouncer of a certain "evil example," he would not have spoken of "the weak cause and the weak house of Bourbon," unless he had been the most undiscerning of aspirants. We like his opinion respecting Sir John Moore, to whose good qualities he does justice, while he implies, we think with justice, that he wanted the decision necessary to cut through the difficulties in which he found himself entangled. He is a strong, but not an undistinguishing enemy to Napoleon; understands the superstition as well as the wrongs of the Spanish nation; and exhibits no more antipathy and mistake about the French speculators in government, than was held to be consistent with a reasonable liberality of opinion before their late glorious Revolution. But in writing for these times, it would have been as well if the author could have foreseen, that the measure of such an intellect as his hero's, was not of sufficient extent to embrace the coming enlargements of knowledge; and at all times it is bad taste to write any kind of history in the florid and gratuitous style of these memoirs. We do not object to a panegyric, when it professes to be one; but the readers of a work written for the diffusion of information will draw unfavourable conclusions respecting the volume before us, and the qualifications of the writer for a public historian, from the first pages they encounter. Two objections will stare them in the face at once: first, that Captain Sherer never speaks of the Duke of Wellington, without feeling upon him the influence of his latest successes; and second, that while he ventures to speak of politics and political institutions, he has no knowledge of them whatsoever. At page 7, for instance, he talks of Buonaparte's having been an "idol" raised by the French "levellers." Now, if by levellers he means republicans, such as Carnot, La Fayette, Lanjuinais, and others, Buonaparte was not their idol. He was enabled to raise himself in spite of them, on the strength of the military necessities generated by the Allies. In the same page, the prejudices of the English people against the French are regarded with pleasure, in as much as they enabled us to carry on a long and "glorious war." But the war was not glorious in its length, whatever it was in its termination; and if neither French nor English had had any prejudices against one another, we believe it is now thought by many very sensible men, that the calamities of this long and glorious war might have been spared, and that the labouring population of a country which Captain Sherer describes as being at the pinnacle of "power, wealth, and influence," would not have been starving from the consequences. What is meant too by the Duke of Wellington's being a "free-born general of a constitutional army," and the "faithful servant of the English people?" The people never employed him, for they have never been represented. The army was a most unconstitutional army, for it was a standing one; and as to the Duke's being a free-born general (which is an odd collocation of noun and participle), he was born among the privileged classes; which certainly gives freedom enough on the score of properties and game-laws, but hardly entitles a man to the epithet of free-born, in the liberal sense of the term.

Captain Sherer appears to be a lover of poetry, which it is an excellent thing to be, and a comfort and ornament in all conditions of life: but when a military historian mingles its common-places with his style, and delights in painting his nouns with epithets, the reader will suspect that he has carried the same enthusiasm into his judgments, and that, however sincere, they are not to be depended upon.

Speaking of the brilliant appearance of the horses of the Mahratta chiefs, he says that they "are showily caparisoned; and, in particular, the breast-plates glitter with silver; every neck is curved by a standing martingale; and their many neighings come down upon the wind loud and lordly." In one of the extracts made below, the reader will find the poetical epithet "swart," and a passage about the "hot throb of honours." And in the course of three lines at page 58, are five epithets and one picturesque adverb, an epithet to every noun:—"From beneath the thick plumes of red horse-hair, which drooped over their bronzed cheeks, the manly eyes of the bold 19th dragoons looked on severely."

Writing like this is an ill preparation for argument, and unfortunately Captain Sherer asserts better than he reasons. Take a specimen from p. 19:—

'It has been argued by some that this war was forced upon Tippoo, and that Lord Wellesley was not justified in these measures. The fact is, it was not war that was forced upon Tippoo, but the time of commencing it. War was already in his heart. He never would, he never could, have rested in amity with us. His attitude of peace was treacherous; it was but the couching of the tiger preparatory to its spring. As the hunters go forth from an Indian village to destroy the terror of their herds, seeking him in his own lair, so the British, that her trembling subjects in the

Digitized by Google

Carnatic might sleep in security, marched to assault this dangerous and dreaded enemy in his own capital.'

The gallant author here contents himself with stating that an argument exists against the war with Tippoo, and answering it by assuming a fact. This is at all events no counter argument.

—We shall lay before our readers one of the most entertaining passages of the work, and then conclude with a remark or two on the illustrious person who is the subject of the book :—

CAPTURE OF SERINGAPATAM AND DEATH OF TIPPOO.

'Two thousand five hundred Europeans, and one thousand eight hundred natives were appointed to this service under Major-general Baird. The hour for the assault was well chosen: it was that sultry hour of early afternoon, which is throughout the East a season of profound repose; when lassitude is felt in all its enervating power; when, after the meal at noon, all natives compose themselves to sleep or rest. Hot, panting, breathless for the signal, men from the far north and west, that had left their threshholds at home, fair flaxen-headed youths, lay by their native comrades looking up to the fierce sun, and well nigh as swart as they.

'The sleepy silence which hung over the city, and the awful stillness in the trenches, were suddenly broken by the voice of Baird :— "Come, my brave fellows! follow me, and prove yourselves worthy of the name of British soldiers," was the brief appeal, with which, springing out of the trenches, sword in hand, he summoned the bold men to the overthrow of a kingdom. He was answered by the quick and forward rush of the "forlorn hope" as they broke past him; and was close followed by the columns under colonels Sherbrooke and Dunlop. The summit of the breach, after a short struggle on the slope with a few gallant Mysoreans, who started out on the instant, was crowned in six minutes; a British colour was there displayed by the brave serjeant* of the "forlorn," who, as he gave the shout of triumph, and felt the hot throb of honours already won, fell dead by a shot from within the fort.

'The face of the wide breach was soon crowded with men; and when collected in sufficient force to enter upon the rampart, they filed off to the right and left, driving the enemy before them, who fled, particularly on the right, with unresisting panic.† Numbers threw down their arms and rushed out of the fort. One body of fugitives effected their escape by lowering themselves with the long folds of their unrolled turbans, from the lofty wall at the south-western angle; but of these the more inactive and irresolute were dashed to pieces upon the rocky bottom of the ditch. Upon the left, however, the column of Colonel Dunlop, who had himself been wounded in a personal conflict with one of Tippoo's sirdars, on the slope of the breach, was vigorously opposed. The enemy took post behind the traverses which they had constructed, and defended them, one after the other with such resolution as frequently to bring our front to a stand. Nor would this difficulty have been easily surmounted, had the detachment of the 12th regiment, British, failed in passing the ditch between the exterior and inner rampart. A narrow strip of ground left for the passage of the workmen was by happy chance discovered; the rampart was climbed; the detachment advanced along it, flanked these formidable traverses, and cleared them by their fire. In this quarter the sultan himself had hitherto fought in person, firing from behind a traverse like a common soldier, his attendants aver with such steadiness and effect, that he brought down many of the assailants.

'But when on all sides the English were gaining ground; when those of the right attack were seen in their crimson uniforms, over the eastern gate; when on all the works the dismayed Mysoreans were resigning the contest, and abandoning their posts, Tippoo retired along the northern rampart.

'Coming up with one of his horses he mounted, complaining of fatigue, and of the aching of a leg, in which he had been formerly wounded. He now rode slowly, with what object none can tell, not away, out of the city, as he might have done, but to a bridge that crossed the inner ditch, and led by a covered gateway into the town. As he was entering this gateway he received a wound from a musket ball. The place was soon filled with fugitives, both from without and within; for on both sides the British were now advancing. The archway was so chocked with people that he could not pass through the crowd; and the cross-fire of the conquerors soon made it a heap of the dead and the dying. His horse sunk under him, wounded; his palanquin was at hand, and his attendants disengaged him from the saddle, and placed him upon it. This was their last service—removal was impossible. In a few minutes English soldiers pressed into the gateway. One of them, attracted by the glittering of the golden buckle, snatched at the sultan's sword-belt. Tippoo, with such strength as yet remained to him, made a cut at the soldier, and wounded him in the knee. The man drew back, raised his piece, and shot the sultan deliberately through the temple, little knowing that it was the stern unyielding king, who fell back upon the litter dead. In the hot search for plunder, the body was thrown out of the palanquin, and lay hidden for a time beneath a heap of slain. While Tippoo, in the consciousness that his kingdom was departed from him, provoked the fate he probably desired, all was alarm and terror in the palace. Baird, who had been formerly, for three years, the fettered and captive tenant of a loathsome hovel in this very city, now stood before the palace gates as a victor.

'After some anxious parley between Major Allan and the killedar, the palace, which was crowded with armed men, surrendered: the gates were opened, and the youthful princes* were led to the presence of the injured conqueror. They came trembling: they knew his story; they knew his wrongs; and they knew that Europeans taken during the siege had been murdered in torture by their father: but as they drew near, and met the eyes of Baird, that brave man was sensibly affected at the sight; his violent and excited anger was suddenly resolved into the generous emotions of a fatherly pity! he calmed their fears, and dismissed them with expressions of regard and promises of protection.

'From the information gathered at the palace, Baird proceeded instantly to the northern gateway in search of the sultan. The shadowy arch was filled with slain; and from the dim obscurity of the place the features of the dusky dead could not easily be distinguished. Body after body was dragged out and examined without success. Torches were now lighted, and they went in to carry on the search with better expedition: the corpse was at last found beneath a heap of the killed, and recognized by many. Turban, jacket, sword, and belt were gone; of defence or ornament nothing remained to the king; still, however, bound upon his right arm, was the trusted amulet† which he always wore. Despite three wounds in his body, and one in the temple, the countenance was not distorted, and it wore an expression of stern composure. The eyes were open, and the body so warm, that, as Colonel Wellesley, then present, and Major Allan, felt it, they thought, for a minute, that the sultan yet lived; but it was not so. They felt the pulse again, and it was still: the haughty heart, and it had ceased to beat.'

Writers, who like us, have ventured to doubt the genius of Buonaparte for government, and the correctness of the prevailing ideas respecting the amount of his intellect, and who have thought that they perceived in their conclusions fresh reason to entertain similar doubts respecting conquerors in general, may be allowed to say, that they consider the Duke of Wellington as forming no exception to them. We freely grant, that he is a great soldier, or at all events, it becomes us, in our ignorance of the art of war, and with the argument of his successes before us, to take it for granted that he is one; though with regard to his crowning victory, we cannot but think, in common with many, that circumstances, and British nerve, and the remnant of the old pride of that British freedom, which certainly did not originate in his Grace's time, or by his means, more prevailed against Buonaparte than the genius of his antagonist. But when we know how imposing is power in any shape, how awfully so it is in the shape of war, even when its bolts are thrown by common hands, and how certainly the crop of armed men and conquerors start up whenever the times require them, we may be permitted to think, that the absence of the usual powers accompanying a high state of intellect, the striking inferiority in that respect to other leading men of the age, and the instinctive hostility if not insensibility to its advancing philosophy and wants, afford strong additional proofs of the justice of our suspicion, in the person of this eminent individual. We can call upon those who are acquainted with our writings to testify, that in spite of our misgivings to this effect, and of our objections to his former toryism, we did our utmost, while his Grace was in power, to hope the best both of his intentions and faculties, and to assist in giving him those public proofs of it. the withholding of which has been so often said to have an ill effect upon men in power, and to give them a dangerous dislike to the community whom they wish to serve. The assistance we could give, was but an atom in itself, but it might contribute, we thought, to create more, and we thought ourselves bound not to withhold it. We therefore gave the Duke as much credit as we possibly could for settling the Catholic question, though we had never been blind, or pretended to be so, to the evident fact of his having been hostile to it up to the latest period, and to Lord Anglesea's having seen much further in the matter than he. Settle it he did, however; and we found a new encouragement to our hopes, and an unlooked for ground, of respect for the premier, in his being able to forego an old opinion, for the sake of a new one, important to to the common good. It was the same with his practical intimations of reform: we hoped he was beginning to enlarge his notions upon that point, and that this plain soldier, whose blunt good sense

* His name was Graham.

† A Captain Molle of the Scotch Brigade pursued them with such ardour that, unsupported, he gained a cavalier, and raising his hat on his sword summoned his men to take possession of it.

* They were youths of seventeen and fifteen.

† The talisman contained, sewed up in pieces of fine-flowered silk, an amulet of a brittle metallic substance, of the colour of silver, and some manuscripts in magic, Arabic, and Persian characters, the purport of which, had there been any doubt, would have fully ascertained the identity of the sultan's body.—Beatson.

Digitized by Google

we had admired, when he said that it would have been madness in him to become a minister, had fairly undervalued himself, and was going to discover, that philosophy was as easy a thing as the art military. His speeches, to be sure, were always in the way. There was nothing great about them. He seemed to have no more words on his tongue than ideas in his head. Still, however, we hoped. We called to mind all the great intellects who had been poor of speech, and hoped that his very position, seated as he was at the top of the world, might give him a new light, and enable him to look with real superiority on the questions before him. We need not say what a world of contradiction to our hopes was contained in his declaration against reform; what an overwhelming disproof of all we had fancied, burst out of those little words of his about the "evil example" of the French. It is now quite clear that the Duke of Wellington has never been any other, in point of understanding, than what he was twenty years ago; that he has conceded, only to take the first opportunities of receding; that his bonus of the beer-barrel was but a tub to the whale; and that in what is called, and called truly, the March of Intellect, he is one of the most lagging, and unforeseeing, of all foot-soldiers. His bravery we admire: his firmness and power of decision are solid qualities, and would be great ones, if they could show themselves fit for any great intellectual purpose. His military talents remain also as they were: but the question is,—to what do military talents, even the greatest, amount, if thus found in connexion with an ordinary understanding and common views: and does or does not the character of the Duke of Wellington afford new and remarkable reason for bringing the question to an issue, for throwing fresh and final scorn upon appeals to brute force between civilized nations, and accomplishing the endeavours of that intellectual ascendancy, whose wisdom and beneficence go hand in hand.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Werner—Davy Jones, or Harlequin and Mother Carey's Chickens.
COVENT GARDEN.—Cinderella.—Harlequin Fat, and Harlequin Bat.

COVENT GARDEN.

WE looked in here last night time enough to hear Miss INVERARITY receive her usual encore in the finale of Cinderella. Her voice appeared weaker from indisposition; her throat was wrapped round to keep the jewel safe; but she got through her task with her accustomed smiling spirit. The more considerate part of the audience would fain have spared her the repetition; but she waived the indulgence, which was judicious; for it is as well to please so large a body at a little expense, and graceful to show a sense of kindness. Besides, to be able to construe objections to an encore into a consideration for the singer, is to take possession of an established rank. We have again the pleasure of expressing it as our opinion, that although Miss INVERARITY's tones have not at present the richness of Miss PATON's (for there is no knowing what they may attain, when she is as old) there is a most agreeable promise in them of something more sensitive and cordial. When she slides down them in expressing a sense of delight, we recognize a foretaste of that charming mixture of the pleasurable and affectionate which is the greatest beauty of a woman's singing, and which suits so well the breathing and smiling style of the Italians.

Miss INVERARITY's dress was adjusted to more advantage than at first, and gave her figure its proper width. At least we thought so; perhaps because we recommended it. The genteel and feminine appearance of this young debutante, joined with the tones we have been speaking of, has much interested us.

We stopped the first part of the pantomime, to see a new transformation,—that of Harlequin Pat into Harlequin Fat,—of Mr POWER into Mr KEELEY. POWER found that he had become powerless in his new character: it was natural he should wish to get rid of a predicament so unusual; and so, by a pleasant substitution of a letter, Pat has become Fat,—a rare change now-a-days for an Irishman. Mr KEELEY's activity, in spite of his roundness, is well known. They have stuffed him so, however, in this new character, that although he contrives to give it the drollery which the other wanted, and the enormity itself is ludicrous, the activity is overlaid by it. We think the part would tell better, if he was left free to dance about as he pleased. His imitations of Harlequin would become doubly effective, especially if they made a fat boy of him, as in Mr PEAKE's farce of the Middle Temple, where he makes so many round capers, and lively tours of obesity.

In our general dissatisfaction with this Pantomime, when we first saw it, we overlooked the merits of Mr BARNES, the Pantaloon. We are happy to add our testimony to that of others, with respect to the truth and good sense of his performance. He preserves the proper old age of the character; is as passive as so active a decrepitude can contrive to be; and shews a wonderful, stupified sense of the kicks and blows which he receives. On one occasion, when he had received an inhuman punch in the stomach, we observed that he fairly seemed to grow blind with it. He felt, first for the stomach itself, as if he had been exenterated, and then for the very world before him, as if he doubted, while staggering off, whether he should find a way to exist in any longer.

The entertainment, called Olympic Revels, at the theatre in Newcastle street, is indebted (we observe by the play-bill) to a production of Mr. COLMAN. We are surprised the Licenser does not send to stop the performance of this resuscitation of one of the sins of his unthinking middle age. The word heaven occurs more than once in it, and there is mention even of chere amie.

"MUSICAL MYSTERIES" NULLIFIED.

TO THE TATLER.

DEAR MR TATLER,—I beg to inform your Correspondent 'Mowsha' "the wherefore that the music of the Drury-lane Pantomime" bears "the single name of Hughes"—is that the same is that "Hughes'" own and sole production!

The gentlemen named by your (would-be correct) correspondent not having contributed a single note.

The overture (a medley one) is composed chiefly of old sea songs. And the music which accompanies the Diorama, is a selection made by Mr Bishop, of well-known Swiss and Italian airs.

But whatever merit or demerit belongs to the "rest and residue" of the vocal and instrumental music of the "holiday entertainment" must attach to,

Dear Tatler,
Your much amused servant,
R. HUGHES,
4th January 1831. T. R Drury-lane.

HENRY LAWES, who set Milton's 'Comus,' also composed the music to Waller's songs. That poet has celebrated his skill in the following lines:—

"Let those who only warble long,
"And gargle in their throats a song,
"Content themselves with ut, re, mi;
"Let words of sense be set by thee."

One would almost think that Waller saw from Pisgah the fashionable composing singers of the present day, whose "garglings," for aught we know, are accompanied by Hebrew, or Greek words, or by the interesting little monosyllables in the linês we have quoted. —Musical Biography.

RETORT COURTEOUS.—There was a lady of the west country, that gave great entertainment at her house to most of the gallant gentlemen thereabout, and amongst others Sir Walter Raleigh was one. This lady, though otherwise a stately dame, was a notable good housewife; and in the morning betimes she called to one of her maids that looked to the swine, and asked, "is the piggy served?" Sir Walter Raleigh's chamber was just by the lady's, so as he heard her: a little before dinner, the lady came down in great state into the great chamber which was full of gentlemen, and as soon as Sir Walter Raleigh set eye upon her, "Madam," saith he, "is the piggy served?" The lady answered, "You know best whether you have had your breakfast."—Bacon's Apophthegmes.

CANDOUR.—By the word candour his Lordship (Orrery) always means a quality which inclines a man to put the worst construction upon the words and actions of another, and by candour, the Dean (Swift) always means just the contrary.—Note to Swift's Houyhnhnms. [Perhaps few words are more obnoxious to opposite interpretations than this is, by those who do, and those who do not possess the quality.]

DANCE TUNE.—The oldest dance tune now extant is considered to be that called "Sellinger's Round." This may be traced back to the reign of King Henry the Eighth, when Bird made it into a virginal lesson for Lady Nevil.—Musical Biography.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

COBURG THEATRE.—Richard Turpin — Ambrose Gwinett—Harlequin Silver Penny.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—Skimmer of the Seas.—Harlequin and Mother Goose.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, the Drama, (in Two Acts) called

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]

Maria Grazie, Mrs W. BARRYMORE, Ottavia, Miss FAUCIT.
Prince Bianchi, Mr Younge, Nicolo, Mr Webster, Fabio, Mr Hughes,
Albert and Theodore, Mr H. Wallack and Mr J. Vining,
Alessandro Massaroni, Mr WALLACK, Rubaldo, Mr Bedford,
Spoletto, Mr Bland, Uberto, Mr Robinson, Carlotti, Mr Yarnold.

After which, a Musical Piece, (in Two Acts) called

THE ILLUSTRIOUS STRANGER.

[By Mr KENNEY.]

Irza, Miss FAUCIT, Fatima, Mrs WAYLETT.
Aboulifar, Mr Thompson, Aman, Mr Bland, Alibajou, Mr Webster,
Bowbell, Mr LISTON, Gimbo, Mr HARLEY,
High Priest, Mr Fenton, Officers, Mr C. Jones, and Mr Honner.

In the course of the Evening, the Band will perform (second time in this country) F. Schneider's Grand Overture, "A la Chasse;" and P. De Winter's Overture to "Mahomed."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES,

OR HARLLEQUIN AND MOTHER CAREY'S CHICKENS.

[By Mr BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.

Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Billboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, Werner; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, the Tragedy of

THE FAIR PENITENT.

[By Mr ROWE.]

Lavinia, Mrs CHATTERLEY, Lucilla, Mrs DALY.
Calista, Miss F. KEMBLE, Horatio, Mr C. KEMBLE,
Sciolto, Mr Egerton, Lothario, Mr Abbott, Altamont, Mr G. Bennett, Rossano, Mr Henry, First Gentleman, Mr Irwin.

Previous to the Tragedy, Spohr's Overture to "Alruna."

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

To-morrow, The £100. Note; the Pantomime; and Teddy the Tiler.

FRENCH PLAYS,
THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

MONDAY, January 10, 1831.
On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

L'HERETIERE.

Vaudeville, en Un Acte, de M. SCRIBE.
Madame de Melval, jeune Veuve, Mademoiselle HERMINIE.
M. de Gourville, M. BEHIER ST AUBERT, Gustaves, son Neveu, M. PAULIN.

Suivi de

JEAN!

Pièce en Quatre Parties Mêlée de Chant, par MM. TAEAULON et ALPHONSE SIGNOL.

Madame de Ligny, Mademoiselle FLORVAL,
Madame de Sirval, Parente de Madame de Ligny, Mademoiselle Eliza,
La Marquise d'Olban, amie de Madame de Ligny, Madame Paulin,
Madame veuve Chopin, Limonadière, Madame Préval,
Adelaide, sa Fille, Mademoiselle St Ange,
Louise, Femme de Chambre, Madame Gamard.
M. DERVAL remplira le Rôle de Jean.
Rigolard, Maitre de Danse, et Parrain de Jean, M. Laporte,
M. de Walbruck et M. D'Offlenn, Attachés a l'Ambassade, M. Paulin et M. Guenée,
Un Garçon, d'estaminet, M. Arnaud, Un Valet, M. Grannille.

On Finira par

LE BOUFFE ET LE TAILLEUR.

Petit Opéra, en Un Acte, Musique de GAVEAU.
Cavatini, Chanteur Italien, M. Alfred,
Célestine, sa Fille, Mademoiselle FLORVAL.
Benini, son Homme de confiance, M. Gamard,
Barbeau, Maitre Tailleur, aimant passionnement la Musique, M. Préval.

 This bill will be repeated on Mondays and Fridays, the days of performance.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

Act I.—WINTER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mr DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—SUMMER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

To which will be added, a New Comic Burletta, called

WAS I TO BLAME?

Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

After which, the Comic Burletta, called

A DEAD SHOT.

Louisa Lovetrick, Mrs FITZWILLIAM, in which character she will introduce her celebrated Description of "A Sunday Concert."
Chatter, Miss DALY.
Captain Cannon, Mr BAYNE, Mr Hector Timid, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Mr Wiseman, Mr S. SMITH, Charles, Mr V. WEBSTER.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.

Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely New Historical Burletta, called

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS.

Mary Stuart, (Queen of Scots) Miss FOOTE,
Lady Douglas, Mrs Knight, Catherine Seyton, Miss Pincott,
Lady Fleming, Miss King, Mattie, Miss Kibrey, Moggy, Miss Langley,
Jenny, Miss Slater. Lord George Douglas, Mr Fredericks,
Lord Lindsay, Mr Brougham, Sir Robert Melville, Mr Worrel,
Lord Ruthven, Mr Beckwith, Roland, Mr Raymond, Drysdale, Mr Newcombe,
Sandy, Mr J. Knight.

To which will be added, a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe,

To be followed by a Comic Burletta, called

THE LITTLE JOCKEY.

Arinette, Miss FOOTE, in which she will sing, "Why pretty Maiden," and "The Boy in yellow wins the day." Clotilda, Miss Nursey, Maurice, Miss Kibrey.
The Baron D'Acourt, Mr W. VINING,
De Limburg, Mr Paget, Floriville, by a Gentleman, Jocose, Mr Collier,
Denis, Mr W. Young, Pierre, Mr Brown.

The whole to conclude with a Comic Burletta, called

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER, Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond, Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget, Captain Cape, Mr W. VINING.

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely new Drama, entitled

NANCY OF PORTSMOUTH.

Nancy Bloomfield, Miss SOMERVILLE, The Widow Crabjuice, Mad. SIMON,
Constantia, Miss Jordan, Kitty Bustle, Mrs Vale. Old Margery, Mrs Rogers,
Becky Sims, Miss Rummens. Sir Edward Gayton, Mr Gough,
Frederick Gayton, Mr Edwin, Captain Splashaway, Mr Hicks,
Joe Barton, Mr C. Hill, Fiery Ned, Mr D. Pitt, Tim Tipple, Mr Vale,
Bounce, Mr Rogers, Capt. Friendly, Mr Lee, Tapwell, Mr Hobbs,
Jemmy Gonimble, Madlle. Rosier, Long Bill, Mr Almar, Short Bill, Mr Webb.

After which, the Drama, entitled

LAW AND LIONS.

Mrs Mammoth, Mrs Vale, Miss Jane, Miss Vincent.
Mr James, Mr C. Hill, Mr Suavey, Mr Williams, Robert, Mr Hicks,
Ensign Pudor, Mr Honor, Mr James, sen. Mr Almar,
Mr Pudor, sen. Mr Gough, Sam Smoothface, Mr Rogers,
Jemmy Mammoth, Mr Vale.

After which, a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,

THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE].

The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.
Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL, 98 Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

№ 108.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY7, JANUARY, 7, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Year Book. By William Hone. Part I, for January 1831. 8vo. Double Columns, 128. Tegg.

TWELFTH-NIGHT.

THE day before yesterday was the first time for many years that we forgot a coming holiday; otherwise there would have been an article in yesterday's paper on this subject. This is a time when people may well forget holidays: but the reader of our article on Christmas-Day knows what we think on that point, and how pastime may be reconciled with reflection. We therefore sat down yesterday to get as much holiday as we could, by making our very labours contribute to it: for as to losing the day, it was not to be thought of. We should have fancied that nature had left us out; that the alma-mater had given a cake to every one of her children but us: and our eternal right of boyhood is what we will never give up. The holly-berries are the same as they were thirty years ago; the sun is the same; love is the same; and we are resolved to continue the same as much and as long as we can. We recommend a similar resolution to all such of our readers as have never made it. It is the best way of diminishing pain and of doubling pleasure. They will get nothing by being old before their time,—middle-aged at forty. The child, says the poet, is father to the man, and he is too often a sensible father with a foolish son.

'Twelfth-day is so called,' says Mr Smith's book on Festivals, Games, &c., 'because it is the twelfth day after the Nativity. It is also termed the Epiphany, or manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles, when the Eastern Magi were guided by the star to pay their homage to the Saviour. The festive rites and gambols of this anniversary were originally intended to commemorate the magi, who were supposed to be kings. In France, one of the courtiers was formerly chosen king; and waited upon by the real monarch and his nobles in a grand entertainment; in Germany they practise a similar custom among the scholars at the colleges, and the citizens at civic banquets; at our own universities, not many years ago, and in private entertainments still, it is customary to give the name of king so that person whose portion of the divided cake contains the lucky bean, or the royally-inscribed label, and to honor him with a mock homage. This mode of perpetuating the remembrance of the ancient kings seems to have been partly borrowed from the Roman Saturnalia, when the masters made a banquet for their servants, and waited upon them; and partly from the Roman custom of drawing lots or beans for the title of king, when the fortunate party was declared monarch of the festive circle, over which he exercised full authority till they separated. The festival of kings, as this day is called in an ancient calendar of the Romish church, was continued with feasting for many days. "To what base uses may we not return?" In 1792, during the French Revolution, when kings of all sorts were suffering proscription, la fête des rois was abolished as anti-civic, and Twelfth-day took the name of la fête des sans culottes. To this nominal change the people willingly yielded assent, but they would not resign the festival and the good cheer, and they were quite right. As a religious memento the cake and its concomitants may be idle and perhaps irreverent, but it is a pity to let any custom fall into disuetude, which promotes social mirth and happiness, and fills every juvenile class with pleasant anticipations and recollection from Christmas to Candlemas.'—P. 133.

We take this opportunity of noticing a new publication of Mr Hone's, highly "germain to the matter," entitled 'The Year Book.' It is on the same plan as his popular periodical, 'The Every-day Book,' is to be had in weekly numbers or monthly parts, as the reader pleases, each part containing at least eight engravings; and what renders it particularly welcome to his old readers is, that he has announced new stores of research and recreation, and "nothing that he has brought together before." The number that has just appeared is for the present month, and among other articles, original and select, is an original letter from Howard the philanthropist, and an article on our Christmas friend, the Robin Redbreast, which contains some of the prettiest descriptions we have seen a long time, and ends with a poetical thought, such as might put to shame all the fashionable poetry existing. The writer is speaking of a late edition of 'The Children in the Wood.' "Whatever affection," he says, "we may have for the old common brown paper garland of 'The Children in the Wood,' with a rude cut of the ruffians, in doublets and trunk hose, fighting in the wood, we must infallibly be delighted with the appearance of this story of infancy in the recent edition. It is more richly embellished than any other 'trivial, fond record.' Its engravings are executed in a masterly manner, by Branston and Wright, and other first-rate artists, from delicious drawings by Mr Harvey. It is the most charming, and must inevitably be the most popular little publication which an indulgent press has yielded to the constant coaxing of lovers of elegant decoration. There is a vignette which might be coveted for a place in this column:—a lone Robin, upon the lowest branch of a leafless oak, in a snowy solitude, keeping company with silence."—P. 64.

But our present business with Mr. Hone is to make him enrich our Twelfth-day. The following passage from his book will present the reader with specimens of the keeping of Twelfth-day at some of our old courts, and an account of the Carnival at Rome, which just now commences. The musts in the first extract we have marked in Italics, in order to give full effect to these compulsory duties of royalty, and do justice to the puerility at bottom of them.

TWELFTH-DAY AT COURT THREE HUNDRED YEARS AGO.—'The grand state of the Sovereign, on Twelfth-day, and the manner of keeping festival at court, in the reign of king Henry VII, are set forth in Le Neve's MS. called the Royalle Book, to the following effect:—

'As for Twelfth-day the king must go crowned in his royal robes, kirtle, surcoat, his furred hood about his neck, his mantle with a long train, and his cutlas before him; his armills upon his arms, of gold set full of rich stones; and no temporal man to touch it, but the king himself; and the squire for the body must bring it to the king in a fair kerchief, and the king must put them on himself; and he must have his sceptre in his right hand, and the ball with the cross in the left hand, and the crown upon his head. And he must offer that day gold, myrrh, and sense; then must the dean of the chapel send unto the archbishop of Canterbury by clerk or priest the king's offering that day; and then must the archbishop give the next benefice that falleth in his gift to the same messenger. And then the king must change his mantle when he goeth to meat, and take off his hood and lay it about his neck, and clasp it before with a great rich ouche; and this must be of the same color that he offered in. And the queen in the same form when she is crowned.

'The same day that he goeth crowned he ought to go to matins; to which array belonged his kirtle, surcoat, tabard, and his furred hood slyred over his head, and rolled about his neck; and on his head his cap of estate, and his sword before him.

'At even-song he must go in his kirtle, and surcoat, and hood laid about his shoulders, and clasp the tippet and hood together before his breast with a great rich ouche, and his hat of estate upon his head.

'As for the Void on the Twelfth-night the king and the queen ought to have it in the hall. And as for the wassail, the steward, the treasurer, and the controller, shall come for it with their staves in their hands; the king's sewer and the queen's having fair towels about their necks, and dishes in their hands, such as the king and the queen shall eat of: the king's carvers and the queen's shall come after with chargers or dishes, such as the king or the queen shall eat of, and with towels about their necks. And no man shall bear anything unless sworn for three months. And the steward, treasurer, comptroller, and marshal of the hall shall ordain for all the hall. And, if it be in the great chamber, then shall the chamberlain and ushers ordain after the above form; and if there be a bishop, his own squire, or else the king's, such as the officers choose to assign, shall serve him: and so of all the other estates, if they be dukes or earls; and so of duchesses and countesses. And then there must come in the ushers of the chamber with the pile of cups, the king's cups and the queen's, and the bishop's, with the butlers and wine to the cupboard, and then a squire for the body to bear the cup, and another for the queen's cup, such as is sworn for hire.

'The [singers of the chapel] may stand at the one side of the hall: and when the steward cometh in at the hall door with the wassail, he must cry thrice "Wassaile," &c., and then shall the chapel answer it anon with a good song: and thus in likewise if it please the king to keep the great chamber. And then when the king and queen have done, they will go into the chamber. And there belongeth, for the king, two lights with the void, and two lights with the cup; and for the queen as many.'—P. 46.

Digitized by Google

Twelfth-Day two Hundred Years Ago.—'Some notion may be formed of the great revelries in all ranks of society, on Twelfth-night, from this fact, that in 1622 the gentlemen of Gray's Inn, to make an end of Christmas, shot off all the chambers they had borrowed from the tower, being as many as filled four carts. The king (James I.) awakened with the noise, started out of bed, and cried "Treason! Treason!" The court was raised and almost in arms; the earl of Arundel with his sword drawn, ran to the bed chamber to rescue the king's person, and the city was in an uproar.—P. 49.

Card-Playing on Twelfth-Night at Charles the Second's Court.—'On January 6th, 1662, being Twelfth-night, Mr Evelyn records in his diary as follows:—This evening, according to custom, his majesty (Charles II.) opened the revels of that night by throwing the dice himself in the privy chamber, where was a table set on purpose, and lost his 100*l.* (the year before he won 1500*l.*) The ladies also played very deep. I came away when the duke of Ormond had won about 1000*l.* and left them still at passage, cards, &c., at other tables: both there and at the groom porter's, observing the wicked folly and monstrous excess of passion amongst some losers; sorry I am that such a wretched custom as play to that excess should be countenanced in a court which ought to be an example to the rest of the kingdom.'—Ib.

The Carnival at Rome, which begins on Twelfth Day—(Extracted by Mr Hone from Lady Morgan's "Italy.")—'The Carnival commences on Twelfth-day; but its public festivities are reserved for the last week or ten days. Formerly, they commenced with an execution, a criminal being reserved for the purpose. But this custom Cardinal Gonsalvi, to his great honour, abolished. The Carnival holds out some most favorable traits of the actual condition of the Italians; for, if the young and profligate abuse its days of indulgence, a large portion of the middle and inferior classes are exhibited to public observation in the touching and respectable aspect of domestic alliance and family enjoyment; which under all laws, all religions, and all governments, those classes best preserve. A group of three generations frequently presents itself, crowded into an open carriage, or ranged on hired chairs along the Corso, or towering emulously one above the other in galleries erected near the starting-post of the course; taking no other part in the brilliant tumult than as the delighted spectators of a most singular and amusing scene. For several days before the beginning of these festivities, "the city of the dead" exhibits the agitation, bustle, and hurry of the living. The shops are converted into wardrobes; whole streets are lined with masks and dominos, the robes of sultans and jackets of pantaloons; canopies are suspended, balconies and windows festooned with hangings and tapestry; and scaffolds are erected for the accommodation of those who have not the interest to obtain admission to the houses and palaces along the whole line of the Corso.

'At the sound of the cannon, which, from the Piazza di Venezia, each day announce the commencement of the amusements, shops are closed, palaces deserted, and the Corso's long and narrow defile terms with nearly the whole of the Roman population. The scene then exhibited is truly singular, and, for the first day or two, infinitely amusing. The whole length of the street, from the Porta del Popolo to the foot of the Capitol, a distance of considerably more than a mile, is patrolled by troops of cavalry; the windows and balconies are crowded from the first to the sixth story by spectators and actors, who from time to time descend and take their place and parts in the procession of carriages, or among the maskers on foot. Here and there the monk's crown, and cardinal's red skull-cap, are seen peeping among heads not more fantastic than their own. The chairs and scaffolding along the sides of the streets are filled to crushing, with maskers, and country folk in their gala dresses (by far the most grotesque that the carnival produces). The centre of the Corso is occupied by the carriages of princes, potentates, the ambassadors of all nations, and the municipality of Rome; and the two lines of carriages, moving in opposite directions on each side, are filled by English peers, Irish commoners, Polish counts, Spanish grandees, German barons, Scotch lairds, and French marquises; but above all, by the hired jobs of the badauds and pizzicaroli of Rome. These form not the least curious and interesting part of the procession, and best represent the carnival, as it existed a century back. In an open carriage sits, bolt upright, la signora padrona, or mistress of the family, her neck covered with rows of coral, pearl, or false gems; her white satin robe, and gaudy head-dress, left to "the pitiless pelting of the storm," showered indiscriminately from all the houses, and by the pedestrians, on the occupants of carriages, in the form of sugar-plums, but in substance of plaster of Paris or lime. Opposite to her sits her caro sposo, or husband, dressed as a grand sultan, or Muscovite czar: while all the little signorini of the family, male and female, habited as harlequins, columbines. and kings and queens, are crammed into the carriage: even the coachman is supplied with a dress, and appears in the character of an elderly lady, or an Arcadian shepherdess; and the footman takes the guise of an English miss, or a French court lady, and figures in a spencer and short petticoat, or, accoutred with a hoop and a fan, salutes the passers-by with "buon giour, messieurs."

'At the ave maria, or fall of day, the cannon again fire, as a signal to clear the street for the horse course. All noise then ceases; the carriages file off by the nearest avenue; their owners scramble to their windows, balconies, chairs, or scaffolds; while the pedestrians that have no such resources, driven by the soldiery from the open street, are crowded on the footways, to suffocation. But no terror, no discipline, can restrain their ardor to see the first starting of the horses.

'A temporary barrier, erected near the Porta del Popolo, is the point from which the race commences; another, on the Piazza di Venezia, is the termination of the course. The horses are small, and of little value. They have no rider, but are placed each in a stall behind a rope, which is dropped as soon as the moment for starting arrives, when the animals seldom require to be put in motion by force. A number of tinfoil and paper flags are stuck over their haunches; small pointed bodies are placed to operate as a spur; and the noise and the pain of these decorations serve to put the horse on its full speed, to which it is further urged by the shouting of the populace. At the sound of the trumpet (the signal for starting), even at the approach of the officer who gives the order, the animals exhibit their impatience to be off, and they continue their race, or rather their flight, amidst the screams, plaudits, and vivats of the people of all ranks. This scene forms the last act of each day's spectacle, when every one is obliged to quit his carnival habit; for it is only on one or two particular evenings that there is a masked carnival at the aliberte.'

We remember, at the carnival at Florence, an unpleasant custom the women had of using masks made to imitate the face of the Venus de Medici. The cheeks being coloured, and the eyes having the balls put to them, the beauty became horrible, from its monotony and want of feeling,—a sort of life in death. The lively wearers had a trick of looking you in the face with this petrifaction, and making a shrill trilling of the voice. We used to long to snatch off their masks, and give a thump with them to their own natural good-humoured faces. It was curious to be in a room with your friends, and see masked females come in, and provoke all sorts of gallant speeches, who might come and go in this manner wherever they pleased, and nobody knew who they were. These are the things that make a residence abroad seem like realising a play. We conclude with laying before our readers, a Twelfth Night Dramatic Sketch, which was suggested, by passing a very pleasant evening, a few years back, when the company took it in their heads to speak blank verse, and the drawing of a Twelfth-cake, was turned into a mock-heroic upon royalty. The conversion of Twelfth Night characters into the members of a Court, is an obvious and natural mode of playing the pastime; and the lovers of poetry, if they took courage, would find it an easier thing than they imagine to convert their prose into blank verse.

King and Queen sitting crowned. Lords, Ladies, the General, the Archbishop, Chief-Justice, Chief Cook, the Master of the Horse, Fool, &c.

King. Give us our cup. Soh!—now, my vassals all,
Lords, ladies, mighty (foolish) General,
Chief Judge, Chief-Cook, Right Reverends, and Wrong Reverends,
(If such there be, which is impossible)
Horse (Master of the), you; (henceforth to be Called Horse, for shortness' sake, and to do honour
To this our index-like and shrewd parenthesis)
Fool, you, you fool; and you, my lord Archbishop;
My lady Giggle, and my lady Glum,
And Maids of Honour with your several children,
A health to all.
All. Wassail, my liege, and thanks.
King (rising in anger.) Now by the Gods—'
All (rising). Good God, Sir, what's the matter!
King. Now by the Gods, as I before observ'd,
The bowl's too hot. See that the cook be slain.
(Chief-Cook faints.)
Take him away; first handing me his watch.
(They take away the Cook to execution.)
Archbishop. So perish all our sovereign's enemies!
Chief Justice. And handed be their watches.
General. Sire, methinks
A general massacre of all the cooks
Would not be wrong, by way of hint in future.
King. We'll think on't after Christmas. Meanwhile sit,
And sparkle all:—be merry on the spot.
Chief Justice. How witty!
Archbishop. How divine!
Lady Giggle. How irresistible!
O heavens! For God's sake, Sir! I cannot bear it.
King (aside). Giggle's a girl of infinite discernment,
I'll be in love with her.
All. The Queen is fainting! (Queen faints.)
King. How! Fainting in this inconvenient manner!
Take her away, and order a divorce.
Queen (aside) Fainting was wrong, I see: but having fainted,
I must faint on. If he show any tenderness,
I'll have a fit, if not—the General.
(The Queen is carried out.)

Digitized by Google

King. What think ye, lords and ladies? Said I right?
Ladies. Particularly so.
King. Delightful sex!
Henceforth all womankind shall be my wife.
(All look enchanted, but Giggle.)
Giggle. (Aside, and recovering herself). Well; be it so. To be his wife is little,
But to be Queen is much. Prodigious monarch!
1st Lady. Wonderful!
2nd Lady. Awful!
3rd Lady. Dreadful!
4th Lady. Superhuman!
5th Lady. So fat, for a thin man!
6th Lady. Decisive character!
Giggle. And then so gentle, not to kill the Queen!
Archbishop. A cheek like Phœbus!
Chief Justice. Flaxen hair so black!
King. Nay, there you flatter.
Chief Justice. Pardon me, great Sir,
Tis, as the poet says, "Dark with excess
Of light:" I never saw so black a snow.
King. Well; lawyers I've been told, can make black white;
But never did I feel them right till now.
Move wassail! Hand the cake! Lords, you eat nothing.
Eat instantly and much, or we shall feel
Ourself disgraced. Archbishop, by the way,
A word with you: you need not stretch your ear:
'Tis long enough. I doubt if we can say
Ourself: 'tis wrong, is't not?
Archbishop. It has been hitherto, may it please your Majesty,
But can be so no longer.
King. Good. We did
Remember some such saying in our youth,*
But we are young no longer.
Chief Justice. Ah, dear Sire,
Who is young?
King. But I've lost my teeth!
Archbishop. (shewing his teeth). And, Sire,
Who has teeth?† Teeth and all those sort of things,
Went from this world to keep their sovereign company.
What seems a tooth is none.
King. Alas!
Nor yet what seems a king. Slave to will,
I find, at last, he has no will at all,
Nor yet can will himself to feel no will;
So I will reign no longer.—Call the games;
And let us change our diadem for Bob.

* It was said by a French gentleman to a lady, who was expressing a fear that she had spoken a word not to be found in his language. "It is not, Madam," said he; "but it ought to be."

† Said by a Cardinal (with good teeth) to Louis the Fourteenth.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—The Brigand.—The Illustrious Stranger.—Davy Jones, or Harlequin and Mother Carey's Chickens.
COVENT GARDEN.—The Fair Penitent.—Harlequin Fat, and Harlequin Bat.

THE reader will bear us testimony, that we do not shirk our task of criticism. We neither shirk it, nor desire to do so. But we give him notice, that a great holiday infallibly makes great children of us, and that on Twelfth-Night the play is at home. We write this article therefore, while the performances are getting ready; and in default of being able to criticise them, which would not be so proper, shall say a word or two on SHAKSPEARE'S play of TWELFTH-NIGHT.

And firstly, how is it, that they do not play it to-night (last night, to wit) at the theatres, as they used to do? Is it because they think that those who would relish it best, remain at home? or for want of a proper Viola? We know not how that may be; but FARREN would make an excellent Malvolio; DOWTON would furnish a loud and jolly, if not a very relishing Sir Toby; and Dukes are to be had by the dozen. We guess that Miss INVERARITY, by and by, will contribute a good Viola. People have been accustomed to associate the idea of fragility with Sir Andrew, otherwise there is KEELEY for him. He would contemplate his leg well, pique himself judiciously on his absurdities, and look very serious and incompetent. Besides there is BLANCHARD. We had forgotten him. He would do the fragile and inefficient part of the character to the life.

"Twelfth-Night" is understood to have been Shakspeare's last play. What a world of information does not that give us respecting the good-nature of his wisdom, and his retaining it all his life! Care had not made him bitter with the world. Knowledge with him was in no respect half-knowledge; it had gone strait on with its good heart, kept the open path of honesty, and, rounding the circle of humanity, brought him back where he set out. We find something good-natured in the very titles of his plays. He did not know very well what to call the piece before us; so he lays the time of it in a holiday, and gives it the name of "Twelfth-Night,"—or (adds he) "What you will." You may call it what you please, says the poet:—I care not, provided you be pleased. So with As you like it: he consigned the title and the play to the good-humour of the audience. If they liked it, all was well. Then there is A Midsummer Night's Dream, all about love and fairies,—as if he really dreamt such things on fine summer nights; and All's Well that Ends Well,—a very consolatory reflection; and The Merry Wives of Windsor; and A Winter's Tale,—such a tale as people relate over their winter fires. We are surprised he did not call The Tempest the Enchanted Island.

We have spoken, in a former article, of the beginnings of Shakspeare's Plays, and how soon you find something sweet in them. What a beginning have we not to the Twelfth-Night, in the famous passage about love and music!

If music be the food of love, play on, &c.

The piece commences with a strain of music; opening like a room in heaven, and we find that love is the inhabitant. And the scene ends as beautifully as it begins.

Away before me to sweet beds of flowers:
Love-thoughts lie rich, when canopied with bowers.

We are not aware that the author found any warrant in what he had written, for calling this play Twelfth-Night, except that Sir Toby and the others keep it up at midnight over their wine, singing catches "enough to draw three souls out of one weaver." We know not which is finer of the kind, the wit and humour of that scene, or the love throughout. The comic passages are as terse and fresh as if they were written yesterday. We can never help thinking that they contain the germ of the style of modern wit. Of course we are not comparing the pretensions of modern genius with anything like Shakspeare's; but we mean, that even in his jokes he contrived to escape the evanescencies of fashion, and write what would be a lasting model. See what Malvolio says about seven of his people, attending to him "with an obedient start,"—and his complaint that Sir Toby roars out his catches "without any mitigation or remorse of voice." This is anticipating the finest turns of Swift and Congreve.

But the love is the thing. It is the heart of these beautiful plays, and music plays to it like its pulse. It has been said that "no maid could live near SHAKSPEARE;" that is, that if she could not marry him, she must be gone. Yet there is reason to conjecture, from his Sonnets, that he could love a woman more than she could love him. Indeed it would have been wonderful if he could not; for who was likely to contain so much imagination as he? And

The lunatic, the lover, and the poet
Are of imagination all compact.

The very excess of his love might have hurt him with the object of it; for he could see, or imagine, all that was lovely in her; while on the other hand, she might have felt herself unequal to do justice to so unusual an affection; and out of the very pride that might have been pleased with a commoner lover, been inclined to think the superior one fantastic.—But what a love would that woman's have been who understood him? ☞

ADJECTIVES VERSUS SUBSTANTIVES.—Voltaire amused himself sometimes with the style of certain authors, all bristling with epithets: "If they could only understand (he said) that adjectives are the greatest enemies of substantives, although they agree in gender, number, and case!"

TWELFTH-NIGHT, &c.—Our meats and our sports (much of them) have relation to church-works. The coffin of our Christmas pies, in shape long, is in imitation of the cratch; our choosing kings and queen on Twelfth-night, hath reference to the Three Kings: so likewise our eating of fritters, whipping of tops, roasting of herrings, Jack of Lents, &c. they were all in imitation of church-works, emblems of martyrdom. Our tansies, at Easter, have reference to the bitter herbs; though, at the same time, it was always the fashion for a man to have a gammon of bacon, to show himself to be no Jew.—Selden.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, Lord BYRON's Tragedy of

WERNER, OR THE INHERITANCE.

[Adapted by Mr MACREADY.]

Josephine, Mrs FAUCIT, Ida Stralenheim, Miss MORDAUNT.
Werner, Mr MACRREADY, Ulric, Mr WALLACK, Gabor, Mr COOPER,
Baron Stralenheim, Mr H. Wallack, Frits, Mr Younge, Otto, Mr Cohen,
Henric, Mr Salter, Eric, Mr C. Jones, Idenstein, Mr W. Bennett,
Rodolph, Mr Cooke, Arnheim, Mr Fenton, Meister, Mr Eaton,
Ludwig, Mr Cathie, Herman, Mr S. Jones.

Previous to the Tragedy will be performed (second time in this country) P. Lindpaintner's Overture to "Der Vampyr."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES,

OR HARLLEQUIN AND MOTHER CAREY'S CHICKENS.

[By Mr BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.

Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 506 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, Henri Quatre; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Entertainments will commence with (first time this season)

THE £100 NOTE.

Lady Pedigree, Mrs TAYLEURE,
Miss Arlington, Miss TAYLOR, in which character she will sing the Ballad of "My Father Land," and the Bavarian Broom Girl's Song.
Mrs Arlington, Miss LAWRENCE, Nurse, Mrs DALY.
Montmorency, Mr WRENCH, Morgan, Mr BLANCHARD,
Janus, Mr BARTLEY, O'Shocknessy, Mr POWER,
Billy Black, Mr KEELEY, Paperfund, Mr TURNOUR, Bilker, Mr EVANS

After which, the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To conclude with,

TEDDY THE TILER.

[By Mr G. H. RODWELL.]

Lady Dunderford, Mrs Daly, Oriel, Miss Lawrence, Flora, Miss Nelson,
Julia, Mrs Brown. Lord Dunderford, Mr Evans, Henry, Mr Duruset,
Frederick, Mr Baker, Bombardine, Mr Henry, Mr Scrivener, Mr Turnour,
Teddy Mulowney, the Tiler, Mr POWER,
Tim, Mr Addison, Stiff, Mr Mears, Apewell, Mr Irwin.

To-morrow, Cinderella; and Harlequin Fat or Harlequin Bat.

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely new Drama, entitled

NANCY OF PORTSMOUTH.

Nancy Bloomfield, Miss SOMERVILLE, The Widow Crabjuice, Mad. SIMON,
Constantia, Miss Jordan, Kitty Bustle, Mrs Vale. Old Margery, Mrs Rogers,
Becky Sims, Miss Rummens. Sir Edward Gayton, Mr Gough,
Frederick Gayton, Mr Edwin, Captain Splashaway, Mr Hicks,
Joe Barton, Mr C. Hill, Fiery Ned, Mr D. Pitt, Tim Tipple, Mr Vale,
Bounce, Mr Rogers, Capt. Friendly, Mr Lee, Tapwell, Mr Hobbs,
Jemmy Gonimble, Madlle. Rosier, Long Bill, Mr Almar, Short Bill, Mr Webb.

After which, the Drama, entitled

THE ADOPTED CHILD.

[By Mr S. BIRCH.]

Lucy, Madame Simon, Jeannette, Miss Rumens, Nell, Mrs Vale.
Clara, Miss SOMERVILLE. Michael, Mr OSBALDISTON,
Sir Bertrand, Mr D. Pitt, Record, Mr Williams, Le Sage, Mr Lee,
Spruce, Mr Rogers, Flint, Mr Almar, Boy, Miss Ellis.

To conclude with, a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,

THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE].

The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.
Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

Act I.—WINTER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mr DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—SUMMER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

To which will be added, a New Comic Burletta, called

WAS I TO BLAME?

Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

After which, the Comic Burletta, called

A DEAD SHOT.

Louisa Lovetrick, Mrs FITZWILLIAM, in which character she will introduce her celebrated Description of "A Sunday Concert."
Chatter, Miss DALY.
Captain Cannon, Mr BAYNE, Mr Hector Timid, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Mr Wiseman, Mr S. SMITH, Charles, Mr V. WEBSTER.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.

Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely New Historical Burletta, called

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS.

Mary Stuart, (Queen of Scots) Miss FOOTE,
Lady Douglas, Mrs Knight, Catherine Seyton, Miss Pincott,
Lady Fleming, Miss King, Mattie, Miss Kibrey, Moggy, Miss Langley,
Jenny, Miss Slater. Lord George Douglas, Mr Fredericks,
Lord Lindsay, Mr Brougham, Sir Robert Melville, Mr Worrel,
Lord Ruthven, Mr Beckwith, Roland, Mr Raymond, Drysdale, Mr Newcombe,
Sandy, Mr J. Knight.

To which will be added, a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]

Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.

IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.

Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe,

To be followed by a Comic Burletta, called

THE LITTLE JOCKEY.

Arinette, Miss FOOTE, in which she will sing, "Why pretty Maiden," and "The Boy in yellow wins the day." Clotilda, Miss Nursey, Mause, Miss Kibrey.
The Baron D'Acourt, Mr W. VINING,
De Limburg, Mr Paget, Floriville, by a Gentleman, Jocose, Mr Collier,
Denis, Mr W. Young, Pierre, Mr Brown.

The whole to conclude with a Comic Burletta, called

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER, Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond, Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget, Captain Cape, Mr W. VINING.

COBURG THEATRE.—Richard Turpin — Ambrose Gwinett—Harlequin Silver Penny.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—Skimmer of the Seas.—Harlequin and Mother Goose.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL, 98 Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen

C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 109.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 8, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Observations on the Duty of Sea-borne Coal; and on the Peculiar Duties and Charges on Coal, in the Port of London. Founded on the Reports of Parliamentary Committees, and other Official Documents. 8vo. pp. 23. Longman.

'It has been estimated, apparently on good grounds,' observes the author of this pamphlet, 'that while the repeal of the coal duty and of the existing regulations with respect to the trade in coal, would afford very great additional facilities to almost every branch of industry carried on in the city, it would save the inhabitants of London "from A MILLION TO TWELVE-HUNDRED THOUSAND POUNDS A YEAR." The apathy,' continues he, 'which has been displayed by those so deeply interested in this affair is most singular. John Bull is the most inconsistent of animals; he loaded the table of the House of Commons with petitions against the leather duty, which added from one to two per cent. to the price of his shoes; but he submits, apparently without a growl, to taxes and regulations, which add from forty to fifty per cent. to the price of his fuel!'

We think the inconsistency can be explained, though not much to the honour of the ideas in people's heads. A man has not been used to the same kind of shoes all his life, and he has been accustomed to a choice among different shoemakers; but fuel is one among the three great necessaries of existence, and he has been so accustomed to it in the same shape from the earliest infancy, that he scarcely thinks more of enquiring seriously into the price of it, than of the price of air to breathe. It must be had; and like the air, he acquires an unreflecting notion that it is to be had in the same manner at any price; or without it he dies. The case is a good deal the same with bread. To meat he has not always been accustomed in the same degree, or of the same quality. People have had different kinds of meat at school and elsewhere: they have been taught to have a choice with it, and have often changed their butchers. But the loaf, till of late years, has been considered a thing unalterable. They have been used to one aspect and one quality of bread, ever since they can remember: and therefore, till indigestion forces upon them an alarming degree of meditation, they no more think of changing their bread, or their baker, than of going to live in a new atmosphere. A man cannot possibly do without bread: he therefore goes on, eating any kind of bread. He cannot do without warmth: he therefore goes on paying any price for coals.

There is a striking circumstance connected with this, of great importance to the consideration. People in general have too little imagination, and habit does not tend to improve it. The comfort, therefore, which they have derived ever since they were born from sustenance and warmth, they come to identify with the habitual feelings of everybody: and though they read in the newspapers of the want of bread and fuel among the poor, it is with the utmost difficulty, and by a violent forcing of the reflection, that they can draw a distinction between the sensations of the poor man's flesh and stomach, and those of their own. Hunger with themselves is brief: they can soon satisfy it. Cold is brief: they can go to the fire. They become unable to sympathize with the continuous operation of want. They think the poor man talks about cold and hunger, and that there must be some reason in it, inasmuch as he looks ill; for they can picture to their imaginations a care-worn face, since they see so many about them, where the hands are warm, and the stomachs well fed. But still, as their own hands are in the habit of being warm, and their stomachs comfortable, or at any rate uncomfortable with fullness, they have no abiding conception of hands cold for a whole day, or of an habitual craving for food.

We do not mean to say that it would be desirable for people to be oversensitive on these points; otherwise the distress of half a dozen human beings would be sufficient to discomfort the whole globe. It is to be hoped that the martyrs to reform and imagination will have suffered enough eventually, to secure the infinite preponderance of good in this world. But meanwhile, its advance is the slower for it, and the apathy of the excessively comfortable sometimes not a little provoking.

Take one of the clergymen for instance, who have been writing addresses of late to the poor, to advise them to bear hunger and cold with patience. One of these gentlemen sits down to his writing table, with his feet on a rug, before a good fire, after an excellent breakfast, to recommend to others the endurance of evils, the least part of which would rouse him into a remonstrance with his cook or his coal-merchant, perhaps destroy his temper, and put him in a state of un-Christian folly. "Bless me!" cries he, looking about him, if there is the least bit of a "crick" in the window, "how intolerably cold it is this morning!" and he rises from his chair, and not without indignation closes the intolerable window which the servant had so "shamefully neglected." His dinner is not ready when he returns from his ride. "'Tis very shameful of the cook," quoth he: "I have eaten nothing to signify since breakfast, and am ready to sink." The dinner is brought in with all trepidation, and he does sink,—that is to say, into an easy chair, and fish, flesh, and fowl sink into him. Little does he think, and less does he endeavour to think, (for the thought is not a comfortable one) that the men to whom he wrote his address in the morning, are in the habit of feeling this sinking sensation from morning till night, and of seeing their little crying children suffering from a distress which they know to be so wretched. Many of these poor people sink into the grave; and the comfortable clergyman thinks it much if he gets into his carriage or puts his warm great coat and handkerchief round his portly neck, and goes to smooth the poor man's passage to that better world, which he himself will keep aloof from, as long as port and pheasant can help him.

'What riches give us, let us then enquire:
Meat, fire, and clothes. What more? Meat, clothes, and fire.'

These are the three great necessaries of life, meaning by meat, food; though it is worthy of observation, that meat was so common in the poet's time, he makes the two words synonimous. After a few lines to show the insufficiency of superfluities for rendering bad men happy, the poet says of these superfluities:

'Perhaps you think the poor might have their part:
Bond damns the poor, and hates them from his heart.
The grave Sir Gilbert holds it for a rule,
That every man in want is knave or fool.
"God cannot love (says Blunt, with tearless eyes)
The wretch he starves"—and piously denies:
But the good bishop, with a meeker air,
Admits, and leaves them, Providence's care."

We proceed to extract from the pamphlet before us the passages most requisite to give the reader a proper notion of the abuses with which government and coal-merchants have conspired to heap the trade; but to those who take a political interest in the subject, and can afford it, we recommend an earnest perusal of the whole pamphlet. It is a pity, we think, that the author did not say more respecting the good that would be done to the suffering poor by an abandonment of the abuses; and we should have been pleased, had he marked out the particular passages for which he acknowledges himself indebted to the Edinburgh Review. But his pages are well worthy perusal: the subject imperatively demands attention. The reader will see in it (and he will partially see in our extracts) how he is cheated on all hands;—by the government, in abstracting their high-minded portion for pensioners and kings' natural children; by the Corporation of London, to an enormous extent, nobody knows on what pretence; and by the coal-merchants, in all their various contrivances of splitting, carting, and being connived at. He will there see, that during the passage of the coals from the Thames bank to his house, their cost becomes greater than the whole sum up to that period, from their digging in the mine to their arrival in London. We remember being forcibly struck by the article on the subject in the Edinburgh Review, especially by what the reviewer said respecting the frightful inequality of taxation between the Northern and Southern counties. We pray the reader, when he looks at his blazing fire, to think what precious commodities those "black diamonds" (as they have been well called), are to his coal-merchant, and how the rogue is probably hugging himself and laughing at him at that moment, for the last order he gave him. The author excepts the coal-owners from his objections, that is to say, those who supply the merchant; but we suspect, that a due enquiry into their profits would tell even there a different story.

Digitized by Google

'The grievances that affect the coal trade may be divided into two great classes: first, the duty on sea-borne coal: and second, the regulations as to the sale of coal. The last are particularly oppressive in the metropolis, where every sort of iniquity that it is possible to practise in the trade, has been fostered and promoted down to this very day.

'The Legislature of England seems to have too often forgotten that fuel is one of the articles most indispensable to existence. In our northern climates, it is quite as essential as either food or clothes: its cost forms an important item in the expense of every family in the lower and middle classes, an increase of its price affecting them in precisely the same way as an increase in the price of bread. Not only, however, is fuel a necessary of life; it is also among the most important, or rather, we should say, by far the most important, of all the instruments of manufacturing industry. It is not because the inhabitants of Glasgow, Manchester, Leeds, Birmingham, &c. are more industrious and inventive than those of Canterbury, Winchester, Exeter, &c. that they have made such prodigious advances in manufactures, wealth, and population, while the latter have been comparatively stationary—but it is because the former are abundantly supplied with fuel, while the latter are not. Since the invention of the steam engine, fire has become of infinitely more importance as a moving power than either water or wind; and in the present state of the arts, those who cannot obtain abundant supplies of fuel at a cheap rate, must submit to be outstripped by their neighbours in the career of improvement.

'Every one versed in the merest elements of political science, will be forward to admit that nothing but the pressure of the most overwhelming necessity, could ever excuse the government of a country like England for laying duties on coal, an article so indispensable as a necessary, and so important as a manufacturing instrument: and it will be as universally admitted, that in the event of a crisis ever occurring to excuse the imposition of such a tax, it should be laid equally on all classes and districts. One is almost ashamed of saying a word in defence of so plain a principle. Suppose that the public exigencies were such, that they could not be met otherwise than by laying a tax on bread, what would be thought of Parliament, were it to enact that this tax should be restricted to the counties south of the Humber, (upon which it must of course be greatly aggravated,) and that all the rest of the empire should be exempted from its operation? Would not such a proceeding be a manifest violation of one of the first duties of Government, which is bound to extend the same protection to all who are under its authority, and to subject them all to the same equal burthens? But these obvious and universally recognized principles have been trampled under foot in the case of the coal duty. It has been imposed without there being so much as the pretence of necessity to allege in excuse; and it has not been made to affect the whole empire, but only particular portions of it. Had it been made to fall exclusively on the inhabitants of those districts where coal is produced, and where it is naturally cheapest, something, perhaps, might have been found to say in favour of the inequality: but such is not the case. The duty is imposed on water-borne coals only, or on those that are conveyed to great distances by sea, and does not affect those that are consumed near the mines, or that may be conveyed by land. All the southern counties of England, as Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Middlesex, Kent, Surrey, Sussex, Hampshire, Devonshire, &c. are destitute of coal-mines, and are obliged to import supplies of coal from the north by sea. And because such is the case, because the coal-fields happen to be in Northumberland, Durham, Lancashire, and Wales, Government interposes to increase the naturally high price of coal sent to the metropolis and the southern counties, by laying a duty on sea-borne coals of no less than six shillings a chaldron, being full fifty per cent. upon the price of coals as sold by the owners! Whether there be any tax so grossly unequal and oppressive in Turkey or Spain, we know not; but we believe we may safely affirm, that it has no parallel in any other European country. The nobility and gentry of the north may consume any quantity of coals that they please, without paying a single sixpence of duty. The lordly owners of the most magnificent castles in Northumberland and Durham, escape a tax, that presses, with grinding severity on the poorest inhabitant of a cottage in the south of England. Whatever may be said as to the equality of Englishmen's rights, it were worse than ludicrous, so long as this tax exists, to talk about the equality of their burdens. * * * * * †

'A great deal of the peculiar poverty and misery to be met with amongst the labouring classes of Kent, Hampshire, Suffolk, &c., is undoubtedly ascribable to the operation of the coal duty, and of the various regulations under which trade is conducted. Were there a heavy tax on the beef, or bread, used in the southern counties, which did not extend to the North, does any one doubt that it would have a most injurious effect upon the individuals subjected to its operation? Fuel, however, is quite as indispensable as either of the articles referred to; and being so, must not a tax on it equally affect those on whom it falls, and depress their condition, compared with those who are exempted from such an impost? It is not, however, by its direct effects only that the coal tax is injurious: it is so indirectly, by depriving those subjected to it of means of employing that would otherwise be at their disposal. At present one has only to take up a map of England, distinguishing the coal districts, to learn at a glance the seats of manufacture and employment. But such is not the natural order of things. Were the duty and the regulations that grow out of it abolished, the expense of conveying coal by sea would be so much reduced, that many branches of industry which cannot at present be carried on except in the vicinity of the mines, might be carried on at a distance; while many that are now carried on in counties remote from the mines, though with difficulty, would be carried on with comparative facility and success.

'There is a statement in the second Report of the Lords' Committee (p. 139). which strikingly exemplifies what has now been stated. Mr William Stark, a manufacturer of Norwich, informed their lordships, that so long as yarn was spun by the hands, all that was used in that city was spun there; but that since yarn had been spun by machinery, Norwich had entirely lost this branch of industry, inasmuch as the high price of coal caused by the duty had disabled them from erecting machines! At the time that Mr Stark gave this evidence, there were from 4000 to 5000 persons unemployed in Norwich. And it is not, probably, going too far to say, that not one-third of them would have been in that situation but for the coal duty. * * * * * *

'The mischievous operation of the coal duty on the poor is as clear as the sun at noon-day. It deprives them of employment, and benumbs them with cold. We would beg to ask whether there be a gentleman connected with the southern counties, ignorant of the severe privations occasioned by the scarcity and high price of fuel, and of the depredations to which plantations and palings are in consequence exposed? Let none, therefore, presume to say, that the distress of the poor of Kent, Surrey, &c., is of a sort that cannot be sensibly relieved by legislative interference. To afford them material and immediate relief, we have only to treat them as we treat others; to allow them to supply themselves with fuel in the same way that the peasantry of Yorkshire and Northumberland are supplied. We do not mean to say that this relief would be sufficient; but no reasonable person can doubt that it would be very considerable; and it cannot be withheld without prolonging inequality and oppression.

'Dr Smith has truly stated, that considering the vast importance of plentiful supplies of fuel, if a bounty could in any case be justified, it would be so were it given upon the conveyance of coals from the mine to the consumer. But such, he adds, is our policy, "that where coals are naturally cheap, they are consumed duty free; where they are naturally dear, they are loaded with a heavy duty!" (Wealth of Nations, iii., p. 451). We leave it to others to determine whether the disastrous influence of such a tax, or its glaring injustice, be its most prominent characteristic.'

[The remaining Extracts in our next.]

† 'This paragraph, and one or two of those that follow, are borrowed from an article that appeared on this subject, in No. 101 of the Edinburgh Review.'

LETTER OF THE LAW.—A girl was tried for stealing a pair of black silk stockings, but it being proved upon evidence that they were odd ones, she was acquitted.

PERTINENT ANSWER TO AN IMPERTINENT QUESTION.—A countryman giving evidence in court, was asked by the counsel if he was born in wedlock? "No, sir," said the man, "I was born in Devonshire."

ANECDOTE OF HANDEL.—Actuated by motives of pure benevolence, he presented a copy of his oratorio of the Messiah to the Foundling Hospital, which then stood in need of every assistance. This act of bounty was so ill understood by the Governors, that they formed a resolution of applying to Parliament, prohibiting the performance of the Messiah by any others than Mr Handel and themselves. It was necessary to ask for Mr Handel's concurrence, but he was so little sensible of the propriety of such a proceeding, that on its being mentioned to him, he broke out into a furious passion: "For vat sal the Foundlings put mein oratorio in de Parlement? De teuffel! mein music sal not go to de Parlement!"—Musical Biography.

EQUIVOCAL MARK OF RESPECT.—An anonymous writer of the seventeenth century records the following anecdote:—'Sir Thomas Jermin, going out with his servants and brooke hawkes one evening at Bury, they were no sooner abroad but fowle were found, and he cried out to one of his falconers, "Off with your jerkin." The fellow being into the wind, did not heare him; at which he stormed, and still cried out, "Off with your jerkin, you knave, off with your jerkin!" Now it fell out that there was, at that instant, a plaine townesman of Bury, in a freeze jerkin, stood betwixt him and his falconer, who, seeing Sir Thomas in such a rage, and thinking he had spoken to him, unbuttoned himself amaine, threw off his jerkin, and besought his worshippe not to be offended, for he would off with his doublet too, to give him content.'—Strutt's Sports and Pastimes.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE. — Werner. — Davy Jones, or Harlequin and Mother Carey's Chickens.

COVENT GARDEN.—£100. Note.—Harlequin Fat, and Harlequin Bat.—Teddy the Tiler.

COVENT GARDEN.

We had heard the farce of a Hundred Pound Note so much praised before we saw it, that perhaps on that account it did not answer our expectations last night. There are laughable passages: the piece has the great attraction of a cluster of good actors in it, KEELEY, WRENCH, BLANCHARD, POWER, BARTLEY, &c.; there is a character,—Miss Arlington, for a young lady to show off in; MADAME VESTRIS did show off in it, and made it famous for her personation of a broom-girl; then KEELEY has a part of a witty Boots at an inn, who makes conundrums, and asks people whether they "give it up;" and there is a good blunder-headed character for POWER; and yet, notwithstanding all its cleverness and all these advantages, we felt disappointed. We did not heartily like, while we laughed. POWER was never in better blundering condition,—never more self-complacent and reposing,—more quietly drunk with arch humour. Every one of KEELEY's jokes had their full effect on the house; and it is a great pleasure to us to be pleased in company with others. Finally, there is a hot old Welshman performed by BLANCHARD, almost too well; for we thought he would have worked up his thin body into an apoplexy. Yet still we found something wanting. Perhaps it was because none of the characters are in their own nature pleasant. They are all selfish and self-absorbed, with the exception of the lover (WRENCH); and he has none of the graces of a lover. He has a Pshaw! for everything that is said to him, or is mixed up with opposition of some sort; and for want of his Hundred Pound Note, which gets into another man's pocket by mistake, is in danger of being taken before the justice. The old Welshman is seriously hot and unhappy, without any real drollery to carry off his calamitousness: the Irishman has a serious quarrel: Boots, in spite of his wit, has a gravity of prudence about him, and an eternal eye to his money: the Innkeeper (BARTLEY) is a mere innkeeper, mercenary and common-place; and the young lady, Miss Arlington, shows off to no real purpose, and degrades her fair proportions into the linsey-woolsey lumpishness, bald cap, and unthinking hips of the penny-seeking pilgrims from Bavaria. We should like it not, even though Madame VESTRIS performed it; and we are sorry to add, that we conceive Miss TAYLOR to be less fitted to carry off the awkwardness of this particular part of the character, and not successful in the character in general. It is proper to say, the audience seemed to differ with us in the former respect, for they encored her in the broom-song; and she obtained applause for another song; but unquestionably the performance altogether is a failure, and the reason of it is equally obvious:—she does not really give herself up to the character. She doubts, in the midst of her assumed giddiness, whether this or that touch will do; is too serious in the intervals; has an air of misgiving and shamefacedness; falls into a fit of dancing, not as if it were an irrepressible impulse, resulting from an overflow of merry fancies, but as if she had got it to do, and had made up her mind to do it courageously. In a word, the character of Miss Arlington, in Miss TAYLOR'S hands, wants animal spirits and truth. It is that of a clever artificial actress, playing her part uneasily; and this too, with such a face, voice, and figure, as make one mad to see her so spoilt; for she has undoubtedly contrived somehow to get the worst of stage educations, and has been flattered into so much artifice, that she cannot call her smile her own. Would it have been better, had not her teeth been so good? We are a little afraid so. The failure the more vexed us, because we still have a theory within us respecting her talent for comedy; but we believe we must confine it to such characters as Rosalind, where the poetry helps off the art. How charming she was in some passages of that character, and how she spoilt it with consciousness and trick, the reader too well knows. The closer she comes to real life, the less confidence she seems to retain, at least on the London stage. She sang the bits of songs introduced,¶ with great spirit, and gave us some very pleasing and powerful specimens of the depth of her voice; but the songs did not burst from her with the proper incontrollable vivacity: they were not part and parcel of all the rest, nor was she a proper giddy neice, while her aunt was talking to her. She waited for her turn in the dialogue, like an ordinary actress; and looked upon the other speaker with the conscious demeanour of one who was thinking of the house, and of what the house thought of her. But enough. We felt ourselves obliged to specify the grounds of our fault-finding, for obvious reasons. It would have been a more than ordinary pleasure to us, not to find it at all.

THE WISDOM OF THE WISEST.—Solomon always used the word fool as a term of the same signification as unjust, and makes all deviation from goodness and virtue, to come under the notion of folly.—Steele.

A TYRANT MADE USEFUL.—The Egyptians revolting, in the time of Ochus, King of Persia, he marched against them, defeated their King, Nectanehus, who was obliged to take refuge in Macedonia, caused the ox which the Egyptians worshipped under the name of Apis, to be butchered, and obliged that miserable people to adore an Ass. This last god was indeed as good as the other in reality, but not according to the reasoning of the Egyptians: who were not brought over to this new worship without a great deal of violence. Ochus committed also many cruelties against his own subjects; so that the Persians, not thinking themselves safe under so barbarous a sovereign, formed several conspiracies against his life. At last Baroas, one of the generals of his army, despatched him by poison, exposed his flesh for a prey to the fowls, and converted his bones into knife-handles, and sword-hilts.—History of Thamas Kouli Khan.

BRUTALITY AND FALSEHOOD.—A Danish chieftain of high rank, some say, of royal blood, named Lothbroc, amusing himself with his hawk near the sea, upon the western coasts of Denmark, the bird, in pursuit of her game, fell into the water. Lothbroc, anxious for her safety, got into a litle boat that was near at hand, and rowed from the shore to take her up, but before he could return to the land, a sudden storm arose, and he was driven out to sea. After suffering great hardship, during a voyage of infinite peril, he reached the coast of Norfolk, and landed at a port called Bodham: he was immediately seized by the inhabitants, and sent to the court of Edmund, king of the East Angles. When that monarch was made acquainted with the occasion of his coming, he received him very favourably, and soon became particularly attached to him, on account of his great skill in the training and flying of hawks. The partiality which Edmund manifested for this unfortunate stranger, excited the jealousy of Beoric, the king's falconer, who took an opportunity of murdering the Dane, whilst he was exercising his birds in the midst of a wood, and secreted the body; which was soon afterwards discovered by the vigilance of a favorite spaniel. Beoric was apprehended, and it seems, convicted of the murder, for he was condemned to be put into an open boat (some say the very boat in which the Danish chieftain came to England), without oars, mast, or rudder, and in that condition, abandoned to the mercy of the ocean. It so chanced that the boat was wafted to the very point of land that Lothbroc came from; and Beoric, escaped from the danger of the waves, was apprehended by the Danes, and taken before two of the chieftains of the country, named Hinguar and Hubba, who were both of them the sons of Lothbroc. The crafty falconer soon learned this circumstance, and in order to acquire their favour, made them acquainted with the murder of their father, which he affirmed was executed at the command of King Edmund, and that he himself had suffered the hardship at sea, from which he had been delivered by reaching the shore, because he had the courage to oppose the King's order, and endeavoured to save the life of the Danish nobleman. Incited by this abominable falsehood, to revenge the murder of their father by force of arms, they invaded the kingdom of the East Angles, pillaged the country, and having taken the King prisoner, caused him to be tied to a stake, and shot to death with arrows.—Strutt's Sports and Pastimes.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

C. W. (with thanks), and J. L. (with thanks also), are received. We are sensible of the value of the latter's information, and will avail ourselves of it.

The translation from Marullus is elegant, and does the author credit; but the thought has been too often repeated.

An Admirer and Subscriber to the Tatler is right. It was a mistake of the printer. Does he think it would be better to correct it now, or leave it for another volume?

Will the correspondent who writes to us on a certain delicate domestic subject (of which we had not heard a word till the moment of his communication) have any objection to inform us, whether he wishes for a reconcilement? If so, perhaps we could help him; or at any rate, do something towards showing him the way to it. The mode in which he proposes to call attention to his present position, is surely not advisable, whether he is right or wrong. We write this under the influence of very particular feelings, and with a great desire that those of all parties should be respected.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, the Historical Play, entitled

HENRI QUATRE.

Florence St. Leon, Miss PEARSON, who will introduce, "Tell me, my heart."
Louison, Mrs WAYLETT, who will introduce, "Come where the Aspens quiver."
Clotilde de Biron, Miss MORDAUNT. Henri Quatre, Mr MACREADY,
Duke de Sully, Mr Hammerton, General D'Aumont, Mr Latham,
Eugene de Biron, Mr COOPER, Frederick St. Leon, Mr J. VINING,
Moustache, Mr FARREN, O'Donnell, Mr H. Wallack, Pinçeau, Mr Webster,
Gervaise, Mr Bedford, Germain, Mr Salter,
Jocrisse, Mr HARLEY, Lafleur, (a Page) Miss Poole.
In Act II.—An Incidental Peasant's Dance, composed by Mons. SIMON.
Principal Dancers.—Mr Gilbert and Mdle. Rosalia Guet.

Previous to the Play, Spontini's Overture to "Olympia," and the National Air, "Vive Henri Quatre."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES,
OR HARLLEQUIN AND MOTHER CAREY'S CHICKENS.

[By Mr BARRYMORE.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Billboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.
DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.
The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.
Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands.

On Monday, Pizarro; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, the New Grand Comic Opera, (in Three Acts) called

CINDERELLA.

The Music, by Rossini.
Cinderella, Miss INVERARITY, Clorinda, Miss CAWSE,
Thisbe, Miss HUGHES, Fairy Queen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Felix, Mr WILSON, Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. PENSON, Pedro, Mr KEELEY,
Alidoro, Mr G. STANSBURY, Dandini, Mr MORLEY.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.
THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

On Monday, Romeo and Juliet; and Harlequin Fat or Harlequin Bat.

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely new Drama, entitled

NANCY OF PORTSMOUTH.

Nancy Bloomfield, Miss SOMERVILLE, The Widow Crabjuice, Mad. SIMON,
Constantia, Miss Jordan, Kitty Bustle, Mrs Vale. Old Margery, Mrs Rogers,
Becky Sims, Miss Rummens. Sir Edward Gayton, Mr Gough,
Frederick Gayton, Mr Edwin, Captain Splashaway, Mr Hicks,
Joe Barton, Mr C. Hill, Fiery Ned, Mr D. Pitt, Tim Tipple, Mr Vale,
Bounce, Mr Rogers, Capt. Friendly, Mr Lee, Tapwell, Mr Hobbs,
Jemmy Gonimble, Madlle. Rosier, Long Bill, Mr Almar, Short Bill, Mr Webb.

After which, the Drama, entitled

THE ADOPTED CHILD.

[By Mr S. BIRCH.]
Lucy, Madame Simon, Jeannette, Miss Rumens, Nell, Mrs Vale.
Clara, Miss SOMERVILLE. Michael, Mr OSBALDISTON,
Sir Bertrand, Mr D. Pitt, Record, Mr Williams, Le Sage, Mr Lee,
Spruce, Mr Rogers, Flint, Mr Almar, Boy, Miss Ellis.

To conclude with, a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,

THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE].
The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.
Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene 1. Regions of Time.—II. The Town of Newbury (Sunrise).—III. Cabinet in the Widow's Mansion.—IV. Splendid Temple of the New Year.—V. Picturesque Roadside Inn.—VI. Exterior of Public House and Saddler's.—VII. Suspension Bridge over the Menai.—VIII. Quiet Lodgings in a retired Neighbourhood.—IX. Race Course and Grand Stand.—X. Splendid Falls of Tivoli.—XI. Cavern (Moonlight).—XII. and last. Realms of Bliss in the Regions of Light.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

Act I.—WINTER.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mr DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.
[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—SUMMER.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

To which will be added, a New Comic Burletta, called

WAS I TO BLAME?

Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

After which, the Comic Burletta, called

A DEAD SHOT.

Louisa Lovetrick, Mrs FITZWILLIAM, in which character she will introduce her celebrated Description of "A Sunday Concert."
Chatter, Miss DALY.
Captain Cannon, Mr BAYNE, Mr Hector Timid, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Mr Wiseman, Mr S. SMITH, Charles, Mr V. WEBSTER.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].
The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely New Historical Burletta, called

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS.

Mary Stuart, (Queen of Scots) Miss FOOTE,
Lady Douglas, Mrs Knight, Catherine Seyton, Miss Pincott,
Lady Fleming, Miss King, Mattie, Miss Kibrey, Moggy, Miss Langley,
Jenny, Miss Slater. Lord George Douglas, Mr Fredericks,
Lord Lindsay, Mr Brougham, Sir Robert Melville, Mr Worrel,
Lord Ruthven, Mr Beckwith, Roland, Mr Raymond, Drysdale, Mr Newcombe,
Sandy, Mr J. Knight.

To which will be added, a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe,

To be followed by a Comic Burletta, called

THE LITTLE JOCKEY.

Arinette, Miss FOOTE, in which she will sing, "Why pretty Maiden," and "The Boy in yellow wins the day." Clotilda, Miss Nursey, Mause, Miss Kibrey.
The Baron D'Acourt, Mr W. VINING,
De Limburg, Mr Paget, Floriville, by a Gentleman, Jocose, Mr Collier,
Denis, Mr W. Young, Pierre, Mr Brown.

The whole to conclude with a Comic Burletta, called

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER, Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond, Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget, Captain Cape, Mr W. VINING.

COBURG THEATRE.—Richard Turpin — Ambrose Gwinett—Harlequin Silver Penny.

SADLER'S WELL THEATRE.—Skimmer of the Seas.—Harlequin and Mother Goose.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL, 98 Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

№ 110.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, JANUARY 10, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Knowledge for the People; or the Plain Why and Because. Part III. Origins and Antiquities. 18mo. pp. 72.—Low.

[We are obliged to give our notice of a new publication to-day, without any comments. "A great book is a great evil," says the Proverb. Mr Moore's "evil" is in 823 pages quarto; and as the man said, who was invited to lunch by the farmer, and astonished him by being a long time about it, "A cheese of this size is not so soon got through as you may imagine."

To-morrow the first notice of Mr Moore's book will appear.]

'Why is Christmas-Day so called?

'Because of its derivation from Christi Missa, the mass of Christ, and thence the Roman Catholic Liturgy is termed their Missal or Mass-book. About the year 500, the observation of this day became general in the Catholic Church.'—P. 40.

'Why are gifts at Christmas called Christmas-boxes?

'Because in olden times the Roman priests had masses for almost everything; if a ship went to the Indies, a priest had a box in her, under the protection of some saint, and for their masses to be said to that saint, the poor people put something into the priests' box, which was not to be opened till the ship's return. The mass at that time was called Christmass, the box called Christmass-box, or money gathered against that time, that masses might be made by the priests to the saints, to forgive the people their sins at that time; and from this servants had the liberty to get box-money that they too might be enabled to pay the priest for his masses, well knowing the truth of the proverb, "no penny, no pater-noster." Fosbroke says an altar was erected in every village, where persons gave money. The apprentices' boxes were formerly made of pottery; and Aubrey mentions a pot, in which Roman denarii were found, resembling in appearance an earthen Christmas-box.'—P. 47.

'Why are waits so called?

'Because of the derivation of the term from wayghtes, or hautboys, of which, it is not unworthy of remark, there is no singular number. From the instrument, its signification was after a time transferred to the performers themselves. The wayghtes (or waits) of ancient times were attendant musicians on great personages, mayors, and bodies corporate, generally furnished with superb dresses, or splendid cloaks; they were in the service of the court in the reign of Edward IV. and had their regular allowance of coals, pitched candles, bread, ale, &c. Todd derives the term from wahts; nocturnal itinerant musicians, (Beaumont and Fletcher;) Bayley, on account of their waiting on magistrates, &c. or of quet, a watch; or from the French guetter, to watch; because anciently they kept a sort of watch all night. It appears, therefore, that the persons formerly called waites, or waits, were musical watchmen, the word implying oboes. They were, in fact, minstrels, at first annexed to the King's Court, who sounded the watch every night, and in towns, paraded the streets, during winter, to prevent theft. At Exeter, they were set up with a regular salary, in 1400; and although suppressed by the Puritans, were re-instated in 1660.'—The Mirror, 1827—P. 49.

'Why are unmarried females called Spinsters?

'Because, formerly, women were prohibited from marrying till they had spun a regular set of bed furniture, and till their marriage were consequently called Spinsters, which continues till this day in all legal proceedings.'—P. 54.

'Why does the wedding-ring finger differ from the others?

'Because it is the only finger where two principal nerves belong to two distinct trunks; the thumb is supplied with its principal nerves from the radical nerve, as is also the forefinger, the middle finger, and the thumb side of the ring finger; whilst the ulnar nerve furnishes the little finger and the other side of the ring finger, at the point or extremity of which a real union takes place; it seems as if it were intended by nature to be the matrimonial finger.

'That the side of the ring finger next the little finger is supplied by the ulnar nerve, is frequently proved by a common accident, that of striking the elbow against the edge of a chair, a door, or any narrow hard substance; the ulnar nerve is then frequently struck, and a thrilling sensation is felt in the little finger, and on the same side of the ring finger, but not on the other side of it.'—Id.

'Why was a newly married man formerly called a bridegroom?

'Because groom signifies one who serves in an inferior station, and it was customary for the newly married man to wait at table on his bride and friends on his wedding-day.'—Id.

'Why is a month after marriage called the honey-moon?

'Because of its origin from a custom of the Teutones, an ancient people of Germany, to drink mead, or metheglin, a beverage made of honey, for thirty days after every wedding.'—Id.

'Why is an allowance to ladies called pin-money?

'Because pins were acceptable new year's gifts to ladies, instead of the wooden skewers which they used till the end of the fifteenth century; and instead of the gifts, a composition was sometimes received in money.'—Id.

'Why is the middle meal of the day called dinner?

'Because of its corruption from the French disner, which Du Cange derives from the barbarous Latin, disnare. Menage deduces it from the Italian desinare, to dine; and that from the Latin desinere, to leave off work.'

'Why is the covering of a coach-box called hammer-cloth.

'Because when coaches were first introduced, our frugal forefathers used to load the carriages with provisions for the family, when they came to London. The hamper, covered with a cloth, was a convenient repository, and a seat for the coachman. This was afterwards converted into a box. Hammer-cloth is therefore, probably, a corruption of hamper-cloth.'—P. 56.

'Why are chequers painted against the sides of public-houses?

'Because in early times, a chequered board, the emblem of calculation, was hung out, to indicate an office for changing money. It was afterwards adopted as the sign of an inn, or hostelry, where victuals was sold, or strangers lodged and entertained.'—P. 59.

'Why is the horse-keeper at an inn called an ostler?

'Because ostler is derived from the word hostel, which was formerly obtained from the French, and was in common use here to signify an inn; and the innkeeper was from thence called the hosteller. This was at a period when the inn-keeper, or hosteller, would be required by his guests to take and tend their horses, which before the use of carriages, and when most goods were conveyed over the country on the backs of horses, would be a chief part of his employment: and hence, the hosteller actually became the hostler, or ostler, that is, the horse-keeper.'—Hone.—Id.

'Why did tavern-keepers originally call portions of liquor "goes?"

'Because of the following incident, which, though unimportant in itself, convinces us how much custom is influenced by the most trifling occurrences.

'The tavern, called the Queen's Head, in Duke's court, Bow street, was once kept by a facetious individual of the name of Jupp. Two celebrated characters, Annesley Spay and Bob Todrington, a sporting man, meeting one evening at the above place, went to the bar, and each asked for half a quartern of spirits with a little cold water. In the course of time, they drank four-and-twenty, when Spay said to the other, "Now we'll go." "O no," replied he, "we'll have another, and then go." This did not satisfy the gay fellows, and they continued drinking on till three in the morning, when both agreed to Go; so that, under the idea of going, they made a long stay. Such was the origin of drinking, or calling for, goes.'—Etymological Compendium.—P. 60.

'Why is a chimney-piece also called a "MANTEL."

'Because it is work raised before a chimney, to conceal it, mantel originally signifying a cloak.'—P. 61.

'Why are lawyers also called attorneys?

'Because, in the time of our Saxon ancestors, the freemen in every shire met twice a year, under the precedency of the shire-reeve, or sheriff, and this meeting was called the Sheriff's Torn. By degrees, the freemen declined giving their personal attendance, and a freeman who did attend, carried with him the proxies of such of his friends as could not appear. He who actually went to the Sheriff's Torn, was said, according to the old Saxon, to go "at the Torn," and hence came the word attorney; which signified one that went to the Torn for others, carrying with him a power to act or vote for those who employed him. The distinction between attorney and solicitor, arises from the latter practising in a Court of Equity, and the former only in a Court of Law.'—Heraldic Anomalies.'—P. 72.

Observations on the Duty of Sea-borne Coal; and on the Peculiar Duties and Charges on Coal, in the Port of London. Founded on the Reports of Parliamentary Committees, and other Official Documents. 8vo. pp. 23. Longman.

[Final Extract.]

'The smallness of the coal used in London is uniformly remarked by every individual from the North who visits the metropolis. And yet, singular as it may seem, none but large coals are shipped from the Tyne and the Wear for London. The cause of the metamorphosis which the coal undergoes in its passage to the consumer is not, however, difficult to discover: and it admirably illustrates the nature of the regulations under which the trade is placed. Coals are nominally sold by the owners to the shippers by weight, or by the chaldron waggon, which is supposed to contain, when full, 53 cwt., and is stamped as such by the officer of the Customs. But the weight of the waggon depends in a great degree on the size of the pieces with which it is filled, so that in point of fact, coal is sold by measure. It is stated by the celebrated mathematician, Dr Hutton, who, being a native of Newcastle, was well acquainted with the coal trade, that, "if one coal, measuring exactly a cubic yard (nearly equal to five bolls), be broken into pieces of a moderate size, it will measure seven bolls and a half; if broken very small, it will measure nine bolls; which shews that the proportion of the weight to the measure depends upon the size of the coals; therefore, accounting by weight is the most rational method.' The shippers are well aware of this, and insist upon the coal-owners supplying them with large coal only; and to such an extent is this principle carried, that all coal for the London market is screened, as it is technically termed, or passed over gratings, which separate the smaller pieces. Inasmuch, however, as coals are sold in all their subsequent stages by measure, no sooner have they been delivered by the owner, than it is for the interest of everyone else into whose hands they may come before reaching the consumer, to break them into smaller portions. 'The ship owner,' says Mr Buddle, 'and every person from the consumer through the whole chain of dealers in coal up to the coal owners, cry out for round coals; what is the object of that? Although our waggons are loaded by weight, it is quite notorious we sell by measure; and every hand that those coals pass through, from the mine down to the cellar of the consumer, every time they are lifted, an increase of measure takes place; consequently every man, from the coal-owner to the consumer, is benefitted by every breakage of the coal. This has been carried in some instances to such an extent, that I have found it necessary to place persons on board ships to prevent the crew from breaking the coals with the carpenter's mauls! I believe that the profit of many of the retailers in London arises chiefly from the increase of measure by the breakage of the coal.'—(First Lords' Rep. p. 59.) Mr Burgin, who had been a coal-meter, declares that 'he never went to work without seeing the coals knocked to pieces.'—(Com. Rep. p. 46.) And Mr Brandling, a most intelligent and extensive coal-owner, states, that in consequence of the breakage, the coals are reduced in London to a size inferior to what they would be were they put on board unscreened, and subjected to no additional breakage.—(Com. Rep. p. 260.)'

Digitized by Google

'That such a system should have been so long persevered in, is truly astonishing. Dozens of acts of Parliament have been passed to preserve the public from fraud in the measuring of coal, and yet any coal-merchant who breaks his coal a little smaller than his neighbours, will, by making the same quantity measure farther, defraud his customers quite as effectually as if he sold them larger coal in a deficient measure. But though the attention of Honourable Gentlemen has been repeatedly called to this easy method of defrauding the unsuspecting citizens, it does not seem to have ever attracted the smallest portion of their concern. They have continued, with an Irish sort of discernment, to occupy themselves in stopping up the spigot, while the liquor was running out at the bung-hole. * * * * * * * *

'It has been said by those who profit by the existing system that the sale of coal by weight would not really put a stop to fraud, but would merely turn it into a new channel: and make that be done by wetting coal, which is now done by selling it in deficient measures. But the fallacy of this representation is obvious. Very few individuals ever think of re-measuring the coal brought to them; and besides, as has been already shewn, the correctness of the measure is no security against fraud, so long as it is impossible to regulate the size of coal. But were coals sold by weight, everyone would see, at once, whether they were unusually wet; and any dealer who should attempt to defraud his customers in this way, would immediately lose his employment. This is a natural check which every individual has it in his power to apply, and which is found to be quite effectual in preventing frauds in the sale of sugar, and many other commodities. But, in point of fact, the extent to which the weight of coal can be increased by wetting is, in all cases, very limited, and, in the case of large coal quite inconsiderable. Mr Horne, an intelligent coal-merchant, has made some experiments which throw much light on this subject. He put into a wet sack, 2 cwt. or 224lbs of small coal, and these being completely wetted, and immediately weighed, were found to have gained 28lbs. in weight; after they had been an hour in the sack, the increased weight was reduced to 20¾lbs., and after standing three hours it was reduced to 14lbs. Mr Horne says, that at the end of six hours, when the increased weight was still farther reduced, the coals were so very wet that he could not have sent them to anybody.—(Com. Rep. p. 90.) When good size coals were treated in the same way, the increased weight from wetting at the end of three hours only amounted to about 6¾lbs. on 2 cwt.; and when large coals were wetted, the increase at the end of three hours on 2 cwt. was no more than 4lbs. It is clear, therefore, that there is nothing to be apprehended from frauds from wetting were coals sold by weight. The offence is not one that could be perpetrated to any great extent even on the blind; and it is not one that can be perpetrated at all on any individual having his eyes open.' * * * * *

'Besides obviating fraud, the sale of coals by weight might be made a means of saving a great deal of labour in their delivery. At present coals, when about to be delivered in London, are uniformly put into sacks, containing each three bushels, and then again into waggons, containing, at an average, 31 sacks. Now this sacking of the coals is a very laborious and expensive, and, in nine cases out of ten, a *perfectly useless process. Were the plan of selling by weight adopted, waggons with close sides might be used, into which the coals might be delivered in bulk directly from the lighters; their weight being determined by deducting the weight of the empty waggon from its weight when full. In this way, not only would the waste of labour in filling the sacks be completely avoided, but the shooting (as it is called), or delivery to the consumer's cellars from the waggons, would be facilitated. To accomplish so desirable a change, nothing would be necessary but to have weighing machines, under proper officers, erected near the principal wharfs, and distributed throughout the city. No waggon should be permitted to leave any of the wharfs without a ticket from the officers, stating the weight of the waggon when empty, its weight at leaving the wharf after being loaded, and (consequently) the weight of coal in it. And, in order to check any frauds that might be committed between the wharf and the consumer's house, the latter should be authorised, whenever he thinks fit, to send the waggon to be re-weighed at the nearest weighing-machine; and in the event of its weight turning out deficient, the coal should be forfeited. This is the plan for the delivery of coal adopted at Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c. It is found to be quite effectual for the prevention of fraud; and is not half so expensive as the defective, and, as Bentham would call it,† fraud-generating and fraud-protecting system followed here.‡

'In despite however of the heavy expense attending the digging of coal from the mine, and conveying it to the shore, and of the waste occasioned by screening, the coal-owner only receives from 12 to 14 shillings the chaldron, for that very coal which is afterwards sold in London for 50 or 55 shillings! And enormous as this difference must appear, it is less than it really amounts to; for owing to the breakage that the coal undergoes, it may be moderately estimated, that five chaldrons of coal at Newcastle or Sunderland, are expanded into six or seven, previously to their being lodged in the consumer's cellar.§ The items which quadruple the price of coal in its transit from the owners to the consumers, have been specified with great minuteness, in the evidence of Mr Buddle before the House of Lords, and of Mr Bentley before the House of Commons. We have condensed them into the following statements; on the accuracy of which every dependence may be placed. They deserve the attention of every one who likes a good fire, and dislikes being swindled.

'It appears from the correct and valuable monthly returns of the coal market, published by Mr Pearsall, of that establishment, that the average price during last month (October 1830) of the best Wallsend coals imported from Sunderland, was 1*l.* 16*s.* 11*d.* per London chaldron. The Committee of the House of Commons state in their Report, 'that Mr Horne, a coal-merchant, stated, that if he gave 33*s.*, the market price for a chaldron of coals on board ship, he made an addition of 13*s.* 9*d.* to that price for delivering it to the consumer's cellar.' If, therefore, any of our readers laid in their winter's stock of fuel during last month, and ordered of Mr Horne, or any other coal-merchant equally respectable, the best Wallsend coals, they would, according to the above statement, be charged for them 1*l.* 16*s.* 11*d. plus* 13*s.* 9*d*, or 2*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.* a chaldron.' * * * * * Which is thus apportioned:—

Coal-owner for coal - - -	£0	13	9
Ship-owner, &c. for Voyage to London -	0	11	5⅜
Government Duty, Corporation Charges, and London Coal-merchant - -	1	5	5⅜
	£2	10	8‖

'But with respect to the other charges, consisting of the government duty and the London municipal dues, and payments on account of deliverance to the consumer, in the metropolis, amounting in all to no less than 25*s.* 5⅜*d.* a chaldron; we have no hesitation in saying, that they may, and ought to be, reduced considerably more than a half.' * * * * * *

'The corporation of London (who, we hesitate not to say, have been the indulgent foster-fathers of every abuse connected with the coal trade) exact, over and above the 1*d.* they pay to the ship meter, 3*d.* a chaldron, which goes into the corporation fund, forming an item of nearly 19,000*l.* a year. How such an abuse was suffered to grow up we know not; nor does it appear by any

* In some cases sacking may be necessary, as in carrying coals to some parts of the Temple, and other places not accessible to waggons.

† And very properly call it. It is curious to see how the particular and all-including style of this great man, which he has doubtless adopted from the wisest motives as a master of scholars (who go and deliver it in other shapes) makes its way even with those who have no proper sense of it in the abstract.—Edit. of the Tatler.

‡ The Committee of the House of Commons seem to suppose that coals, when weighed at the wharf, might be sent to the consumer in close waggons. But who is to see that these waggons are not opened by the way? Nothing but the power to have them re-weighed, and forfeited if they be deficient in weight, will be sufficient to prevent fraud. And this will equally prevent it, whether the waggons be open or shut.

§ There are abundant proofs of this statement in the different Reports.

‖ The particulars which lead to this amount are enumerated in the pamphlet.—Edit. of the Tatler.

Digitized by Google

evidence we can find, either in the Parliamentary Reports, or the lucubrations with which the Common Council have favoured us, on what grounds the 4*d.* per chaldron was granted to the meters, by the 47 Geo. 3, as pay and allowance, in addition to the 4*d.* paid to their employers. The effect, however, has been to carry to the Corporation coffers the large annual revenue above mentioned; that body having ingeniously contrived to shift to the public, the charge on account of that very duty for which it continues to receive the remuneration awarded by ancient usage and charter! Certainly it is high time that something were done to put an end to this monstrous exaction. Why should the inhabitants of Westminster, Southwark, &c. be obliged to pay 19,000*l.* a year to the funds of the aldermen and common councilmen of the city? We do not envy them their turtle, but we protest against being taxed to pay for it.

'The management of coal when brought to the wharf, and before it is sent to the consumer, is devolved entirely on a set of civic functionaries, called land-meters. Even though these persons had been each of them as watchful as Argus, their superintendence could not, owing to the facility with which frauds may be committed by breakage, be of any considerable importance; but the fact is, that they do not so much as pretend to trouble themselves about their duty. It has been conclusively proved before the Commons' Committee, that a very large part, perhaps not less than THREE FOURTHS of the entire coal sent to the different parts of the city, is dispatched without being measured! Were the existing system intended for the protection of fraud, it is not easy to see how it could be improved. The consumer gets the coal-meter's ticket, certifying the measurement of the coals sent him; and he, 'good easy man,' trusts implicitly to this official guarantee. At bottom, however, he has no security, save only the word of the dealer; the certificate of the meter being, in nine cases out of ten, founded upon it, and not on any knowledge of his own. For this precious protection the consumer has to pay 6d. a chaldron—three times what it ought to be, were it as effective as it is worthless.

'But even this is not all. The meters have no right nor power to interfere in the measurement of any coal, provided it be sent out in quantities less than nine bushels. Now, as every one knows, all the labouring classes belonging to this immense metropolis, as well as very many of the smaller sort of shopkeepers and tradesmen, buy coal from chandlers and other retailers, in one or two sacks at a time. With such sales the meter has nothing to do. He merely gives the shadow of a protection to the rich, who, if they please, may, in this respect, protect themselves; but the poor man, who has neither time nor means to secure himself against fraud, may be plundered without opposition, and with the most perfect impunity!'

* * * * * *

'After all, however, the charges which attend the delivery of the coals from the ship to the consumer's cellar, are the most exorbitant. In fact, the charge for conveying a chaldron of coals from the pool, a little below London bridge, to the consumer's in the city, amounts to no less than 14*s.* 8½*d.*; being MORE THAN THE PRIME COST OF THE COAL IN THE NORTH, including the rent of the landlord, the expense of mining, of bringing the coals to the surface of the mine, and carrying them to the ship! Is it necessary to say another word to convince every reasonable man of the existence of intolerable abuses in this department of the trade?'

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

LAW.—The King's oath is not security enough for our property; for he swears to govern according to law: now the Judges they interpret the law; and what Judges can be made to do, we know. —Selden's Table Talk.

INTERESTED MARRIAGES.—When a couple are now to be married, mutual love, or union of minds, is the last and most trifling consideration. If the goods and chattels can be brought to unite, their sympathetic souls are ever ready to guarantee the treaty. The gentleman's mortgaged lawn becomes enamoured of the lady's marriageable grove; the match is struck up, and both parties are piously in love—according to act of Parliament.—Goldsmith.

LIKING AND DISLIKE.—There are persons that we like, though they do not like us. This happens very rarely; and indeed it is a strong presumption of merit both in them and in ourselves. We fancy they only want to know us better, to be convinced of the prize they would obtain in our friendship. There are others, to whom no civilities or good offices on their parts can reconcile us, from an original distaste: yet even this repugnance would not, perhaps, be proof against time and custom.—Hazlitt's Characteristics.

RIGHT OF THE PROTESTANT CLERGY TO THEIR LANDS AND TITHES.—The unwillingness of the monks to part with their land, will fall out to be just nothing; because they were yielded up to the king by a supreme head—viz. a Parliament. If a King conquer another country, the people are loath to lose their lands; yet no Divine will deny, but the king may give them to whom he please. If a Parliament make a law concerning leather, or any other commodity, you and I for example are Parliament-men: perhaps in respect to our own private interest, we are against it; yet the major part conclude it, we are then involved; and the law is good.—Selden's Table-Talk.

SALVATOR ROSA, the famous painter, was also an elegant poet, as well as a musical composer. Yet, although so accomplished a person, he seems, says his biographer, to have been one of the most miserable of men. The greater part of his cantatas are filled with the bitterest complaints, either against his mistress or against mankind in general. He says of himself that he has had more misfortunes than there are stars in the firmament, and that he lived thirty years without one happy day.—Musical Biography.

SINGULAR ORIGIN OF THE USE OF ANTIMONY.—Basil Valentine, superior of a monastery, having observed the effect of this mineral in fattening hogs, wished to try whether it would produce the same effect on his monks. The result, unhappily, was very different: for the monks who took it died soon after: and hence the origin of the name (Anti-Moine.) In spite of this tragical experiment, however, Paracelsus resolved upon bringing the mineral into use, thinking he could employ it along with some other preparations. But neither could he boast of his success. The medical faculty of Paris was at first divided into two parties on the occasion. Some declared that antimony was a poison; others, that it was an excellent remedy. The dispute was not confined to the circle of the faculty, and it became general in Paris: the Parliament and the Sabonne took part in it; but in a short time all doubts were at an end, the wonderful effects of the mineral being proved; and the faculty at length placed it in the list of their most efficient medicines.—Vigneul Marville.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Henri Quatre. — Davy Jones, or Harlequin and Mother Carey's Chickens.

COVENT GARDEN.—Cinderella.—Harlequin Fat, and Harlequin Bat.

ADELPHI.

WE saw a little piece here on Saturday night, called A Dead Shot.—It is hardly worth criticism, though here and there is a good joke or two. Mrs FITZWILLIAM in the heroine plays effectively, and knocks a man off his chair by an ingenious flourish of her arm, while singing a mock-Italian song. The story is that of a young lady, who, in order to get rid of two lovers disagreeable to her, plays an assumed part, like Maria in the Citizen, and pretends to get into great rages, which frighten them out of their matrimonial wishes. They state their new views to the uncle, a hot old man, who thinks they are lying and insulting him. The third lover, whose affection she returns, but who was rejected by the uncle on account of his being a young lawyer not yet in practice, comes forward and states that he will fight them both; a valour, which charms the old gentleman. The inamorato accordingly goes out for that purpose: a shot is heard; and he returns as if bleeding, followed by the despairing Mr Timid (Mr BUCKSTONE), who thinks he has killed him. As a dying request, he begs to be united to the object of his love; the uncle consents; and his hand being put into the young lady's, he starts up, declaring that his object is accomplished, and that he was never better in his life. This touch of probability is hardly necessary; as the uncle, in his admiration of bravery, might have given him the lady at once: but the vraisemblable of a farce is not to be too nicely enquired into.

We found a good house, as usual, and Mr YATES rattling away to its great amusement in Was I to Blame.

COVENT GARDEN.

WE omitted to mention in our criticism on The Hundred Pound Note, that the Princess Victoria was at the play. We did not stop to see her; but she found it necessary, it seems, after the farce, to come forward to the acclamations of the audience, and receive the praises usually bestowed by anticipation upon future sovereigns. It was for her the Pantomime was played at an earlier hour than usual. We have no wish to be thought uncivil towards the little royal lady, who is probably a nice little girl; but if the consideration of one evening's health is precious to one, it is precious to all; and if it is not precious to that one, except as marking a distinction, we think that such distinction ought especially to be avoided. Sovereign persons have had too many of them already, and the health of the world has been the worse for it. The line has been drawn too strongly between royal and other natures; and both parties have suffered bitterly in consequence; the one from being nursed into too little sympathy with the many, the many from being nursed into too much, and afterwards compelled to discover the perniciousness of the mistake.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, the Tragic Play of PIZARRO.
[By Mr SHERIDAN.]
Cora, Miss PHILLIPS, Elvira, Mrs FAUCIT.
Ataliba, Mr Youngc, Rolla, Mr WALLACK, Orozembo, Mr J. VINING,
Pizarro, Mr H. Wallack, Alonzo, Mr COOPER,
Las Casas, Mr Thompson, Sentinel, Mr Salter.
In Act II.—The Temple of the Sun.—High Priest, Mr Horn.
Priests, Virgins, Matrons, &c.—Misses Byfeld, S. Phillips, Russell, Bruce, Crawford, Mrs Bedford, Mrs Newcombe.—Messrs Bedford, Bland, and Yarnold.

Previous to the Play, Spontini's Overture to "Ferdinand Cortez."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called
DAVY JONES,
OR HARLLEQUIN AND MOTHER CAREY'S CHICKENS.
[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, The School for Scandal; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, the Tragedy of
ROMEO AND JULIET.
[By W. SHAKSPEARE.]
Lady Capulet, Mrs Lovell, Nurse, Mrs Gibbs,
Juliet, Miss FANNY KEMBLE. Romeo, Mr ABBOTT,
Prince Escalus, Mr Henry, Paris, Mr Duruset, Montague, Mr Turnour, Capulet, Mr Egerton, Benvolio, Mr Baker, Tybalt, Mr Diddear,
Mercutio, Mr C. KEMBLE, Friar Lawrence, Mr WARDE,
Friar John, Mr Mears, Apothecary, Mr Meadows, Page, Miss Fortescue, Balthazar, Mr Irwin, Abram, Mr Heath, Samson, Mr Atkins, Gregory, Mr Norris, Peter, Mr KEELEY.

Previous to the Tragedy, Mozart's Overture to "Die Zauberflöte."

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called
HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.
[By Mr FARLEY.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by
Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.
THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, Cinderella; and Harlequin Fat or Harlequin Bat.

FRENCH PLAYS,
THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

This Evening,
On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par
L'HERITIERE.
Vaudeville, en Un Acte, de M. SCRIBE.
Madame de Melval, jeune Veuve, Mademoiselle HERMINIE.
M. de Gourville, M. BEHIER ST AUBERT, Gustaves, son Neveu, M. PAULIN.
Suivi de
JEAN!
Pièce en Quatre Parties Mêlée de Chant, par MM. TABAULON et ALPHONSE SIGNOL.
Madame de Ligny, Mademoiselle FLORVAL,
Madame de Sirval, Parente de Madame de Ligny, Mademoiselle Eliza,
La Marquise d'Olban, amie de Madame de Ligny, Madame Paulin,
Madame veuve Chopin, Limonadière, Madame Préval,
Adelaide, sa Fille, Mademoiselle St Ange,
Louise, Femme de Chambre, Madame Gamard.
M. DERVAL remplira le Rôle de Jean.
Rigolard, Maître de Danse, et Parrain de Jean, M. Laporte,
M. de Walbruck et M. D'Offtenn, Attachés a l'Ambassade, M. Paulin et M. Guenée,
Un Garçon, d'estaminet, M. Arnaud, Un Valet, M. Grannille.
On Finira par
LE BOUFFE ET LE TAILLEUR.
Petit Opéra, en Un Acte, Musique de GAVEAU.
Célestine, sa Fille, Mademoiselle FLORVAL.
Cavatini, Chanteur Italien, M. Alfred,
Benini, son Homme de confiance, M. Gamard,
Barbeau, Maître Tailleur, aimant passionnement la Musique, M. Préval.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called
THE WRECK ASHORE.
Act I.—WINTER.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mr DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.
[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]
Act. II.—SUMMER.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

To which will be added, a New Comic Burletta, called
WAS I TO BLAME?
Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

After which, the Comic Burletta, called
A DEAD SHOT.
Louisa Lovetrick, Mrs FITZWILLIAM, in which character she will introduce her celebrated Description of "A Sunday Concert."
Chatter, Miss DALY.
Captain Cannon, Mr BAYNE, Mr Hector Timid, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Mr Wiseman, Mr S. SMITH, Charles, Mr V. WEBSTER.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called
GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.
[By Mr BUCKSTONE].
The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely New Historical Burletta, called
MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS.
Mary Stuart, (Queen of Scots) Miss FOOTE,
Lady Douglas, Mrs Knight, Catherine Seyton, Miss Pincott,
Lady Fleming, Miss King, Mattie, Miss Kinsey, Meggy, Miss Langley,
Jenny, Miss Slater. Lord George Douglas, Mr Fredericks,
Lord Lindsay, Mr Brougham, Sir Robert Melville, Mr Worrel,
Lord Ruthven, Mr Beckwith, Roland, Mr Raymond, Dryesdale, Mr Newcombe,
Sandy, Mr J. Knight.

To which will be added, a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled
OLYMPIC REVELS.
[By Mr PLANCHE.]
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Manufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Pluto, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe,

To be followed by a Comic Burletta, called
THE LITTLE JOCKEY.
Arinette, Miss FOOTE, in which she will sing, "Why pretty Maiden," and "The Boy in yellow wins the day." Clotilda, Miss Nursey, Maude, Miss Kinsey.
The Baron D'Acourt, Mr W. VINING,
De Limburg, Mr Paget, Floriville, by a Gentleman, Jocose, Mr Collier,
Denis, Mr W. Young, Pierre, Mr Brown.

The whole to conclude with a Comic Burletta, called
CLARISSA HARLOWE.
Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER, Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond, Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget, Captain Cape, Mr W. VINING.

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely new Drama, entitled
NANCY OF PORTSMOUTH.
Nancy Bloomfield, Miss SOMERVILLE, The Widow Crabjuice, Mad. SIMON,
Constantia, Miss Jordan, Kitty Bustle, Mrs Vale. Old Margery, Mrs Rogers,
Becky Sims, Miss Rummens. Sir Edward Gayton, Mr Gough,
Frederick Gayton, Mr Edwin, Captain Splashaway, Mr Hicks,
Joe Barton, Mr C. Hill, Fiery Ned, Mr D. Pitt, Tim Tipple, Mr Vale,
Bounce, Mr Rogers, Capt. Friendly, Mr Lee, Tapwell, Mr Hobbs,
Jemmy Gonimble, Madlle. Rosier, Long Bill, Mr Almar, Short Bill, Mr Webb.

After which, a new Drama, entitled
BARON TRENCK.
[By Mr OSBALDISTON.]
Countess of Hulsdorff, Madame Simon, Countess of Lewemberg, Miss Rumens,
Victorine, Miss SOMERVILLE. Baron de Trenck, Mr OSBALDISTON,
The Count of Lissdonn, Mr Gough, Augustus, Mr Edwin,
Major Muffledorf, Mr D. Pitt, Boltzheim, Mr Almar,
François Bassentrompdorf, (with an entirely new Comic Song) Mr C. Hill.

To conclude with, a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,
THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.
[By Mr W. BARRYMORE].
The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.
Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

To-morrow, Nancy of Portsmouth; "PS. Come to Dinner;" and the Pantomime.

COBURG THEATRE.—The Hut of the Red Mountain—The Banks of the Hudson—Harlequin Silver Penny.

SADLER'S WELL THEATRE.—Skimmer of the Seas.—Harlequin and Mother Goose.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL, 98 Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

No. 111.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Letters and Journals of Lord Byron: with Notices of his Life, by Thomas Moore. Two vols. 4to. Murray.

LORD BYRON—MR MOORE—AND MR LEIGH HUNT, WITH ORIGINAL LETTERS, NOT IN MR MOORE'S WORK.

We do not pretend to give a notice of this book after the usual fashion. We shall comment on it, as it may happen; but our great object is to shew that the author is an insincere man of the world, and that neither he nor his hero have a right to scatter charges of vulgarity and unworthiness. Had Mr Moore's second volume contained no more offence than the first, we should have passed it over, content to let him enjoy the airs he gives himself, and his harmless Irish metaphor of "venom on a grave." Nor do we now pay attention to the work, out of any regard for his opinion, as far as he is concerned; but we have resolved, for certain weighty reasons, self-love apart, never to let another attack on us pass without notice. It is a plan we determined on pursuing, when we set up The Tatler, and we have already found the benefit of it. Our wish, as we said before, is to attack nobody in person, but to lead quiet tattling lives, if we are allowed to do so; but if not, we shall do our best, for far more sakes than our own, to make the blow recoil on the assailant. We have suffered enough upon all points; we have conceded enough in the case of Lord Byron. We shall concede no more. Our business will now be to give specimens of the blows we have withheld. As to Mr Moore's opinion of us or our writings the reader will see why we have long ceased to care for it; and we will here briefly tell him the reason, before we give him the proofs. We shall not deny him justice; but justice will be amply sufficient for our purpose.

Mr Moore is a songster and a man of wit. He is nothing more, nor ever will be, should he try for it till he burst. To be a man of wit, however, and a genuine one, as we allow him to be, is much; and to be a wit and a genuine songster too, has contented the ambition of the French patriot, Beranger, who has got fame by it, and admiration, and love But then Beranger has been prepared to suffer, and to go to prison; nay, he has been even content (when time was) to wear a poor coat (mention it not in the Squares!); and he has laughed at intimacies with the great, and shown that he laughed sincerely. In one word, he has had faith in disinterestedness, and practised it. Now Mr Moore has no faith except in a joke, and a lord, and a good dinner; and yet he must needs try to win a serious reputation. For this purpose he has written volumes of bad prose, full of insincerity, and poems which are "three-piled hyperboles" of sugar-plums. He is one of those who must paint the lily

And throw a perfume on the violet.

He paints and plasters, because he has no faith in his materials. He cannot give us the soul of what he describes; he despairs of being able to make us love it in its simplicity; so he brings a heap of gaudy colours and gilding to stick upon it, that we may partake of the benefits of his obtuseness. Even in his songs, he can rarely get beyond a stanza with any real gravity. His table-songs are inimitable: his lampoons have been the just dread of dowagers and Whig-rats. But with the exception of a few lyrics upon recollections connected with Ireland, and probably with the best part of his childhood, which are affecting and beautiful, he cannot get a good serious thought in the first verse of a song, but he must spoil it in the next with some conceit or pedantry. He set about spoiling his prose, in the same manner, with classical names lugged in to bear company with modern, like a schoolboy's theme, with degrading prettinesses, and remote, half-witted metaphors; such as when he talks of Burke "perching himself on the remotest branch from popular contact;" as if Burke, and the thick of politics, had anything to do with a linnet in a bush. The ridicule of the critics made him doubt this style; so in his new work he has done his best to alter it, though it was evidently a hard task; and not knowing how to be in earnest, he has taken to as ludicrous a formality; talks of "the poet Dryden" and "the poet Ariosto," as if there were Drydens and Ariostos who were potters; and puts on so many strange, bridling, cosy, motherly, moral airs, betwixt love for his naughty young master, and zeal for the chaplain, that we almost fancy him with a mob-cap on, and a cup of "the creature" by his side. In short, Mr Moore is no real biographer, no prose-writer, no thinker; there is not one original reflection in all his remarks, nor one that has not been made in a better manner before him by writers of his own time; and his poetry is just as good as wit and festivity can make it, and nothing else. His world is the little world of fashion; his notions of liberty those of a Whig-Aristocrat, without the excuse; and the whole secret of his deification of Lord Byron is, that their intercourse was one of flattery and convenience, and that in trumpeting his great craft down the stream, he hopes his "little sail"

Will join the triumph and partake the gale.

He is mistaken. His huge book will go down to posterity like many others, for anybody to dig out of the book-shelves who chooses; but it will assuredly be left there, with a great deal even of what Lord Byron has supplied, like the letters of Rochester and others, which nobody now cares about. Extracts will do very well for the collections of those days, but none of Mr Moore's heavy common-places will accompany them; nor will Lord Byron, though a far greater genius than he, be regarded with anything like his biographer's wholesale astonishment. Does he think that the mighty mind of posterity will busy itself with his bustling details, unless it be as we do with Mr Pepys; or look upon a lord with his little eyes? Even now, Lord Byron is not regarded by thousands, in any point of view, as he supposes, or would have us think he supposes. The bad opinion of the Noble Lord that was entertained years ago by multitudes, even among the aristocracy, is changed—for the worse. The grounds of this deterioration remain undisproved. The very lapse of a few short months has made a difference as to the impression which Mr Moore might have expected from his book; and to us, the difference has been an enormous one. The second French Revolution has drawn its golden line between the past and the future. Humanity and its rights have emerged into the sunshine: we have beheld the marvellous spectacle (Mr Moore called the impulse that produced it an "awful" one, and doubtless must have felt it so) of un-worldly power taking its seat on the throne of worldly: and everything in future is not to be construed in favour of the great, and disfavour of those they differ with, upon the strength of the old slavish misbelief.

Observe. Two years ago, if you had been a suffering Reformer, if you had persevered in one long work of endeavour for human good, or what you believed to be such, and in the belief that a time would come after you were dead and gone, when the dream should be realized,—if you had sacrificed "health, fame, and fortune" in the endeavour; if you had encountered every species of opposition and calumny: if your cheeks had sunk; if your heart had been torn to pieces for your children; and if with a weakened frame, and no resources but of your tired thoughts, not even with a sixpence in the world before you, you had been compelled to begin life again, at an age when others begin to look forward to some repose; and if during this time, you had been deceived by false patrons, and forsaken by false friends, and at the close of it had been worked up by a combination of circumstances and of pangs infinite, to utter a syllable of complaint which might have been less excusable in happier hours, and which you yourself should regret,—that one offence would be turned against you as if you had committed a thousand crimes; all that you had ever said, done, or endured in behalf of generous sentiments would be forgotten; and nobody be so loud in your condemnation, as the men whose desertion had helped to sting you into the impulse.

Now mark on the other hand. If, instead of the enduring Reformer, thus beset with misfortunes, you had been a Lord,—rich, noted, and spoiled,—with every humour upon earth to indulge, and with the power to indulge it; if you had had no object in life, even when you seemed to have a better one, but to make a show and be talked of; —and if this Lord, so spoiled and perverted, partly by the flatteries of the very men who forsake the unfortunate, had been thought to commit almost every crime under the sun; was known to have been guilty of a thousand painful ebullitions of will and selfishness; to have disgusted the class that would have been proud of him, and the reformers with whom he pretended to sympathize; to have calumniated his friends; betrayed his guests to derision; hastened the ruin of the fortunes he pretended to raise, by giving them up to their enemies; and spared neither age nor sex in his resentment;—yet being a Lord, and having a table, and possessing other worldly advantages as well as genius enough to make his opinions and his favour of consequence; what excuse should not be found for him? How would not the doctrines of charity, which the other man had preached till he was hoarse, be brought up, solely in his favour? How would not some of his offences be denied with indignation, others contrasted with his good qualities, others secreted, others philosophized upon and excused, and all recommended to the consideration of our modesty, as the errors of a man of genius, without which, perhaps, he would not have been so great as he was? How many generous sentiments would not be expressed in pity to the man of excessive sensibility, who wounded everybody's feelings? How would not fond servility have trembled at his displeasure, and been glad to take his blows? How would not all his claims, however ostentatious, have been admitted? How his satires and private libels have been treasured up? How his friends resolved not to forsake him, in spite of the insults he dealt to them all round? Nay, how would not his very confessions of offence have been received with fond deprecating smiles as whims of his Lordship's not to be thought of,—mystifications of dull rogues, merely at the expence of a few women,—singular, jocose humours, in which it pleased his Lordship to be tragic,—and generous instances of that desire to be thought ill of, which marked his hatred of hypocrisy, and the extreme simplicity and goodness of heart which was so natural to him.

Digitized by Google

Times are changed. They are changed, not because the case itself is altered, but because the assumptions of privileges and worldliness have received a blow such as was thought impossible, and men's hearts have expanded before their new hopes, and will not suffer those who believed in truth and public virtue, to be any longer at the mercy of their calumniators.

Mr Moore, in his second volume, has ventured to speak of the "unworthy alliance" which Lord Byron made with Mr Leigh Hunt when he set up The Liberal, of the "dross" of which that work was compounded, and of the "taint" with which his Lordship's purities were to be infected by being mixed up in the same "pot-au-feu." These images of the pot and sauce-pan are natural to Mr Moore, though in his show-shops he takes care to put his fillagree in the window. It is furthermore to be gathered from Lord Byron's correspondence, that Mr Moore represented the faculties of Mr Leigh Hunt for periodical writing as "dead weight;" and wherever the name of that person is mentioned, Mr Moore does it with infinite airs and assumptions. We have observed, that we do not care for Mr Moore's opinion with regard to our writings. We should value it if we thought it sincere, upon a song or a squib. But whatever it may be in our power to do in other matters, we have a poor opinion of his knowledge of what ought to be done. We shall bring additional reasons for it before we have finished these notices. Our immediate object is to shew the inconsistency between the opinion which Mr Moore gave of Mr Leigh Hunt to Lord Byron after his former friend had fallen into adversity, and lost his public influence, and the one which he expressed to Mr Leigh Hunt himself when lords came to visit him, and when Mr Moore thought his good word of consequence. We again request the reader to keep in mind what we have stated respecting the object of these articles. We do not wish to "Sir," or to bandy charges of this and that with Mr Moore, as the ladies "Madam" each other in the Beggar's Opera, when Macheath is found out between them. We concede with hearty good-will his hero to Mr Moore, and the honours of what we suppose we are to call a "worthy" alliance. But we do not choose to risk any detriment possible to this new "dead-weight" of ours, The Tatler,—a germ, however poor, of precious promise of shelter to many heads; and in order to take away the last remaining chance of an ill-effect of Mr Moore's opinions upon those of the public, we shall shew how little they are to be depended upon. His first volume may be forgotten by this time, and even in that volume, though there is the wish to think ill and to ridicule, Mr Moore has been compelled to be inconsistent by certain politic retrospections. He knew what his own conduct had argued in the first instance: he was aware that Lord Byron possessed letters; though, perhaps, he had forgotten those in the possession of Mr Leigh Hunt; at all events he has hampered his reputation for sincerity beyond retrieval. The reader will see, by the letters we are about to lay before him, that he who talked to Lord Byron about "dross," and "taint," and "dead-weight," must, either to his Lordship or Mr Leigh Hunt, have been grossly insincere. Yet even this light is nothing to what he must appear in, when the reader sees his expressions of gratitude contrasted with the warnings he afterwards gave the noble lord against a connection with his former friend, on account of his being at a disadvantage with the world.

The letters commence in the year 1810, when Mr Leigh Hunt was Editor of The Examiner, and wrote the dramatic criticisms in that paper. The signature of the first was cut out to give away.

LETTER I.*

On receiving a letter and some books.

[1811.]

My Dear Sir,—I am just about to step into the mail for a week's absence from town, and have only time to say that I have received your letter, which I have read with gratitude and admiration.—How you, who write so much in public, can afford to write so well in private, is miraculous—I shall take your books with me, and hope to tell you all I think and feel about them at Beckenham.

Bury Street, Monday Evening.

LETTER II.

On Mr Moore's Opera of M. P., or Blue Stocking—Mr Leigh Hunt's Feast of the Poets, &c.

[Post-mark, 1811.]

My Dear Sir,—It was my intention upon receiving the last letter with which you favoured me, to answer it by a visit, and that immediately; but I was hurried off to the country by the sickness of a friend; and since my return, I have been occupied in a way that makes me very unfit society for you—namely, in writing bad jokes for the galleries of the Lyceum. To make the galleries laugh, is in itself sufficiently degrading, but to try to make them laugh and fail (which I fear will be my destiny) is deplorable indeed. The secret of it however is, that, upon my last return from Ireland, in one of those moments of weakness to which poets and their purses are too liable, I agreed to give Arnold a piece for the summer, and you may perceive by the lateness of my appearance, with what reluctance I have performed my engagement.

It will no doubt occur to you, upon reading the first page of this note, that the whole purport of it is to ask for mercy; but the kind terms in which you have spoken of some things I have written, make me too much interested in your sincerity to ask for, or wish, the slightest breach of it. I have no doubt that, in this instance you will treat me with severity, and I am just as sure that, if you do, I shall have deserved it. Only say that you expected something better from me, and I shall be satisfied.

I must (though late) thank you for your last Reflector—the poem to which you were good enough to direct my attentions, interested me extremely; there is nothing so delightful as those alternate sinkings and risings, both of feeling and style, which you have exhibited in those verses, and you cannot think how gracefully it becomes the high philosophy of your mind to saunter now and then among the flowers of poetry. Do indulge her with a few more walks, I beseech you.

I am afraid you look upon me as a bad politician, or you would likewise have bid me read the fine article, entitled (if I recollect right) "A Retrospect of Public Affairs."—It is most ably done—but you write too well for a politician—and it is really a pity to go to the expence of fulminating gold, when common gunpowder serves the purpose just as well.

I shall not call upon you now till I have passed the ordeal—but till then, and ever, believe me, my Dear Sir,

Your's with much esteem,

Bury street, Saturday. Thomas Moore.

The fragment which Carpenter told you I had for the Reflector was wickedly political—Some of the allusions have now lost their hold, but you shall see it, and perhaps something may, with your assistance, be yet made of it.

LETTER III.

On M. P. or the Blue Stocking.

My Dear Sir,—I have not the least fear that you will make any ungenerous use of the anxiety which I express with respect to your good opinion of me. I dare say you have read in the Times of yesterday the very well-written, and (I confess), but too just account which they give of the shooting of my fool's-bolt on Monday. The only misrepresentation I can accuse them of (and that I feel very sensibly) is the charge of Royalism and courtier-ship which they have founded upon my foolish clap-trap with respect to the Regent; — this has astonished me the more, as the Opera underwent a very severe cutting from the Licenser for a very opposite quality to courtier-ship, and it is merely lest you should be led into a mistake (from the little consideration you can afford to give to such nonsense) that I trouble you with this note.

If the child's plea,—"I'll never do so again," could soften criticism, I may be depended upon from this moment, for a most hearty abjuration of the stage, and all its heresies of pun, equivoque, and clap-trap:—however humble I may be in other departments of literature, I am quite conscious of being contemptible in this.

Your's, my Dear Sir, very truly,

27 Bury street, Wednesday. Thomas Moore.

Did you receive a note I sent you about a week ago?

LETTER IV.

On the Feast of the Poets—Lord Moira, &c.

[Post-mark, August 1812.]

My Dear Sir,—I am sorry to find by your Examiner of last Sunday that you are ill, and I sincerely hope, both for the sake of

* The Italics in all the following letters are the writer's own.

Digitized by Google

yourself and the world, that it is not an indisposition of any serious nature.—I have very often since I left town had thoughts of writing to you; not that I had anything to say, but merely to keep myself alive in your recollection, till some lucky jostle in our life's journey throws us closer together than we have hitherto been. It is not true, however, that I have had nothing to say to you, for I have to thank you for your poem in the Reflector, which I would praise for its beauty, if my praises could be thought disinterested enough to please you—but it has won my heart rather too much to leave my judgment fair play; and the pleasure of being praised by you, makes me incapable of returning the compliment:—all that I can tell you is, that your good opinion of me in general is paid back with interest ten-fold, and that my thoughts about you are so well known to those I live with, that I have the pleasure of finding you acknowledged among them by no other title than "Moore's Friend." I suppose you have heard that I suddenly burst upon my acquaintances last spring, in the new characters of husband and father, and I hope you will believe me, when I say that (though my little intercourse with you might have made such a confidence impertinent on my side,) I often wished to make you one of the very few friends who knew the secret of my happiness, and witnessed my enjoyment of it. I rather think too, that if you were acquainted with the story of my marriage, it would not tend to lower me from that place, which I am proud to believe, I hold in your esteem. I have got a small house and large garden here in the neighbourhood of Lord Moira's fine library, and feel happy in the consciousness that I have indeed "mended my notions of pleasure," and that I am likely, after all, to be what men like you approve. Mrs Moore and I have been for these ten days past on a visit to our noble neighbour, who is at length preparing for an old age of independence, by a manly and summary system of retrenchment. He has dismissed nearly all his servants, and is retiring to a small house in Sussex, leaving his park and fine library here to solitude and me. How I have mourned over his late negotiation! A sword looks crooked in water, and the weak medium of Carlton House has given an appearance of obliquity even to Lord Moira—but both the sword and he may be depended on still—at least I think so.

I was very much flattered by your taking some doggrel of mine out of the Morning Chronicle some months since, called "The Insurrection of the Papers." I don't know whether you saw "The Plumassier" about the same time. It was mine also, but not so good. I hope next year, when I have got over a work I am about, to help you with a few shafts of ridicule in the noble warfare you are engaged in, since I find that you have thought some of them not unworthy your notice.

With best regards to Mrs Hunt and your little child, for whom I could supply a companion picture; I am, my Dear Sir,

Most truly your's,

Wednesday. THOMAS MOORE.

[I shall take the liberty of paying] the postage of this, lest it might not be received at the Office.

[To be continued to-morrow, with further remarks.]

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Pizarro. — Davy Jones, or Harlequin and Mother Carey's Chickens.

COVENT GARDEN.—Romeo and Juliet.—Harlequin Fat, and Harlequin Bat.

FRENCH PLAYS—HAYMARKET THEATRE.

WE last night went with a good deal of expectation of amusement, and much love of faces newly arrived from Paris, to see the French actors begin their performances here for the season. It was bad weather, which made us fear they might be baulked of some of their visitors; and when we arrived, we found but a gloomy box to sit in, from which we could not discern whether the house was full or not. The places immediately about us were not quite filled at a late hour. But there stood the performers on the stage, with the French faces which we had learnt doubly to like since the noble Revolution: we fancied them just arrived from that metropolis which has given every Frenchman a lustre in our eyes; and we shook hands with them in imagination,—we mean with two of them. As to the third, who was a lady, we embraced her with all our heart,—that is to say, with as much of it as was left us by the rest of her countrywomen; which is a common meaning of the phrase de tout mon cœur, though not always with the same excuses. It was related among the anecdotes of the Great Week, that a Parisian lady being asked what she thought of the heroic workmen and artisans, exclaimed with enthusiasm, "I could embrace them all!" Now this is what we felt towards the stage representatives of those fair Parisians, who assisted the heroes when they bled.

Unfortunately during the first piece we saw but one of them; for there were but three dramatis personæ in it. It is called L'Héritière (The Heiress), a comedy-vaudeville, or with songs (we explain these matters, because it is a pedantry to suppose that every one who is capable of relishing a good thing, is acquainted with a language); and it is written by Messrs. SCRIBE and G. DELAVIGNE, one of those BEAUMONT and FLETCHER partnerships in little, the commonness of which in Paris appears so strange to our sulkier muses.

This piece is very pleasant, and has a very simple and natural plot, for a farce. M. de Gourville (M. BEHIER ST AUBERT), an elderly gentleman, accompanied by his nephew Gustave (M. PAULIN), who is fond of sporting, has taken the road to his country-house to enjoy the pleasures of the season, when he stops at the residence of a young widow, Madame de Melval (Mademoiselle HERMINIE), who is destined by an uncle to be his ward and wife. The lady frankly confesses, that under all the circumstances of her widowhood, and after what she has experienced of the levities of younger men, she is not unwilling to complete her uncle's views; but as she acknowledges with equal frankness that she is not in love; and as M. de Gourville has a passion for large incomes, and expects to have no more with her than one of ten thousand livres, he thinks it may be as well to transfer her to his nephew. He accordingly informs her that the young gentleman, who has only been in the house three days, and all that time occupied with his sporting, is in love with her. Madame de Melval has great difficulty in believing this, especially as the nephew sleeps in her presence, scarcely ever speaks to her, and is riotously gay; but the uncle insists that it is true, that he only seems to sleep, has only unnatural fits of spirits, and eats nothing. At this juncture in comes Gustave, bawling for his breakfast.

We will give a passage or two, as we proceed.

'Gustave. Good morning, Madam: Good morning, my dear uncle. So, nobody dreams of eating yet, eh? I've been in the breakfast-room, and it is one vast solitude.

'Agatha (Madame de MERVAL). We had a project, Sir, of going to breakfast at a little distance from the house, near the fountain.

'Gourville. Ay, a good jolly luncheon, at two.

'Gustave. At two! Good God, I can never go so long at that! (Gourville makes signs to him). It's very well of you to shrug your shoulders, who lie in bed and all that; but I, who am scampering about the fields before day-light——

'Agatha. How, Sir!

'Gustave. Yes, Madam, I was at it at four this morning.

'Gourville (to Agatha). I told you he never sleeps.

'Gustave. No: your gardener will not let me. I told him to call me between six and seven, and he must needs come telling me at four that I had "only two hours to sleep." I got in such a rage with the fellow! For you must know, Madam, I was in one of the finest sleeps I ever had in my life: aye, and dreams too.

'Agatha. What, you dream then, Sir?

'Gustave. Oh yes, Madam.

'Gourville. Come, now he's making way.

'Gustave. I dreamt I was in the middle of a battle, Madam, gaining a great victory. (Here he sings a song to that effect.)

Agatha. (aside to Gourville) Very amiable no doubt, and lively, my dear Sir; but there's no love here.

Gourville. Unnatural spirits, that's all; forced animation.

Gustave. I'm sure, Madame, you, who are so good and so amiable, would not see me expire at your feet. Would you be good enough to stir these people a little?

Agatha. Sir, I fly to make them haste with your breakfast.

Gustave (seizing her hand and kissing it as she is going out.) Madam, you restore a dying man.

The uncle is in despair at this scene. He reproaches Gustave with his want of gallantry, and is about to insinuate that Madame de Melval is in love with him, when the other, guessing his intention, informs him that he shall remain insensible, for the fact is, that he hates women who fall in love first. He likes one that makes conquest difficult. "Well, my friend," says the uncle, "you may put up your tent here then; for I was going to tell you, that Madame de Melval regards you with aversion."

The nephew's vanity is roused at this. He vows he will bring down her pride, made her love him, and then laugh at her. Being left to himself to pursue his project, he accordingly resolves upon eschewing breakfast, in order to exhibit the want of appetite, suitable to a lover:— for which purpose he takes a hunk of bread out of his pocket, such as sportsmen sometimes arm themselves with, and falls to eating it as fast as possible, for fear of being surprised. The lady comes in, and finds him pensively reading Racine. In a word, he now makes love as hard as he can; and though he does not succeed immediately, has hopes. His uncle encourages him to make haste, by telling him that there is another lover in the case, from whom Agatha has just received an offer of marriage, to which she is about to return an answer in writing. Gustaves goes out to seek her. Meanwhile the uncle sits down to a packet of letters, which has just arrived for himself.

But what a change does this packet make! One of the letters contains the last will and testament of his friend the uncle of Madam de Melval; and by this will he finds that instead of being heiress to a mere ten thousand livres a year, she is sole legatee, and heiress to an income of upwards of a hundred thousand.

He now curses the moment in which he recommended his nephew to make love, and instantly sets about undoing his work. He hears with alarm Gustave's account of the promising look of his adventure; and afterwards, on finding him and Mad. de Melval together, is horrified at hearing her tell him, with a smile, in answer to his questions about the other lover, to go and fetch the letter she has written to him. The uncle seizes the moment of his absence, to inform her that his nephew's passion is a joke, and that he is making sport of her. The disconcerted widow receives him accordingly on his return into the room, with such coldness, as to induce him to ask his uncle for an explanation. Gourville tells him, that the joke he intended for the lady, has recoiled on himself; for in fact she loves him as little as he does her. The poor nephew replies, that he really does love her: his intended joke has turned into a grave passion. M. de Gourville, startled at this, resolves upon getting him out of the way without more ado. He tells him he must in decency go; the honour of the family demands that he must not stay to be despised: he goes out to order the post-coach, he sees the horses put to, he calls out to his nephew that he is ready to set off with him. Gustave in despair gets the servant to carry a note to Madame de Melval, who returns it unopened. "La Fleur," says he, "ten louis for yourself, and as many for the postillion, if he will dash off with my uncle immediately, a league and back again."

Digitized by Google

La F. How, Sir!

Gust. Twenty louis.

La F. But consider, Sir!

Gust. It's a wager.

La F. Oh a wager, is it? Then here goes.

Enter Madame de Melval, without seeing Gustave, and laments aloud that she cannot help having an affection for him, and regretting his departure. He comes forward, confesses what his plan had been, owns that he had been vanquished and made to repent it, and is explaining to her, as he thinks, his uncle's conduct, when the latter is brought back by the postillion. The old gentleman puts the best face he can upon the matter, and produces the will, which makes Agatha stare at his virtue in having been able to marry, and yet renouncing her. The delighted nephew professes equal astonishment, and both unite in overwhelming the bewildered speculator with torrents of acknowledgment.

We have left ourselves no room to expatiate on the neatness, compactness, and surprising turns of this very agreeable piece; nor even to criticise the new actors whom we saw; which is not amiss; for we should not like to make objections to foreign performers, without taking into consideration the difference of national acting, and all which might reasonably render our opinion doubtful, especially on a first night: and we are obliged to say that we were disappointed in the performance of this first piece. The second promised better, but we did not stop it, knowing that we should have room to criticise but one piece at a time, which luckily suits a paper published so often as ours: and besides, we could not get a book of it, which we confess to be necessary to our due appreciation of a language, which we are more in the habit of reading than of hearing. ☞

Rochefoucauld has said that hypocricy is the homage which vice pays to virtue. Might it not also be said of those writings which endeavour to represent prejudices as useful, that they are the homage which absurdity pays to good sense?—Yellow Dwarf.

Delicacy in Conversation. — There is speaking well, speaking easily, speaking justly, and speaking seasonably. It is offending against the last, to speak of entertainments before the indigent; of sound limbs and health before the infirm; of houses and lands before one who has not so much as a dwelling; in a word, to speak of your prosperity before the miserable; this conversation is cruel, and the comparison which naturally rises in them betwixt their condition and yours, is excruciating.—Bruyère.

We measure the excellency of other men, by some excellency we conceive to be in ourselves. Nash, a poet, poor enough (as poets used to be) seeing an Alderman with his gold chain, upon his great horse, by way of scorn, said to one of his companions,—"Do you see yon fellow, how goodly, how big he looks; why that fellow cannot make a blank verse."—Selden's Table-Talk.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

Act I.—Winter.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mr DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—Summer.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

To which will be added, a New Comic Burletta, called

WAS I TO BLAME?

Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

After which, the Comic Burletta, called

A DEAD SHOT.

Louisa Lovetrick, Mrs FITZWILLIAM, in which character she will introduce her celebrated Description of "A Sunday Concert."
Chatter, Miss DALY.
Captain Cannon, Mr BAYNE, Mr Hector Timid, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Mr Wiseman, Mr S. SMITH, Charles, Mr V. WEBSTER.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr Buckstone].
The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, the Comedy of

THE SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL.

[By Mr Sheridan.]

Lady Teazle, Miss CHESTER, Lady Sneerwell, Mrs FAUCIT,
Mrs Candour, Mrs Orger, Maria, Miss Mordaunt, Maid, Mrs Webster.
Sir Peter Teazle, Mr FARREN, Sir Oliver Surface, Mr DOWTON,
Joseph Surface, Mr MACREADY, Charles Surface, Mr WALLACK,
Sir Benjamin Backbite, Mr HARLEY, Crabtree, Mr W. Bennett,
Careless, Mr Yarnold, Rowley, Mr Younge, Moses, Mr Webster, Trip, Mr Balls,
Snake, Mr Thompson, Sir Harry, (with a Song) Mr SINCLAIR

Previous to the Comedy, (3rd time in this Country) F. Schneider's Overture to "A la Chasse."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES,

OR HARLLEQUIN AND MOTHER CAREY'S CHICKENS.

[By Mr W. Barrymore.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

To-morrow, Werner; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, the New Grand Comic Opera, (in Three Acts) called

CINDERELLA.

The Music, by Rossini.
Cinderella, Miss INVERARITY, Clorinda, Miss CAWSE,
Thisbe, Miss HUGHES, Fairy Queen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Felix, Mr WILSON, Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. PENSON, Pedro, Mr KEELEY,
Alidoro, Mr G. STANSBURY, Dandini, Mr MORLEY.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr Farley.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr Peake.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

To-morrow, Fazio; and Harlequin Fat or Harlequin Bat.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely New Historical Burletta, called

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS.

Mary Stuart, (Queen of Scots) Miss FOOTE,
Lady Douglas, Mrs Knight, Catherine Seyton, Miss Pincott,
Lady Fleming, Miss King, Mattie, Miss Kitrey, Moggy, Miss Langley,
Jenny, Miss Slater. Lord George Douglas, Mr Fredericks,
Lord Lindsay, Mr Brougham, Sir Robert Melville, Mr Worrel,
Lord Ruthven, Mr Beckwith, Roland, Mr Raymond, Drysdale, Mr Newcombe,
Sandy, Mr J. Knight.

To which will be added, a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[By Mr Planché.]
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.

To be followed by a Comic Burletta, called

THE LITTLE JOCKEY.

Arinette, Miss FOOTE, in which she will sing, "The Boy in yellow wins the day."
Clotilda, Miss Nursey, Maurice, Miss Kibrey.
The Baron D'Acourt, Mr W. VINING,
De Limburg, Mr Paget, Floriville, by a Gentleman, Jocose, Mr Collier,
Denis, Mr W. Young, Pierre, Mr Brown.

The whole to conclude with a Comic Burletta, called

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER, Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond, Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget, Captain Cape, Mr W. VINING.

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely new Drama, entitled

NANCY OF PORTSMOUTH.

Nancy Bloomfield, Miss SOMERVILLE, The Widow Crabjuice, Mad. SIMON,
Constantia, Miss Jordan, Kitty Bustle, Miss Vincent, in which she will sing
"Oh men! what silly things ye are," Old Margery, Mrs Rogers,
Becky Sims, Miss Rummens. Sir Edward Gayton, Mr Gough,
Frederick Gayton, Mr Edwin, Captain Splashawny, Mr Hicks,
Joe Barton, Mr C. Hill, Fiery Ned, Mr D. Pitt, Tim Tipple, Mr VALE,
Bounce, Mr Rogers, Capt. Friendly, Mr Lee, Tapwell, Mr Hobbs,
Jemmy Gonimble, Madlle. Rosier, Long Bill, Mr Almar, Short Bill, Mr Webb.

After which, a new Comic Drama, entitled

"PS. COME TO DINNER."

Charlotte, Miss Vincent, Fanny, Miss Ellis, Mrs Pickwick, Madame Simon,
Mrs Bobbin, Miss Rummens, Betty, Mrs Rogers.
Sir Gregory Gander, Mr D. PITT, Capt. Court'em, Mr Honor, Scapin, Mr C. Hill,
Lackbrain, Mr Rogers, Peter Pickwick, Mr VALE, Tim Bobbin, Mr WILLIAMS,
Hob, Mr Emded, Harry, Mr Hicks. Snooz'em, Mr Gough.

To conclude with, a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,

THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

[By Mr W. Barrymore].
The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.
Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

To-morrow, Nancy of Portsmouth; The Adopted Child; and the Pantomime.

Coburg Theatre. — The Gambler's Life—Jonathan Dobson—Harlequin Silver Penny.

Sadler's Well Theatre.—Skimmer of the Seas.—Harlequin and Mother Goose.

Published by J. Onwhyn, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. Chappel; Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange; A. Hays, 165 Regent street; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at Ebers's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. Reynell, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 112.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 12, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Letters and Journals of Lord Byron: with Notices of his Life, by Thomas Moore. Two vols. 4to. Murray.

LORD BYRON—MR MOORE—AND MR LEIGH HUNT,
WITH ORIGINAL LETTERS, NOT IN MR MOORE'S WORK.

[Continued from our last]

In the year 1812, the then Editor of the Examiner had been provoked by the Prince Regent's tergiversation towards Ireland, and the adulation of the Morning Post, into jesting about a large "Adonis of fifty," and saying, that his Royal Highness had lived half a century without doing anything for the good of the people or the respect of posterity. For these words (or something like them) he and his brother, the joint proprietors of the Examiner, were sent to prison, and fined a thousand pounds. The sentence might have been escaped, the fine might have been escaped, had they consented to promise that they would say no more about the Prince. They refused. The fine was offered to be collected for them among friends,—among the people. They with gratitude declined. Some years after, Lord Byron, who thought himself obliged to Mr Leigh Hunt for his sticking by him in adversity, offered, through Mr Shelley, to lend him five hundred pounds to bring him over to Italy, that he might endeavour to repair his broken health and fortunes. He thanked his Lordship, but as he could not go to Italy, he of course could not avail himself of the offer. We speak of these money matters in a lump, to let the reader see, that when Mr Leigh Hunt thought himself bound at last to apply to his friends, and his adherence to the Good Cause helped to keep him poor notwithstanding, the necessity did not imply a habit of mind which the generous would have met with ill-construction, whatever occasion might have been taken of his diminished influence, for the mean to insult him and the selfish to forsake.

The next of Mr Moore's letters was written soon after his going to prison, in February 1813. At that time, everything from Mr Moore's pen, whether he praised or objected, had in his correspondent's eyes a hue of "favour and of prettiness;" nor did Mr Hunt ever afterwards say one word against him, or think it, till he found him insincere. What he now sees in some passages of his letters, he leaves the reader to guess. The one upon his patron Lord Moira in the following will surely be held a curiosity by those who think of the different positions of Mr Hunt as Editor of the Examiner and visitor of Lord Byron. The reader has been already told that the Italics in these letters are of the writers own marking, not ours.

LETTER V.

On Mr Hunt's Imprisonment; Lord Moira, &c.

Kegworth, Leicestershire, Thursday.

My Dear Sir,—I was well aware that, on the first novelty of your imprisonment, you would be overwhelmed with all sorts of congratulations and condolences, and therefore resolved to reserve my tribute both of approbation and sympathy till the gloss of your chains was a little gone off, and both friends and starers had got somewhat accustomed to them. If I were now to tell you half of what I have thought and felt in your favor during this period, I fear it would be more than you know enough of me to give me credit for; and I shall therefore only say in true Irith phrase and spirit, that my heart takes you by the hand most cordially, and that I only wish heaven had given me a brother, whom I could think so well of and feel so warmly about. I hope to be in London in about four or five weeks, when one of my first visits shall be to Horsemonger-lane, and I trust I shall find your restrictions so far relaxed as to allow of my not merely looking at you through the bars, but passing an hour or two with you in your room.

I have long observed, and (I must confess) wondered at your retenue about Lord Moira, and have sometimes flattered myself (forgive me for being so vain, and so little just, perhaps, to your sense of duty) that a little regard for me was at the bottom of your forbearance, for you have always struck me as one whom nature never destined "accusatoriam vitam vivere," and who, if you were to live much among us Lilliputians of this world, would soon find your giant limbs entangled with a multitude of almost invisible heart-strings; but be this as it may, I must acknowledge (with a candour which is wrung from me) that Lord Moira's conduct no longer deserves your approbation, and when I say this, I trust I need not add, that it no longer has mine. His kindnesses to me of course I can never forget, but they are remembered as one remembers the kindnesses of a faithless mistress, and that esteem, that reverence, which was the soul of all, is fled. His thoughtfulness about me, indeed, remained to the last, and in the interview which I had with him immediately on his coming down here after his appointment, he said that, though he had nothing sufficiently good in his Indian patronage to warrant my taking such an expensive voyage, yet it was in his power, by exchange of patronage with Ministers, to serve me at home, and that he meant to provide for me in this way; to which I answered, with many acknowledgements for his friendship, that "I begged he would not take the trouble of making any such application, as I would infinitely rather struggle on as I am, than accept of anything under such a system." I must add (because it is creditable to him) that this refusal, though so significantly conveyed, and still more strongly afterwards by letter, did not offend him, and that he continued the most cordial attentions to us during the remainder of his stay. I know you will forgive this egotism, and would perhaps trouble you with a little more of it, if the unrelenting post time were not very nearly at hand.

* * * * * *
* * * * * *

From your's ever,
Thomas Moore.

In Mr Moore's first volume is an account of his coming with Lord Byron to dine in the prison, and a copy of verses from his lordship to his friend, in which the Editor of the Examiner is designated as "the wit in the dungeon." How comes it by the way, that Mr Moore never showed Mr Hunt any of these flattering phrases from the Noble Poet? And what is the probable reason why they are now produced, after Mr H. has known Lord Byron, and suffered from the advice given him by Mr Moore? Mr M. says in this account of the dinner, that Lord Byron "good naturedly" accepted Mr Hunt's invitation, and that the "wishes" of his lordship's introducer were "attended to," as far as the visitors at table were concerned; though it is intimated that a sad breach of politeness was manifested, when other visitors dropped in during the evening; Mr M. implying, that he had expressed "wishes" to the contrary. Our quondam friend must excuse us, if we think that a sincere man is likely to have a better memory than an insincere one, and that Mr Moore is mistaken in thinking that he expressed any such wish;—that is to say, meaning by the word "wish" a direction understood and received by the entertainer of the Noble Lord. We ask the reader whether the patronising style of this passage in Mr Moore's "reminiscences," accords with the letters his host received from him at that period. As to "good-nature," the host thought it good-natured enough certainly in Lord Byron to come to see him; and he had higher notions of lords then than he has learnt to have since. But he might have had fifty lords for his visitors, if he chose. Lords are never wanting: though patriots who can dispense with them are a little scarce, except in Paris. And with regard to friends dropping in, during this visitation by which the host was bound to die of honour and his monopoly, how was a man who has been such a student in truth as never to deny himself to a visitor in his life, to begin by not being at home in prison? Or how was he to excuse himself to friends who had come from a distance to see him, by telling them that he had a lord with him, and the invisible dignity of Mr Moore?

But all this is harmless, and we are sorry to waste the reader's time upon it. The letter containing the following passage was written a month or two after this visit. Lord Byron's other visits have been mentioned elsewhere; nor is it necessary to recur to them. Mr Leigh Hunt forgets how many letters he received at various times from Mr Moore, having lost or mislaid several; but such as he can find that have anything to do with the object of these articles, are here continued.

Digitized by Google

LETTER VI.

Mayfield Cottage, Monday Evening.
[Post-mark, August 1812.]

My Dear Hunt,

* * * * * *
* * * * * *

I hope you see my friend Lord Byron often; one of the very few London pleasures I envy him is the visit to Horsemonger-lane now and then.

Faithfully your's,
Thomas Moore.

[We have been compelled to cut short the article of to-day. Amends will be made for it in our next]

Military Memoirs of Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington. By Captain Moyle Sherer. First Volume, 12mo. pp. 295. (First volume of Dr Lardner's Cabinet Library.) Longman.

[Final Extracts.]

THE GUERILLAS OF SPAIN.

Napoleon well knew what he was about when he supplied the French generals in Spain with such large and seemingly disproportionate numbers of cavalry. Before the trampling of his numerous and warlike squadrons, the hearts of the Spanish soldiers, who had no confidence in their own discipline, no power of formation and movement, and for a long time no officers capable of instructing them, too often became fear-broken; and the glittering of French sabres was like the gleam of the axe and the signal of execution.

The frequent and melancholy experience of their inefficiency in regular warfare drove numbers of the dispersed, but not disheartened, patriots to adopt a new mode of hostilities, which harassed and distressed the French to an incredible degree.

They collected in small bands; they chose leaders of a ready intelligence and a daring courage; and they commenced a system of war in detail, which gratified their thirst for the invaders' blood, and suited well their melancholy fortunes. The French had never found any difficulty in defeating the Spanish armies*—"troops," says a French officer, "hastily raised, without skill to manœuvre, and embarrassed by the very numbers which should have been their strength."

But now they were engaged with the nation;—they stood side by side in the market-places with men who were marking them for a prey. The peasant was seen ploughing peaceably in his field; but in one of the furrows lay his long Spanish gun, ready to give aid in any chance contest between the partidas, or guerrillas, and the passing detachments of the enemy. Not a mountain pass in the romantic land but there lay among the rocks and bushes a group of these fierce and formidable men, awaiting the expected convoy or the feeble company. Even in the plains the posts of correspondence were compelled to fortify a belfry, or tower, or house; and the sentinel kept his vigilant look-out from a scaffolding of planks, that he might see all that passed in the fields around: nor could any of the soldiers venture beyond the enclosure thus fortified for fear of assassination. To lead these guerrilla bands, the priest girded up his black robe, and stuck pistols in his belt—the student threw aside his books, and grasped a sword—the shepherd forsook his flock—the husbandman his home.

One of the most celebrated of the guerilla chiefs, thus simply tells the commencement of his military life:—

"I was born at Idozin, a village of Navarre, on the 17th of June 1781. My parents were John Stephen Espoz y Mina, and Mary Terese Ilundain y Ardaiz, honest farmers of that province.

"As soon as I had learned to read and write, I devoted myself to the labours of husbandry; and when my father died I took charge of the little farm, which constituted the patrimony of my family. In this manner I lived till the age of twenty-six years.

"My patriotism being then excited by the treacherous invasion of Spain by Napoleon in 1808, after having done all the harm I could to the French in my own village, I abandoned it, and enlisted as a soldier in Doyle's battalion, on the 8th of February 1809.

"Having joined, a short time after, the guerrilla commanded by my nephew Xavier Mina, I continued still as a private soldier, when this guerrilla being disbanded, in consequence of the capture of my nephew, seven of the men named me their chief, and with them I began to command."

Such was the origin of this famous guerrilla chief, and such his first rank and service. Similar was the origin and service of many others, who never rose to the distinction obtained by this brave, enterprising, and fortunate individual.

The number of these armed bands was very great, and some few of the self-elected chiefs, or of those chosen by smugglers and robbers to be their leaders, became a terror to the villages which they visited, and committed great oppressions, plundering friends as well as enemies: but even these were keen after the invader's blood;—while the good and true patriots, who were led by good and true men, met on all sides assistance and encouragement, and were in constant communication with the inhabitants of every town and village in which the French troops were cantoned.

The stratagems of the leaders of these bands were infinitely varied; and the very nature of their service, demanding at one moment the greatest secrecy and address, and admitting at another a display of heroic energy, had about it a wild charm that fascinated all gallant and enterprising spirits.

The principal chieftains of these partidas, were the two Minas and Renovales, in Navarre and Arragon; Porlier, named the Marquisetto, and Longa, in the Asturias and Biscay; Juan Martin, or El Empecinado, in New Castile; Juan Paladea, or El Medico, in La Mancha; the curate Merino and others in Castile; the friar Sapia, of Soria; Juan Abril, of Segovia; the doctor Rovera, in Catalonia; and Julian Sanchez in the neighbourhood of Salamanca; and a long list of names of lesser note, well known in the vicinity of those places where they acted against the enemy. There were not less than fifty thousand of these irregular combatants in Spain at one period of the war, and many of them were actuated by very noble motives and the true love of their country. It were a waste of words to insist upon the injury which these parties inflicted on the French armies, or upon the very material advantage derived by Spain, by Portugal, and by the British army, from their active and persevering exertions. We know that, in an after-period of the war, lord Wellington himself appreciated their important services most highly.

* We deny that they ever had an army, though we use the word; they had levies of armed men, but no armies. "What the Spaniards call armies," is the expression of Sir John Moore; and the Duke of Albuquerque, speaking of the army of Cuesta, says, "On our marches we stop to repose like a flock of sheep, without taking up any position; and again, we march as if it were on a pilgrimage, without any regard to distance, order, or method." Although these remarks of the Duke's apply to the incompetency of Cuesta, they picture faithfully the marches of Spanish armies.

CHESS-PLAYING.

TO THE TATLER.

Mr Tatler,—I avail myself of your kind permission to furnish my account of the manner in which the "Three Pawns Gambit" came to be called "Cunningham's."

Alexander Cunningham, better known, at least to the literary world, in the beginning of the last century, as a critic and commentator on Virgil and Horace, was a good chess-player, and the intimate friend of Sir Abraham Janssen, Bart., then esteemed the best player in England. They were both members of the club which had been established at Old Slaughter's Coffee House, St Martin's lane, from the time of George I, and which continued to meet there till 1770, when it was removed, or rather a new one formed, first at the Salopian, and afterwards at Parsloe's in St James's street, under the auspices of Philidor.

This eminent player came to England in 1747, after having beaten all the players at Paris except Mons. de Legalle. He brought letters of recommendation to Sir Abraham, who patronised him and introduced him to the Chess-Club. Here it was that Philidor first saw played that opening of the "Three Pawns Gambit," and was told either that Cunningham (who died in 1732) invented it, or was fond of playing it. Philidor, however, in compliment to Sir Abraham and his friend, gave it the name of Cunningham's Gambit, in his work which was printed in 1749: just as he gave the name of the "Gambit of Aleppo" (Stamma's birth-place) to the Queen's Gambit, because Stamma was fond of opening the game in that manner. Philidor's words are, "Gambit de Cunningham dont l'auteur l'a que certainement gagné, mais je pense le contraire." He then goes on with a train of play in support of his opinion, which has been impugned by the anonymous Editor of the latter editions of his work, who has detected a bad move in a late stage of the game: but, as often happens when inferior players attempt to criticise their masters, he has overlooked another evidently bad move on the opposite side; and, as Philoscuccharia tells us, the result has been controverted.

The same Correspondent seems to treat Philidor's talents rather lightly; but the reason he gives is somewhat illogical, if not unintelligible; he says, we know Philidor's play only "by tradition." I need not tell you, Mr Tatler, that all fame, except of the present day, rests upon the same broad basis; but supposing we could bring back to our bar all Philidor's contemporaries, what farther light could they give us? Not a single additional ray; for none of them could play with him on equal terms.

His fame, therefore, rests upon the same footing as that of all the famous players who preceded him, from Berseca the Saracen, who, in 1266, performed the same feat for which Philidor has been so much be-praised; viz. that of playing three games at once without seeing the boards. The vanity peculiar to his nation led him to give two or three of these parties, in order, as he himself expresses it, "to transmit to posterity a fact of which future ages might otherwise entertain some doubt." A very few years before this, Sacchiere, a priest of Turin, had performed the same feat with four chess boards: and Canera gives us the names of more than a score of players who excelled in this difficult exercise. I could continue, but I have already trespassed too far on your kindness, and I am, Mr Tatler,

Your obliged correspondent,
A Lover of Chess.

Talent for Writing Worse and Worse.—A gentleman returning from the representation of the 'Modern Prophets,' or from some other of D'Urfey's bad plays, the first night it was acted, said to Dryden, "Was there ever such stuff?"—"Sir," replied Dryden, "You don't know my friend Tom so well as I do: I'll answer for him he shall write worse yet."

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.
DRURY LANE.—School for Scandal.—Davy Jones, or Harlequin and Mother Carey's Chickens.
COVENT GARDEN.—Cinderella.—Harlequin Fat, and Harlequin Bat.

COVENT GARDEN.

Miss INVERARITY appeared for the sixth time last night in Cinderella, and we saw part of the opera for the fifth. It seems as if we could see this play, and hear this new singer in it, a hundred times. Not because she has come to her maturity, or that superior as she is to any of the singers who have lately come forward, she will not be far more so by and by, but because her aspect and her style harmonize so pleasingly with one another, and with the character. She looks just the gentle person to be set aside by a coarse father and two flaring sisters; and yet there is a tenderness and a promise of luxury in some of her tones, that announce a capacity for enjoyment, and warrant success when it comes.

Miss INVERARITY received more than her usual honours last night in the finale. The audience anticipated it with a round of applause, interrupted it with more, and encored it with greater enthusiasm than we have yet witnessed, except the first night. The piece was given out for repetition next Saturday. The performer who announced it, gave the common pronunciation to the name,—INVERARITY,—which must convince a speculative gentleman of his error, who, moved, we suppose, by the wonders of her name, and thinking there ought to be no end to them any more than to the syllables, was instructing the boxes around him the other night, how it was not INVERARITY, but Inverareety. The fair singer's patronymic has indeed raised a marvellous degree of astonishment. The inhabitants of this busy metropolis seem to think that she has found out the longitude in appellation, and complain that they have not time to pronounce it. Some wonder where it could have come from; and others have recommended that it should be cut short. The name indeed might be cut into "little stars." There is Rarity, or Verarity, or Verari. Verari would have a pretty Italian sound. The lady however does well to keep her name as it is. She has given pleasure to those who bear it; she is not the person to give up an old acquaintance, or her tones belie her: and besides, the name is a very good name, and we suppose there are bonnie Scots who are proud of it on other accounts. Inverarity is the name of a place near Dundee; so that there must have been Inverarities "of that ilk." Finally, its length is a notion; people must utter many syllables, when they say anything at all; and they might as well utter these as any others. The words "Miss INVERARITY" do not take longer time to pronounce than "The Duke of WELLINGTON." Now, who makes any fuss about "The Duke of WELLINGTON?" or what lover of agreeable images has not the idea of a pleasanter performer suggested to him by the one name than the other? Who would go to hear the Duke of WELLINGTON that has once heard him? And who would not go to hear Miss INVERARITY fifty times, for a like reason?

Mr WILSON's fine tenor was in choice condition last night, and he improves in his acting.

KEELEY's performance of the servant gives a great zest to the comic part of this opera. His round comfortable person and lackadaisical manner suit the kitchen companion of Cinderella: the airs he gives himself on occasion contrast admirably with this manner in general,—as when he plays the ambassador, or takes a part in the dance: (the way in which he reposes upon his approaches to his partner has the true comic gusto); and then how well he addresses the sovereign in those truly royal words:—"Most magnificent, extravagant, and dreadful Prince,—whose face is shocking to your subjects, and frightful to all the rest of the world." The Emperor Paul, or Charles X, could not have been better saluted.

"Most extensive Prince," is another style and title which would have suited the Autocrat. The Poles, we trust, are going to clip the epithet for his descendant.

We must not close our article without commending M. ALBERT the dancer, for putting on some visible clothing; and also for mitigating the petulence of his dance military. He is a very clever dancer; and must have observed that he does not obtain the less applause for shewing his judgment on those points. Both he, and his two fair companions, received, if we are not mistaken, more than their ordinary amount of approbation last night. ☞

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

WHOLE PATRIOTS AND HALF.—If you are a patriot and a martyr to your principles, this is a painful consideration, and must act as a draw-back to your pretensions, which would have a more glossy and creditable appearance, if they had never been tried. If you are a lord, or a dangler after lords, it is well: the glittering star hides the plebeian stains; the obedient smile and habitual cringe of approbation are always welcome.—Hazlitt's Plain Speaker.

BENEFITS OF EARLY INSTRUCTION.—The advantage of having learnt the Catechism, to a child wandering in darkness, may be estimated by the following trifling circumstance:—A lady observing a little girl apparently lost in the street, accosted her with the question of "Whose child are you?"—"Child of wrath, Ma'am," cried the little urchin, dropping a curtesy, as if addressing the parson. The lady resumed and said, "Where were you born?" "Born in sin, Ma'am," persevered the diminutive theologian.

GENERAL LA FAYETTE.—The departure of General La Fayette for America, is thus noticed in a Paris paper in the year 1777:—"Paris, April 4:—One of the richest of our young nobility, the Marquis de la Fayette, a relation of the Duke de Noailles, between nineteen and twenty years of age, has at his own expense hired a frigate, and provided everything necessary for a voyage to America, with two officers of his acquaintance. He set out last week, having told his lady and family that he was going to Italy. He is to serve as a Major-General in the Ameriaan army. On the other hand, the Count de Bulkely, an Irish gentleman, who is a Major-General in the French service, is going, with the leave of Majesty, to offer himself to the King of Great Britain to serve agains the Americans."

THE LATE AMIABLE RULER OF THE POLES.—When the Grand Duke Constantine was travelling in Germany, he on one occasion, weary of the slow progress he made, ordered the post-boy repeatedly to drive faster, but to no purpose; he then threatened to shoot him if he did not quicken his pace; the postillion persisted in jogging on at his own rate, which so provoked the Grand Duke, that he drew a pistol, and shot him dead upon the spot.—Lumsden's Journey from India.—[Is not Constantine, who resembles his father Paul more than any of the rest of the family, a madman? And is it not high time that a general protest should be made against madmen occupying thrones? It is a melancholy and strange consideration, that insanity has often discharged the office of king; and that some of the bitterest consequences of public measures have resulted from it. What republican ever satirized royalty like this notorious fact?]

PARLIAMENTARY REPORT.—Mr Popham, when he was Speaker, and the Lower House had sat long, and done in effect nothing, coming one day to Queen Elizabeth, she said to him, "Now, Mr Speaker, what hath passed in the Lower House?" He answered, "If it please your Majesty, seven weeks."—Bacon.—[The Lower and the Upper House too seem to pass their time pretty much in the same way still; especially when the times out of doors are uneasy and want comforting.]

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.—Of all the moral advantages of the new system of education (Lancasterian) perhaps the greatest arises from the mildness of the punishments which it imposes. Its punishments appeal to the rational, not to the animal nature of man; and are calculated to influence the principles of his mind, rather than to impose torture on his body. Every blow inflicted for the correction of a bad action, excites ten bad feelings; and it is somewhat absurd to attempt to purify the stream by corrupting the source. A boy may be flogged for a fault, and the fault may be corrected; but it is corrected not in consequence of the flogging, but in spite of it. No virtuous principle was ever instilled into the human mind by stripes: their only effect is to irritate and harden, to make slaves, and train up tyrants."—Westminster Review.—Do not the above arguments equally apply to the degrading system of flogging soldiers? How much longer will this foul blot on the humanity and civilization of England continue to make us the laughing-stock of our continental neighbours? A beaten soldier after a good battle, is something: but a beaten soldier on parade, and by the lash, ought to be a contradiction in terms.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, Lord BYRON's Tragedy of
WERNER, OR THE INHERITANCE.
[Adapted by Mr MACREADY.]
Josephine, Mrs FAUCIT, Ida Stralenheim, Miss MORDAUNT.
Werner, Mr MACREADY, Ulric, Mr WALLACK, Gabor, Mr COOPER,
Baron Stralenheim, Mr H. Wallack, Frits, Mr Younge, Otto, Mr Cohen,
Henric, Mr Salter, Eric, Mr C. Jones, Idenstein, Mr W. Bennett,
Rodolph, Mr Cooke, Arnheim, Mr Fenton, Meister, Mr Eaton,
Ludwig, Mr Cathie, Herman, Mr S. Jones.

Previous to the Tragedy. (2nd time in this Country) P. Linppainter's Overture to "Sulmona."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called
DAVY JONES,
OR HARLLEQUIN AND MOTHER CAREY'S CHICKENS.
[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.
DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.
The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.
Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, The Brigand; The Illustrious Stranger; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, the Tragedy of
FAZIO.
Marchesa Aldabella, Mrs CHATTERLEY, Clara, Miss PHILLIPS,
Bianca, (1st time) Miss F. KEMBLE. Giraldi Fazio, Mr WARDE,
Duke of Florence, Mr EGERTON, Bartolo, Mr BLANCHARD,
Philario, Mr Henry, Falsetto, Mr Parry, Gonsalvo, Mr Baker,
Theodore, Mr Mears, Keeper, Mr Fuller, Pietro, Mr Turnour,
Gentleman, Mr Irwin, Antonio, Mr Heath, Aurio, Mr Crumpton.

Previous to the Tragedy, (1st time in this country) A Grand MS. Overture, by Friedrich Kuhlaw.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called
HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.
[By Mr FARLEY.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.
THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, £100 Note; Harlequin Fat or Harlequin Bat; and Teddy the Tiler.

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely new Drama, entitled
NANCY OF PORTSMOUTH.
Nancy Bloomfield, Miss SOMERVILLE, The Widow Crabjuice, Mad. SIMON,
Constantia, Miss Jordan, Kitty Bustle, Miss Vincent, in which she will sing a Parody on "Cherry Ripe," Old Margery, Mrs Rogers,
Becky Sims, Miss Rummens. Sir Edward Gayton, Mr Gough,
Frederick Gayton, Mr Edwin, Captain Splashaway, Mr Hicks,
Joe Barton, Mr C. Hill, Fiery Ned, Mr D. Pitt, Tim Tipple, Mr VALE,
Bounce, Mr Rogers, Capt. Friendly, Mr Lee, Tapwell, Mr Hobbs,
Jemmy Gonimble, Madlle. Rosier, Long Bill, Mr Almar, Short Bill, Mr Webb.

After which, the Drama, entitled
THE ADOPTED CHILD.
[By Mr S. BIRCH.]
Lucy, Madame Simon, Jeannette, Miss Rumens, Nell, Mrs Vale.
Clara, Miss SOMERVILLE, in which she will sing, "Vain are Music's soothing sounds." Michael, Mr OSBALDISTON,
Sir Bertrand, Mr D. Pitt, Record, Mr Williams, Le Sage, Mr Lee,
Spruce, Mr Rogers, Flint, Mr Almar, Boy, Miss Ellis.

To conclude with, a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,
THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.
[By Mr W. BARRYMORE].
The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.
Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene 1. Regions of Time.—II. The Town of Newbury (Sunrise).—III. Cabinet in the Widow's Mansion.—IV. Splendid Temple of the New Year.—V. Picturesque Roadside Inn.—VI. Exterior of Public House and Saddler's.—VII. Suspension Bridge over the Menai.—VIII. Quiet Lodgings in a retired Neighbourhood.—IX. Race Course and Grand Stand.—X. Splendid Falls of Tivoli.—XI. Cavern (Moonlight).—XII. and last. Realms of Bliss in the Regions of Light.

To-morrow, Nancy of Portsmouth; The Two Pupil's; or, the Pedagogue Puzzled; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called
THE WRECK ASHORE.
Act I.—WINTER.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mr DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.
[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]
Act. II.—SUMMER.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

To which will be added, a New Comic Burletta, called
WAS I TO BLAME?
Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

After which, the Comic Burletta, called
A DEAD SHOT.
Louisa Lovetrick, Mrs FITZWILLIAM, in which character she will introduce her celebrated Description of "A Sunday Concert."
Chatter, Miss DALY.
Captain Cannon, Mr BAYNE, Mr Hector Timid, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Mr Wiseman, Mr S. SMITH, Charles, Mr V. WEBSTER.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called
GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.
[By Mr BUCKSTONE].
The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely New Historical Burletta, called
MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS.
Mary Stuart, (Queen of Scots) Miss FOOTE,
Lady Douglas, Mrs Knight, Catherine Seyton, Miss Pincott,
Lady Fleming, Miss King, Mattie, Miss Kibrey, Moggy, Miss Langley,
Jenny, Miss Slater. Lord George Douglas, Mr Fredericks,
Lord Lindsay, Mr Brougham, Sir Robert Melville, Mr Worrel,
Lord Ruthven, Mr Beckwith, Roland, Mr Raymond, Drysdale, Mr Newcombe,
Sandy, Mr J. Knight.

To which will be added, a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled
OLYMPIC REVELS.
[By Mr PLANCHE.]
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe,

To be followed by a Comic Burletta, called
THE LITTLE JOCKEY.
Arinette, Miss FOOTE, in which she will sing, "The Boy in yellow wins the day,"
Clotilda, Miss Nursey, Mau e, Miss Kibrey.
The Baron D'Acourt, Mr W. VINING,
De Limburg, Mr Pag t, Floriville, by a Gentleman, Jocose, Mr Collier,
Denis, Mr W. Young, Pierre, Mr Brown.

The whole to conclude with a Comic Burletta, called
CLARISSA HARLOWE.
Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER, Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond, Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget, Captain Cape, Mr W. VINING.

COBURG THEATRE. — The Gambler's Life—Jonathan Dobson—Harlequin Silver Penny.

SADLER'S WELL THEATRE.—Skimmer of the Seas.—Harlequin and Mother Goose.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL; EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 113.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 13, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Letters and Journals of Lord Byron: with Notices of his Life, by Thomas Moore. Two vols. 4to. Murray.

LORD BYRON—MR MOORE—AND MR LEIGH HUNT, WITH ORIGINAL LETTERS, NOT IN MR MOORE'S WORK.

[Continued from our last.]

We forget the subject alluded to at the commencement of the ensuing letter, having lost the one that explained it; but Mr Moore and his correspondent used to send critical opinions to one another on their writings, and the latter recollects having elicited some pleasant reproaches from him for objecting to his too frequent use of the words "dews" and "flowers." Mr Moore said, that he was in the act of writing some verses with those words in them, when the objection came in by the post; and that he had struck out one in consequence, but kept the other to spite his friend. Let the reader imagine the delightfulness of such a correspondent, if he had been but sincere. Whether the allusion was to any tirade against criticism arising out of this circumstance, or from some less friendly assault, we cannot say: for Mr Moore has not been slow to complain of the critics, nor to secure interest against them, though he will do nothing to assist you in turn. We do not believe that there is any mention in his writings of one single author, however acquainted he may have been with him in private, or however distinguished even the author may have been himself, unless he has been a man of influence in the circles. This it is to be a "diner-out!" He does not know on what tender toes of aristocracy he may tread, till his footing is secure.

LETTER VII.

On Mr Moore's pleasure in being what he never was, and his pride in letting the world know what he never did.

Mayfield Cottage, Monday Morning.

My Dear Hunt,—I have had an unquiet conscience ever since I sent off my last letter to you—because in my flippant tirade against critics, I was led into a forgetfulness of two or three kind things you have said, which are of more value to me than a whole legion of Aristotles.—In the first place, though you bid me not think any more of the little glimpse of future glorification you have opened upon me, you could not seriously expect that I should obey you—you may be very sure I shall treasure up the promise most proudly, and if you depend upon my bad memory for an escape from it, you have but a very poor chance indeed.—Next to my pleasure in being your friend, is the pride I should feel in letting the world know that I am so.

* * * * * *

[The rest of this letter is omitted. It alludes to another critic who had just then given the world intimation of a mind destined to have considerable influence on the times, and who afterwards became a friend of Mr Moore as well as Mr Leigh Hunt. A doubt as to whether it would be proper to publish the passage, withholds it; but it is proper to add, that the donbt has nothing in it which tells against Mr Moore. It was only some occasional sentences in the passage that went to corroborate the object of these articles.]

* * * * * *

I intended to have told you something about my poem, which, though often pulled down and rebuilt again, is now in a fair way of progress, but I have not left myself room in this sheet, and it is not worth beginning another; so good bye.

Ever your's,
T. Moore.

In the letters of Lord Byron, published by Mr Moore, are various notices of a poem written by Mr Leigh Hunt, called the Story of Rimini. In his Lordship's first mention of it in a letter to Mr Moore, he calls it "a real good, and very original poem;" says he thinks it will be "a great hit;" and adds, "you can have no notion how very well it is written, nor should I, had I not redde* it." In a letter of the same date to Mr Murray the bookseller, he describes it as a "very wonderful and beautiful performance, with just enough of fault to make its beauties more remarked and remarkable." The Story of Rimini was published; the Quarterly Review damned a poem written by the Editor of the Examiner; and the damnation was the signal for a series of attacks and calumnies from all the quarters of Toryism, which conspiring with its ascendancy in those times, with the natural tendency of the mob of small writers to side against a losing cause, and with the Author's culpable carelessness in neglecting his fortunes while he aggravated his opinions, ultimately succeeded in depriving him of all influence. The Bourbons had just been reinstated then; every insult and injury was meditated to the cause of mankind; and every one of its advocates was to be sacrificed at any price. Those were not the times of Lafayette and Philip of Orleans, of the good natured William the Fourth, of the sounds of the ice of tyranny breaking up in all quarters, of the heavenly summer of hope, and of all England calling out for that Reform, which in recommending them to call for, the Editor of the Examiner had lost "health, fame and fortune." The same signal which roused his enemies was the signal for the terrors and desertions of false friends. We shall not pain ourselves by dwelling upon graver instances, but not long afterwards the faults of Mr Leigh Hunt's poem became uppermost in the mind of his noble eulogizer; his friendship with Mr Shelley (always beloved by his friends, and now so praised by those who have been taught to know him, as well as by those who are eager to reconcile themselves to the memory of a man of rank,) was a new offence to the Anti-liberals, and to those who fear them; and his admiration of the genius of another young poet, Mr Keats, besides aggravating the offence, completed the impatience of the noble bard, who never liked Mr Hunt's homage to Mr Wordsworth as the first poet of the age. As to Mr Moore, to go counter to the circles at all, except under circumstances which extorted their respect, or happened to suit the immediate policy of the Whig part of them, was a committal of a man's self, which, it seems, neutralized the merit of the exceptions, and not only precluded all public recognition of his friend, or even that hazardous assistance of a political squib or two, which his "gratitude" promised, and his expediency took such care not to perform, but enabled him to write in two sorts of style upon one subject, to two different friends; as the reader will see presently. Mr Moore cannot say his soul is his own, out of the pale of what is "received." He has no notion even of a pathos which is not dressed, as he thinks, in a manner fit to go to court. His sphere is a round of dinners: his universal empyrean the roof of the Opera House. Yet the annals of fashion might have taught him, that tears are to be shed even there; and nature, in spite of mistake, still find a sympathy. Lord Byron spoke too partially, in the first instance, of the faults in the 'Story of Rimini.' We are very sincere in saying so; and any reader may believe us, when we add, that he confounded them too much with the poem afterwards. The truth is, that the critics were right when they objected to certain coinages, cant phrases, and other defects in the poem, generated, not as they thought by affectation, but by a mistaken notion of avoiding the cant of common-place. These can be easily taken away. But the author has been allowed to persuade himself by other reasons than his own, that there is a heart beating underneath those trivialities of the poem, which might have saved Mr Moore the duplicity of speaking of it in one way to the author, and another to his Noble Friend. To cite testimonies in favour of his own work, is a suing for opinions in forma pauperis, which no decent author can be inclined to. The next generation is sure to do justice to the Poem one way or other; either by restoring it to perusal, or forgetting it altogether. Suffice it meanwhile to say, in observing the strange attempt of Mr Moore to throw ridicule one

* Lord Byron was in the habit of spelling the past tense of the verb read in this manner.

Digitized by Google

day on what he has praised the day before, that in quarters fashionable as well as unfashionable, the pages of the 'Story of Rimini' have been embalmed in the most welcome of all criticisms, —tears. Let this bit of superfluousness be pardoned in a writer who would fain have devoted his whole life to poetry, had not circumstances and the times compelled his conscience to serve truth in a less pleasing shape. In 1816, after the first outcry had been raised against the Story of Rimini, Lord Byron intimated to Mr Moore, who had then become a critic himself, that a favourable notice of it in the Edinburgh Review would be useful, and "do it justice." But Mr Moore, besides discovering that Mr Hunt was no wholesale flatterer, had found out that the once potent editor of a newspaper, and critic of new operas, could be quizzed by a court dependant, and had thus become an object of ridicule to all who valued the gravity of their reception In his first quarto, therefore, we find the following note on the above intimation of his lordship's :—

"My reply," says Mr Moore, "to this part of his letter, was, I find, as follows: with repect to Hunt's poem, though it is, I own, full of beauties, and though I like himself sincerely, I really could not undertake to praise it seriously. There is so much of the quizzible in all he writes, that I never can put on the proper pathetic face in reading him."—Vol. i. p. 644.

Now mark the following letter, written a year before.

LETTER VIII.

On the Story of Rimini.

Mayfield Cottage, March 7th, 1814.

My Dear Hunt,—I do forgive you for your long silence, though you have much less right to be careless about our non-intercourse than I have—if I knew as little about you and your existence as you know of me, I should not feel quite so patient under the privation—but I have the advantage of communing with you, for a very delightful hour, every Tuesday evening: of knowing your thoughts upon all that passes, and of exclaiming "right!—bravo!—exactly!" to every sentiment you express—whereas, from the very few signs of life I give in the world, you can only take my existence for granted, as we do that of the little woman under the hill,

Who, if she's not gone, must live there still.

However, I do forgive you—and only wish I could pay you back a millesimal part of the pleasure which—in various ways—as poet, as politician, as partial friend, you have lately given me. Your Rimini is beautiful, and its only faults such as you are aware of, and prepared to justify—there is that maiden charm of originality about it—that "integer, illibatusque succus," which Columella tells us the bees extract—that freshness of the living fount, which we look in vain for in the bottled-up Heliconian of ordinary Bards —in short, it is poetry—and notwithstanding the quaintnesses, the coinages, and even affectations, with which, here and there—

I had just got so far, my dear Hunt, when I was interrupted by a prosing neighbour, who has put everything I meant to say out of my head—so, there I must leave you, impaled on the point of this broken sentence, and wishing you as little torture there as the nature of the case will allow. I have only time to say again, that your poem is beautiful, and that, if I do not exactly agree with some of your notions about versification and language, the general spirit of the work has more than satisfied my utmost expectations of you. If you go on thus, you will soon make some of Apollo's guests sit "below the salt." The additions to this latter Poem* are excellent, and the lines on Music at the end are full of beauty.

There are many of the lines of Rimini that "haunt me like a passion"—I don't know whether I ought to own that these are among the number—I quote from memory :—

The woe was short, was fugitive, is past!
The song that sweetens it may always last.

I am afraid you will set this down among your regular, sing-song couplets—to me it is all music.

Is it true that your friend Lord B. has taken to the beautifully "mammosa" Mrs. ———? Who, after this, will call him a "searcher of dark bosoms." Not a word to him, however, about this last question of mine.

Ever, my dear Hunt, most faithfully your's,
Thomas Moore.

I hope to deliver my mighty work into Longman's hands in May, but, of course, it will not go to press till after the summer.

———

We leave the foregoing to the reader without further comment.

The next letter is dated four years afterwards, by which time Mr Moore had got a considerable access of dread respecting the progress of liberalism. He has a pretty alliteration somewhere in one of his quartos about "rank, riches, and religion." We know not whether the alteration of times would have modified that particular passage, for we do not remember the context; but we are very firmly persuaded that if the second French Revolution had happened before the publication of Mr Moore's prose works, the author would not have thought it necessary to express so much anxiety respecting the dangers of plain speaking; nor are we sure that the word religion would have been found in his writings. It was not to be expected perhaps under any circumstances, that Mr Moore would be found in the van of opinion. We do not believe that he has given up to a party what was "meant for mankind." People are generally meant for what they do. But at all events, we beg the reader to compare the coy and devout publicities of Mr Moore, with the words marked in capitals in the following letter. We need not add that the words are so marked by ourselves.

* The Feast of the Poets.

LETTER IX.

Sloperton Cottage, Devizes, January 21, 1818.

My Dear Hunt,—Having the opportunity of a frank, I must write you a line or two to thank you for your very kind notices of me, and still more, to express my regret that in my short and busy visit to town, I had not the happiness, to which I looked forward, of passing at least one day with you and your family. I am always so thrown "in medias res" when I go to London, that I have never a minute left for anything agreeable—but my next visit will, I hope, be one of pleasure, and then you are sure to be brought in among the ingredients. For the cordiality with which you have praised and defended me, I am, I assure you, most deeply grateful; and, though less alive, I am sorry to say, both to praise and blame, than I used to be, yet coming from a heart and a taste like your's, they cannot fail to touch me very sensibly. You are quite right about the conceits that disfigure my poetry; but you (and others) are quite as wrong in supposing that I hunt after them—my greatest difficulty is to hunt them away. If you had ever been in the habit of hearing Curran converse—though I by no means intend to compare myself with him in the ready coin of wit—yet, from the tricks which his imagination played him while he talked, you might have some idea of the phantasmagoria that mine passes before me while I write—In short, St Anthony's temptations were nothing to what an Irish fancy has to undergo from all its own brood of Will-o-th'-wisps and hobgoblins.

I was sorry to find that Cobbett found such a sturdy defender in your correspondent of last week; indeed, I am grieved to the heart at many things I see among the friends of liberty, and begin to fear much more harm from the advocates of the cause than from its enemies. You, however, are always right in politics; and if you would but keep your theories of religion and morality a little more to yourself (the MANIA on these subjects being so universal and congenital, that he who thinks of curing it is as mad as his PATIENTS) you would gain influence over many minds that you unnecessarily shock and alienate. I would not say this of you in public (for I cannot review my friends) but I say it to you thus privately, with all the anxious sincerity of a well-wisher both to yourself and the cause you so spiritedly advocate. I intended to have written you a long letter, but the post-belle (an old woman whom I employ for that purpose) is ringing her alarum below, and I must finish.

My best regards to Mrs Hunt.

Your's very faithfully,
Thomas Moore.

LETTER X.

Sloperton Cottage, Devizes, Oct. 10th, 1818.

My Dear Hunt,—I intended that a letter from me should accompany your copy of the 7th number of my Melodies; but I rather think, from your paper of Sunday last, that Power has had the start of me; and I only write now to get a little credit from you for my intentions, which, in general indeed, are the best things about me, but which, unfortunately, the matter-of-fact people of the world are never satisfied with. At you have imagination, however, as well as heart, I shall leave you to fancy all the kind things I have felt towards you, during the long, long time I have passed in saying nothing whatever about them; and I am the more inclined just now to trust a good deal to your imaginative power, as I am disabled from writing much from a slight strain in my shoulder, which I received the night before last—when the world was near being a bad poet out of pocket by the upsetting of a carriage in which I was returning from Bowood.

Shall you be in London about the latter end of November? I hope to be there about that time, and we must meet; for I have much to say to you, much to give and receive sympathy about. I suppose that you have heard of the calamity that has befallen me through the defalcation of my deputy at Bermuda, who has made free with the proceeds of two or three ships and cargoes deposited in his hands, and I am likely to be made responsible for the amount. You will, it is most probable, have an opportunity of returning my prison visits; as, if it comes to the worst, the Rules must be my residence. However, (as I have just written to Lord Byron) Unity of Place is one of Aristotle's Rules, and, as a poet, I must learn to conform to it. By the bye he has made many enquiries about you in his two last letters to me, and I should be glad to hear from you before I write to him again. I hope you will like my Irish Melodies better than you liked Lalla Rookh.

You were right about the verses to Sir H. Lowe,

Your's, my dear Hunt, very truly,
Thomas Moore.

Digitized by Google

By the way, in turning over a bundle of letters, we have met with another, the beginning of which, from the writer who could praise nothing seriously, is edifying. Mr Moore is thanking Mr Leigh Hunt for sending him a Mask, called the 'Descent of Liberty,' which, to say the truth, was not worth his praises; and he writes as follows:—

'You already know my opinion of it—it will live in spite of the Congress and Buonaparte—and though the principal maskers have shifted dresses a good deal since, your poetry is independent of the politics—it has that kind of general and fanciful character of Sir Joshua Reynolds's portraits, which will make it long outlive the frail and foolish heads that sat for it."

To return a moment to the "pathetic face," we must relate a characteristic touch of the late Mr Hazlitt. When he read the note in Mr Moore's book, containing those words about "putting on" the face, as aforesaid, he exclaimed, with one of his "looks," —"Damn his face! What has that to do with it? Does he always put on a face when he goes to read anything serious?"

The next and last letter is dated August 20, 1821, that is say, only a few months before Mr Moore wrote to Lord Byron to warn him against any connexion of authorship with Mr Leigh Hunt and Mr Shelley on accounts of its being a "bankrupt" "unequal" and "unholy" alliance. For the "unholy," we refer the readers to Mr Moore's opinion respecting the "mania" prevalent on the subject of religion and morality; for the "unequal" (keeping in mind that the work proposed to be set up was a periodical one), to all that he has said in the previous letters respecting Mr Hunt as a periodical writer, and to the close of the first paragraph of the following letter, written, as we have just observed, but a few months before his admonitions to Lord Byron. For the "bankrupt" we refer to his "gratitude," and perhaps we may add with a little better chance of the existence of such a thing, his shame. Such is the "gratitude" of a man of the world! A losing cause is with him cause of offence, and a sufficient reason why he should warn one friend who never appears up to that period to have done him any service, against connexion with another to whom he had repeatedly expressed himself under obligation. But the reader shall have this matter sifted in our next.

We conclude with introducing to him the harbinger of Mr Moore" good offices:—

LETTER XI.

Paris, August 20, 1821.

My Dear Hunt,—I take the opportunity of a frank to send you a hasty line of acknowledgment for your kind mention of me. I was indeed most happy to see the announcement of your recovery, for public as well as private reasons—for, though you have right good auxiliaries, there is but one Richmond in the field after all.

This is a very delightful place to live in, and if I was not obliged to stay in it, I should find the time pass happily enough; for were

"Ev'n Paradise itself my prison,
Still I should long to leap the crystal walls."

Your friend Mr Bowring and I were rather unlucky in our attempts to meet, but we did meet at last, and I liked him exceedingly."

All the insincere will of course secretly love Mr Moore the better for these letters. His double-dealing will help to reconcile them to their own. But what will the sincere say to him? And they are a rising party now in the world! Perhaps he might have found it better for him in the end to stick to them!

Some men of talent and merit are only pleased with the society of their inferiors, where they find it easiest to shine. This is to calculate very foolishly; since, in striving with a man of ability, we sharpen our own powers—but always degenerate in exercising ourselves with fools.—Say.

Royal Sports.—Louis the Eleventh ordered the Abbot of Baigne, a man of great wit, and who had a knack at inventing new musical instruments, to get him a Concert of Swine's voices, thinking it impossible. The Abbot accordingly mustered up a number of hogs of several ages, and placed them under a pavilion covered with velvet, (before which he had a sound-board, painted, with a certain number of keys) thus making an organ: and as he played on the keys with little spikes which pricked the hogs, he made them cry in such tune and concert, as highly delighted the King and his Court!—Is there not in this story something covert as to the usual treatment of the people by Kings?

Anecdote of Horne Tooke.—Mr Holcroft, the author of the 'Road to Ruin,' was one of the most violent and fiery-spirited of all that motley crew of persons who attended the Sunday meetings at Wimbleton. One day he was so enraged by some paradox or raillery of his host, that he indignantly rose from his chair and said, "Mr Tooke, you are a scoundrel!" The other, without manifesting the least emotion, replied, "Mr Holcroft, when is it that I am to dine with you? Shall it be next Thursday?" "If you please, Mr Tooke," answered the angry philosopher, and sat down again.—The Spirit of the Age.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

Drury Lane.—Werner.—Davy Jones, or Harlequin and Mother Carey's Chickens.

Covent Garden.—Fazio.—Harlequin Fat, and Harlequin Bat.

Covent Garden.

Mr Milman's tragedy of Fazio was performed here last night, the part of the heroine by Miss Kemble. We saw so little of it, owing to an unavoidable hindrance, that we can make but a very short, but luckily an agreeable criticism, by saying that she succeeded in obtaining great applause. We conceive the character to have been fortunately chosen (if we have a right recollection of it), inasmuch as it leans rather to the harsher than the softer passions; and hitherto Miss Kemble has undoubtedly shown a greater force that way than the other. There were some dozens of gentlemen in the pit, who, at the end of the play, applauded, as usual, not only with all their might, but with all their hats. It was pleasant to see them in a real majority; for during the short time we were present, the whole house warmly expressed their pleasure several times, sometimes with repeated rounds of applause. On the fall of the curtain Mr Egerton made his appearance; but the house would have none of Egerton. The call was for Kemble. Mr Egerton said, that it had not been ascertained whether Mr Kemble was in the theatre.

Voices from the Pit. Yes, he is.

Mr Egerton. Where?

Voices. In a side-box.

This detection of Mr Kemble in his public privacy raised a laugh. A little bit of drama, not on the stage, takes mightily in the theatre. The audience become the actors, and snatch a sort of illegitimate satisfaction. In a few moments Mr Kemble made his appearance, and in a voice of evident emotion, gave out the piece for repetition as follows: "Ladies and Gentlemen, in consequence of the very considerable approbation you have bestowed on Miss Kemble, this tragedy will be repeated on Friday and Monday." We shall attend on Friday, and give a due account both of play and performance.

We are glad to see by the play-bills, that the Panto mime is to be played this evening at the same early hour, at which it took place for the benefit of the Princess Victoria! This attention to the health of the little public is judicious, and will no doubt be well rewarded.

Injuries from Friends.—Those who have their joys, have also their griefs in proportion; and none can extremely exalt or depress friends, but friends. The harsh things which come from the rest of the world, are received and repulsed with that spirit which every honest man bears about him, for his own vindication; but unkindness in words or actions among friends, affect us the first instant in the inmost recesses of our souls. Indifferent people, if I may so say, can wound us only in heterogeneous parts, maim us in our legs or arms, but the friend can make no pass but at the heart itself. On the other side, the most impotent assistance, the mere well-wishes of a friend, gives a man constancy and courage against the most prevailing force of all his enemies. It is here only a man enjoys and suffers to the quick.—Steele.

Striking Reflections, ending with a Beautiful Image.—Some things, it is true, are more prominent, and lead to more serious consequences than others, so as to excite a greater share of attention and applause. Public characters, authors, warriors, statesmen, &c. nearly monopolize public consideration in this way, and we are apt to judge of their merit by the noise they make in the world. Yet none of these classes would be willing to make the rule absolute; for a favourite player gains as much applause as any of them. A poet stands a poor chance either of popularity with the vulgar, or influence with the great, against a fashionable opera-dancer or singer. Reputation or notoriety is not the stamp of merit. Certain professions, like certain situations, bring it into greater notice, but have perhaps no more to do with it than birth or fortune. Opportunity sometimes indeed "throws a cruel sunshine on a fool." I have known several celebrated men, and some of them have been persons of the weakest capacity: yet accident had lifted them into general notice, and probably will hand their memories down to posterity. There are names written in her immortal scroll, at which Fame blushes!—Hazlitt's Characteristics

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have read with great pleasure the lines addressed to Mr Macready "On the birth of his first child." They shall appear to-morrow.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

Act I.—Winter.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mr DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—Summer.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

To which will be added, a New Comic Burletta, called

WAS I TO BLAME?

Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

After which, the Comic Burletta, called

A DEAD SHOT.

Louisa Lovetrick, Mrs FITZWILLIAM, in which character she will introduce her celebrated Description of "A Sunday Concert."

Chatter, Miss DALY.

Captain Cannon, Mr BAYNE, Mr Hector Timid, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Mr Wiseman, Mr S. SMITH, Charles, Mr V. WEBSTER.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr Buckstone].

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.

Columbine, Miss STALLARD.

Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Corridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, a New Serio Comic Burletta, called

FRA DIAVOLO.

The Overture and Music, by Auber. Arranged by Zerbini.

Zerlina, Madame VESTRIS, Mrs Popkins, Mrs GLOVER,
Bianca, Miss Kabrey, Nina, Miss Greener, Lucia, Miss Slater.
Alderman Popkins, Mr W. VINING, Lorenzo, Mr Hodges,
Carlo, Mr Worrell, Pietro, Mr Newcomb, Timothy Quail, Mr Cooper,
Fra Diavolo, Mr Fredericks, Gasparoni, Mr Paget,
Christofano, Mr Brougham, Rocco, Mr Beckwith, Tebaldo, Mr Cooke,
Beppo, Mr Coates, Bruno, Mr Browne.

In Act III. A Pas Seul, by Miss Josephine.

After which, a Comic Burletta, called

STEINBERG CASTLE.

Flora, Miss FOOTE.

Dorival, Mr Fredericks, Governor Steinberg, Mr Newcomb,
O'Shaughnessy, Mr Brougham.

To conclude with, a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[By Mr Planche.]

Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.

Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.

IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.

Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe,

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely new Drama, entitled

NANCY OF PORTSMOUTH.

Nancy Bloomfield, Miss SOMERVILLE, The Widow Crabjuice, Mad. SIMON,
Constantia, Miss Jordan, Kitty Bustle, Miss Vincent, in which she will sing a Parody on "Cherry Ripe," Old Margery, Mrs Rogers,
Becky Sims, Miss Rummens. Sir Edward Gayton, Mr Gough,
Frederick Gayton, Mr Edwin, Captain Splashaway, Mr Hicks,
Joe Barton, Mr C. Hill, Fiery Ned, Mr D. Pitt, Tim Tipple, Mr VALE,
Bounce, Mr Rogers, Capt. Friendly, Mr Lee, Tapwell, Mr Hobbs,
Jemmy Gonimble, Madlle. Rosier, Long Bill, Mr Almar, Short Bill, Mr Webb.

After which, will be produced a new Drama, (in Two Acts) entitled

THE TWO PUPILS; OR, THE PEDAGOGUE PUZZLED.

Miss Morley, Miss CHICHESTER, (her 1st appearance) Fanny, Miss VINCENT.
Lord Henry Delmont, Mr C. HILL, Sir Thomas Morley, Mr D. PITT.
Doctor Dirliewhacket, Mr WILLIAMS, Samuel Sliver, Mr VALE,
Sir Thomas' Servant, Mr Webb, Servant of the House, Mr Lee.

To conclude with, a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,

THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

[By Mr W. Barrymore].

The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.

Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.

Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene 1. Regions of Time.—II. The Town of Newbury (Sunrise).—III. Cabinet in the Widow's Mansion.—IV. Splendid Temple of the New Year.—V. Picturesque Roadside Inn.—VI. Exterior of Public House and Saddler's.—VII. Suspension Bridge over the Menai.—VIII. Quiet Lodgings in a retired Neighbourhood.—IX. Race Course and Grand Stand.—X. Splendid Falls of Tivoli.—XI. Cavern (Moonlight).—XII. and last. Realms of Bliss in the Regions of Light.

To-morrow, Nancy of Portsmouth; with other Entertainments; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, the Drama, (in Two Acts) called

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr Planche.]

Maria Grazie, Mrs W. BARRYMORE, Ottavia, Miss FAUCIT.
Prince Bianchi, Mr Younge, Nicolo, Mr Webster, Fabio, Mr Hughes,
Albert and Theodore, Mr H. WALLACK, Rubaldo, Mr Bedford,
Spoletto, Mr Bland, Uberto, Mr Robinson, Carlotti. Mr Yarnold.

After which, a Musical Piece, (in Two Acts) called

THE ILLUSTRIOUS STRANGER.

[By Mr Kenney.]

Irza, Miss FAUCIT, Fatima, Mrs WAYLETT,
Aboulifar, Mr Thompson, Aman, Mr Bland. Alibajou, Mr Webster,
Bowbell, Mr LISTON, Gimbo, Mr HARLEY,
High Priest, Mr Fenton, Officers, Mr C. Jones and Mr Honner.

In the course of the Evening, Rossini's Overture to "Semiramide," and Mozart's Overture to "Die Entfurung aus Dem Serail.'

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES,

OR HARLLEQUIN AND MOTHER CAREY'S CHICKENS.

[By Mr W. Barrymore.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.

Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.

Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr Stanfield.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, Werner; Perfection; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Entertainments will commence with

THE £100 NOTE.

Lady Pedigree, Mrs TAYLEURE,

Miss Arlington, Miss TAYLOR, in which character she will sing the Ballad of "My Father Land," and the Bavarian Broom Girl's Song.

Mrs Arlington, Miss LAWRENCE, Nurse, Mrs DALY,
Montmorency, Mr WRENCH, Morgan, Mr BLANCHARD,
Janus, Mr BARTLEY, O'Shocknessy, Mr POWER,
Billy Black, Mr KEELEY, Paperfund, Mr TURNOUR, Bilker, Mr EVANS.

Previous to which, an Overture, by M. Corri. (MS.)

After which the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr Farley.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.

With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr Peake.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.

Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.

Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To conclude with,

TEDDY THE TILER.

[By Mr G. H. Rodwell.]

Lady Dunderford, Mrs Daly, Oriel, Miss Lawrence, Flora, Miss Nelson,
Julia, Mrs Brown. Lord Dunderford, Mr Evans, Henry, Mr Duruset,
Frederick, Mr Baker, Bombardine, Mr Henry, Mr Scrivener, Mr Turnour,
Teddy Mulowney, the Tiler, Mr POWER,
Tim, Mr Addison, Stiff, Mr Mears, Apewell, Mr Irwin.

To-morrow, Fazio; and the Pantomime.

COBURG THEATRE. — The Gambler's Life — Jonathan Dobson—Harlequin Silver Penny.

Published by J. Onwhyn, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. Chappel; Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange; A. Hays, 165 Regent street; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at Ebers's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Booksellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. Reynell, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 114.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 14, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Letters and Journals of Lord Byron: with Notices of his Life, by Thomas Moore. Two vols. 4to. Murray.

LORD BYRON—MR MOORE—AND MR LEIGH HUNT,

WITH ORIGINAL LETTERS, NOT IN MR MOORE'S WORK.

[Continued from our last.]

We are now arrived at the period of Mr Leigh Hunt's junction with Lord Byron in the 'Liberal.' Let it be allowed us to recapitulate a little. For the last ten years, from 1811, up to August 1821, Mr Moore has been complimenting Mr Leigh Hunt as an author who wrote "too well for a politician;" as a "fulminator of gold;" as a man whom he should "like for a brother;" as a companion, the power to visit whom "he envied Lord Byron;" as a friend who had warmly excited his "gratitude,"—whose friend it was his "pleasure to be, and his proud wish to let the world know for such;" as a "beautiful" and "original" poet, not to be compared with "ordinary bards;" and as the sole "Richmond in the field," in a certain line of writing.

These last words are scarcely out of his mouth, when Mr Moore writes to Lord Byron to warn him against any connexion with Mr Leigh Hunt, as it was a "bankrupt" one, an "unequal" one, "unholy," and would render him an object of "ridicule."

If we had Mr Moore's insincerity, we should speak of the above eulogies with the usual modest common places, and nobody would believe us. As it is, we can only trust, that the reader, for the sake of his own sincerity and ours, will believe us when we say, that nothing but inexperience and the cordiality with which we supposed Mr Moore to write them at the time, could have induced us to receive them without blushing then; and that it is only with feelings of pain, shame, and disgust, that we now contrast them with his abuse, and can reflect we ever did receive them.

In the last but one of the letters from Mr Moore to Mr Leigh Hunt, which we have laid before the public, the writer says, that Lord Byron had lately been making many inquiries after Mr Hunt, and an answer is requested from him, before another letter is written to the Noble Lord. This has a friendly look; and conveys an impression, that Mr Hunt was mentioned in a friendly way in the correspondence of his two acquaintances. Yet it would seem from Mr Moore's late work, that such was not the fact. On the part of Lord Byron, it certainly was not. The most bitter things his Lordship ever said of Mr Hunt, are contained in a letter of June 1818, four months previous to the kind inquiries intimated by Mr Moore; and these bitter things are introduced by certain stars, evidently referring to something which Mr Moore had said, and which he had apparently said, with no great respect towards the man, for whom he was professing gratitude and admiration. Be this as it may, what induced Lord Byron at that time to write such things of the man towards whom he also had expressed gratitude? Part of the reason must, perhaps, remain in obscurity, in default of an elucidation from Mr Moore. The rest we can explain; and in explaining these, we elucidate all the real grounds of objection which Lord Byron had against Mr Leigh Hunt, then or afterwards. The reader will be good enough to bear in mind, that Mr Hunt had never said anything against Lord Byron, either publicly or in private; that he was no double-dealing correspondent, who wrote one thing to one man and another to another; that he was notoriously scrupulous among his friends in saying nothing behind a man's back which he had not thought it right to say to his face; and that the public are in possession of all his sins of accusation. But, in the first place, he had become, as before observed, an object of attack to all the agents of Toryism, whose cause was then flushed with power, in consequence of the triumph of the allies; and Lord Byron, besides being in want of an influential advocate with the public, never surmounted that reverence for the circles, and dread of worldly ridicule, with which he was hampered by his rank. This was one of the reasons why he had begun to fall off in his notions of respect for Mr Leigh Hunt. A second reason was, that Mr Hunt had become poor, and poverty is an unpleasant object of contemplation to a luxurious man of the world: especially as it diminishes influence with the worldly. Thirdly, Mr Leigh Hunt was falling off more and more from his respect for titles,—not to mention that he had paid Lord Byron the awkward compliment of supposing him to be above his rank, which he was not. Fourthly, and lastly, (and this was the greatest reason of all, as far as the literary part of the business was concerned,) Mr Leigh Hunt, besides not being a flatterer of his lordship in private, and not saying much about his writings in public, (the poetry he was fondest of being of another kind, and Lord Byron's being seldom in his thoughts), was guilty of the unpardonable offence of thinking Mr Wordsworth the first poet of the day, and of being the first to hail the rise of a young poet, Mr Keats, who promised, he thought, to rival Mr Wordsworth. Lord Byron had always objected, with an appearance of spleen, to Mr Hunt's high estimation of Mr Wordsworth; and it seems by the letters which his kind friend Mr Moore has published, that he became absolutely furious about Keats. The reason was, that he had an instinctive sense of the truth of a great deal that was said about those two poets; and he had got a notion, that Keats spoke of him with contempt. On seeing a miniature of Mr Keats put up in Mr Hunt's study at Pisa, he could not help expressing his astonishment, how the other could admire him. Mr Hunt said, that Mr Keats would be sorry to hear him talk so, as he (Mr Keats) was an admirer of Don Juan. The noble poet softened immediately, turned the conversation upon that point, and upon the merits discernible in Mr Keats's poetry; and took the first opportunity of mentioning his genius with honour in Don Juan. This is the reason, why, after all the vituperations of him published in Mr Moore's correspondence, he speaks of Mr Keats's 'Hyperion' as a wonderful production, and says it was superior to 'Æschylus!'

The 'Liberal' was set up in spite of the good offices of the grateful Mr Moore.

We will here quote a passage on that matter from the masterly pages of Mr Hazlitt:

'Mr Moore has been so long accustomed to the society of Whig Lords, and so enchanted by the smile of beauty and fashion, that he really fancies himself one of the set, to which he is admitted on sufferance, and tries very unnecessarily to keep others out of it. He talks familiarly of works that are or are not read "in our circle;" and seated smiling and at his ease in a coronet-coach, enlivening the owner by his brisk sallies and Attic conceits, is shocked, as he passes, to see a Peer of the realm shake hands with a Poet. There is a little indulgence of spleen and envy, a little servility and pandering to aristocratic pride in this proceeding. Is Mr Moore bound to advise a Noble Poet to get as fast as possible out of a certain publication, lest he should not be able to give an account at Holland or at Lansdown House, how his friend Lord Byron had associated himself with his friend Leigh Hunt? Is he afraid that the "Spirit of Monarchy" will eclipse the "Fables for the Holy Alliance" in virulence and plain speaking? Or are the members of the "Fudge Family" to secure a monopoly for the abuse of the Bourbons and the doctrine of Divine Right? Because he is genteel and sarcastic, may not others be paradoxical and argumentative? Or must no one bark at a Minister or General, unless they have been first dandled, like a little French pug-dog, in the lap of a lady of quality? Does Mr Moore insist on the double claim of birth and genius as a title to respectability in all advocates of the popular side—but himself? Or is he anxious to keep the pretensions of his patrician and plebeian friends quite separate, so as to be himself the only point of union, a sort of double meaning, between the two? It is idle to think of setting bounds to the weakness and illusions of self-love as long as it is confined to a man's own breast; but it ought not to be made a plea for holding back the powerful hand that is stretched out to save another struggling with the tide of popular prejudice, who has suffered shipwreck of health, fame and fortune in a common cause, and who has deserved the aid and the good wishes of all who are (on principle) embarked in the same cause by equal zeal and honesty, if not by equal talents to support and to adorn it!'*

* See more and stronger remarks on this subject in the second volume of the Plain Speaker:—Art. On the Spleen of Party.

Digitized by Google

An account of the opposition made to this work has been given in other places, and the secret of it admirably sifted by the above writer, of whom we shall have more to say presently. Mr Moore speaks of the "dross" in the 'Liberal,' and intimates that it was compounded of nothing else, with the exception of the noble lord's contributions. He tries hard at the same time to impress upon the reader, that he has a sort of genteel ignorance of what was in it. Part of this "dross" was furnished by Mr Hazlitt, who, now he is dead, is acknowledged on all hands, except Mr Moore's, to have been one of the most powerful writers of his time. His articles in the 'Liberal' (of which more hereafter) are almost as good as any he ever wrote; and that is the reason why Mr Moore and others had such a horror of them. Mr Hazlitt is mentioned once,—we believe no oftener,—in the 'Life and Correspondence' published by Mr Moore, and is described by Lord Byron as one who "talks pimples—a red and white corruption rising up (in little imitation of mountains upon maps) but containing nothing, and discharging nothing, but their own humours." For the suggestion of this piece of grossness and absurdity, the Noble Lord was indebted to some Tory magazine, which in the personalities allowed to Toryism but to nothing else, falsely represented Mr Hazlitt as having a pimpled face. It pleased the jealous spleen of the noble anti-republican to take the misrepresentation for granted; and it has no less pleased Mr Moore to repeat his use of it. We have already presented the reader, in Mr Hazlitt's own words, with one reason for this proceeding of Mr Moore's; and we shall lay before him another below.*

'Mr Moore has a little mistaken the art of poetry for the cosmetic art. He does not compose an historic group, or work out a single figure; but throws a variety of elementary sensations, of vivid impressions together, and calls it a description. He makes out an inventory of beauty—the smile on the lips, the dimple on the cheeks, item, golden locks, item, a pair of blue wings, item, a silver sound, with breathing fragrance and radiant light, and thinks it a character or a story. He gets together a number of fine things and fine names, and thinks that, flung on heaps, they make up a fine poem. This dissipated, fulsome, painted, patch-work style may succeed in the levity and languor of the boudoir, or might have been adapted to the Pavilions of royalty, but it is not the style of Parnassus, nor a passport to Immortality. It is not the taste of the ancients, "'tis not classical lore"——nor the fashion of Tibullus, or Theocritus, or Anacreon, or Virgil, or Ariosto, or Pope, or Byron, or any great writer among the living or the dead, but it is the style of our English Anacreon, and it is (or was) the fashion of the day! Let one example (and that an admired one) taken from 'Lalla Rookh,' suffice to explain the mystery and soften the harshness of the foregoing criticism.

'Now upon Syria's land of roses
Softly the light of eve reposes,
And like a glory, the broad sun
Hangs over sainted Lebanon:
Whose head in wintry grandeur towers,
And whitens with eternal sleet,
While summer, in a vale of flowers,
Is sleeping rosy at his feet.
To one who look'd from upper air,
O'er all th' enchanted regions there,
How beauteous must have been the glow,
The life, the sparkling from below!
Fair gardens, shining streams, with ranks
Of golden melons on their banks,
More golden where the sun-light falls,—
Gay lizards, glittering on the walls
Of ruin'd shrines, busy and bright
As they were all alive with light;—
And yet more splendid, numerous flocks
Of pigeons, settling on the rocks,
With their rich, restless wings, that gleam
Variously in the crimson beam
Of the warm west, as if inlaid
With brilliants from the mine, or made
Of tearless rainbows, such as span
The unclouded skies of Peristan!
And then, the mingling sounds that come
Of shepherd's ancient reed, with hum
Of the wild bees of Palestine,
Banquetting through the flowery vales—
And, Jordan, those sweet banks of thine,
And woods, so full of nightingales.'—

'The following lines are the very perfection of Della Cruscan sentiment, and affected orientalism of style. The Peri exclaims, on finding that old talisman and hackneyed poetical machine, "a penitent tear"—

'Joy, joy forever! my task is done—
The gates are pass'd, and Heaven is won!
Oh! am I not happy? I am, I am—
To thee, sweet Eden! how dark and sad
Are the diamond turrets of Shadukiam,
And the fragrant bowers of Amberabad!'

Mr Shelley's masterly translation of the 'May-day Night' from Faust, appeared in the 'Liberal;' and Mr Moore, enlightened by the fact of Mr Shelley's having been heir to a title, and of his condescending to pay him (as he truly says) an "undeserved compliment," pronounces him to have been a man of "real genius." One of the most genuine wits now living, whose name we do not feel ourselves at liberty to mention without applying to him, and from whom (we are not sure) perhaps Mr Moore has heard in one of the Reviews, was a writer in the 'Liberal.' Others to whom we also feel under a like delicacy, and who are at a distance, contributed articles which might help Mr Moore to some truer notions on the side of refinement. And gallantry, as well as respect for her powers, might have induced him to except from the charge of "dross" the contributions of Mrs Shelley, the authoress of Frankenstein, which he has pronounced to be "one of those original conceptions, that take hold of the public mind at once and for ever." Mr Leigh Hunt willingly concedes that the articles from his own pen in the 'Liberal' are far inferior to what he could have wished them, and were not worthy of the occasion. Ill health, and the calamitous death of his friend, and the new, unlooked-for, and most unpleasant circumstances under which he found himself situated with Lord Byron, may perhaps excuse his doing no better. Yet his lordship would fain have persuaded him, that there was one article of his writing which Mr Moore would look upon with serious eyes. This was a trifle called "Rhyme and Reason," proposing to modern versifiers to omit all but their rhymes in future, as matter superfluous. But as Lord Byron (we do not say with what truth) considered it likely to make his friend look so grave, we will insert the commencement of it.

'A friend of ours, the other day, taking up the miscellaneous poems of Tasso, read the title-page into English, as follows: "The Rhymes of the Lord Twisted Yew, Amorous, Bosky, and Maritime."* The Italians exhibit a modesty worthy of imitation, in calling their miscellaneous poems, rhymes. Twisted Yew himself, with all his genius, has put forth an abundance of these terminating blossoms, without any fruit behind them: and his countrymen of the present day do not scruple to confess, that their living poetry consists of little else. The French have a game at verses, called Rhymed Ends, (Bouts Rimés) which they practise a great deal more than they are aware; and the English, though they are a more poetical people, and lay claim to the character of a less vain one, practice the same game to a very uncandid extent, without so much as allowing that the title is applicable to any part of it.

'Yet how many "Poems" are there among all these nations, of which we require no more than the rhymes, to be acquainted with the whole of them? You know what the rogues have done, by the ends they come to. For instance,

Grove,
Night,
Rove,
Delight.

Heart,
Prove,
Impart,
Love,
Kiss,
Blest,
Bliss,
Rest.

There is in all this a play of fancy, a glitter of words, a shallowness of thought, and a want of truth and solidity that is wonderful, and that nothing but the heedless, rapid glide of the verse could render tolerable:——it seems that the poet, as well as the lover,—

'May bestride the Gossamer,
That wantons in the idle, summer air,
And yet not fall, so light is vanity!'

'Mr Moore ought not to contend with serious difficulties or with entire subjects. He can write verses, not a poem. There is no principle of massing or continuity in his productions—neither height nor breadth nor depth of capacity. There is no truth of representation, no strong internal feeling—but a continual flutter and display of affected airs and graces, like a finished coquette, who hides the want of symmetry by extravagance of dress, and the want of passion by flippant forwardness and unmeaning sentimentality. All is flimsy, all is florid to excess. His imagination may dally with insect beauty, with Rosicrucian spells; may describe a butterfly's wing, a flower-pot, a fan: but it should not attempt to span the great outlines of nature, or keep pace with the sounding march of events, or grapple with the strong fibres of the human heart. The great becomes turgid in his hands, the pathetic insipid. If Mr Moore were to describe the heights of Chimboraço, instead of the loneliness, the vastness, and the shadowy might, he would only think of adorning it with roseate tints, like a strawberry-ice; and would transform a magician's fortress in the Himmalaya (stripped of its mysterious gloom and frowning horrors) into a jeweller's toy, to be set upon a lady's toilette.'†

* Rime del Signor Torquato Tasso, Amorose, Boschereccie, Maritime, &c.

† There is a passage from the same hand in another work, still better than this; which will be given by and by.

Digitized by Google

'Was there ever per-oration more eloquent? Ever a series of catastrophes more explanatory of their previous history? Did any Chinese gentleman ever show the amount of his breeding and accomplishments more completely, by the nails which he carries at his finger's ends?'

There is a specimen of a Pastoral to the same purpose, a Prologue, &c. and mention is made of "tinkling old gentlemen about town;" in which venerable class Mr Hunt certainly did not mean to include Mr Moore. He can safely add, that he had no intention whatsoever against Mr Moore in writing the article; though Lord Byron was always insisting that he had; and as his lordship now began to let his visitor into the secrets of intercourse between the insincere, to laugh at Mr Moore's love-poetry (which he was in the habit of calling "Looks and Tones,") to say how angry the author of 'Lalla Rookh' was at Mr Hunt's not holding it in greater admiration, and at Mr Hazlitt's having said that he "ought not to have written it even for three thousand pounds," and finally to describe him as a man who could express two different opinions of his friends, before them and behind their backs, (which he charged him with doing to himself, and which the reader has seen but too lamentably how capable he was of doing) Mr Leigh Hunt afterwards said, when the Loves of the Angels appeared, that he might have exemplified the subject of 'Rhyme and Reason,' out of that poem, and Lord Byron was always archly inciting him to do it, under pretence of requesting him not. Day after day, he used to say to his visitor, "Well, have you begun? Are 'Looks and Tones' getting on? Mind, you must not publish:—You know I'm his friend." And then he used to chuckle, and shake for glee.

[We are compelled to leave off here, like an Eastern reciter, at an interesting part of our story. We shall resume it to-morrow.]

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—The Brigand—The Illustrious Stranger—and the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—£100 Note—The Pantomime—and Teddy the Tiler.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A change took place here last night in the list of performances, Mary Queen of Scots and the Little Jockey disappearing; and Fra Diavolo! from Terracina and Tottenham Street, taking the lead in the performances.

Brother Devil (Mr FREDERICKS) is but a middling sort of a rascal, considering he is of the Brigand race, and professes to be gay as well as ferocious. He does not seduce a single woman during the three acts; nor even succeed in killing a man. He calls himself a Marquis, it is true, and talks to the innkeeper's daughter, and her name is Zerlina; but his gallantry only ends in secreting himself in a closet to rob the house, and in making her lover jealous. We really cannot commend his profligacy. He has a good name for murder: but we see no proofs of it. We must take the will for the deed; console ourselves with the reflection of the philosopher, that "intention is everything." In short, he is the innocentest puppy of a desperado we have seen a long time, and only deserves hanging.

Perhaps something of this mediocrity of character is owing to his present representative, Mr FREDERICKS, who at all events takes him too much as he finds him, and does not sufficiently frown and fume him into importance. Mr FREDERICKS (who has something about his tone and manner that we like in ordinary, though he should not run all his sentences into one another) is too natural, and like a man of this world, for a stage robber. He has not slang enough, nor stamp, nor growl, nor rolling of the eyes. He is too much the Marquis throughout, even when in danger and the act of preparing for revenge. He does not go, as he ought, to the side-boxes, shake his fist, and grin in the ears of the ladies sitting there, as if he would graze their cheeks with his whiskers. He is a most stationary, unassuming bandit, and has no glory about him. Then his mention of the word "hell." Does not Mr FREDERICKS know, that this is the very touchstone of melo-dramatic delivery? That no robber, of any decent enormity, or blackness of mustachios, can make an adjuration by the infernal regions, without stalking sideways, as aforesaid, clenching his fist, rolling his eyes, descending into the depths of his throat, as if he was raking the very bottom of Tartarus, and taking at least half a minute to growl out the words "By h-h-h-h-e-l-l!"

It is the part of Zerlina that is the attraction of this piece, and very well Madame VESTRIS performs it. Madame VESTRIS should never play such characters as the one we saw her in at the Tottenham Street Theatre,—that of a sentimental young lady. She may have a regard for it, and wish to add its performance to the list of her accomplishments. That is all very well; and the wish is a credit to her. But actually to appear in any part unfit for us, is to descend instead of rise in our merits, however superior we may think it. Madame VESTRIS should always perform these gay, playful characters, mixed up of the natural and the coquettish. The expression of her face is injured and made a blank by the others. Her features in these are put into their proper play. Her eyes assume their intelligence, because she understands what she is about: her mouth, having something to do, as it ought to have, adjusts itself handsomely to the occasion; its expression does not go wandering without an object: and her good taste in singing, and other graces, elevate the familiarity of the rest of her acting, in a manner extremely sensible and pleasing; whereas they are neutralized, and even vulgarized, by attempting to adapt them to what she has no real talent for. The piece before us is worth anybody's going to see, if it be only to hear Zerlina's song upon Fra Diavolo, to see her pretty dress, with the square-capped cloth on her head, and hear how naturally she insists upon saving her lover from the consequences of his ill-humour, and how prettily she afterwards refuses to forgive him, because the forgiveness is going to break with a smile out of her lips.

We have seen Madame VESTRIS in no character that we would rather see her in than this.

Mrs GLOVER acts the wife of the jealous and repentant alderman very well indeed. Her tears are full of ill-usage: and the action of leaning her arm on his shoulder, as an evidence of relenting, is a touch true to nature.

A little girl of the name of JOSEPHINE performs a sort of medley Pas Seul in the third act, in a promising manner. ☞

TO W. C. MACREADY, Esq.

ON READING THE ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE BIRTH OF HIS FIRST CHILD, IN GRATEFUL RECOLLECTION OF THE EARLY SCENES OF HIS VIRGINIUS.

There is no father, who with swimming eyes,
Hath watched thee life and present being lend
To scenes by simple-hearted poet penned,
Presenting household lore in Roman guise,
Which, true to ancient time, in freshness vies
With that which gushes now—who should not send
A welcome to thee as the father's friend,
Now thou art joyful sharer in the ties
Thou hast, by art forstalling nature, shewn.—
Yet be thy knowledge than thy fancy less;
Be parents' griefs a tragic dream alone;
While all thou imaged of their happiness,
Home-felt, sustain thy voice's cordial tone,
Or make it tremble with its sweet excess.

***

JOHN ABELL, a gentleman of the chapel royal in the reign of Charles the Second, was celebrated for a fine counter-tenor voice, and for his skill in playing the lute. The King wished to send him to the Carnival at Venice, to show the Italians that there were good voices in England. This event, however, did not take place. In 1688 he was discharged from his situation, on account of his adherence to the Romish communion. He went abroad, and greatly distinguished himself by singing in public in several of the towns of Germany. He amassed great sums, but, as he lived profusely, he was often reduced to the necessity of travelling with his lute on his back, and subject to many hardships. In his rambles he got as far as Poland. On his arrival at Warsaw the King sent for him. Abell at first refused to attend the summons, but was prevailed upon to make his appearance at last. On his arrival at the palace he was seated on a chair, and drawn up to a great height from the floor of a spacious hall. Soon afterwards the King and his attendants appeared in a gallery opposite to him, and at the same time a number of bears were let loose below! The King gave him the choice whether he would sing or be let down amongst the bears. Abell very wisely chose the former, and he declared afterwards that he never sang so well in his life as he did in his cage.—Musical Biography.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

PETER SIMPLE to-morrow.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, Lord BYRON'S Tragedy of
WERNER, OR THE INHERITANCE.
[Adapted by Mr MACREADY.]
Josephine, Mrs FAUCIT, Ida Stralenheim, Miss MORDAUNT.
Werner, Mr MACREADY, Ulric, Mr WALLACK, Gabor, Mr COOPER,
Baron Stralenheim, Mr H. Wallack, Fritz, Mr Younge, Otto, Mr Cohen,
Henric, Mr Salter, Eric, Mr C. Jones, Idenstein, Mr W. Bennett,
Rodolph, Mr Cooke, Arnheim, Mr Fenton, Meister, Mr Eaton,
Ludwig, Mr Cathie, Herman, Mr S. Jones.

After which,
PERFECTION.
[By Mr BAYLY.]
Kate O'Brien, Mrs WAYLETT. in which she will sing "My own Blue Bell," and "Kate Kearney."
Susan, Mrs ORGER.
Charles Paragon, Mr VINING. Sir Lawrence Paragon, Mr W. BENNETT.
Sam, Mr WEBSTER.

In the course of the Evening will be performed, the Overture to "Pietro Von Abano"- -(Spohr); and "La Dame Blanche"—(Bojeldieu).

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called
DAVY JONES.
[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.
Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.
DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.
The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.
Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, Rob Roy; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, the Tragedy of
FAZIO.
[By Mr MILMAN.]
Marchesa Aldabella, Mrs CHATTERLEY, Clara, Miss PHILLIPS,
Bianca, (2nd time) Miss F. KEMBLE. Giraldi Fazio, Mr WARDE,
Duke of Florence, Mr EGERTON, Bartolo, Mr BLANCHARD,
Philario, Mr Henry, Falsetto, Mr Parry, Gonsalvo, Mr Baker,
Theodore, Mr Mears, Keeper, Mr Fuller, Pietro, Mr Turnour,
Gentleman, Mr Irwin, Antonio, Mr Heath, Aurio, Mr Crumpton.

Previous to the Tragedy will be performed (for the 2nd time in this country) a Grand M.S. Overture by Friedrich Kuhlau.

After which the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called
HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.
[By Mr FARLEY.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by
Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.
THE ORDER OF SCENERY.
Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.
To-morrow, Cinderella; and the Pantomime.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

This Evening,
On commencera à Sept Heures et demie, par
LES DEUX PERES.
Vaudeville, en Deux Actes, de M. DUFATY.
Laure, Fille de M. Dorlis, Mademoiselle HERMINIE.
M. de Ferlis, Amateur de Botanique, M. ST AUBERT,
Dorval, Navigateur, M. Prèval, Prosper, M. Alfred,
Rustique, Jardinier, M. Gamard.

Suivi de la Première Représentation de
LE FUTUR DE LA GRAND'MAMAN.
Vaudeville nouveau en un Acte, de M. DARTOIS.
Madame Darbel, jeune Veuve, Mlle. Elisa. La Comtesse Emilie, Mlle. Emma.
Marianne, Nourrice chez le Comte, Mlle St. Ange.
M. DERVAL remplira le Rôle de Delmare, futur de la Grand'Maman,
Le Comte Adolphe, M. Alfred. Mignot, Mari de Marianne, M. Laporte.

On Finira par
LES RENDEZ-VOUS BOURGEOIS.
Opera, en Un Acte, Musique de NICOLO.
Reine, Fille de Dugravier, Mademoiselle FLORVAL,
Louise, Nièce de Dugravier, Mlle. St Ange,
Julie, Femme de Chambre, Mlle. HERMINIE.
M. Dugravier, M. Prèval. César, amant de Reine, M. Laporte,
Charles, amant de Louise, M. Alfred,
Bertrand, Valet de M. Dugravier, M. Gamard. Jasmin, Valet, M. Arnaud.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called
THE WRECK ASHORE.
Act I.—WINTER.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mr DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.
[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]
Act. II.—SUMMER.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

To which will be added, a New Comic Burletta, called
WAS I TO BLAME?
Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

After which, the Comic Burletta, called
A DEAD SHOT.
Louisa Lovetrick, Mrs FITZWILLIAM, in which character she will introduce her celebrated Description of "A Sunday Concert."
Chatter, Miss DALY.
Captain Cannon, Mr BAYNE, Mr Hector Timid, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Mr Wiseman, Mr S. SMITH, Charles, Mr V. WEBSTER.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called
GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.
[By Mr BUCKSTONE].
The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.
Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, a New Serio Comic Burletta, called
FRA DIAVOLO.
The Overture and Music, by Auber. Arranged by Zerbini.
Zerlina, Madame VESTRIS, Mrs Popkins, Mrs GLOVER,
Bianca, Miss Kabrey, Nina, Miss Greener, Lucia, Miss Slater.
Alderman Popkins, Mr W. VINING, Lorenzo, Mr Hodges,
Carlo, Mr Worrell, Pietro, Mr Newcomb, Timothy Quail, Mr Cooper,
Fra Diavolo, Mr Fredericks, Gasparoni, Mr Paget,
Christofano, Mr Brougham, Rocco, Mr Beckwith, Tebaldo, Mr Cooke,
Beppo, Mr Coates, Bruno, Mr Browne.
In Act III. A Pas Seul, by Miss Josephine.

To be followed by a Comic Burletta, called
THE LITTLE JOCKEY.
Arinette, Miss FOOTE, in which she will sing, "The Boy in yellow wins the day,"
Clotilda, Miss Nursey, Maude, Miss Kibrey.
The Baron D'Acourt, Mr W. VINING,
De Limburg, Mr Paget, Floriville, by a Gentleman, Jocose, Mr Collier,
Denis, Mr W. Young, Pierre, Mr Brown.

To conclude with, a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled
OLYMPIC REVELS.
[By Mr PLANCHE.]
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely new Drama, entitled
NANCY OF PORTSMOUTH.
Nancy Bloomfield, Miss SOMERVILLE, The Widow Crabjuice, Mad. SIMON,
Constantia, Miss Jordan, Kitty Bustle, Miss Vincent, in which she will sing a Parody on "Cherry Ripe," Old Margery, Mrs Rogers,
Becky Sims, Miss Rummens. Sir Edward Gayton, Mr Gough,
Frederick Gayton, Mr Edwin, Captain Splashaway, Mr Hicks,
Joe Barton, Mr C. Hill, Fiery Ned, Mr D. Pitt, Tim Tipple, Mr VALE,
Bounce, Mr Rogers, Capt. Friendly, Mr Lee, Tapwell, Mr Hobbs,
Jemmy Gonimble, Madlle. Rosier, Long Bill, Mr Almar, Short Bill, Mr Webb.

After which will be produced (2nd time) a new Drama, (in Two Acts) entitled
THE TWO PUPILS; OR, THE PEDAGOGUE PUZZLED.
Miss Morley, Miss CHICHESTER, (her 1st appearance) Fanny, Miss VINCENT.
Lord Henry Delmont, Mr C. HILL, Sir Thomas Morley, Mr D. PITT.
Doctor Dirliewhacket, Mr WILLIAMS, Samuel Sliver, Mr VALE,
Sir Thomas' Servant, Mr Webb, Servant of the House, Mr Lee.

To conclude with, a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,
THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.
[By Mr W. BARRYMORE].
The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.
Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

COBURG THEATRE. — The Gambler's Life—Jonathan Dobson—Harlequin Silver Penny.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—A Deed of Blood.—Home for the Holidays — Harlequin and Mother Goose.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL.—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 115.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 15, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Letters and Journals of Lord Byron: with Notices of his Life, by Thomas Moore. Two vols. 4to. Murray.

LORD BYRON—MR MOORE—AND MR LEIGH HUNT,

WITH SOME ORIGINAL ANECDOTES OF HIS LORDSHIP.

[Concluded.]

If Mr Moore supposes that Lord Byron made him an exception to the way in which he used to talk of his "friends," he is mistaken. We do not believe that he does suppose it; though he would fain make a different impression on the public mind, and represent Lord Byron as being in a strange state of momentary waywardness, when he was not ranking him among those he loved best. The fact is, that Lord Byron laughed at him. He was inclined to love him heartily enough, as long as he believed his flatteries sincere. His respect for the circles induced him to have a certain respect for one who could lampoon; and in addition to Mr Moore's flatteries of him as a Poet, there was one other ground of regard upon which Lord Byron was particularly inclined to like him, because it enabled him to undervalue him at the same time; and that was Mr Moore's veneration for lords. But as all these "friends" were in the habit of talking against one another behind their backs, in a style which they did not think so well for their faces, he had found out, as Mr Hunt has done, that his earnest, anxious, and delighted correspondent, Mr Moore, could have his word against him as well as the rest. Lord Byron said to Mr Hunt one day, with a very bitter face, when the latter was expressing his surprise at discovering Moore to be double-tongued,—"Surprised at Moore! Why, do you know what he says of me?" I did not tell him that I had heard something Mr Moore had said, nor from whom I had heard it; and the recollection mortified him so much, that he was fairly unable to get the words out. Mr Hunt had never shown an inclination for hearing him talk against his friends; in fact, he had shown a reverse feeling: and this was one of the reasons why Lord Byron never took heartily to his society. But his Lordship could not contain himself, nevertheless. He saw that his visitor was justly offended with Mr Moore's duplicity, against which, however, no retaliation was meditated, not even in jest. Mr Hunt felt too much hurt by it, and was not aware of the extent to which he should have to struggle against the effects of his tergiversation The talk, therefore, alluded to in our last, about turning the 'Loves of the Angels' into an exemplication of the joke upon Rhyme and Reason, was mere talk; though his Lordship tried hard that it should not be: he did not let the subject drop for weeks; was always returning to his pleasantry about "Looks and Tones;" and as he saw that Mr Hunt could not help laughing at his malicious piece of wit about being Mr Moore's friend, he took an especial delight in repeating it:—"Well, are we never to have the Rhymes? —the Looks and Tones?—

'Oh, there are looks and tones!'"

(We believe this is a line of Mr Moore's). And then he would retreat a little, doubling himself up in his peculiar manner, and uttering a kind of goblin laugh, breathing and grinning, as if, instead of his handsome mouth, he had one like an ogre, from ear to ear. Then came the inevitable addition,—"But mind, you must not publish. You know I'm his friend." We do not remember him to have praised Mr Moore's poetry but once. The poem he eulogized was one of the Irish Melodies, beginning,—

"When first I knew thee, warm and young,
There shone such truth about thee"

On the other hand, he was never backward to let you see that he had a poor notion of his serious poetry in general. He did not think that there shone much truth about that, either of style or sentiment. He says in a letter to Mr John Hunt, in alluding to the 'Loves of the Angels,' and observing that he should not alter his poem on that subject, "I leave it to others to circumcize their Angels with their 'bonnes fortunes' to the drawing-room and clerical standard." In this passage, the words others and theirs have been substituted very plainly for the words Mr Moore and his:—so cautious was he of committing himself on paper, and yet so desirous of saying all. His care in this respect was a circumstance worthy notice, considering the incontinence of speech for which he was famous. He used to observe, with a look of gravity, that "you could not deny what you had written." Yet this was the writer of an autobiography said to have been committed to the flames; and enough remains both in Mr Moore's work and in private letters, to shew that his scruples had come late, and to alarm his "friends" all round. We have letters ourselves which we shall withhold except in case of aggression: others we have burnt: and we beg it to be understood, that in those which remain, there is nothing to implicate a woman. No outrage ever did or could induce us to ward off a blow at the expense of the other sex. We have particular reasons for saying this, and therefore hope the reader will excuse the apparent supererogation.

Lord Byron thought Mr Moore a tuft-hunter* and a smell-feast. On Mr Hunt's expressing his surprise one day, at an account of Mr Moore's veneration for good dinners, Lord Byron exclaimed,—"He! why he finds out your bill of fare, and his countenance falls if it is not of the first order. You should have seen how distressed he looked one day at Venice, because the dinner did not suit him."—"That then," said the other, "accounts for an expression I once saw in his face when the covers were taken off from some dishes. I had a suspicion of it, but could hardly believe it possible."—"Do but give Tom a good dinner, and a lord," returned the noble poet, "and he is at the top of his happiness.—Oh!" added he, in the most emphatic manner, with a face full of glee as above described, doubling himself up as he walked, lifting up his arm, and bringing it down with a doubled fist upon the word in Italics, "TOMMY loves a Lord!"

These are surely not the refinements and the just pride, any more than the previous specimens of duplicity are the single-heartedness, which give Mr Moore a right to speak of "unworthiness," of the vanity of dependants, and to repeat charges of "vulgarity." To know every fugitive mode of the world of fashion, is no proof of being unvulgar. It is no more than the footman may know. Refinement, we thought, consisted in freedom from grossness, which Mr Moore is certainly not free from it: and vulgarity in an overweening sense to what is common to many, whether of the great vulgar or the small (a sense which Mr Moore certainly has.) To be too fond of good eating is gross: to write like Swift is gross. False refinement itself is a symptom of grossness; and so it is of vulgarity. To hunt the company of lords is vulgar. To call Rousseau "low, bad," and "a pauper" was vulgar. There is no word so common in the mouth of vulgar people as low. Nor did Mr Moore make a very polite pun, when, in one of his letters to Lord Byron, he designated two different spheres he had been dining in, one at the west-end, and one in the city, as "High-life and Row-life." As to "vanity," what is all this but vanity? And as to being a dependant, the term belongs to the man who depends in any shape for the comfort of his existence upon those of whom he might be independent: not to him who goes into another country to set up a joint speculation, and is forced to obtain fugitive aid from the partner that deserts him.

With respect to Lord Byron's refinement, one specimen shall serve for many. In writing once to a friend, to request him to prepare accommodations for a lady who expected to be confined, he delicately intimated the condition she was in, by saying she was about to "pig." This, we suppose, is the elegant melancholy of Hamlet.

One anecdote also will suffice with regard to "vanity," especially

* Tuft-hunter is a college term for one who seeks the company of men of noble families; their caps being distinguished by a tuft of gold.

Digitized by Google

as it betrays his secret soul on that point, and illustrates the most plausible action of his life. It was said in the Times newspaper (we forget exactly when, for we quote from memory, but we can refer to the passage, and will correct it, if necessary) that after all which had been said of this noble "apostle and martyr of freedom, his exertions in the cause of Greece were limited to a six months' talk about an expedition to Lepanto, and a loan of some thousands of pounds which were repaid to his executors." Mr Leigh Hunt was walking with his lordship one day in the garden of the Casa Saluzzi at Genoa, when it pleased the noble bard to fall foul on the character of Milton, whose republicanism, patriotism, poetry, and everything else, be attributed to sheer "vanity." His companion said, that he supposed he meant to include in Milton's aspirations the love of glory, which was not to be denied; but Lord Byron would not allow the matter to be so qualified. He said it was all pure vanity, and nothing else; and that such was the motive of all public men, not excepting the greatest, let them do or suffer what they might. In short, he insisted on driving the proposition so far, that Mr Hunt said he hoped he would not give such an opinion the sanction of his book, and put it in Don Juan; and asked him what he would say, if the world should turn round upon him, and in requital of what he was going to do for Greece, attribute all that he did to vanity. His face turned of the colour of scarlet; and he said no more.

We conclude these most disagreeable subjects for the present, and if not compelled to take further notice of them, for ever, by laying before our readers, the promised quotation from the 'Plain Speaker.' It is a book, like all Mr Hazlitt's other works, not half enough known; because the author wrote under every species of disadvantage, and died just at the moment when he might have had the attention he deserved. But if Mr Moore wishes to know how a man can write so as to secure the attention of posterity, let him compare his own flimsy common-places with the following flail of gold:—

'I was sorry to find, the other day, on coming to Vevay, and looking into some English books at a library there, that Mr Moore had taken an opportunity, in his 'Rhymes on the Road,' of abusing Madame Warens, Rousseau, and the men of genius in general. "It's an ill bird," as the proverb says. This appears to me, I confess, to be pickthank work, as needless as it is ill-timed, and, considering from whom it comes, particularly unpleasant. In conclusion, he thanks God, with the Levite, that "he is not one of those," and would rather be anything—a worm, the meanest thing that crawls—than numbered among those who give light and law to the world by an excess of fancy and intellect.* Perhaps posterity may take him at his word, and no more trace be found of his "Rhymes" upon the onward tide of time, than of

"The snow falls in the river,
A moment white, then melts for ever!"

'It might be some increasing consciousness of the frail tenure by which he holds his rank among the great heirs of Fame, that urged our Bard to pawn his reversion of immortality for an indulgent smile of Patrician approbation, as he raised his puny arm against "the mighty dead," to lower, by a flourish of his pen, the aristocracy of letters nearer to the level of the aristocracy of rank—two ideas that keep up a perpetual see-saw in Mr Moore's mind, like buckets in a well, and to which he is always ready to lend a helping hand, according as he is likely to be hoisted up, or in danger of being let down, with either of them.

'The mode in which our author proposes to correct the extravagance of public opinion, and qualify the interest taken in such persons as Rousseau and Madame de Warens, is singular enough, and savours of the late unlucky bias of his mind:—it is by referring us to what the well-bred people in the neighbourhood thought of Rousseau and his pretensions a hundred years ago or thereabouts. "So shall their anticipation prevent our discovery!"

"And doubtless 'mong the grave and good
And gentle of their neighbourhood,
If known at all, they were but known
As strange, low people, low and bad;
Madame herself to footmen prone,
And her young Pauper, all but mad."

'This is one way of the reversing the judgment of posterity, and setting aside the ex-post-facto evidence of taste and genius. So, after "all that's come and gone yet"—after the anxious doubts and misgivings of his mind as to his own destiny—after all the pains he took to form himself in solitude and obscurity—after the slow dawn of his faculties, and their final explosion, that like an eruption of another Vesuvius, dazzling all men with its lights, and leaving the burning lava behind it, shook public opinion, and overturned a kingdom—after having been "the gaze and show of the time," after having been read by all classes, criticized, condemned, admired in every corner of Europe—after bequeathing a name that at the end of half a century is never repeated but with emotion, as another name for genius and misfortune—after having given us an interest in his feelings as in our own, and drawn the veil of lofty imagination or of pensive regret over all that relates to his own being, so that we go a Pilgrimage to the places where he lived, and recall the names he loved with tender affection (worshipping at the Shrines where his fires were first kindled, and where the purple light of love still lingers—"Elysian beauty, melancholy grace!")—after all this, and more, instead of taking the opinion which one half of the world have formed of Rousseau, with an eager emulation, and the other have been forced to admit, in spite of themselves, we are to be sent back by Mr Moore's eaves-dropping muse, to what the people in the neighbourhood thought of him (if ever they thought of him at all), before he had shown any one proof of what he was, as the fairer test of truth and candour, and as coming nearer to the standard of greatness, that is, of something asked to dine out, existing in the author's own mind.

"This, this is the unkindest cut of all."

'Mr Moore takes the inference which he chooses to attribute to the neighbouring gentry concerning "the pauper lad," namely, that "he was mad," because he was poor, and flings it to the passengers out of a laudau and four, as the true version of his character, by the fashionable and local authorities of the time. He need not have gone out of his way to Charmettes merely to drag the reputations of Jean Jacques and his mistress after him, chained to the car of aristocracy, as "people low and bad," on the strength of his enervated sympathy with the genteel conjectures of the day, as to what and who they were. We have better and more authentic evidence. What would he say, if this method of neutralizing the voice of the public were applied to himself, or to his friend, Mr Chantrey; if we were to deny that the one ever rode in an open carriage tête-à-tête with a lord, because his father stood behind a counter, or were to ask the sculptor's customers, when he drove a milk-cart, what we are to think of his bust of Sir Walter? It will never do. It is the peculiar hardship of genius, not to be recognized with the first breath it draws—often not to be admitted even during its life-time—to make its way slow and late, through good report and evil report, "through clouds of detraction, of envy and lies"—to have to contend with the injustice of fortune, with the prejudice of the world,

"Rash judgments amid the sneers of selfish men"— to be shamed by personal defects, to pine in obscurity, to be the butt of pride, the jest of fools, the bye-word of ignorance and malice—to carry on a ceaseless warfare between the consciousness of inward worth and the slights and neglect of others, and to hope only for its reward in the grave and in the undying voice of fame:—and when, as in the present instance, that end has been marvellously attained, and a final sentence has been passed, would any one but Mr Moore wish to shrink from it, to revive the injustice of fortune and the world, and to abide by the idle conjectures of a fashionable coterie empannelled on the spot, who would come to the same shallow conclusion whether the individual in question was an Idiot or a God? There is a degree of gratuitous impertinence and frivolous servility, in all this, not easily to be accounted for, or forgiven.

'There is something more particularly offensive in the cant about "people low and bad" applied to the intimacy between Rousseau and Madame Warens, inasmuch as the volume containing this nice strain of morality is dedicated to Lord Byron, who was at that very time living on the very same sentimental terms with an Italian Lady of Rank, and whose Memoirs Mr Moore has since thought himself called upon to suppress, out of regard to his Lordship's character and to that of his friends, most of whom were not "low people." Is it quality, not charity, that with Mr Moore covers all sorts of slips?

"But 'tis the fall degrades her to a whore;
Let Greatness own her, and she's mean no more!"

'What also makes the dead set at the Heroine of the 'Confessions' seem the harder measure, is, that it is preceded by an effusion to Mary Magdalen, in the devotional style of Madame Guyon, half amatory, half pious, but so tender and rapturous that it dissolves Canova's marble in tears, and heaves a sigh from Guido's canvas. The melting pathos that trickles down one page, is frozen up into the most rigid morality, and hangs like an icicle upon the next. Here Thomas Little smiles and weeps in ecstacy; there Thomas Brown (not "the younger," but the elder surely) frowns disapprobation, and meditates dislike. Why, it may be asked, does Mr Moore's insect muse always hover round this alluring subject, "now in glimmer, and now in gloom"—now basking in the warmth, now writhing in the smart, now licking his lips at it, now making wry faces, but always fidgetting and fluttering about the same gaudy luscious topic, either in flimsy raptures or trumpery horrors? I hate for my own part, this alternation of meretricious rhapsodies and methodistical cant, though the one generally ends in the other.'—Plain Speaker, Vol. II. Article On the Spleen of Party.

*"Out on the craft—I'd rather be
One of those hinds that round me tread,
With just enough of sense to see
The noon-day sun that's o'er my head,
Than thus, with high-built genius curs'd,
That hath no heart for its foundation;
Be all at once that's brightest—worst—
Sublimest—meanest in creation."

Rhymes on the Road.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Werner—Perfection—and the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Fazio—and the Pantomime.

COVENT GARDEN.

THE tragedy of Fazio was repeated last night, and Miss KEMBLE again received great applause. The author of this piece is the Rev. Mr MILMAN, "Professor of Poetry" in one of the Universities, and one of those Quarterly Reviewers who sat in judgment upon Mr KEATS and others, of whom they knew no more than the parish-beadle. Mr MILMAN's tragedy is about the best specimen of what such critics can produce. The best thing in it is the plot; there is effect, but coarse; the characters are those of disagreeable people; the language elegant and common-place; the sentiments and descriptions, for the most part, wanting in truth. The subject partakes of that Newgate-calendar sordidness, in which there is nothing to reconcile us to the pain. Want of truth and moral dignity is its greatest defect throughout. Its power is not that of sympathy, but of selfish will.

The plot deserves the praise of simplicity. Fazio, a young alchemist (Mr WARD), who has a wife (Miss KEMBLE) that is fond of him, quits his bed of nights to discover the philosopher's stone. He has a neighbour, a miser, (BLANCHARD) whose house is broken into by thieves. The old man escapes into Fazio's house, with part of his wealth, but is mortally wounded, and dies there. Fazio takes back the body, possesses himself of the wealth, and commences a life of luxury. A bad, beautiful woman, whom he had once loved in vain (Mrs CHATTERLEY) is now at his service: his wife becomes jealous, and finding that the government are making wondering enquiries into the meagre exchequer of the old miser, she goes to them, and in the hope of detaching him from his mistress, by reducing him to his former poverty, tells them into whose hands the wealth had fallen. A sentence of death ensues; Fazio is executed; and his wife, betwixt astonishment and remorse, after getting the mistress sent into a convent, dies of a broken heart.

This is a very effective story; there are some good situations in the piece; and towards the conclusion the attention of the audience, which is a good deal neutralized previously by the false sentiments and poetry, recovers, and is strongly occupied till the end. But the tragedy wants a vein of sweetness in it to reconcile us. The wife is violent and selfish, even in her sorrows; the mistress is as unfeeling as a painted statue; and Fazio, though forgiving, talks a language so wide of nature and sensibility, that his virtue seems as a mere piece of bye-play, and we look upon him as nothing but a fool. What are we to think of a man, who, when his wife says something to him in his condemned cell, which induces him to suspect she has killed their children, can make the following simile?

> Oh, thou hast not been
> So wild a rebel to the will of God!
> If that thou hast, 'twill make my passionate arms
> That rings thee round so fondly, drop from off thee
> Like sere and wither'd ivy.

Who would think of ivy on such an occasion? What "passionate arms" liken themselves to so poor and feeble a common-place. This is not the speech of a man taking leave of his wife before his execution, but of a cold scholar looking at them and thinking of his Latin verses. So the old miser looking at his gold, is compared to a Satyr gloating on a sleeping nymph. There is no truth, or taste of nature, in such a simile. It is like comparing infirmity with vigour, or old age with youth.

> Her stately steps
> Were light as though a winged angel trod
> Over earth's flowers, and feared to brush away
> Their delicate hues.

Here is the same want of gusto and verisimilitude. Stateliness does not give the idea of lightness, and still less of fear. Its tread is firm and weighty with self-estimation; the security of its step without a doubt. The play is full of the like impertinences of style. Nothing (at least as far as we observed) is described so as to convey a true and simple idea of itself. The author stands by, and says as fine a "thought" upon it as he can; and the thought and the real feeling are distinct. The best touch we have noticed is where the wife says to her husband, when he comes to her, possessed of his new riches,

> Why, Fazio, art thou frantic? Nay, look not
> So strangely, so unmeaningly. I had rather
> That thou wouldst weep, than look so haggard joyful.

This is fine. Mr MILMAN's pleasures are not real. His tragedy wants the reconcilement of real poetry, and of the "soul of goodness in things evil." But he can give you a pain in the midst of pleasure. The dance in the fifth act is well contrived to aggravate the distress. His tragedies have that sort of pain in them, that you do not wish to see them again,—or to read them!

We should be glad if Miss KEMBLE succeeded better in SHAKSPEARE's plays, than in ROWE's or Mr MILMAN's. Something apart from genuine or attractive nature seems to suit her best; nor, on seeing more of her in the piece before us, can we think she has made any advances in the level part of her style. She is still too formal, artificial, and drawling. But give her something to be vehement with, or to denounce, and she gets on. She has not yet got rid of the fault of being too literally emphatic on particular words; but upon the whole, she has improved upon us, by appearing in these characters of self-will, sarcasm, and violence; and we doubt not, as we have before intimated, that her powers will finally settle in that direction. There was one burst of another kind, which we had the pleasure of hailing. It is where she tells her husband that the children live. But these home passages are so rare, that they seem almost as artificial as the rest.—Miss KEMBLE received great applause, especially towards the catastrophe, when it was enthusiastic; and Fazio we suppose, will now run side by side with Werner,—a pair of as uncomfortable, unexalting, sordid-featured tragedies, as a man would not wish to see on a summer's day.

☞

THE LONGITUDE LENGTHENED.

TO THE TATLER.

DEAR MR. TATLER,—I am glad you took notice of Miss Inverarity's strange name, for, do you know, that I thought it a long one too; and I ventured to say as much to my next neighbour in the pit, when what do you think he said? "Sir," says he, "that's only an abridgment of her real name!" (an abridgment!) "It is," says he, "In-verity-a-rarity," but she is called "Inverarity" for shortness. What an odd coincidence! for she is "in verity, a rarity;" and there again you and I agree.

I like your Tatler very much, and am,

Your constant reader,

Green street, Dec. 12, 1830. PETER SIMPLE.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—We understand that it is intended by the Directors for the coming season, to effect an improvement in the Vocal department of these Concerts, by the introduction of several new concerted Pieces. This improvement would no doubt be a considerable one, and do justice to the instrumental part of the entertainment. After the magnificent harmonies of Mozart and Beethoven, the ear cannot well be content with a single voice, unless it were that of an angel. Something more choral would seem better to reply to them, and sustain the grandeur of the impression.

PLAIN PSALM-SINGING originated with Calvin. His separation from the church of Rome was founded on opposition to its discipline as well as its tenets, and in particular he laid the musical part of the service under great restraints. The whole of the music adopted by him consisted of that plain metrical psalmody which is now in general use among the reformed churches of the Continent, and in the parochial churches of this country. This seems to have been the origin of the practice of psalmody. Calvin employed a musician, Guillaume Franc, to set the psalms to easy tunes of one part only; and in this work the composer succeeded so well, that the people became almost infatuated with the love of psalm-singing. Even in the field of battle this has been made an incentive to courage. In the frequent insurrections of the reformers against their persecutors, a psalm, sung by four or five hundred of their party, answered all the purpose of warlike music.—Musical Biography.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A WELL-WISHER has obliged us by the publication he enclosed.
PHILOSCACCHARIA to-morrow. We thank him for his private letter.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, the Opera of
ROB ROY MACGREGOR.
[Adapted by Mr POCOCK.]
Diana Vernon, Miss PEARSON, in which she will introduce,
The Song—"He's what they ca' a Bonnie Lad."
Katty, Miss BRUCE. Mattie, Mrs ORGER. Helen Macgregor, Mrs FAUCIT.
Sir Frederick Vernon, Mr Younge. Rasleigh Osbaldistone, W. H. Wallack.
Francis Osbaldistone, Mr SINCLAIR.
Owen, Mr. W. Bennett. Captain Thornton, Mr Thompson.
Dougal, Mr Webster. Rob Roy Macgregor Campbell, Mr MACREADY.
Major Galbraith, Mr Bedford.
M'Stuart, Mr Yarnold. Jobson, Mr Salter. Andrew, Mr Hughes.
Bailie Nicol Jarvie, Mr LISTON.

Previous to the Opera, will be performed the Overture to "The Heart of Mid Lothian," (adapted chiefly from Scottish Airs.)

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called
DAVY JONES.
[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.
Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.
DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.
The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.
Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands.

On Monday, Pizarro; Perfection, and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, the New Grand Comic Opera, (in Three Acts) called
CINDERELLA.
The Music, by Rossini.
Cinderella, Miss INVERARITY, Clorinda, Miss CAWSE,
Thisbe, Miss HUGHES, Fairy Queen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Felix, Mr WILSON, Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. PENSON,
Alidoro, Mr G. STANSBURY, Dandini, Mr MORLEY.
Pedro, Mr MEADOWS, (who has undertaken the character at a short notice, on account of Mr KEELEY's indisposition.)

After which the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called
HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.
[By Mr FARLEY.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by
Mr BAKER and Mr F. MATTHEWS.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.
THE ORDER OF SCENERY.
Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.
On Monday, Fazio; and the Pantomime.

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely new Drama, entitled
NANCY OF PORTSMOUTH.
Nancy Bloomfield, Miss SOMERVILLE, The Widow Crabjuice, Mad. SIMON,
Constantia, Miss Jordan, Kitty Bustle, Miss Vincent, in which she will sing
a Parody on "Cherry Ripe," Old Margery, Mrs Rogers,
Becky Sims, Miss Rummens. Sir Edward Gayton, Mr Gough,
Frederick Gayton, Mr Edwin, Captain Splashaway, Mr Hicks,
Joe Barton, Mr C. Hill, Fiery Ned, Mr D. Pitt, Tim Tipple, Mr VALE,
Bounce, Mr Rogers, Capt. Friendly, Mr Lee, Tapwell, Mr Hobbs,
Jemmy Gonimble, Madlle. Rosier, Long Bill, Mr Almar, Short Bill, Mr Webb.

After which will be produced (3rd time) a new Drama, (in Two Acts) entitled
THE TWO PUPILS; OR, THE PEDAGOGUE PUZZLED.
Miss Morley, Miss CHICHESTER, (her 3rd appearance) Fanny, Miss VINCENT.
Lord Henry Delmont, Mr C. HILL, Sir Thomas Morley, Mr D. PITT.
Doctor Dirliewhacket, Mr WILLIAMS, Samuel Sliver, Mr VALE,
Sir Thomas' Servant, Mr Webb, Servant of the House, Mr Lee.

To conclude with (By Particular Desire) an Opera, entitled,
THE DEVIL'S BRIDGE.
[By Mr HAPDE.]
Claudine, Mrs VALE. Lauretta, Miss VINCENT.
Countess Rosalvina, Miss SOMERVILLE, in which Character she will sing, "Vain are Music's Soothing Sounds;" "There's a Grief;" and the Duet, "My Early Day, What Joy was Thine," with Mr EDWIN.
Count Belino, EDWIN, in which he will sing "Behold, in his Soft Expressive Face;" "Tho' Love is Warm Awhile;" "Is there a Heart that Never Lov'd;" and the Picture Song, "'Tis but Fancy Sketch."
Baron Teraldi, Mr DIBDIN PITT.
Florian, Mr Young. Fabricio, Mr Gough. Marcelli, (1st time) Mr C. Hill.
Pietro, Mr VALE.
Antonio, Mr Hobbs. Paolo, Mr Asbury. Julio, Miss Clarke.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called
THE WRECK ASHORE.
Act I.—WINTER.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mr DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.
[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—SUMMER.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS

To which will be added, a New Comic Burletta, called
WAS I TO BLAME?
Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

After which, the Comic Burletta, called
A DEAD SHOT.
Louisa Lovetrick, Mrs FITZWILLIAM, in which character she will introduce her celebrated Description of "A Sunday Concert."
Chatter, Miss DALY.
Captain Cannon, Mr BAYNE, Mr Hector Timid, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Mr Wiseman, Mr S. SMITH, Charles, Mr V. WEBSTER.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called
GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.
[By Mr BUCKSTONE].
The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.
Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, a New Serio Comic Burletta, called
FRA DIAVOLO.
The Overture and Music, by Auber. Arranged by Zerbini.
Zerlina, Madame VESTRIS, Mis Popkins, Mrs GLOVER,
Bianca, Miss Kabrey, Nina, Miss Greener, Lucia, Miss Slater.
Alderman Popkins, Mr W. VINING, Lorenzo, Mr Hodges,
Carlo, Mr Worrell, Pietro, Mr Newcomb, Timothy Quail, Mr Cooper,
Fra Diavolo, Mr Fredericks, Gasparoni, Mr Paget,
Christofano, Mr Brougham, Rocco, Mr Beckwith, Tebaldo, Mr Cooke,
Beppo, Mr Coates, Bruno, Mr Browne.
In Act III. A Pas Seul, by Miss Josephine.

To be followed by a Comic Burletta, called
THE LITTLE JOCKEY.
Arinette, Miss FOOTE, in which she will sing, "The Boy in yellow wins the day,"
Clotilda, Miss Nursey, Mau e, Miss Kibrey.
The Baron D'Acourt, Mr W. VINING,
De Limburg, Mr Paget, Floriville, by a Gentleman, Jocose, Mr Collier,
Denis, Mr W. Young, Pierre, Mr Brown.

To conclude with, a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled
OLYMPIC REVELS.
[By Mr PLANCHE.]
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe,

COBURG THEATRE. — The Gambler's Life—Jonathan Dobson—Harlequin Silver Penny.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—A Deed of Blood.—Home for the Holidays — Harlequin and Mother Goose.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad s Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 116.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, JANUARY 17, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Sunday Library; or, The Protestants' Manual for the Sabbath Day: being a Selection of Sermons, from Eminent Divines of the Church of England, chiefly within the last half century; with occasional Biographical Sketches and Notes. By the Rev. J. F. Dibdin, D.D., Rector of St Mary's, Bryanstone Square, and Vicar of Exning, Suffolk. 12mo. Vol. i. pp. 369. Longman.

This is the commencement of another "Library" series, the object of which, to use the language of the reverend Editor, is to be "made instrumental to the propagation of moral and religious truths" in a form at once "pleasing and cheap."

The pleasing form must be acknowledged on all hands. The book is got up in the usual elegant style of the publishers: there is a frontispiece, consisting of a good portrait, after Owen, of the Archbishop of Canterbury: Dr Dibdin has indulged himself and his brother book-worms (of which we claim to be one), with a vignette of the south front of Lambeth Palace, at the head of the dedication to his Grace: and at the back of the title-page is another vignette of the Bible and Crown, with the motto, "Honour all men, love the brotherhood; fear God; honour the king." There is no symbol, by the way, for love of the brotherhood, nor the honour that is to be paid to all men; which we think a pity. The Bible stands for the fear of God, and the Crown for the honour to be paid the king. But how is it on these occasions that we have nothing to symbolize the love of the brotherhood, and the consideration that is to be had for his Majesty's subjects?

The cheapness of the publication will perhaps be disputed. Not that it is dearer than others of the like size and embellishment. It is at least equal in those respects to the very best of them, but the matter will be looked upon with very different eyes by different people: and for many who will doubtless be willing to give their five shillings to read the book, there unquestionably exist vast numbers, in these days, who would give as much to eschew the privilege. The Doctor may think that these are the persons who are in especial need of the book, and who would be grateful for its contents, if once acquainted with them: but the general run of intellect is further gone, we fear, than he supposes. It demands a little more reasoning and consistency than it nsed. There are many who have the most exalted opinion of Christianity, who will not think it preached up to in these volumes, or even understood. There are many, impressed with the most beneficent ideas of a Supreme Being, who will think them grossly contradicted. What appears to Dr Dibdin to be the fairest statements, will be taken by them for the reverse; its most satisfied conclusions will appear to them gratuitous assumptions; its claims to consistency full of the most extraordinary contradictions. We confess we were surprised to see how poor a thing the reputation of some clerical writers can turn out to be. How little there is, for instance, in the sermon here extracted from the writings of Bishop Porteus, to satisfy a mind of common enquiry,—or in Bishop Horne,—or the celebrated Horsley, who in temper however, if not in argument, was too much of what the Apostle says, no Bishop ought to be, a "striker." Bishop Blomfield is altogether a poor hand, as the public had lately occasion to witness in his half-witted pamphlet about the Sabbath. The official habit spoils all. Authority can never reason properly, otherwise it brings its own claims into doubt. The preacher on pay has his pay to take care of as well as his argument. What would have become of the world, or of the imperfect Christianity to which we have yet attained, if nobody had ever talked to us but constituted authorities. Assumption is their motto: admission is no longer that of the world. Dr Dibdin thinks that his publication may be especially useful at the present time, as a counteraction to the universal growth of infidelity, and anti-clericism. But if he ventures to go with his book into any quarters where they prevail, the propriety of his very first step will be disputed: there is an assumption in his very title-page. He describes himself as Rector of St Mary's, Bryanston, and Vicar of Exning, in Suffolk; and he will be asked how he, in such times as these, when bread is wanted for the stomachs ofthe poor, as well as a stone to be received by the heads of infidels, can officiate properly in those two places at once, and reconcile the good nature he seems to possess to the Bryanstone hot rolls, or Suffolk dumplings, of which he deprives some other clergyman. Having answered this, they will proceed to his next assumption, and so on through all the conclusions of his friends the bishops and pluralists: and we fear he would have hard work of it.

As we have a regard for anybody who likes anything besides himself, we like Dr Dibdin for his Bibliomania, for his love of tall copies and enchanting vellums, and the cordialities he interchanged with the monks abroad over their old wine. Furthermore, he is one of those who are apt to "commit" themselves (as the phrase is), out of a certain natural candour and social confidence; and his present publication is not without evidences of a simplicity of this sort, though, for ought we know, he may be unable to recognize them when laid before him. The sly reader, accustomed to dramatic plots and equivoque, will see differently. The best of it is that the sermons of some of his divines afford evidences of the like Christian quality; which, to say the truth, is the most interesting thing we have found in the book, and shows how much of their childhood men may retain under all circumstances, even when the best of their doctrines have become identified with sophistication. Some of these we shall lay before the reader, and though a different mode of obtaining a Christian object is contemplated by the Editor, we believe that the perusal of them will terminate in no injury to any party. A good-humoured smile is not the worst sort of expression with which to read the sentiments of a church dignitary.

'The first thing discernible in these sayings,' observes Dr Dibdin, speaking of Christ's Sermon on the Mount, 'is their originality and boldness; and the marvellous effect which the delivery of them, from so high an authority, must have necessarily produced upon minds stubbornly attached to, and deeply prejudiced by, Judaical rites and ceremonies, and principles of moral government. Nothing equivocal or compromising belongs to our Saviour's doctrines. In an address, remarkable for the pregnant brevity of its style, the plain bold truth is fearlessly told, and the hearers are left to reflect or not upon its force. It was impossible for them to hear and not to reflect.

'A second thing discernible in these "sayings" is, the frequently utter contrariety of the doctrines contained in them to those in which the hearers had been brought up, and of which they are reminded at the very commencement of their announcement. Our blessed Saviour sometimes begins, "Ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time," that it was thus and thus—"but I say unto you—" and then he proceeds to tell them that they must reject what they had before heard, and attend exclusively to what they were about to hear, if it was their desire to benefit by his instruction: so that the firmness and fearlessness of the great teacher of Israel are equally discernible.'—Introductory Remarks, p. 2.

Bishop Bloomfield says, at p. 66, that—

'Religion is the proper business of our whole lives. We are placed in this world for the express purpose of being religious; and every part of our existence, which is not employed in the business, either of preparation, or of actual religion, is so much time lost.'

We can only say in answer to this, that if the Bishop's portraits are like him, religion makes a man very plump and comfortable, and gives him a promising double-chin. We should have thought, if it had not been for the bishop's remark, that he lost a little time in taking his dinner; but we find that it is not so, or that at all events the right reverend prelate contrives to unite religion with lobster-sauce, in a manner that leaves pleasing evidences of its possibility on his aspect.

'"Let no one," exhorts Bishop Porteus, "indulge the vain imagination that a just, and generous, and compassionate conduct towards his fellow-creatures constitutes the whole of his duty, and will compensate for the want of every other Christian virtue." '

Digitized by Google

Here we are given to understand that a man may want many Christian virtues, and yet be just, generous, and compassionate. How that can be we cannot conceive, nor what the many other virtues are, that are not included in these.

'"This," however, according to the Bishop, "is a most fatal delusion; and yet in the present times a very common one. Benevolence," he proceeds to inform us, "is the favourite, the fashionable virtue of the age: it is universally cried up by infidels and libertines as the first and only duty of man; and even many who pretend to the name of Christians, are too apt to rest upon it as the most essential part of their religion, and the chief basis of their title to the rewards of the Gospel. But that Gospel, as we have just seen, prescribes to us several other duties, which require from us the same attention as those we owe to our neighbour; and if we fail in any of them, we can have no hope of sharing in the benefits procured for us by the sacrifice of our Redeemer. What then God and nature, as well as Christ and his apostles, have joined together, let no man dare to put asunder. Let no one flatter himself with obtaining the rewards, or even escaping the punishments, of the Gospel, by performing only one branch of his duty; nor let him ever suppose, that under the shelter of benevolence he can either, on the one hand, evade the first and great command, the love of his Maker; or on the other hand, that he can securely indulge his favourite passions, can compound as it were with God for his sensuality, by acts of generosity, and purchase by his wealth a general license to sin. This may be very good Pagan morality, may be very good modern philosophy, but it is not Christian godliness."'

But Christianity is surely getting on, when infidels and even libertines come to make a virtue of benevolence. The Bishop seems to envy the fashionable world their new virtue; to be angry that publicans and sinners can take the Divine Teacher at his word, and threaten to do without the minor teachers. To be just, generous, and compassionate, he says, may be very good modern philosophy. Modern philosophy will surely thank him for the compliment, and take itself, as he suspects, for something very like Christian godliness: for how a general license to sin can be compatible with justice, generosity, and compassion, is a mystery which it requires a theologian to understand. What are the many other Christian virtues, that are compatible with the absence of justice, generosity, and compassion? Can a man then be just without paying his duty towards heaven after the Bishop's fashion? Can he be generous, and yet think ill of Pluralities? Can he be compassionate, and yet propose to apply the superfluities of the church to the benefit of the poor? For our parts, we hold with the great author of Christianity, and not with the bishop; and think a man may.

But what are we to think of the extraordinary announcements and accusations in the following passage from a sermon by Mr Benson?

'There has sprung up, in these degenerate days, a most pernicious class of infidels, who, without deigning, if indeed they were able, to enter into any serious reasoning upon the subject of religion, have been bad and bold enough to adopt all the conclusions of their predecessors as undeniably true. They scorn any longer to argue the case as doubtful; and assuming it as an admitted fact that revelation is incapable of any rational defence, they pour forth the torrent of their abuse in language whose impiety and indecency I dare not repeat. It would be a shame even to speak those things, which these men glory in proclaiming openly to the world; which they utter in the streets, and courts of justice; and by which they have insulted the judges of the land, and would pollute the purity of the female breast. To talk of the "impure morals of the Bible Deity," and to pronounce the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, a God of "cruelty, injustice, deceit, fraud, and the worst of human vices,"—such is a specimen of the impieties which they have dared to familiarise to the ears of a Christian people. * * * *. I speak not unadvisedly on this subject. They have been painful hours which I have given to the examination of such writings; but I have given my hours to the task, because it was my duty to do so: and (thank God and his protecting grace) the issue has been, a conviction of nothing but the desperation of those minds, the corruption of those tastes, and the pitiable ungodliness of those hearts, which could dare to be so light and lustful in a matter of such unspeakable solemnity. Be it true, or be it false, revelation is always serious itself, and has consequently a right to demand seriousness from others: and it is a mark either of an unsound head, or an insincere heart, to meet it in the spirit of railing and of ribaldry. Not only, however, do these enemies of the truth revile and speak all manner of evil falsely against the Gospel, but one of their basest and principal efforts is, to pour their calumnies into minds too weak to resist or refute them, and to clothe them in such a fascinating garb, as may captivate the imagination and disturb the impartiality of the reasoning powers. It is to the daughters of our Israel that some specially recommend their impiety and impurity. It is in a form and language which may be level to the means and capacities of the less educated part of the community, that others utter forth their notes of defiance against the God of Israel and his saints: and it is with the charms of poetic numbers, and in all the glowing colours of poetic imagery, that one master-spirit has sought to insinuate the poison of doubt and distrust with regard to the mercy and the holiness of David's Lord.'

We wish Dr Dibdin would make a selection of all the curious stories he could find in the course of his old reading, that have never yet been familiarised to the world. It would make a capital volume. And this reminds us by the way, that the public are in want of a Library of Fiction. Why do not Messrs Longman set their friend Mr Dunlop to work upon it? or apply to Sir Walter Scott? It would make a delightful series, illustrated by his pen.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"A Swan-like End."—Luccock, in his notes on Rio Janeiro, says, "A purple bird, called a Sabiar, was shot near St Gonsales, and, though badly wounded, immediately set up a full and melodious song, which continued until its latest moments."—Could this bird have been the Swan of the ancients, whose dying song is so often alluded to?

Carlo Dolce.—Carlo Dolce made a solemn vow never to paint any but sacred subjects. His Madonnas, however, were all portraits of Maria Madelina Baldinucci. He was the victim of a pertinacious melancholy, which at times made it impossible to obtain a word from him: all his answers were sighs. On the day of his wedding, when the company were met for the ceremony, he was nowhere to be found. At last he was discovered in the church of the Annunziata, prostrate on the steps of the great altar, before a crucifix.—Lady Morgan's Salvator Rosa.

Salvator Rosa.—A Roman Noble endeavouring one day to drive a hard bargain with him, he coolly interrupted him, to say that, till the picture was finished, he himself did not know its value; observing, "I never bargain, Sir, with my pencil, for it knows not the value of its own labour before the work is finished. When the picture is done, I will let you know what it costs, and you may then take it or not, as you please."—Lady Morgan's Life of Salvator Rosa.

English Notion of Kings.—An Englishman came to Lord Mareschal one day, without any letter of recommendation, to ask him to present him to the King of Prussia. His Lordship told him that it was not such an easy matter, and that many great Noblemen had been refused. "Faith!" said the Englishman, "it is not that I care much about it; but as I have already seen five kings, I should have been glad to make up the half-dozen."—Memoirs of a Traveller now in Retirement.

Antipathies.—Erasmus, though a native of Rotterdam, had such an aversion to fish, that the smell of it gave him a fever.—Ambrose Paré mentions a gentleman who never could see an eel without fainting.—Joseph Scaliger and Peter Abono never could drink milk.—Cardan was particularly disgusted at the sight of eggs.—Uladislaus, King of Poland, could not bear to see apples.—Henry III. of France, could never sit in a room with a cat.

Character of Hobbes.—He was frank, civil, and communicative of what he knew,—a good friend, a good relation, charitable to the poor, a great observer of equity, and had no desire of gathering wealth. "This last quality," says Bayle, "is a favourable prejudice for the goodness of his life." For a man who had lived so long (till 91) his reading was inconsiderable. He said himself, that if he had bestowed as much time on reading as other men of letters, he should have been as ignorant as they!

Maternal Love.—A Venetian lady having lost her only son, became a prey to excessive grief. Her confessor attempted to console her: he told her to think of Abraham, whom the Almighty commanded to sacrifice his son, which he obeyed without a murmur. "Ah, my father! (she replied) God would never have commanded such a sacrifice to a mother."

Voltaire's Character of Cromwell.—Cromwell is described as a man who was an impostor all his life. I can scarcely believe it. I conceive that he was at first an enthusiast, and that he afterwards made his fanaticism instrumental to his greatness. An ardent novice at twenty often becomes an accomplished rogue at forty. In the great game of human life, men begin with being dupes, and end in becoming knaves. A statesman engages as his almoner a monk, entirely made up of the details of his convent—devout, credulous, awkward, perfectly new to the world: he acquires information, polish, finesse, and supplants his master.—Philosophical Dictionary.

Valuation of Actors.—It has been usual to raise a very unjust clamour against the enormous salaries of public singers, actors, and so on. This matter seems reducible to a moral equation. They are paid out of money raised by voluntary contributions, in the strictest sense; and if they did not bring certain sums into the treasury, the managers would not engage them. These sums are exactly in proportion to the number of individuals to whom their performance gives an extraordinary degree of pleasure. The talents of a singer, actor, &c. are therefore worth just as much as they will fetch.—Hazlitt's Table-Talk.

Digitized by Google

A PROLOGUE OF ALL WORK.

Age,	Bard,
Stage,	Reward:
Mind,	Hiss,
Mankind;	Miss,
Face,	Dare,
Trace,	British Fair.
Sigh,
Tragedy:	Applause,
Scene,	Virtue's cause;
Spleen;	Trust,
Pit,	Just;
Wit,	Fear,
Fashion,	Hear:
British Nation.	Stands,
	Hands,
Young,	True,
Tongue,	You.

Here we have some respectable observations on the advantages of the drama in every age; on the wideness of its survey; the different natures of tragedy and comedy; the vicissitudes of fashion; and the permanent greatness of the British empire. Then the young bard, new to the dramatic art, is introduced. He disclaims any hope of reward for merit of his own, except that which is founded on a proper sense of; the delicacy and beauty of his fair auditors, and his zeal in the cause of virtue. To this, at all events, he is sure his critics will be just; and though he cannot help feeling a certain timidity, standing where he does, yet upon the whole, as becomes an Englishman, he is perfectly willing to abide by the decision of his countrymen's hands, hoping that he shall be found —— to sense, if not to genius, true,

And trusts his cause to Virtue, and—to You.—(Liberal.)

PARADISE.—The Mahometans are accused of making their Heaven a sensual one; but some Christians have done the same thing. Gabriel Henas published a folio on the subject, in which he so particularly describes the Blessedness of Paradise as to say, "there will be music in heaven with material instruments, as on earth." Yet his account falls short of that of his brother Jesuit, Lewis Henricus, who affirms "that there will be a sovereign pleasure in kissing and embracing the bodies of the Blessed; that they shall bathe in the sight of one another, for which there shall be most delicious baths; that they shall swim in them like fishes; and sing as harmoniously as larks and nightingales. That the Angels shall be dressed like women, and shall appear to the Saints in the habits of ladies, their hair curled, their petticoats fardingaled, and in the richest linen. That men and women shall divert themselves with masquerades, feasts, and balls. That the women shall sing more agreeably than the men, to make the pleasure greater; that they shall rise again with longer hair, and shall be decked with ribbons and ruffles, as they are in this world. That married people shall kiss one another, as in this life, and their pretty sweet children, which will be no small pleasure."

LULLY THE COMPOSER.—The fate of Lully is altogether a singular one. Mademoiselle de Montpensier, niece to Louis XIV. begged the Chevalier Guise then on his travels to find some pretty little Italian boy as a page for her. At Florence he met with Lully, whose wit, vivacity, and musical talent determined the chevalier to engage him. On his arrival he was presented to the lady, but his figure obtained for him so cool a reception, that she ordered his name to be entered on her household books, as under scullion. In his moments of leisure, however, from the kitchen, he used to scrape upon an old wretched violin. The princess hearing he had a fine taste, procured him a master, and in the course of a few months he became so great a proficient, that he was elevated to the rank of court musician. In the year 1636, Lully was required to compose a Te Deum on the recovery of the king, from a dangerous illness. He composed a most excellent one. Nothing was neglected in its composition nor in preparation for its execution. In the ardour of his zeal he beat time himself; but melancholy were the consequences. In the heat of action he struck his foot; and bad management of this small wound rendered amputation necessary. All efforts to cure him were vain; he died, and was interred in the church of the Augustines at Paris, where an elegant monument was erected to his memory. A singular conversation passed betwixt Lully and his confessor, in the last illness, which shows the natural archness of his disposition and the foolish bigotry of the priest. He had been for many years a composer for the opera, the priest required him, as a proof of his sincere repentance, to commit his last work to the flames. Lully acquiesced, and pointing to a drawer in which the rough draft of Achilles and Prelixenes was deposited, it was burnt, and the confessor retired satisfied. Lully grew better, and when one of the young princes reproached him for having destroyed such good music. "Hush, hush, my lord, (answered Lully in a whisper,) I have another copy of it."—Unhappily, this ill-timed pleasantry was followed by a relapse; the gangrene increased, and the prospect of death threw him into such pangs of remorse, that he submitted to be laid on a heap of ashes, with a cord round his neck. In this situation he expressed a deep sense of his fault. and soon after expired.—Musical Biography.

'Tis better to spend our time in reading a good book twice, than a bad one once.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.
DRURY LANE.—Rob Roy Macgregor—and the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Cinderella—and the Pantomime.

COVENT GARDEN.

THE performance of Cinderella, together with that of the Christmas Pantomime, is like cake upon cake. The young visitors of the theatre have a double holiday portion of entertainment; for there is transformation and spectacle in the opera, as well as in the pantomime; and it tells a favourite fairy-tale. Their is this advantage besides,—that the little part of the audience understand the subject as well as the big; and to crown the satisfaction, the big seem to relish it quite as much as the little. We look upon this as an evidence of the good sense as well as poetical turn of the day. It is man enough not to despise the pleasures of the child: it can ride the hobby-horse, like Agesilaus: it has been reading poetry and novels for the last twenty years, and can reconcile marvel with matter of fact. One sight of a tragedy, unless it be of the first order, is more than enough. There are many we should no more think of seeing a second time, than of going to sit with our legs in a ditch, if it were not that we have to criticise new performers. They give you distress without recompense. The pain wants dignity: the effect is merely uncomfortable; it does not, and ought not to give you any pleasure, unless you want common feeling, and require to be roused by vulgar stimulants. The authors are neither children nor men: they have not come to poet's-estate, nor ever will: they are destined to be ever sophisticate, affected, and undergrown. Give us childhood in preference to this, or else the wisdom that comes round to childhood, and has found its visions true. But we are getting serious, when we intended to be merry. In a word then, this fairy-tale opera is a thing to make one happy; and we find ourselves instinctively go to it as often as we can. All's Well that Ends Well, says the great and good-natured poet; and all ends well in Cinderella, notwithstanding the badness of the sisters and father. In fact, they are bad only to make the heroine more happy. She is in the ashes, only to shine out the brighter. And as she surmounts them at last, and becomes the best off, it would be hard if they were so unhappy meanwhile as their badness might otherwise make them. We see they are not. They have finery to their heart's content. And the father loves finery too, and is fantastic. Virtue must not have everything; nor vice want every comfort, till we can all of us be wiser. The sun "shines on the just and unjust." Miss Thisbe and Miss Clorinda, must have the solace of a pair of flaunting dresses, while Miss Cinderella in her dark corner enjoys the sweetness of her patience. We pity her heartily nevertheless, and wish her to triumph: that is best for the eventual success of everybody, because it is the triumph of humanity.

Miss INVERARITY received her usual applause on Saturday night, and her enthusiastic encore in the finale. Mr KEELEY, we were sorry to find, was ill, and his place in the servant supplied by Mr MEADOWS, who is quaint and clever, but is not so made up of natural comedy as the other. Mr MEADOWS is in too great a hurry, from want of conscious power; and though it was natural in him to try and vary the performance of the character from that of Mr KEELEY, he did not vary it to advantage, especially in substituting commonplace epithets of the formidable, when addressing the prince, for the "Most Magnificent, Extravagant, and Dreadful" address of the other, which are words that hang well together, and have a meaning.

We were again delighted with the dance of the nymphs by torch-light, before the chariot of Cinderella, and the torch-bearing genii in the air. There is something so charming in it, that the audience never fail to applaud. Could it not be made a little longer? a little more lasting? Might it not go as far into the depth of the stage as possible, and so come round with its circuit afterwards, instead of approaching the stage lamps at once, and turning off so soon?—It is very beautiful.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, the Tragic Play of PIZARRO.
[By Mr SHERIDAN.]
Cora, Miss PHILLIPS, Elvira, Mrs PAUCIT.
Ataliba, Mr Younge, Rolla, Mr WALLACK, Orozembo, Mr J. VINING,
Blind Man, Mr Hammerton. Topac, Miss Chikini.
Pizarro, Mr H. Wallack, Alonzo, Mr COOPER,
Las Casas, Mr Thompson, Sentinel, Mr Salter.
In Act II.—The Temple of the Sun.—High Priest, Mr Horn.
Priests, Virgins, Matrons, &c.—Misses Byfeld, S. Phillips, Russell, Bruce, Crawford, Mrs Bedford, Mrs Newcombe.—Messrs Bedford, Bland, and Yarnold.
In the course of the Evening, P. De Winter's Overture to "Tamerlan," and Mehul's Overture to "La Chasse du Jeune Henri."
Concluding with the National Air, "Vive Henri Quatre."
After which, a new Historical Anecdote, (in One Act) entitled
A KING'S FIRESIDE.
[By Mr MORTON.]
Nannette, Miss MORDAUNT.
Henri Quatre, Mr FARREN. Louis, Mrs WAYLETT. Gaston, Miss POOLE.
Henrietta of France, Miss M. A. MARSHALL.
Admiral Lord Effingham, Mr Thompson. D'Aubigny, Mr Cooke.
To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called
DAVY JONES.
[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.
Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Billboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.
DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.
The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.
Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, School for Scandal; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, the Tragedy of
FAZIO.
[By Mr MILMAN.]
Marchesa Aldabella, Mrs CHATTERLEY, Clara, Miss PHILLIPS,
Bianca, (3rd time) Miss F. KEMBLE. Giraldi Fazio, Mr WARDE,
Duke of Florence, Mr EGERTON, Bartolo, Mr BLANCHARD,
Philario, Mr Henry, Falsetto, Mr Parry, Gonsalvo, Mr Baker,
Theodore, Mr Mears, Keeper, Mr Fuller, Pietro, Mr Turnour,
Gentleman, Mr Irwin, Antonio, Mr Heath, Aurio, Mr Crumpton.
Previous to the Tragedy will be performed (for the 3rd time in this country) a Grand MS. Overture, by Friedrich Kuhlau.
To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called
HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.
[By Mr FARLEY.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by
Mr BAKER and Mr F. MATTHEWS.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.
THE ORDER OF SCENERY.
Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, Cinderella; and the Pantomime.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

The following Performers will appear for the First Time in London:—
Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY, du Theâtre du Gymnase.
Madame ALBERT, du Theâtre des Nouveautés.
M. LEPEINTRE, Aine, du Theâtre du Vaudeville.
This Evening,
On commencera à Sept Heures et demie, par
LEONIDE; OU, LA VIEILLE DE SURESNE.
Vaudeville en Trois Actes, de MM. St. HILAIRE, VILLENEUVE et DEPEUTY.
Madame de St. Elme, Mlle. Eliza. Mathilde, sa Fille, Mlle. Corra.
Madame Hebert, Madame Baudin, Léonide, sa Fille adoptive, Mlle. HERMINIE.
Louison, petite Paysanne, au service de Madame Hebert, Mlle. St. Ange.
Grudner, M. ST. AUBERT. Rodolphe, M. Alfred.
Robertin, Frère de Grudner, M. Préval. Charles, son Fils, M. PAULIN.
Suivi de la Première Représentation de
LA SECONDE ANNEE; OU, A QUI LA FAUTE?
Vaudeville en Un Acte, de M. SCRIBE.
Caroline, Femme de Denneville, Mlle. FLORVAL.
M. DERVAL remplira le Rôle de Denneville.
Edmond, Comte de St. Elme, Ami de Denneville, M. PAULIN.
Gervault, Caissier, M. Gamard.
On Finira par
LE BAL CHAMPETRE.
Vaudeville, en Un Acte, de MM. SCRIBE et DUPIN.
(Cette Piece a été demandée.)
Madame Durfort, Mlle. Corra. Josephine, Mlle. St. Ange.
Angelina, Mlle. FLORVAL. Amanda, Madame Gamard. Toinette, Mlle. Eliza.
Annette, jeune Paysanne, Mlle. Emma.
M. Pastourelle, M. Guenée. M. Bellejambe, M. Laporte.
Poussif, Conducteur de Diligence, M. Préval. M. Durfort, Banquier, M. Cloup.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called
THE WRECK ASHORE.
Act I.—WINTER.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mr DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.
[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]
Act. II.—SUMMER.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.
To which will be added, a New Comic Burletta, called
WAS I TO BLAME?
Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.
After which, the Burlesque Burletta, called
BILLY TAYLOR.
Mary Wagstaff, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Kitty Sligo, Miss M. GLOVER.
Billy Taylor, Mr J. REEVE.
Carolus, Mr O. Smith. Captain Flatbottom, Mr S. SMITH.
Old Nicholas, Mr Chapman. Ben Blockhead, Mr Sanders.
To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called
GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.
[By Mr BUCKSTONE].
The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.
Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely New Historical Burletta, called
MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS.
Mary Stuart, (Queen of Scots) Miss FOOTE.
Lady Douglas, Mrs Knight. Catherine Seyton, Miss Pincott.
Lady Fleming, Miss King. Mattie, Miss Kabrey. Moggy, Miss Langley.
Lord George Douglas, Mr Fredericks. Lord Lindsay, Mr Trougham.
Sir Robert Melville, Mr Worrell. Lord Ruthven, Mr Beckwith.
Roland, Mr Raymond. Drysdale, Mr Newcombe. Sandy, Mr J. Knight.
After which, a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled
OLYMPIC REVELS.
[By Mr PLANCHE.]
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Manufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young.
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
To be succeded by a Comic Burletta, to be called
STEINBERG CASTLE.
Flora, Miss FOOTE.
Dorival, Mr Fredericks, Governor Steinberg, Mr Newcombe.
O'Shaughnessy, Mr Brougham.
The whole to conclude with a Comic Burletta, called
CLARISSA HARLOWE.
Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER. Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond. Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget. Capt. Cape, Mr W. VINING.

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely new Melodrame, entitled
ZAMOR, THE MEXICAN.
The Music, by Mr Blewitt.
Ora, Miss SOMERVILLE. Joan, Miss VINCENT.
Dame Mabil, Madame SIMON. Robert, Baron Fitzallan, Mr GOUGH.
Henry Fitzallan, Nicol Colbrande, Blid, and Broadland, Mr H. KEMBLE.
Zamor, Mr OSBALDISTON. Edmund Erpingham, Mr C. HILL.
Martin Walbourn, Mr DIBDIN PITT. Peter Poundtext, Mr Webb.
Abel Lackbrain, Mr Asbury. Walter Altringham, Mr VALE.
Ralph Perkyn, Mr Rogers. Monk, Mr Young.
Raymond and Hubert, Messrs. Hobbs and Tully.
After which will be produced (4th time) a new Drama, (in Two Acts) entitled
THE TWO PUPILS; OR, THE PEDAGOGUE PUZZLED.
Miss Morley, Miss CHICHESTER, (her 4th appearance) Fanny, Miss VINCENT.
Lord Henry Delmont, Mr C. HILL, Sir Thomas Morley, Mr D. PITT.
Doctor Dirliewhacket, Mr WILLIAMS, Samuel Sliver, Mr VALE,
Sir Thomas' Servant, Mr Webb, Servant of the House, Mr Lee.
To conclude with, a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,
THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.
[By Mr W. BARRYMORE].
The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.
Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

COBURG THEATRE. — Wat Tyler and Jack Straw—Harlequin Silver Penny.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—A Deed of Blood.—Harlequin and Mother Goose.—Golden Pippin.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL.—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

№ 117.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 18, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy. By John Frederic William Herschel, Esq. A.M. Late Fellow of St John's College, Cambridge, &c. (Fourteenth Volume of the Cabinet Cyclopædia). 12mo. pp. 372. Longman.

WHEN Goldsmith was about to write his History of Animated Nature, Johnson said to him, "There is Goldsmith going to write a natural history, and he will make it as entertaining as a Persian tale." He added, we believe, that this would be done in spite of his friend's knowing nothing of the subject. But no man can be said to be entirely ignorant of a subject, who approaches it in a spirit of universality. At least he has a just sense of one of its highest points of view, is prepared to enquire into it in the right spirit, and to report what he can learn, to the best advantage. But we noticed the remark for the purpose of observing, that there is more sympathy between the wonders of science and of a Persian tale than the Doctor supposed. There is a fact which it delights us to impress upon the public,—namely, the total failure of the prophecy which announced that the advancement of science would put an end to the love of fiction; whereas no circumstance has stared the present generation more in the face, than the increase of both together. Sir Humphrey Davy and Sir Walter Scott have flourished at the same period. More than half of the literature of the age has been made up of fiction, and the French have become more imaginative, at the same time that the sciences have been at their height in both countries. Utilitarianism has kept pace with delight. And the wonder would be if it were not so; for the more the general mind is expanded, the more subjects it embraces, and the more it is prepared to do justice to them all. The mistake has arisen from taking short-sighted views of science and of fiction, and from observing the exclusive devotion which some of their disciples pay to the object of their pursuit. But this occasional absorption of the individual, and still less the exclusiveness of his lesser disciples, says nothing against the readiness with which the general mind receives all sorts of wonders, or the final argument which the philosopher has for the reconcilement of them. The great father of experimental philosophy has left us a lofty panegyric on poetry; and if Sir Isaac Newton undervalued poetry, let it be said, without arrogance, that he so far injured his own universality as a philosopher, and threw a doubt on the expansiveness of mind with which he wandered among his stars. The less poetry he united with his science, the less justice he did to the dignity and delightfulness of what he beheld; the more subjected himself to the suspicion of diminishing the heavens into the measure of his books and diagrams,—of looking at the universe as a mathematician, and not at mathematics as a universalist. Things are proved only by their effects; and he who does not know that any single marvel opens an unlimited field to all others, that the dullest common-places are made up of marvels, and that the delight we derive from a beautiful fiction does not prove itself as real by the emotion it gives us, as the effect of the most substantial phenomenon, is ignorant of half of the nature of man, and disputes the reasonableness and the spirituality of the delight which he receives from anything.

We have been led into these remarks by the very surprising and delightful passages which we have met with in our first glances into the work before us, and by the hearty reverence we bear towards all the quarters of knowledge, though we are conversant with but one speck in a corner of them. From that speck, however, we may cast our eyes into the universe, and at least know how much there is that we do not know: and this process of the understanding appears so easy and so unavoidable, that we fall into an unphilosophic fit of impatience at beholding those, who possess so much of the knowledge that we can only admire, ignorant of what would seem to be one of the very first things they ought to know better than any one else. We do not mean to include in this objection the author of the work before us. We are not aware of anything that subjects him to the charge; and from some truly philosophical remarks at the beginning of the work, we draw a different conclusion. These we have the greatest pleasure in laying before the reader: for every new hope of mankind is linked with a thousand; every proof of its feasibility, in whatever quarter, is an encouragement to him in all other quarters, and hence one of the greatest delights of science. We do not merely learn to know more; we learn to expect more; to labour with cheerfulness; to look for the like improvements in moral science; to see, in fact, the inevitable connexion of moral and political advancement with every other; and in the lines of the mathematician, and the compounds of chemistry, to recognize sunshine for the world.

'"The character of the true philosopher (says Mr Herschel) is to hope all things not impossible, and to believe all things not unreasonable. He who has seen obscurities which appeared impenetrable in physical and mathematical science suddenly dispelled, and the most barren and unpromising fields of enquiry converted, as if by inspiration, into rich and inexhaustible springs of knowledge and power, on a simple change of one point of view, or by merely bringing to bear on them some principle which it never occurred before to try, will surely be the very last to acquiesce in any dispiriting prospects of either the present or future destinies of mankind; while, on the other hand, the boundless views of intellectual and moral, as well as material relations, which open on him on all hands in the course of these pursuits, the knowledge of the trivial place he occupies in the scale of creation, and the sense continually pressed upon him of his own weakness and incapacity to suspend or modify the slightest movement of the vast machinery he sees in action around him, must effectually convince him, that humility of pretension, no less than confidence of hope, is what best becomes his character.'"

The following is another excellent reflection, calculated at once to satisfy the grossest as well as the most refined of men; which is a difficult point of attainment:—

'The question "cui bono" to what practical end and advantage do your researches tend? is one which the speculative philosopher, who loves knowledge for its own sake, and enjoys, as a rational being should enjoy, the mere contemplation of harmonious and mutually dependent truths, can seldom hear without a sense of humiliation. He feels that there is a lofty and disinterested pleasure in his speculations which ought to exempt them from such questioning; communicating as they do to his own mind the purest happiness (after the exercise of the benevolent and moral feelings) of which human nature is susceptible, and tending to the injury of no one; and he might surely allege THIS as a sufficient and direct reply to those, who, having themselves little capacity, and less relish for intellectual pursuits, are constantly repeating upon him this enquiry. But if he can bring himself to descend from this high but fair ground, and justify himself, his pursuits, and his pleasures in the eyes of those around him, he has only to point to the history of all science, where speculations apparently the most unprofitable have almost invariably been those from which the greatest practical applications have emanated. What, for instance, could be apparently more unprofitable than the dry speculations of the ancient geometers on the properties of the conic sections, or than the dreams of Kepler (as they would naturally appear to his contemporaries) about the numerical harmonies of the universe? Yet these are the steps by which we have risen to a knowledge of the elliptic motions of the planets and the law of gravitation, with all its splendid theoretical consequences, and its inestimable practical results. The ridicule attached to "Swing-swangs" in Hooke's time * did not prevent him from reviving the proposal of the pendulum as a standard of measure, since so admirably wrought into practice by the genius and perseverance of Captain Kater;—nor did that which Boyle encountered in his researches on the elasticity and pressure of the air, act as any obstacle to the train of discovery which terminated in the steam-engine."

'I'll put a girdle round about the earth
In forty minutes;'

beautifully says the Spirit in the Tempest: but see, in the following passage, what a ray of light can do. The author asks, somewhat

* Hooke's Posthumous Works. Lond. 1705.—p. 472 and p. 458.

Digitized by Google

superfluously we think, "What mere assertion will make any man believe it?" For we do believe as we read in consequence of what is generally known of the wonders of discovery.

'What mere assertion,' says he, 'will make any man believe that in one second of time, in one beat of the pendulum of a clock, a ray of light travels over 192,000 miles, and would therefore perform the tour of the world in about the same time that it requires to wink with our eyelids, and in much less than a swift runner occupies in taking a single stride? What mortal can be made to believe, without demonstration, that the sun is almost a million times larger than the earth? and that, although so remote from us that a cannon ball shot directly towards it, and maintaining its full speed, would be twenty years in reaching it, it yet affects the earth by its attraction in an inappreciable instant of time?—Who would not ask for demonstration, when told that a gnat's wing, in its ordinary flight, beats many hundred times in a second? or that there exist animated and regularly organised beings, many thousands of whose bodies laid close together would not extend an inch? But what are these to the astonishing truths which modern optical enquiries have disclosed, which teach us that every point of a medium through which a ray of light passes is affected with a succession of periodical movements, regularly recurring at equal intervals, no less than 500 millions of millions of times in a single second! that it is by such movements, communicated to the nerves of our eyes, that we see—nay more, that it is the difference in the frequency of their recurrence which affects us with the sense of the diversity of colour; that, for instance, in acquiring the sensation of redness our eyes are affected 482 millions of millions of times; of yellowness 542 million of millions of times; and of violet, 707 millions of millions of times per second. Do not such things sound more like the ravings of madmen, than the sober conclusions of people in their waking senses? They are, nevertheless, conclusions to which any one may most certainly arrive, who will only be at the trouble of examining the chain of reasoning by which they have been obtained.'—P. 23.

The naval officer alluded to in the following passage, is Captain Basil Hall, who has found "the unstable footing of a ship's deck" a much better place to secure his reputation upon, than the unstable footing of shifting politics.

'That a man, by merely measuring the moon's apparent distance from a star with a little portable instrument held in his hand, and applied to his eye, even with so unstable a footing as the deck of a ship, shall say positively, within five miles, where he is, on a boundless ocean, cannot but appear to persons ignorant of astronomy an approach to the miraculous. Yet the alternatives of life and death, wealth and ruin, are daily and hourly staked with perfect confidence on these marvellous computations. We have before us an anecdote communicated to us by a naval officer distinguished for the extent and variety of his attainments, which shows how impressive such results may become in practice. He sailed from San Blas on the west coast of Mexico, and after a voyage of eight thousand miles, occupying eighty-nine days, arrived off Rio de Janeiro, having, in this interval, passed through the Pacific Ocean, rounded Cape Horn, and crossed the South Atlantic, without making any land, or even seeing a single sail, with the exception of an American whaler off Cape Horn. Arrived within a week's sail of Rio, he set seriously about determining, by lunar observations, the precise line of the ship's course, and its situation in it at a determinate moment, and having ascertained this within from five to ten miles, ran the rest of the way by those more ready and compendious methods, known to navigators, which can be safely employed for short trips between one known point and another, but which cannot be trusted in long voyages, where the moon is the only sure guide. The rest of the tale we are enabled by his kindness to state in his own words:—"We steered towards Rio de Janeiro for some days after taking the lunars above described; and having arrived within fifteen or twenty miles of the coast, I hove to at four in the morning till the day should break, and then bore up; for although it was very hazy, we could see before us a couple of miles or so About eight o'clock it became so foggy that I did not like to stand in further, and was just bringing the ship to wind again, before sending the people to breakfast, when it suddenly cleared off, and I had the satisfaction of seeing the great Sugar-loaf Rock, which stands on one side of the harbour's mouth, so nearly right a-head that we had not to alter our course above a point in order to hit the entrance of Rio. This was the first land we had seen for three months, after crossing so many seas, and being set backwards and forwards by innumerable currents and foul winds." The effect on all on board might well be conceived to have been electric; and it is needless to remark, how essentially the authority of a commanding officer over his crew may be strengthened by the occurrence of such incidents, indicative of a degree of knowledge and consequent power beyond their reach.'

We conclude for the present (for we have several more curious passages in store) with the following interesting examples of the mastery to be obtained by man over nature, if he understands her, and the danger he undergoes in attempting to command her operations, where he does not. In the beautiful fictions of the Arabians, the genii come to a man's call and do his wildest bidding, if he is master of the ring which they serve. If he calls them without knowledge, they beat or frighten him to death. One would think that some of these stories had been written by Arabian alchemists. It appears highly probable, that alchemy suggested some of them: though they have a moral, not necessarily connected with any one kind of knowledge.

'If the laws of nature, on the one hand, are invincible opponents, on the other, they are irresistible auxiliaries; and it will not be amiss if we regard them in each of those characters, and consider the great importance of a knowledge of them to mankind,—

I. In showing us how to avoid attempting impossibilities.
II. In securing us from important mistakes in attempting what is, in itself, possible, by means either inadequate, or actually opposed, to the end in view.
III. In enabling us to accomplish our ends in the easiest, shortest, most economical, and most effectual manner.
IV. In inducing us to attempt, and enabling us to accomplish, objects which, but for such knowledge, we should never have thought of undertaking.

We shall therefore proceed to illustrate by examples the effect of physical knowledge under each of those heads:

'Ex. 1. It is not many years since an attempt was made to establish a colliery at Bexhill, in Sussex. The appearance of thin seams and sheets of fossil-wood and wood-coal, with some other indications similar to what occur in the neighbourhood of the great coal-beds in the north of England, having led to the sinking of a shaft, and the erection of machinery on a scale of vast expense, not less than eighty thousand pounds are said to have been laid out on this project, which, it is almost needless to add, proved completely abortive, as every geologist would have at once declared it must, the whole assemblage of geological facts being adverse to the existence of a regular coal-bed in the Hastings' sand; while this, on which Bexhill is situated, is separated from the coal-strata by a series of interposed beds of such enormous thickness as to render all idea of penetrating through them absurd. The history of mining operations is full of similar cases, where a very moderate acquaintance with the usual order of nature, to say nothing of theoretical views, would have saved many a sanguine adventurer from utter ruin.'

Ex. 2. The smelting of iron requires the application of the most violent heat that can be raised, and is commonly performed in tall furnaces, urged by great iron bellows driven by steam-engines. Instead of employing this power to force air into the furnace through the intervention of bellows, it was, on one occasion, attempted to employ the steam itself in, apparently, a much less circuitous manner; viz. by directing the current of steam in a violent blast, from the boiler at once into the fire. From one of the known ingredients of steam being a highly inflammable body, and the other that essential part of the air which supports combustion, it was imagined that this would have the effect of increasiag the fire to tenfold fury, whereas it simply blew it out; a result which a slight consideration of the laws of chemical combination. and the state in which the ingredient elements exist in steam, would have enabled any one to predict without a trial.

'Ex. 3. After the invention of the diving-bell, and its success in subaqueous processes, it was considered highly desirable to devise some means of remaining for any length of time under water, and rising at pleasure without assistance, so as either to examine, at leisure, the bottom, or perform, at ease, any work that may be required. Some years ago, an ingenious individual proposed a project by which this end was to be accomplished. It consisted in sinking the hull of a ship made quite water-tight, with the decks and sides strongly supported by shores, and the only entry secured by a stout trap-door, in such a manner, that by disengaging, from within, the weights employed to sink it, it might rise of itself to the surface. To render the trial more satisfactory, and the result more striking, the projector himself made the first essay. It was agreed that he should sink in twenty fathoms water, and rise again without assistance at the expiration of twenty-four hours. Accordingly, making all secure, fastening down his trap-door, and provided with all necessaries, as well as with the means of making signals to indicate his situation, this unhappy victim of his own ingenuity entered and was sunk. No signal was given, and the time appointed elapsed. An immense concourse of people had assembled to witness his rising, but in vain; for the vessel was never seen more. The pressure of the water at so great a depth had, no doubt, been completely under-estimated, and the sides of the vessel being at once crushed in, the unfortunate projector perished before he could even make the signal concerted to indicate his distress.

'Ex. 4. In the granite quarries near Seringapatam, the most enormous blocks are separated from the solid rock by the following neat and simple process. The workman having found a portion of the rock sufficiently extensive, and situated near the edge of the part already quarried, lays bare the upper surface, and marks into a line in the direction of the intended separation, along which a groove is cut with a chisel, about a couple of inches in depth. Above this groove a narrow line of fire is then kindled, and maintained till the rock below is thoroughly heated, immediately on which a line of men and women, each provided with a pot full of cold water, suddenly sweep off the ashes, and pour the water into the heated groove, when the rock at once splits with a clean fracture. Square blocks of six feet in the side, and upwards of eighty feet in length, are sometimes detached by this method, or by another equally simple and efficacious, but not easily explained without entering into particulars of mineralogical detail.'*

Digitized by Google

Another. Hardly less simple and efficacious is the process used in some parts of France, where mill-stones are made. When a mass of stone sufficiently large is found, it is cut into a cylinder several feet high, and the question then arises how to subdivide this into horizontal pieces so as to make as many mill-stones. For this purpose horizontal indentations or grooves are chiselled out quite round the cylinder, at distances corresponding to the thickness intended to be given to the mill-stones, into which wedges of dried wood are driven. These are then wetted, or exposed to the night dew, and next morning the different pieces are found separated from each other by the expansion of the wood, consequent on its absorption of moisture; an irresistible natural power thus accomplishing, almost without any trouble, and at no expense, an operation which, from the peculiar hardness and texture of the stone, would otherwise be impracticable but by the most powerful machinery or the most persevering labour.'

* 'Such a block would weigh between four and five hundred pounds. See Dr Kennedy's "Account of the Erection of a Granite Obelisk of a Single Stone about Seventy Feet high, at Seringapatam."—Ed. Phil. Trans. vol. ix, p. 312.'

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Pizarro.—A King's Fireside.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Fazio.—And the Pantomime.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.

WE did not expect, in the Castle of Steinberg, which was performed here last night, to recognize our old friend Matrimony, famous for Mrs JORDAN and Mrs DAVISON in the heroine, ELLISTON in the hero, and Irish JOHNSTONE in the German-Hibernian. We need not detail to the reader the plot of that highly-agreeable afterpiece of Mr KENNEY'S; in which a young couple who quarrel, are locked up with one another till they love again. It is related of President Henault, when he was in love with Madame du Deffand, that having agreed to pass a whole day together, they found the time get a little heavy by three, and become intolerable at night-fall. The lovers in the Castle of Steinberg reverse this picture; but then they "begin with a little aversion," which Mrs Malaprop says is the safest way. The truth is, Madame du Deffand and the President were neither in the flower of their youth, like the bride and bridegroom; nor were they in love at all. They were only in gallantry. Here we are presented with a young couple, who are kept apart only to teach them to come together again with more vehemence, and who do so because they are unspoilt and good-hearted.

The way in which the characters of this piece used to be represented by ELLISTON and the others, is among the pleasantest of our stage recollections. Mrs JORDAN as the heroine, did not look so much like the young lady as Mrs DAVISON: she was at too plump a time of life, and had never cultivated the more restrained part of gentility. But then what delicious, cordial tones! What a cordial laugh! (for nobody put so much heart in a laugh as she did) What a wonderful mixture of glee and anxiety, of raillery and affection! of pouting, overdone because it had no faith in itself; and readiness, in every gesture of hostility, to make it up! And ELLISTON, how well did he give us the dry pretence of indifference, contrasted with his natural cordiality! What glances he gave from off his book while pretending to read, and how he snatched back and froze them up with an instantaneous petrifaction of gravity! How peremptory and final was his manner, whenever they turned their backs on each other, as if there was to be no hope of their ever turning the other way! And then how the returning kindness was gradually suffered to warm their approaches! How well you saw all that was coming, in the little surprise that Mrs JORDAN expressed about his having taken to wearing powder! And how full of prophetic responsiveness was the assumed indifference of his "D'ye think so?" But we shall be mystifying perhaps two of our readers to one, with vaguely calling to mind what they never saw.

If we do not think Miss FOOTE so good in the lady's part as Mrs JORDAN or Mrs DAVISON (for the latter was excellent too after her less native fashion), it is partly owing, perhaps, to these first impressions left upon us from younger days. She looked, however, very handsome; was a bride that any lover might have been glad to be reconciled to; introduced the seducing raillery of a dance (which we do not remember is the original); and, in short, perhaps looked more like the real thing than either of those actresses: that is to say, she looked more like the young lady herself brought in to be locked up for her volatility, and just fitted to plague and delight the young officer, her husband. She cannot do so much for the part as Mrs JORDAN or Mrs DAVISON: but she seems more the part itself,—the bride herself come to act it.

Mr FREDERICKS makes a very respectable hussar husband. If this gentleman is young, he is a promising actor. He should take heart, study closely, and not be in a hurry.

The incidents of Matrimony, by the way, are a little caricatured in the Castle of Steinberg; especially in a certain see-sawing and shoulder-thumping of the lady and gentleman together in their tilted chairs, back to back, which the spectators found very lively.

We understand that the successful piece at the Olympic, called Olympic Revels, is the joint production of Mr CHARLES DANCE and Mr PLANCHE.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

YOUNG AND HIS BOOKSELLERS.—Tonson and Lintot were both candidates for printing a work of Dr Young's. The Poet answered both letters the same morning, but misdirected them. In these epistles he complains of the rascally cupidity of each. He told Tonson, that Lintot was so great a scoundrel, that printing with him was out of the question; and writing to the latter, decided that Tonson was an old rascal, but, &c. and then makes his election in his favour.

ORIGIN OF THE TERM KIT-CAT SIZE.—Tonson the bookseller had a country-house at Barn-Elms, Surrey, where he built a room for the occasional meetings of the "Kit-Cat Club," and ornamented it with Portraits of the Members. The room not being lofty enough for half-lengths, Sir Godfrey Kneller made use of a shorter canvas, which has been ever since denominated a Kit-Cat, and which is large enough to admit a hand; the size being, in fact, 36 inches long and 28 wide. These portraits now belong to Wm. Baker, Esq. late Member of Parliament for the county of Hereford, whose father married the eldest daughter of Jacob Tonson, junior.—Memoirs of the Kit-Cat Club.

JACOB TONSON the bookseller, when he published Dryden's translation of the Eneid, caused the hero to be drawn, in all the plates, with a hooked nose like King William. This piece of trickery gave rise to the following Epigram:—

Old Jacob, by deep judgment sway'd,
To please the wise beholders,
Has placed old Nassau's hook-nosed head
On young Eneas' shoulders.

To make the parallel hold tack,
Methinks there's little lacking,
One took his father pick-a-back,
And t'other sent his packing.

ADVERTISING HUSBANDS.—Among Grose's collection of popular advertisements, at the close of the last century, is the following, which really has an air of honesty and sense about it,—a remark that will certainly not apply to any other public matrimonial announcement we ever saw:—"Is there a girl of moderate fortune, who hath the good sense and generosity to prefer a good husband to a rich one, and whose delicacy is not so very refined, as to prevent her answering this address? There is a young man of a liberal education, whose age is 26, possessed of a sound constitution, a clear head, and a kind heart, who would be happy in her acquaintance. Direct, P. Q. at the Coffee-house, in Castle street, Leicester fields."—Morning Post, July 5, 1777.

LOVE AT FIRST SIGHT.—I do not think that what is called Love at first Sight, is so great an absurdity as it is sometimes imagined to be. We generally make up our minds beforehand to the sort of person we should like, grave or gay, black, brown, or fair,—with golden tresses or with raven locks; and when we meet with a complete example of the qualities we admire, the bargain is soon struck. We have never seen anything to come up to our newly-discovered goddess before, but she is what we have been all our lives looking for. The idol we fall down and worship is an image familiar to our minds. It has been present to our waking thoughts, it has haunted us in our dreams, like some fairy vision. Oh! thou, who, the first time I ever beheld thee, didst draw my soul into the circle of thy heavenly looks, and wove enchantment round me, do not think thy conquest less complete because it was instantaneous; for in that gentle form (as if another Imogen had entered) I saw all that I had ever loved of female grace, modesty, and sweetness.—Hazlitt's Table Talk.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

Act I.—Winter.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mr DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—Summer.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

To which will be added, a New Comic Burletta, called

WAS I TO BLAME?

Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

After which, the Burlesque Burletta, called

BILLY TAYLOR.

Mary Wagstaff, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Kitty Sligo, Miss M. GLOVER.
Billy Taylor, Mr J. REEVE.
Carolus, Mr O. Smith. Captain Flatbottom, Mr S. SMITH.
Old Nicholas, Mr Chapman. Ben Blockhead, Mr Sanders.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr Buckstone].

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.

Columbine, Miss STALLARD.

Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely New Historical Burletta, called

MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS.

Mary Stuart, (Queen of Scots) Miss FOOTE.
Lady Douglas, Mrs Knight. Catherine Seyton, Miss Pincott.
Lady Fleming, Miss King. Mattie, Miss Kabrey. Moggy, Miss Langley.
Lord George Douglas, Mr Fredericks. Lord Lindsay, Mr Brougham.
Sir Robert Melville, Mr Worrell. Lord Ruthven, Mr Beckwith.
Roland, Mr Raymond. Dryedale, Mr Newcombe. Sandy, Mr J. Knight.

After which, a Comic Burletta, called

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER. Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond. Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget. Capt. Cape, Mr W. VINING.

To be succeded by an entirely New Burletta, called

THE LOST SON.

Lecatine, Miss FOOTE, in which character she will sing a New Song, composed for her, by C. E. Horn.
Madame Sainville, Mrs Knight. Henriette, Miss Nursey.
Baron Von Neirstein, Mr Cooper. La-Roche, Mr W. VINING.
Eugene de Nerseuil, Mr Raymond. Stranger, Mr Brougham.

The whole to conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of Colman's, by Mr Planché and Mr C. Dance.]

Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.

Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Manufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.

IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.

Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe,

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely new Melodrame, entitled

ZAMOR, THE MEXICAN.

The Music, by Mr Blewitt.

Ora, Miss SOMERVILLE. Joan, Miss VINCENT.
Dame Mabil, Madame SIMON. Robert, Baron Fitzallan, Mr GOUGH.
Henry Fitzallan, Nicol Colbrande, Blid, and Broadland, Mr H. KEMBLE.
Zamor, Mr OSBALDISTON. Edmund Erpingham, Mr C. HILL.
Martin Walbourn, Mr DIBDIN PITT. Peter Poundtext, Mr Webb.
Abel Lackbrain, Mr Asbury. Walter Altringham, Mr VALE.
Ralph Perkyn, Mr Rogers. Monk, Mr Young.
Raymond and Hubert, Messrs. Hobbs and Tully.

After which will be produced a new Drama, (in Two Acts) entitled

THE TWO PUPILS; OR, THE PEDAGOGUE PUZZLED.

Miss Morley, Miss CHICHESTER, Fanny, Miss VINCENT.
Lord Henry Delmont, Mr C. HILL, Sir Thomas Morley, Mr D. PITT.
Doctor Dirliewhacket, Mr WILLIAMS, Samuel Silver, Mr VALE,
Sir Thomas' Servant, Mr Webb, Servant of the House, Mr Lee.

To conclude with, a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,

THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

[By Mr W. Barrymore].

The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.

Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I. Regions of Time.—II. The Town of Newbury (Sunrise).—III. Cabinet in the Widow's Mansion.—IV. Splendid Temple of the New Year.—V. Picturesque Roadside Inn.—VI. Exterior of Public House and Saddler's.—VII. Suspension Bridge over the Menai.—VIII. Quiet Lodgings in a retired Neighbourhood.—IX. Race Course and Grand Stand.—X. Splendid Falls of Tivoli.—XI. Cavern (Moonlight).—XII. and last. Realms of Bliss in the Regions of Light.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, the Comedy of

THE SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL.

[By Mr Sheridan.]

Lady Teazle, Miss CHESTER, Lady Sneerwell, Mrs FAUCIT,
Mrs Candour, Mrs Orger, Maria, Miss Faucit, Maid, Mrs Webster.
Sir Peter Teazle, Mr FARREN, Sir Oliver Surface, Mr DOWTON,
Joseph Surface, Mr MACREADY, Charles Surface, Mr WALLACK,
Sir Benjamin Backbite, Mr HARLEY, Crabtree, Mr W. Bennett,
Careless, Mr Yarnold, Rowley, Mr Younge, Moses, Mr Webster, Trip, Mr Balls,
Snake, Mr Thompson, Sir Harry, (with a Song) Mr SINCLAIR.

Previous to the Comedy, Rossini's Overture to "Il Barbiere di Siviglia."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. Barrymore.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.

Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.

Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,

Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr Stanfield.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 906 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, Werner; Turning the Tables; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, the New Grand Comic Opera, (in Three Acts) called

CINDERELLA.

The Music, by Rossini.

Cinderella, Miss INVERARITY, Clorinda, Miss CAWSE,
Thisbe, Miss HUGHES, Fairy Queen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Felix, Mr WILSON, Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. PENSON,
Alidoro, Mr G. STANSBURY, Dandini, Mr MORLEY.
Pedro, Mr MEADOWS,

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr Farley.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.

With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr Peake.] Characters by
Mr BAKER and Mr F. MATTHEWS.

Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.

Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, Fazio; and the Pantomime.

Coburg Theatre. — Wat Tyler and Jack Straw—Harlequin Silver Penny.

Sadler's Wells Theatre.—A Deed of Blood.—Harlequin and Mother Goose.—Golden Pippin.

Published by J. Onwhyn, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. Chappel,—Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange; A. Hays, 165 Regent street; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at Ebers's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. Reynell, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

N°. 118.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 19, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy. By John Frederic William Herschel, Esq. A.M. Late Fellow of St John's College, Cambridge, &c. (Fourteenth Volume of the Cabinet Cyclopædia). 12mo. pp. 372. Longman.

[Notice concluded.]

IT might be thought, that the progress of science would destroy the pleasure arising from the perusal of works of fiction, by showing us the mechanical causes of phenomena, and so leading us to conclude that the utmost wonders we could imagine might with equal reason be referred to similar causes. In other words, no wonder is greater than any other wonder; and, if once explained, ceases to be a wonder. "Wonder," it has been said, "is the effect of novelty upon ignorance." Perhaps it would have been said better, that wonder is the effect of want of familiarity upon ignorance: for there are many things that excite our wonder, though far from new to us or to our reflections; such as life and death, the phenomena of the planets, &c. But to say nothing of the inexhaustible stock of novelties, wonders could never cease in anything, till we knew their first as well as their final causes. We must understand how it is, that substance, and motion, and thought exist, before we can cease to admire them: the very power of writing a fairy tale, is as great a wonder as anything it relates: and thus, while we think to frighten away the charms of fable and poetry with the sound of our shuttles and steam-engines, they only return the more near to us, settle smiling on the very machinery, and (to say nothing of other sympathies) demand admiration on the very same grounds.

We have been much pleased to find Mr Herschel in this respect on a par with the rest of his knowledge, and capable of illustrating his philosophy with poetical images. Speaking of the astonishing force of gunpowder, twenty-eight grains of which "confined in a cylindrical space, which it just filled, tore asunder a piece of iron, which would have resisted a strain of four hundred thousand pounds applied at no greater mechanical disadvantage," he says,—

'But chemistry furnishes us with means of calling into sudden action forces of a character infinitely more tremendous than that of gunpowder. The terrific violence of the different fulminating compositions is such, that they can only be compared to those untameable animals, whose ferocious strength has hitherto defied all useful management, or rather to spirits evoked by the spells of a magician, manifesting a destructive and unapproachable power, which makes him but too happy to close his book, and break his wand, as the price of escaping unhurt from the storm he has raised. Such powers are not yet subdued to our purposes, whatever they may hereafter be; but, in the expansive force of gases, liberated slowly and manageably from chemical mixtures, we have a host of inferior, yet still most powerful, energies, capable of being employed in a variety of useful ways, according to emergencies.*

* * * * * *

'The transformations of chemistry, by which we are enabled to convert the most apparently useless materials into important objects in the arts, are opening up to us every day sources of wealth and convenience of which former ages had no idea, and which have been pure gifts of science to man. Every department of art has felt their influence, and new instances are continually starting forth of the unlimited resources which this wonderful science developes in the most sterile parts of nature. Not to mention the impulse which its progress has given to a host of other sciences, which will come more particularly under consideration in another part of this discourse, what strange and unexpected results has it not brought to light in its application to some of the most common objects! Who, for instance, would have conceived that linen rags were capable of producing more than their own weight of sugar, by the simple agency of one of the cheapest and most abundant acids?*—that dry bones could be a magazine of nutriment, capable of preservation for years, and ready to yield up their sustenance in the form best adapted to the support of life, on the application of that powerful agent, steam, which enters so largely into all our processes, or of an acid at once cheap and durable?†—that sawdust itself is susceptible of conversion into a substance bearing no remote analogy to bread; and though certainly less palatable than that of flour, yet no way disagreeable, and both wholesome and digestible as well as highly nutritive?‡ What economy, in all processes where chemical agents are employed, is introduced by the exact knowledge of the proportions in which natural elements unite, and their mutual powers of displacing each other! What perfection in all the arts where fire is employed, either in its more violent applications (as, for instance, in the smelting of metals by the introduction of well adapted fluxes, whereby we obtain the whole produce of the ore in its purest state), or in its milder forms, as in sugar-refining (the whole modern practice of which depends on a curious and delicate remark of a late eminent scientific chemist on the nice adjustment of temperature at which the crystallisation of syrup takes place); and a thousand other arts which it would be tedious to enumerate!'

The spirit of the following passage is excellent, and its picture well painted; but we doubt whether the particular deduction possesses our author's accustomed accuracy, or is of any importance if it did. The contrast in the picture is admirable:—

'The advantages conferred by the augmentation of our physical resources, through the medium of increased knowledge and improved art, have this peculiar and remarkable property,—that they are in their nature diffusive, and cannot be enjoyed in any exclusive manner by a few. An eastern despot may extort the riches and monopolise the art of his subjects for his own personal use; he may spread around him an unnatural splendour and luxury, and stand in strange and preposterous contrast with the general penury and discomfort of his people; he may glitter in jewels of gold and raiment of needlework; but the wonders of well contrived and executed manufacture which we use daily, and the comforts which have been invented, tried, and improved upon by thousands, in every form of domestic convenience, and for every ordinary purpose of life, can never be enjoyed by him. To produce a state of things in which the physical advantages of civilized life can exist in a high degree, the stimulus of increasing comforts and constantly elevated desires must have been felt by millions; since it is not in the power of a few individuals to create that wide demand for useful and ingenious applications, which alone can lead to great and rapid improvements, unless backed by that arising from the speedy diffusion of the same advantages among the mass of mankind.'—P. 68.

Surely it is one of the monstrous inequalities in the condition of an eastern despot, say the King of Persia for instance, that he can enjoy as many of the advantages as he chuses of European industry, while his provinces may be wasted with want and famine. It may be observed, by the way, that the increase of petty conveniences throughout the community, is only desirable inasmuch as it leads to a greater sense of the general welfare, and that in a state of society equally wise in mind, and healthy in body (which is the only proper one to look forward to), perfect healthiness and comfort of sensation would be the grand attainment, to the neglect and perhaps the scorn of thousands of pettier comforts, which are only desirable meanwhile as a set off to the irritabilities generated by the evils we have not got rid of. Our author touches upon this point, we see, a page or two afterwards; or at least intimates a similar conclusion from the past history of science. A poet, however, would object to his making a distinction between the "delights of poetry" and "comtemplative enjoyments," much of the delight of the highest poetry consisting in the subtlest exercise of the contemplative faculties, and, as a late writer beautifully expressed it, "feeling the air of truth." Milton, in his Pensieroso,

* 'See a very ingenious application of this kind in Mr Babbage's article on Diving, in the Encyc. Metrop.—Others will readily suggest themselves. For instance, the ballast in reserve of a balloon might consist of materials capable of evolving great quantities of hydrogen gas in proportion to their weight, should such be found.'

* 'Bracconot. Annales de Chimie, vol. xii. p. 184.'

† 'D'Arcet. Annales de l'Industrie. Fevrier, 1829.'

‡ 'See Dr Prout's account of the experiments of Professor Autenrieth of Tubingen. Phil. Trans. 1827, p. 381. This discovery, which renders famine next to impossible, deserves a higher degree of celebrity than it has obtained.'

Digitized by Google

invokes "the cherub Contemplation;" and as he was justly of opinion that a great, that is to say an universally minded poem, was not to be written without an "insight into all seemly arts and affairs;" so he knew, that an insight into all seemly arts and affairs would have but a narrow eye, after all, if it could not discern and appreciate the fine points of knowledge and happiness to be reflected from a poetical consideration of its objects; or, as Bacon has finely expressed it, if he could not discern the same feet of nature treading in different paths. It is to this profundity in the profound of contemplation, that the modern poet beautifully alludes, when he says, that the sight of the meanest flower can give him

"Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears."—Wordsworth.

The botanist anatomizes and classes the daffodil; the artist paints it; the chemist analyses and makes it useful: the poet's heart dances with its very motion in the breeze, and awakens a thousand trains of thought connecting it with all the beauty and sweetness of creation. Now imagination is a part of man as well as reason; and he is the highest contemplatist, who can unite both in the highest degree.

Our author again touches upon the subject of wants and comforts, to rise into a strain of politics worthy of the highest philosophy:—

'The improvement effected in the condition of mankind by advances in physical science, as applied to the useful purposes of life, is very far from being limitted to their direct consequences in the more abundant supply of our physical wants, and the increase of our comforts. Great as these benefits are, they are yet but steps to others of a still higher kind. The successful results of our experiments and reasonings in natural philosophy, and the incalculable advantages which experience, systematically consulted and dispassionately reasoned on, has conferred in matters purely physical, tend of necessity to impress something of the well-weighed and progressive character of science on the more complicated conduct of our social and moral relations. It is thus that legislation and politics become gradually regarded as experimental sciences; and history, not, as formerly, the mere record of tyrannies and slaughters, which, by immortalising the execrable actions of one age, perpetuates the ambition of committing them in every succeeding one, but as the archive of experiments, successful and unsuccessful, gradually accumulating towards the solution of the grand problem—how the advantages of government are to be secured with the least possible inconvenience to the governed. THE CELEBRATED APOPHTHEGM, THAT NATIONS NEVER PROFIT BY EXPERIENCE, BECOMES YEARLY MORE AND MORE UNTRUE. Political economy, at least, is found to have sound principles, founded in the moral and physical nature of man, which, however lost sight of in particular measures—however even temporarily controverted and borne down by clamour—have yet a stronger and stronger testimony borne to them in each succeeding generation, by which they must, sooner or later, prevail. The idea once conceived and verified, that great and noble ends are to be achieved, by which the condition of the whole human species shall be permanently bettered, by bringing into exercise a sufficient quantity of sober thought, and by a proper adaptation of means, is of itself sufficient to set us earnestly on reflecting what ends are truly great and noble, either in themselves, or as conducive to others of a still loftier character; because we are not now, as heretofore, hopeless of attaining them. It is not now equally harmless and insignificant, whether we are right or wrong; since we are no longer supinely and helplessly carried down the stream of events, but feel ourselves capable of buffetting at least with its waves, and perhaps of riding triumphantly over them: for why should we despair that the reason which has enabled us to subdue all nature to our purposes, should (if permitted and assisted by the providence of God) achieve a far more difficult conquest; and ultimately find some means of enabling the collective wisdom of mankind to bear down those obstacles which individual short-sightedness, selfishness, and passion, oppose to all improvements, and by which the highest hopes are continually blighted, and the fairest prospects marred.'—P. 72.

At page 84, the knowledge of one fact by that of another is illustrated by a lively anecdote from the work of a living traveller:

'In Captain Head's amusing and vivid description of his journey across the Pampas of South America, occurs an anecdote quite in point. His guide one day suddenly stopped him, and, pointing high into the air, cried out, "A lion!" Surprised at such an exclamation, accompanied with such an act, he turned up his eyes, and with difficulty perceived, at an immeasurable height, a flight of condors soaring in circles in a particular spot. Beneath that spot, far out of sight of himself or guide, lay the carcass of a horse, and over that carcass stood (as the guide well knew) the lion, whom the condors were eyeing with envy from their airy height. The signal of the birds was to him what the sight of the lion alone could have been to the traveller, a full assurance of its existence.'

But this is nothing to the following. The author is speaking of the "observed relations among the data of physics, which show them to be quantities not arbitrarily assumed, but depending on laws and causes which they may be the means of at length disclosing:"—

'A remarkable instance of such a relation is the curious law which Bode observed to obtain in the progression of the magnitudes of the several planetary orbits. This law was interrupted between Mars and Jupiter, so as to induce him to consider a planet as wanting in that interval;—a deficiency long afterwards strangely supplied by the discovery of FOUR new planets in that very interval, all of whose orbits conform in dimension to the law in question, within such moderate limits of error as may be due to causes independent of those on which the law itself ultimately rests.'—P. 308.

The astronomer may thus be said to have discovered planets which he could not see.

Our choice is bewildered by the multitude of curious passages in Mr Herschel's book. We must content our limited pages by selecting a few more, almost at random.

'Between the physical sciences and the arts of life there subsists a constant mutual interchange of good offices, and no considerable progress can be made in the one without of necessity giving rise to corresponding steps in the other. On the one hand, every art is in some measure, and many entirely, dependent on those very powers and qualities of the material world which it is the object of physical enquiry to investigate and explain; and, accordingly, abundant examples might be cited of cases where the remarks of experienced artists, or even ordinary workmen, have led to the discovery of natural qualities, elements, or combinations which have proved of the highest importance in physics. Thus (to give an instance), a soap-manufacturer remarks that the residuum of his ley, when exhausted of the alkali for which he employs it, produces a corrosion of his copper boiler for which he cannot account. He puts it into the hands of a scientific chemist for analysis, and the result is the discovery of one of the most singular and important chemical elements, iodine. The properties of this, being studied, are found to occur most appositely in illustration and support of a variety of new, curious, and instructive views, then gaining ground in chemistry, and thus exercise a marked influence over the whole body of that science. Curiosity is excited; the origin of the new substance is traced to the sea-plants from whose ashes the principal ingredient of soap is obtained, and ultimately to the sea-water itself. It is thence hunted through nature, discovered in salt mines and springs, and pursued into all bodies which have a marine origin; among the rest, into sponge. A medical practitioner then calls to mind a reputed remedy for the cure of one of the most grievous and unsightly disorders to which the human species is subject—the goître—which infests the inhabitants of mountainous districts to an extent that in this favoured land we have happily no experience of, and which was said to have been originally cured by the ashes of burnt sponge. Led by this indication, he tries the effect of iodine on that complaint, and the result establishes the extraordinary fact that this singular substance, taken as a medicine, acts with the utmost promptitude and energy on goître, dissipating the largest and most inveterate in a short time, and acting (of course, like all medicines, even the most approved, with occasional failures) as a specific, or natural antagonist, against that odious deformity.'—P. 50.

'Our resistance against the destruction of the prejudices of sense, is commonly more violent at first, but less persistent, than in the case of those of opinion. Not to trust the evidence of our senses, seems, indeed, a hard condition, and one which, if proposed, none would comply with. But it is not the direct evidence of our senses that we are in any case called upon to reject, but only the erroneous judgments we unconsciously form from them, and this only when they can be shown to be so by counter evidence of the same sort; when one sense is brought to testify against another, for instance; or the same sense against itself; and the obvious conclusions in the two cases disagree, so as to compel us to acknowledge that one or other must be wrong. For example, nothing at first can seem a more rational, obvious, and incontrovertible conclusion, than that the colour of an object is an inherent quality, like its weight, hardness, &c. and that to see the object, and see it of its own colour, when nothing intervenes between our eyes and it, are one and the same thing. Yet this is only a prejudice; and that it is so, is shown by bringing forward the same sense of vision which led to its adoption, as evidence on the other side; for, when the differently coloured prismatic rays are thrown, in a dark room, in succession upon any object, whatever be the colour we are in the habit of calling its own, it will appear of the particular hue of the light which falls upon it: a yellow paper, for instance, will appear scarlet when illuminated by red rays, yellow when by yellow, green by green, and blue by blue rays; its own (so called) proper colour not in the least degree mixing with that it so exhibits.'—P. 81.

'If the brain be an electric pile, constantly in action, it may be conceived to discharge itself at regular intervals, when the tension of the electricity developed reaches a certain point, along the nerves which communicate with the heart, and thus to excite the pulsations of that organ. This idea is forcibly suggested by a view of that elegant apparatus, the dry pile of Deluc; in which the successive accumulations of electricity are carried off by a suspended ball, which is kept by the discharges in a state of regular pulsation for any length of time. We have witnessed the action of such a pile maintained in this way for whole years, in the study of the above-named eminent philosopher. The same idea of the cause of the pulsation of the heart appears to have occurred to Dr Arnott; and is mentioned in his useful and excellent work on physics, to which, however, we are not indebted for the suggestion, it having occurred to us independently many years ago.'—P. 343.

Digitized by Google

Is the writer of this discourse the same Mr Herschel that was put up the other day for the Presidency of the Royal Society, and defeated by the partizans of the Duke of Sussex? We presume so; certainly not because everybody who pretends to that office could write it, but because of the subject. If he is, it affords another striking evidence in proof of two points; first, that abilities do not raise men to such offices; and second, that the word President ought not to be understood in the sense usually implied, but revert to its literal meaning, of a man who sits at the head of any collection of persons, just as the host of an inn presides at an ordinary.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

The Paid and the Working.—Mr Pelham, brother to the Duke of Newcastle, used to say he grudged the great incomes of the great placemen, for that the business of the nation was done by the clerks in offices, who have but 50*l.* a-year; even as the business of the Church is not done by the Bishops and Deans, but by the Curates of 20*l.* and 30*l.* per annum.—Critical Disquisitions.

Wise and Foolish Princes.—Queen Elizabeth enriched none of her favourites at the expense of her people. She pretended that her people were her favourites. She had sense enough to observe a spirit of liberty rising, and humoured it prudently.—James the First and Charles the First had not the sagacity to imitate her.

Soldiers in Parliament—The brave free-spirited Fletcher of Scotland, who wrote A. D. 1698, speaking of the returning of military men for Members of Parliament, as a thing of a most formidable nature and dangerous tendency, says "The gentlemen of the sword are not proper representatives of a people, whose civic constitution abhors standing armies, and cannot subsist under them. The fortunes and expectations of these gentlemen depend upon observing the word of command; and it is but natural, that they should support power in which they are sharers. It is not to be expected, that even they should concur in a vote, on an address, to disband or reduce themselves, however desirable or necessary the same may be to us. My Lord's steward is a very honest man; but if I had an affair to settle with my Lord, I would choose my neighbour for a referee, rather than the steward."

Honesty Saves Time.—Always go the shortest way to work; now the nearest road to your business lies throngh honesty. Let it be your constant method to deal clearly and above-board. And by this means you need not fatigue it: you need not quarrel, flourish, and dissemble like other people.—Marcus Antoninus.

Wit and Luxury.—There was a bishop that was somewhat a delicate person, and bathed twice a day. A friend of his said to him, "My lord, why do you bathe twice a day? The bishop answered, "Because I cannot conveniently bathe thrice."—Bacon's Apophthegms.

Hope.—Things regarded impossible in one generation, may become easy in the next.—Herschel's Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy.—[Mr Herschel's book affords ample proofs of what he says.]

Lord Norbury's Predecessor.—In Chancery, one time when the counsel of the parties set forth the boundaries of the land in question, by the plot; and the counsel of one part said, "We lie on this side, my lord:" and the counsel of the other part said, "And we lie on this side:" the Lord Chancellor Hatton stood up and said, "If you lie on both sides, whom will you have me to believe."

General Run of Faculties.—Society is a more level surface than we imagine. Wise men or absolute fools are hard to be met with, as there are few giants or dwarfs. The heaviest charge we can bring against the general texture of society is, that it is commonplace; and many of those who are singular, had better be commonplace. Our fancied superiority to others is in some one thing, which we think most of, because we excel in it, or have paid most attention to it; whilst we overlook their superiority to us in something else, which they set equal and exclusive store by. This is fortunate for all parties. I never felt myself superior to any one, who did not go out of his way to affect qualities which he had not. In his own individual character and line of pursuit, every one has knowledge, experience, and skill:—and who shall say which pursuit requires most, thereby proving his own narrowness and incompetence to decide?—Particular talent or genius does not imply general capacity. Those who are most versatile are seldom great in any one department: and the stupidest people can generally do something. The highest pre-eminence in any one study commonly arises from the concentration of the attention and faculties on that one study. He who expects from a great name in politics, in philosophy, in art, equal greatness in other things, is little versed in human nature. Our strength lies in our weakness. The learned in books is ignorant of the world. He who is ignorant of books is often well acquainted with other things: for life is of the same length in the learned and the unlearned; the mind cannot be idle: if it is not taken up with one thing it attends to another through choice or necessity; and the degree of previous capacity in one class or another is a mere lottery.—Hazlitt's Characteristics.

Coffee and Tea—Deceptions in Trade.—How many, and how useless are the falsehoods told in trade! It seems to be one of the principal among its "arts and mysteries," to call things by names that do not belong to them. A person afflicted with a headache, or with indigestion, and understanding that coffee is an excellent remedy in such cases, sends to a neighbouring shop, to purchase some; to save time perhaps, it is bought ready ground; and the sufferer hastens to swallow the beverage that promises a quick relief. It is swallowed in vain;—for, a very small portion of the powder was the production of the coffee-tree; some of it grew on the broom-bush, some in the bean-field, and some, perhaps, had formed part of a quartern loaf. Innocent ingredients enough, they may be; but not coffee, nor answering the purposes of coffee. Let such compound be sold for what it really is, and many persons might be content to use it, as affording a pleasant beverage, less expensive than coffee; but let not that wholesome beverage be belied, and robbed of its reputation, by deception. We send to buy Mocha, and are supplied with Turkey coffee;—we send for Turkey, and are cheated with that from Java;—we send for the Java coffee, and are put off with the coffee of Jamaica; but if we send for Jamaica coffee, we have a compound made from the seeds of broom, beans, bed-straw, &c. The most secure way, is to buy it before it is ground;—we may then be sure of coffee of some kind. Similar deceptions are practised with tea:—send for Souchong, you have the better kind of Congo; send for Congo, and you have the best Bohea, mixed perhaps with some portion of the worst Congo; send for Bohea, and you have a portion of the worst sort, mingled with sloe-leaves, &c. It is the same with green teas. Souchong is derived from a Chinese word signifying little and good, and is not only made from the leaves of very young trees, but such as grow in the best soil. "Of true Souchong" says Bingley, "very little is produced. * * * Such is the delicacy of this tea—that, upon a hill planted with tea-trees, there may be only a single tree, the leaves of which are good enough to be called Souchong; and even of these only the best and youngest are taken." Yet what immense quantities of tea called Souchong, are sold in this country! It has been asserted by those who have been at Mocha, that less coffee is grown there in a year, than is sold as Mocha coffee, in this country, in a single day. Evil of various kinds may result from such deceptions: but what good can they produce; even to those who are at the trouble of practising them? Would the consumers of these, or any other articles, consume less of them if they were sold by their right names?—A. A.—[Perhaps the best answer on this subject to be given to our welcome correspondent, is to be found in the famous couplet,—

Doubtless the pleasure is as great,
Of being cheated as to cheat.]

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

Drury Lane.—School for Scandal.—And the Pantomime.
Covent Garden.—Cinderella.—And the Pantomime.

Covent Garden.

The pleasure which Miss Inverarity gives the public, and which they manifest by undiminished houses and applause, enables her to improve every day in her acting, and begins to put into her manner a livelier confidence. There never was anything distressing in her newness to the stage; she was always modest, without a painful bashfulness; and showed a willingness to express the pleasure she felt at giving pleasure; but with the growth of her success and the improvement of her acting, she begins to be able to express it to some purpose. In making her acknowledgments last night for the plaudits bestowed upon her at the dropping of the curtain, her face reflected, as it were, the delight of the audience: to humble curtseys she added lively and grateful salutations with smiles and hand; and showed in the gladness of her countenance what good the public approbation had done her. Lætos oculis afflavit honores. Furthermore, whether it was owing to this vivacity of acknowledgment, or to her style of dress, we cannot say; but she appears to have suddenly plumped up after her late illness: her cheeks and her person seemed as expanded, as her eyes were glad: so that Cinderella was in all her glory.

☞

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

C. R. H. received, and will be read forthwith.

We are sorry Philoscaccharia has been delayed. His letter will appear tomorrow.

Certain epigrams that have been sent us, are highly gratifying to our feelings; but perhaps at the present moment might subject us to the charge of wishing to dwell on a painful subject. Renewal of the subject by enemies will renew it with us.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

Act I.—WINTER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mr DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—SUMMER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

To which will be added, a New Comic Burletta, called

WAS I TO BLAME?

Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

After which, the Burlesque Burletta, called

BILLY TAYLOR.

Mary Wagstaff, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Kitty Sligo, Miss M. GLOVER.
Billy Taylor, Mr J. REEVE.
Carolus, Mr O. Smith. Captain Flatbottom, Mr S. SMITH.
Old Nicholas, Mr Chapman. Ben Blockhead, Mr Sanders.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.

Columbine, Miss STALLARD.

Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, a Comic Burletta, to be called

THE CHASTE SALUTE.

[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]

The Music, by C. E. Horn.

The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY, (her 1st appearance.)
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,
From the Royal Academy of Music, (his 1st appearance on the English Stage.
Philippe, Mr Newcombe, Thibaut, Mr Collier.

After which, the New Burletta, called

THE LOST SON.

Leontine, Miss FOOTE, in which character she will sing a New Song, composed for her, by C. E. Horn.
Madame Sainville, Mrs Knight. Henriette, Miss Nursey.
Baron Von Neirstein, Mr Cooper. La-Roche, Mr W. VINING.
Eugene de Nerseuil, Mr Raymond. Stranger, Mr Brougham.

To which will be added, a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]

Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.

Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.

IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.

Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe,

To conclude with a Comic Burletta, called

THE LITTLE JOCKEY.

Arinette, Miss FOOTE, in which she will sing, "The Boy in yellow wins the day,'
Clotilda, Miss Nursey, Mause, Miss Kibrey.
The Baron D'Acourt, Mr W. VINING,
De Limburg, Mr Paget, Floriville, by a Gentleman, Jocose, Mr Collier,
Denis, Mr W. Young, Pierre, Mr Brown.

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely new Melodrame, entitled

ZAMOR, THE MEXICAN.

The Music, by Mr Blewitt.

Ora, Miss SOMERVILLE. Joan, Miss VINCENT.
Dame Mabil, Madame SIMON. Robert, Baron Fitzallan, Mr GOUGH.
Henry Fitzallan, Nicol Colbrande, Blid, and Broadland, Mr H. KEMBLE.
Zamor, Mr OSBALDISTON. Edmund Erpingham, Mr C. HILL.
Martin Walbourn, Mr DIBDIN PITT. Peter Poundtext, Mr Webb.
Abel Lackbrain, Mr Asbury. Walter Altringham, Mr VALE.
Ralph Perkyn, Mr Rogers. Monk, Mr Young.
Raymond and Hubert, Messrs. Hobbs and Tully.

After which, a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,

THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE].

The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.

Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

To conclude with, an entirely new Drama, entitled

NANCY OF PORTSMOUTH.

Nancy Bloomfield, Miss SOMERVILLE, The Widow Crabjuice, Mad. SIMON
Constantia, Miss Jordan, Kitty Bustle, Miss Vincent, in which she will sing a Parody on "Cherry Ripe," Old Margery, Mrs Rogers,
Becky Sims, Miss Rummens. Sir Edward Gayton, Mr Gough,
Frederick Gayton, Mr Edwin, Captain Splashaway, Mr Hicks,
Joe Barton, Mr C. Hill, Fiery Ned, Mr D. Pitt, Tim Tipple, Mr VALE,
Bounce, Mr Rogers, Capt. Friendly, Mr Lee, Tapwell, Mr Hobbs,
Jemmy Gonimble, Madlle. Rosier, Long Bill, Mr Almar, Short Bill, Mr Webb.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, Lord BYRON'S Tragedy of

WERNER, OR THE INHERITANCE.

[Adapted by Mr MACREADY.]

Josephine, Mrs FAUCIT, Ida Stralenheim, Miss MORDAUNT.
Werner, Mr MACREADY, Ulric, Mr WALLACK, Gabor, Mr COOPER,
Baron Stralenheim, Mr H. Wallack, Frits, Mr Younge, Otto, Mr Cohen,
Henric, Mr Salter, Eric, Mr C. Jones, Idenstein, Mr W. Bennett,
Rodolph, Mr Cooke, Arnheim, Mr Fenton, Meister, Mr Eaton,
Ludwig, Mr Cathie, Herman, Mr S. Jones.

In the course of the Evening, Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," and Boledieu's Overture to "Les Deux Nuits."

After which, a New Farce, called

TURNING THE TABLES.

[Partly from the French, by Mr POOLE.]

Miss Knibbs, Miss FAUCIT. Mrs Humphries, Mrs C. JONES.
Patty Larkins, Mrs ORGER. Mr Knibbs, Mr HUGHES.
Mr Jeremiah Bumps, Mr COOPER. Mr Edgar de Courcy, Mr VINING.
Mr Thornton, Mr J. VINING. Jack Humphries, Mr LISTON.

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.

Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.

Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 590 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, The Brigand; The Illustrious Stranger; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, the Tragedy of

FAZIO.

[By Mr MILMAN.]

Marchesa Aldabella, Mrs CHATTERLEY, Clara, Miss PHILLIPS,
Bianca, (4th time) Miss F. KEMBLE. Giraldi Fazio, Mr WARDE,
Duke of Florence, Mr EGERTON, Bartolo, Mr BLANCHARD,
Philario, Mr Henry, Falsetto, Mr Parry, Gonsalvo, Mr Baker,
Theodore, Mr Mears, Keeper, Mr Fuller, Pietro, Mr Turnour,
Gentleman, Mr Irwin, Antonio, Mr Heath, Aurio, Mr Crumpton.

Previous to the Tragedy, (4th time in this country) A Grand MS. Overture, by Friedrich Kuhlau.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.

With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Charactors by Mr BAKER and Mr F. MATTHEWS.

Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.

Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, Chancery Suit; Hide and Seek; and the Pantomime.

COBURG THEATRE. — Wat Tyler and Jack Straw—Harlequin Silver Penny.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—A Deed of Blood.—Harlequin and Mother Goose.—Golden Pippin.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

No. 119.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 20, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Voyages and Discoveries of the Companions of Columbus. By Washington Irving. (Eighteenth Number of the Family Library). 18mo. pp. 337. Murray.

This is one of the most agreeable volumes of the 'Family Library.' The subject has the rare merit of being almost equally interesting to the lovers of history, of biography, and of fiction: for the adventures are all strongly mixed with personal character, and some of them are as wild as an Eastern tale. A passage in the introduction prepared us to entertain a high opinion of the way in which the author had executed his task: the first two or three chapters disappointed us: we thought them tame and colourless, and looked for no gusto in the work, no impression of difference between one set of things and another. A little further on, however, our hopes were renewed, and the author gratified them all the rest of the way. An Appendix contains a visit to Palos, made by the author two or three years ago, for the express purpose of seeing the little port in Andalusia, from which Columbus sailed to find out a world. This appendix is headed by an engraving of the spot, and contains a couple of illustrative wood-cuts. The title-page presents us with another, of the curious arms of the Pinzon family, in which the old Spanish heralds inserted an absolute sea-picture, which would delight Sir Francis Heard, and must puzzle the austere science of Sir Egerton Brydges: there is a map of the discoveries made by Columbus's companions; and a good frontispiece exhibits the Convent of La Rabida, near Palos, "at the gate of which Columbus asked bread and water for his child." How much is told in that little sentence! Finally, our author understands what belongs to the head of a chapter:—

'Alonzo de Ojeda, supposed by the savages to have a charmed life—Their experiment to try the fact.

'Disastrous voyage of Ojeda in the Pirate Ship.

'Vasco Nunez hears of a Sea beyond the Mountains.

'Expedition of Vasco Nunez in quest of the Golden Temple of Dobayba.

'Juan Ponce de Leon hears of a wonderful country, and Miraculous Fountain.

'Cruize of Juan Ponce de Leon in search of the Fountain of Youth.'

Are you not anxious, reader, to set off? especially if you are one of those who are liable to the malignant benediction of the poet—

——"God bless your middle-ageish face!"

Is it not like preparing for a story of Sadak or Sindbad? and were not the marvels of Sindbad founded on similar adventures? Among the dreams, by the way, which grown children entertain like the others, of what they should like best, is a delight we have in dreaming upon a new edition of the Arabian Nights, full of notes, and divided into chapters, the heads of which it would be a feast to write.

The first passage that we shall lay before our readers, is the one above alluded to in the introduction, which is a very striking one, and brings us at once into personal contact with the heroes of the book, so that we feel the gallant and lofty party about us, as if they were all preparing to set out for the New World in a body:—

'The expeditions here narrated, may be considered as springing immediately out of the voyages of Columbus, and fulfilling some of his grand designs. They may be compared to the attempts of adventurous knight-errants to achieve the enterprise left unfinished by some illustrious predecessor. Neither is this comparison entirely fanciful; on the contrary, it is a curious fact, well worthy of notice, that the spirit of chivalry entered largely into the early expeditions of the Spanish discoverers, giving them a character wholly distinct from similar enterprises undertaken by other nations. It will not, perhaps, be considered far sought, if we trace the cause of this peculiarity to the domestic history of the Spaniards during the middle-ages.

'Eight centuries of incessant warfare with the Moorish usurpers of the Peninsula, produced a deep and lasting effect upon Spanish character and manners. The war being ever close at home, mingled itself with the domestic habits and concerns of the Spaniard. He was born a soldier. The wild and predatory nature of the war also made him a kind of chivalrous marauder. His horse and weapon were always ready for the field. His delight was in roving incursions and extravagant exploits; and no gain was so glorious in his eyes as the cavalgada of spoils and captives driven home in triumph from a plundered province. Religion, which has ever held great empire over the Spanish mind, lent its aid to sanctify these roving and savage propensities; and the Castilian cavalier, as he sacked the towns, and laid waste the fields of his Moslem neighbour, piously believed he was doing God service.

'The conquest of Grenada put an end to the Peninsular wars between Christian and Infidel: the spirit of Spanish chivalry was thus suddenly deprived of its wonted sphere of action; but it had been too long fostered and excited to be as suddenly appeased. The youth of the nation, bred up to daring adventure and heroic achievement, could not brook the tranquil and regular pursuits of common life, but panted for some new field of romantic enterprise.

'It was at this juncture that the grand project of Columbus was carried into effect. His treaty with the sovereigns was, in a manner, signed with the same pen that had subscribed the capitulation of the Moorish capital; and his first expedition may almost be said to have departed from beneath the walls of Granada. Many of the youthful cavaliers, who had fleshed their swords in that memorable war, crowded the ships of the discoverers, thinking a new career of arms was to be opened to them—a kind of crusade into splendid and unknown regions of infidels. The very weapons and armour that had been used against the Moors, were drawn from the arsenals to equip the heroes of these remoter adventures; and some of the most noted of the early commanders in the New World will be found to have made their first essay in arms under the banner of Ferdinand and Isabella, in their romantic campaigns among the mountains of Andalusia.

'To these circumstances may, in a great measure, be ascribed that swelling chivalrous spirit which will be found continually mingling, or rather warring with the technical habits of the seamen, and the sordid schemes of the mercenary adventurer, in these early Spanish discoveries. Chivalry had left the land and launched upon the deep. The Spanish cavalier had embarked in the caravel of the discoverer. He carried among the trackless wildernesses of the New World the same contempt of danger, and fortitude under suffering; the same restless, roaming spirit; the same passion for inroad and ravage and vain glorious exploit; and the same fervent, and often bigotted zeal for the propagation of his faith, that had distinguished him during his warfare with the Moors. Instances in point will be found in the extravagant career of the daring Ojeda, particularly in his adventures along the coast of Terra Firma and the wild shores of Cuba; in the sad story of the "unfortunate Nicuesa;" graced as it is with occasional touches of high-bred courtesy;—in the singular cruize of that brave but credulous cavalier, Juan Ponce de Leon, who fell upon the flowery coast of Florida in his search after an imaginary fountain of youth;—and above all, in the chequered fortunes of Vaco Nunez de Balboa, whose discovery of the Pacific Ocean forms one of the most beautiful and striking incidents in the history of the New World, and whose fate might furnish a theme of wonderful interest for a poem or a drama.'—P. 4.

Extraordinary emergencies, they say, create extraordinary men. Among the settlers in St Domingo was a notary who voluntarily came forward in a public court to —— But we will not forestall the dramatic interest of our author's account. Don Diego de Nicuesa, one of the most accomplished of the cavalier adventurers, a warrior, a handsome man, a jouster, a reader of romances, a guitar-player, and one who could make his horse dance to the sound of the viol, was nevertheless in debt. He was about to sail with a gallant squadron for the coast of Veragua, when he was stopped by a most embarrassing affair:—

'Nicuesa,' says Mr Irving, 'was more of the courtier and the cavalier, than the man of business, and had no skill in managing his pecuniary affairs. He had expended his funds with a free and lavish hand, and involved himself in debts which he had not the immediate means of paying. Many of his creditors knew that his expedition was regarded with an evil eye by the Admiral, Don Diego Columbus; to gain favour with the latter, therefore, they threw all kinds of impediments in the way of Nicuesa. Never was an unfortunate gentleman more harassed and distracted by duns and demands, one plucking at his skirts as soon as the other was satisfied. He succeeded, however, in getting all his forces embarked. He had seven hundred men, well chosen and well armed, together with six horses. He chose Lope de Olano to be his captain-general, a seemingly impolitic appointment, as this Olano had been concerned with the notorious Roldan in his rebellion against Columbus.

'The squadron sailed out of the harbour and put to sea, excepting one ship, which, with anchor a trip and sails unfurled, waited to receive Nicuesa, who was detained on shore till the last moment by the perplexities which had been artfully multiplied around him.

'Just as he was on the point of stepping into his boat, he was arrested by the harpies of the law, and carried before the Alcalde Mayor to answer a demand for five hundred ducats, which he was ordered to pay on the spot, or prepare to go to prison.

'This was a thunderstroke to the unfortunate cavalier. In vain he represented his utter incapacity to furnish such a sum at the moment; in vain he represented the ruin that would accrue to himself, and the vast injury to the public service, should he be prevented from joining his expedition. The Alcalde Mayor was inflexible, and Nicuesa was reduced to despair. At this critical moment relief came from a most unexpected quarter. The heart of a public notary was melted by his distress! He stepped forward in court and declared, that rather than see so gallant a gentleman reduced to extremity, he himself would pay down the money. Nicuesa gazed at him with astonishment, and could scarcely believe his senses; but when he saw him actually pay off the debt, and found himself suddenly released from this dreadful embarrassment, he embraced his deliverer with tears of gratitude, and hastened with all speed to embark, lest some other legal spell should be laid upon his person.'—P. 58.

Digitized by Google

One of the most melancholy reflections in reading history, is occasioned by the sight of naturally good-hearted and generous men committing the greatest cruelties, out of some paltry excuse of superstition, or government. It is attended, however, with the great consolation of observing, that the cruelty is a mistake arising from circumstances and education; and thus enormities which render the cause of mankind apparently hopeless, enable us to discern the very greatest point of hope, by showing that nothing but mistake is in the way. The Spaniards, who committed all sorts of outrages upon the Indians, visited with the most dreadful revenge any counter-violence against themselves. The following sample of it took place under the orders of the accomplished Nicuesa. We select the passage for the vivacity of the American painting:—

'The village was buried in deep sleep, but the woods were filled with large parrots, which being awakened, made a prodigious clamour. The Indians, however, thinking the Spaniards all destroyed, paid no attention to these noises. It was not until their houses were assailed and wrapped in flames, that they took the alarm. They rushed forth, some with arms, some weaponless, but were received at their doors by the exasperated Spaniards, and either slain on the spot or driven back into the fire. Women fled wildly forth with children in their arms, but at the sight of the Spaniards, glittering in steel, and of the horses, which they supposed ravenous monsters, they ran back, shricking with horror, into their burning habitations. Great was the carnage, for no quarter was shown either to age or sex. Many perished by the fire, and many by the sword.'—P. 71.

The following is a striking instance of the presence of mind and daring resolution, which enabled the Spanish leaders to surmount their difficulties.

'Don Alonzo de Ojeda was observed by the Indians to slay "more of their warriors with his single arm than all their followers together." Though often exposed,' proceeds Mr Irving, 'to showers of arrows, none ever wounded him, and the Indians began to think he had a charmed life. Perhaps they had heard from fugitive prisoners, the idea entertained by himself and his followers of his being under supernatural protection. Determined to ascertain the fact, they placed four of their most dexterous archers in ambush, with orders to single him out. A number of them advanced towards the fort, sounding their conchs and drums, and uttering yells of defiance. As they expected, the impetuous Ojeda sallied forth immediately at the head of his men. The Indians fled toward the ambuscade, drawing him into furious pursuit. The archers waited till he was full in front, and then launched their deadly shafts. Three struck his buckler and glanced harmlessly off, but the fourth pierced his thigh. Satisfied that he was wounded beyond the possibility of cure, the savages retreated with shouts of triumph.

'Ojeda was borne back to the fortress in great anguish of body and despondency of spirit. For the first time in his life he had lost blood in battle. The charm in which he had hitherto confided, was broken; or rather, the Holy Virgin appeared to have withdrawn her protection. He had the horrible death of his followers before his eyes, who had perished of their wounds in raving frenzy.

'One of the symptoms of the poison, was to shoot a thrilling chill through the wounded part; from this circumstance, perhaps, a remedy suggested itself to the imagination of Ojeda, which few but himself could have had the courage to undergo. He caused two plates of iron to be made red hot, and ordered a surgeon to apply them to each orifice of the wound. The surgeon shuddered, and refused, saying he would not be the murderer of his general. Upon this Ojeda made a solemn vow that he would hang him unless he obeyed. To avoid the gallows, the surgeon applied the glowing plates. Ojeda refused to be tied down, or that any one should hold him during this frightful operation. He endured it without shrinking or uttering a murmur, although it so inflamed his whole system that they had to wrap him in sheets steeped in vinegar, to allay the burning heat which raged throughout his body; and we are assured that a barrel of vinegar was exhausted for the purpose. The desperate remedy succeeded; the cold poison, says Bishop Las Casas, was consumed by the vivid fire. How far the venerable historian is correct in his postulate, surgeons may decide; but many incredulous persons will be apt to account for the cure, by surmising that the arrow was not envenomed.'—P. 77.

One of the most remarkable adventures of Ojeda, was connected with a set of piratical traitors, who after confining him in irons on board their ship, were compelled by a violent storm to take off his chains, on condition that he should pilot the vessel. He did so; but was obliged to run it on shore upon the coast of Cuba; and here followed a terrible march through the morasses of that island, the account of which is deeply interesting. The reader must have the whole chapter.

'CHAPTER X.

'Toilsome March of Ojeda and his Companions through the Morasses of Cuba.

'Notwithstanding the recent services of Ojeda, the crew of Talavera still regarded him with hostility; but, if they had felt the value of his skill and courage at sea, they were no less sensible of their importance on shore, and he soon acquired that ascendancy oven them which belongs to a master-spirit.

'Cuba was yet uncolonised. It was a place of refuge to the unhappy natives of Hayti, who fled hither from the whips and chains of their European task-masters. Their forests abounded with these wretched fugitives, who often opposed themselves to the ship-wrecked party, supposing them to be sent by their late masters to drag them back to captivity.

'Ojeda easily repulsed these attacks; but found that the fugitives had likewise incited the villagers to hostility against all European strangers. Seeing that his companions were too feeble and disheartened to fight their way through the populous parts of the island, or to climb the rugged mountains of the interior, he avoided all towns and villages, and led them through the close forests and broad green Savannahs which extended between the mountains and the sea.

'He had only made a choice of evils. The forests gradually retired from the coast. The Savannahs, where the Spaniards had at first to contend merely with rank grass and creeping vines, soon ended in salt marshes, where the oozy bottom yielded no firm foothold, and the mud and water reached to their knees. Still they pressed forward, continually hoping in a little while to arrive at a firmer soil, and flattering themselves they beheld fresh meadow land before them; but were continually deceived. The farther they proceeded, the deeper grew the mire, until, after they had been eight days on this dismal journey, they found themselves in the centre of a vast morass, where the water reached to their girdles. Though thus almost drowned, they were tormented with incessant thirst, for all the water round them was as briny as the ocean. They suffered, too, the cravings of extreme hunger, having but a scanty supply of Cassava bread and cheese, and a few potatoes and other roots, which they devoured raw. When they wished to sleep, they had to climb among the twisted roots of mangrove trees, which grew in clusters in the water. Still the dreary mass widened and deepened. In many places they had to cross rivers and inlets; where some, who could not swim, were drowned, and others were smothered in the mire.

'Their situation became wild and desperate. Their Cassava bread was spoiled by the water, and their stock of roots nearly exhausted. The interminable morass still extended before them, while to return, after the distance they had come, was hopeless. Ojeda alone kept up a resolute spirit, and cheered and urged them forward. He had the little Flemish painting of the Madonna, which had been given him by the Bishop Fonseca, carefully stored among the provisions in his knapsack. Whenever he stopped to repose among the roots of the mangrove trees, he took out this picture, placed it among the branches and kneeling, prayed devoutly to the Virgin for protection. This he did repeatedly in the course of the day, and prevailed upon his companions to follow his example. Nay more, at a moment of great despondency, he made a solemn vow to his protectress, that if she conducted him alive through this peril, he would erect a chapel in the first Indian village he should arrive at, and leave her picture there, to remain an object of adoration to the Gentiles.

'This frightful morass extended for the distance of thirty leagues, and was so deep and difficult, so entangled by roots and creeping vines, so cut up by creeks and rivers, and so beset by quagmires, that they were thirty days in traversing it. Out of the number of seventy men that set out from the ship, but thirty-five remained. "Certain it is," observes the venerable Las Casas, "the sufferings of the Spaniards in the New World, in search of wealth, have been more cruel and severe than ever nation in the world endured; but those experienced by Ojeda and his men have surpassed all others."

'They were at length so overcome by hunger and fatigue, that some lay down and yielded up the ghost; and others, seating themselves among the Mangrove trees, waited in despair for death to put an end to their miseries. Ojeda, with a few of the highest and most vigorous, continued to struggle forward, and, to their unutterable joy, at length arrived to where the land was firm and dry. They soon descried a footpath, and, following it, arrived at an Indian village, commanded by a cacique called Cueybàs. No sooner did they reach the village, than they sunk to the earth exhausted.

'The Indians gathered round and gazed at them, with wonder; but when they learnt their story, they exhibited a humanity that would have done honour to the most professing Christians. They bore them to their dwellings, sat meat and drink before them, and vied with each other in discharging the offices of the kindest humanity. Finding that a number of their companions were still in the morass, the Cacique sent a large party of Indians with provisions for their relief: with orders to bring on their shoulders such as were too feeble to walk. "The Indians," says the Bishop Las Casas, "did more than they were ordered; for so they always do when they are not exasperated by ill treatment. The Spaniards were brought to the village, succoured, cherished, consoled, and almost worshipped as if they had been angels."'—P. 84.

[To be concluded tomorrow.]

Digitized by Google

CHESS-PLAYING.

TO THE TATLER.

Mr Tatler,—Allow me, Sir, to make my very best bow to your correspondent and my monitor—"The Lover of Chess." I am, it seems, in his estimation illogical, unintelligible, ignorant of the earlier writers on chess, and stand convicted of a gross mistake.

As we are both agreed that no one had any right to give Cunningham's name to the Gambit in question, I was willing to leave my unfortunate assertion, that Stamma wrote before Philidor was born, fairly disproved as it was; expecting nevertheless that your correspondent's "curious account," if it contained any evidence of a right to the adoption, would have upset the theory of both of us. I waited accordingly, and the "curious account" turns out to be, that "some one told Philidor that Cunningham invented it or was fond of playing it." Of a verity, that is a curious account; "however," continues the gentleman, "in compliment to Sir Abraham (Janssen) and his friend, Philidor gave it the name of Cunningham's Gambit, just as he gave the name of the Gambit of Aleppo to the Queen's Gambit, because Stamma was fond of playing it." Particularly lucid and perspicuous this for a gentleman who piques himself on his logic. But agreeing as we do on the main point, I did look, from the candour of my monitor, for "much stronger reasons" for my opinion, which he tells me "I might have found." He has not supplied them, perhaps I could; but really the assertion about Stamma was thrown out so cursorily in pursuit of another object, that I did not, nor do I now, feel called upon to give every reason that might suggest itself on the subject to my memory.

Let us enquire into the "gross" blunder I have committed, and claiming a right to expect chronological accuracy from him who called it so, perhaps it will not be found to be quite so gross as represented. I had said that Stamma gave the attack and defence, under the title of the "Three Pawns Gambit," before Philidor was born. I did not say that Stamma invented it; our friend's allusion to Captain Bertin can, therefore, have nothing to do with the question. I neither exalted nor depreciated Stamma's play; it was sufficient for me to prove that the game was known under another title when Philidor published his book. But your correspondent, who founds his objection to my assertion on the date of Stamma's book, which he gives as 1745, should not have forgotten that an earlier edition was published at the Hague, in 1741, and a still earlier at Paris, in 1737. Now, if Philidor came to England, where he beat Stamma, at the age of twenty-one, which he did, it will appear that Stamma's book had been published then about ten years; and, consequently, that Philidor, although born, was only about eleven years old when it first appeared. The only excuse I have for making a stupid blunder so far, is, that I wrote hastily from memory, and without books. Further, it was not until Philidor was seventeen, and after three years close study under M. de Lagalle, then the best player in France, that he attained to any degree of eminence in the game; and even at that time his master was more than a match for him. The "curious account" has not then proved one tittle of right in Philidor to give Cunningham's name to this Gambit; and it has not advanced one step towards disproof of my assertion, that, so far as his book is concerned, no evidence is to be found of even his knowledge of the existence of Stamma's work, which is all I ever assumed. He either did, or he did not know it. Knowing it, he was guilty of a piece of impertinence in giving Cunningham's name to the Three Pawns Gambit, upon the ipse dixit of "some one," even to compliment his patron Sir Abraham: not knowing it, he was guilty of a piece of presumption in professing to give a complete Analysis of a Game, such as Chess, without due study of all works that preceded him, and were accessible. Let it be remembered, that although, according to the emphasis of your correspondent's Italics, writers of the last century,—to wit, Stamma, the anonymous Modenese, Lolli, Dal Rio, Greco, Carlo Cozio, &c., are to be classed amongst the earlier authorities (albeit I hold them to be amongst the later), yet Damiano wrote more than three centuries since; Carrera more than two; Gustavus Selenus more than two; Ruy Lopez, and a long list of others, more than two: yet what acknowledgments does Philidor make to any of them? Will your correspondent favour us with some anecdotes from among them? I suspect he can; and his time will be better occupied than in repeating the thousand and one times told tale of Buzeca, which he must have well known is to be found in almost every work on Chess of modern date, from Twiss downwards.

Sir, your very obliged servant,

Philoscaccharia.

[We beg leave to mention, without violating, we trust, any real spirit of confidence reposed in us, but for the purpose of enabling both our intelligent correspondents to do justice to one another, that when the "Lover of Chess" sent us his first communication, he expressed a wish, if we did not insert it, to be favoured with Philoscaccharia's address, which was certainly no uncomplimentary movement. On the other hand, we have grounds for knowing, that Philoscaccharia entertains a high opinion of the science and information, if not of the immediate argument, of his antagonist. We have thought it right to give his present letter insertion, as the one that brought it forth appears to have been of a sharper nature than we had observed.]

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

Drury Lane.—Werner.—Tables Turned.—And the Pantomime.
Covent Garden.—Fazio.—And the Pantomime.

Olympic Theatre.

Among the pleasant little pieces that are so often borrowed from our neighbours across the channel, there is now and then one, hardly solid enough to bear the transportation. A little of the air and climate should be brought over to recommend it—a little French gesticulation to act it with, and not a little French apprehensiveness, good-humour, and indulgence to hear it with. It is like bringing a butterfly out of summer-time into winter; or importing a bottle of one of their lightest wines, which ought to be drank upon the spot. The French toss off these things so easily, and have such an abundance of them, that they have almost the extempore effect of conversation, and many sallies are accordingly allowed to pass, which, on repetition in another and less sprightly country, have too deliberate an air to obtain the like reception. What does not take effect, is attributed to want of wit; and what does, is sometimes thought gross, for want of the proper subtlety and airiness in the general audience to carry it lightly through their heads.

Of this kind is the new comic burletta, The Chaste Salute, which was brought out here last night, and which is taken (the bills inform us) from the "Baiser au Porteur" of M. Scribe (The Kiss Payable on Demand). Colonel Derville (Mr Spagnoletti), who is engaged to marry Lucille (Miss Fitzwalter), niece to the Baroness de Blanchec (Miss Stuart,) happens to encounter on her wedding-day Madame Thibaut (Miss Sidney) the wife of a Young Farmer (Mr Collier). Being a bit of a Don Giovanni, he makes love to her, and is in the act of offering her a kiss, when the husband comes rushing in, and protests against this innovation upon a man's wedding-day. The Colonel in vain assures him that it is the custom, and that everybody kisses people's wives, expecially on their wedding-days. Thibaut will not believe a word of it. He becomes afraid however of pressing the matter too vindictively, but argues that the Colonel would talk differently, if he were the married man. The Colonel assures him that so far from it, be will allow him to do the very same thing to his wife, whenever he marries: and to prove it, he writes him an order on his future bride, to the following effect:—

"Pay the Bearer, on demand, One Chaste Salute, value received. "Derville."

The happy man pockets the bill, goes away, and becomes the laugh of the village; of which he returns to complain: on the road he meets the Colonel's mistress, whom he knows, though he is ignorant of her engagement; and makes her laugh heartily at his grievance, the name of the criminal not happening to be disclosed. Upon seeing her subsequently, however, in the Colonel's company, and finding how the case stands, he brightens up, and reminding the lover of his promise, lets out the secret to the lady, who becomes as disconcerted as the poor man she laughed at, and threatens to give up the Colonel for ever. The old aunt comes upon the parties during this embroilment, and cannot understand it, till she is informed that the Colonel has debts,—more debts than she thinks for. The aunt, who is a good-natured, though lofty personage, is fond of the gallant officer, and, in her grand style, promises to settle all his debts. The dilemma into which she has brought herself restores good humour. Mademoiselle Lucille persuades the farmer that he is bound to give up the note he holds into the hands of the old lady, who has undertaken to discharge it on the spot. She reads, and threatens to faint, but does not:—in a word, she honours the bill, with much ceremony; and all are content but the farmer.

This piece is agreeably written; but, for the reasons above-mentioned, did not take much hold on the audience. They found themselves puzzled between the guarded propriety of the title of the piece, and the occasional intimation that a chaste salute might be a livelier thing in France than in England.

There were two new performers on this occasion, Mr Spagnoletti from the Royal Academy of Music, and Miss Sidney, we know not whence. Miss Sidney is a lively-looking girl, probably very young, who promises to be a better actress than singer, though she sang with more spirit and meaning than most debutantes. But her voice appears to be weak, and not of good quality. Allowance must be made, however, for a first appearance, both as regards lady and gentleman, especially as Mr Spagnoletti seemed hardly perfect in his part. Probably a little hissing helped to put him out. It was hardly fair, we think, in a first appearance, and towards a young singer; nor did he indeed any way deserve it; for though his voice is better in quality than in power, or at least he does not yet throw it out, he both sang and acted better than we have known many on their first appearance, who have been much encouraged. We liked in particular his walking to and fro as he sang, on one occasion. It suited the familiar style of these vaudeville pieces; and is natural in itself. Mr Spagnoletti's voice resembles Incledon's, and therefore the more disappointed, perhaps, those who found fault with him, in turning out to be comparatively so inefficient. Mr COLLIER sang his songs in the part of the young farmer with more spirit, and shewed symptoms of a promising actor; though he has no voice at all. Miss STUART made a very good pompous elderly gentlewoman; and Miss FITZWALTER was lively as well as handsome.

Digitized by Google

The music of The Chaste Salute is by Mr HORN; and though of no very solid character, is of reasonable goodness for a piece vaudeville. The words of the songs appear, from what we heard of them, to be translated with much spirit; particularly the one upon duelling, and the part in the trio beginning—

You marry Ma'amselle,
Then all will go well;

both of which are sang with much animation by Mr COLLIER.

☞

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, the Drama, (in Two Acts) called,

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]

Maria Grazie, Mrs W. BARRYMORE, Ottavia, Miss FAUCIT.
Prince Bianchi, Mr Younge, Nicolo, Mr Webster, Fabio, Mr Hughes,
Albert and Theodore, Mr H. WALLACK and Mr J. VINING,
Alessandro Massaroni, Mr WALLACK,
Rubaldo, Mr Bedford,
Spoletto, Mr Bland, Uberto, Mr Robinson, Carlotti. Mr Yarnold.

In the course of the Evening, Rossini's Overture to "Semiramide," and Mozart's Overture to "Die Entfurung aus dem Serail."

After which, a Musical Piece, (in Two Acts) called

THE ILLUSTRIOUS STRANGER.

[By Mr KENNEY.]

Irza, Miss FAUCIT, Fatima, Mrs WAYLETT,
Aboulifar, Mr Thompson, Aman, Mr Bland. Alibajou, Mr Webster,
Bowbell, Mr LISTON, Gimbo, Mr HARLEY,
High Priest, Mr Fenton, Officers, Mr C. Jones and Mr Honner.

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.

Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV, Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830, With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, Werner; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, the new Comedy of

THE CHANCERY SUIT.

Emily Travers, Miss E. Tree. Mrs Post, Mrs Gibbs. Mrs Snare, Mrs Pindar.
Jenny, Mrs J. Hughes. Miss Willowly, Mrs Daly.
Miss Sallowfield, Mrs Brown. Mrs Gravebury, Miss Appleton.
Mrs Tapsley, Mrs Tayleure. Sir Bernard Blazoncourt, Mr EGERTON.
Frederick Blazoncourt, Mr ABBOTT. Guy Thistlebloom, Mr BARTLEY.
Jeremy Thistlebloom, (under the assumed name of Courtington) Mr WARDE.
Murphy O'Doggrely, Mr POWER. Snare, Mr MEADOWS.
Winterfield, Mr BLANCHARD.
Tapsley, Mr F. Matthews. Michael, Mr Addison. Ben, Mr Evans.
Sheriff's Officer, Mr Fuller. Beadle, Mr Atkins.

Previous to the Comedy, Rossini's Overture to "Il Barbiere di Siviglia."
After the Comedy, Bishop's Overture to "The Farmer's Wife."

After which, an Interlude, called

HIDE AND SEEK.

[By Mr LUNN.]

Mrs Mordaunt, Miss E. TREE. Charlotte, Miss LAWRENCE.
Mordaunt, Mr DIDDEAR. Merton, Mr DURUSET. Moses, Mr KEELEY.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.

Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, Fazio; Teddy the Tiler; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

Act I.—WINTER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mr DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—SUMMER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

To which will be added, a New Comic Burletta, called

WAS I TO BLAME?

Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

After which, the Burlesque Burletta, called

BILLY TAYLOR.

Mary Wagstaff, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Kitty Sligo, Miss M. GLOVER.
Billy Taylor, Mr J. REEVE.
Carolus, Mr O. Smith. Captain Flatbottom, Mr S. SMITH.
Old Nicholas, Mr Chapman. Ben Blockhead, Mr Sanders.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, a Comic Burletta, to be called

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER. Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond. Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget. Capt. Cape, Mr W. VINING.

After which, a Comic Burletta, called

THE CHASTE SALUTE.

[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]

The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,
Philippe, Mr Newcombe, Thibaut, Mr Collier.

To which will be added, a Comic Burletta, called

THE LITTLE JOCKEY.

Arinette, Miss FOOTE, in which she will sing, "The Boy in yellow wins the day."
Clotilda, Miss Nursey, Mau e, Miss Kibrey.
The Baron D'Acourt, Mr W. VINING,
De Limburg, Mr Paget, Floriville, by a Gentleman, Jocose, Mr Collier,
Denis, Mr W. Young, Pierre, Mr Brown.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe,

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely new Melodrame, entitled

ZAMOR, THE MEXICAN.

The Music, by Mr Blewitt.
Ora, Miss SOMERVILLE. Joan, Miss VINCENT.
Dame Mabil, Madame SIMON. Robert, Baron Fitzallan, Mr GOUGH.
Henry Fitzallan, Nicol Colbrande, Blid, and Broadland, Mr H. KEMBLE.
Zamor, Mr OSBALDISTON. Edmund Erpingham, Mr C. HILL.
Martin Walbourn, Mr DIBDIN PITT. Peter Poundtext, Mr Webb.
Abel Lackbrain, Mr Asbury. Walter Altringham, Mr VALE.
Ralph Perkyn, Mr Rogers. Monk, Mr Young.
Raymond and Hubert, Messrs. Hobbs and Tully.

After which, a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,

THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE].

The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.
Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

To conclude with, an entirely new Drama, entitled

NANCY OF PORTSMOUTH.

Nancy Bloomfield, Miss SOMERVILLE, The Widow Crabjuice, Mad. SIMON
Constantia, Miss Jordan, Kitty Bustle, Miss Vincent, in which she will sing a Parody on "Cherry Ripe," Old Margery, Mrs Rogers,
Becky Sims, Miss Rummens. Sir Edward Gayton, Mr Gough,
Frederick Gayton, Mr Edwin, Captain Splashaway, Mr Hicks,
Joe Barton, Mr C. Hill, Fiery Nod, Mr D. Pitt, Tim Tipple, Mr VALE,
Bounce, Mr Rogers, Capt. Friendly, Mr Lee, Tapwell, Mr Hobbs,
Jemmy Gonimble, Madlle. Rosier, Long Bill, Mr Almar, Short Bill, Mr Webb.

COBURG THEATRE. — Wat Tyler and Jack Straw—Harlequin Silver Penny.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—A Deed of Blood.—Harlequin and Mother Goose.—Golden Pippin.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

№ 120.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 21, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Voyages and Discoveries of the Companions of Columbus. By Washington Irving. (Eighteenth Number of the Family Library). 18mo. pp. 337. Murray.

(Concluded from our last.)

One of the longest divisions of this entertaining volume is devoted to the adventures of Vasco Nunez de Balboa, discoverer of the Pacific Ocean. He was one of the most enterprising and engaging of all this "ocean-chivalry," (as Mr Irving happily quotes it); frank as well as fearless; of an open, prepossessing countenance, generous, and one who knew how to touch the hearts of the Indians with music, as well as frighten them with his artillery. Item, he had a dog who was accounted as good as a man.

'The Spanish writers,' Mr Irving tells us, 'make particular mention of this animal, which was the constant companion, and as it were body guard of Vasco Nunez, and describe him as minutely as they would a favourite warrior. He was of a middle size, but immensely strong; of a dull yellow or reddish colour, with a black muzzle, and his body was scarred all over with wounds received in innumerable battles with the Indians. Vasco Nunez always took him on his expeditions, and sometimes lent him to others, receiving for his services the same share of booty allotted to an armed man. In this way he gained by him, in the course of his campaigns, upwards of a thousand crowns. The Indians, it is said, had conceived such terror of this animal, that the very sight of him was sufficient to put a host of them to flight.'—P. 167.

It would be a nice point to determine how far this animal, morally as well as physically speaking, was not as good as most of the Spanish soldiers. Boswell said of Foote, that if he talked with an ostler, the ostler would answer him; (meaning that he would not treat his observations with deference, clever as he was, but give him as good as he brought.) "Yes, Sir," said Johnson, "and Foote would answer the ostler." The dog of Vasco Nunez might in like manner claim to be as good as a Spaniard; and the Spaniard would claim to be as good as the dog. We suppose he was on the pay-list.

With this dog at his side, some more animals of the same species, and one hundred and ninety soldiers (when he ought to have had a thousand) Vasco Nunez set out from his little colony of Darien, to discover the great Pacific Ocean. We shall here lay nearly two whole chapters of the book before the reader, both on account of the greatness of the event, and because Mr Irving has given us a lively sense of the feelings, probably entertained by the Spaniards on realizing their object.

'Chapter VIII.

'Expedition in quest of the Southern Sea.

'It was on the 1st of September that Vasco Nunez embarked with his followers in a brigantine and nine large canoes or pirogues, followed by the cheers and good wishes of those who remained at the settlement. Standing to the north westward, he arrived without accident at Coyba, the dominion of the cacique Careta, whose daughter he had received as a pledge of amity. That Indian beauty had acquired a great influence over Vasco Nunez, and appears to have cemented his friendship with her father and her people. He was received by the cacique with open arms, and furnished with guides and warriors to aid him in his enterprise.

'Vasco Nunez left about half of his men at Coyba to guard the brigantine and canoes, while he should penetrate the wilderness with the residue. The importance of his present expedition, not merely as affecting his own fortunes, but, as it were, unfolding a mighty secret of nature, seems to have impressed itself upon his spirit, and to have given correspondent solemnity to his conduct. Before setting out upon his march, he caused mass to be performed, and offered up prayers to God for the success of his perilous undertaking.

'It was on the 6th of September that he struck off for the mountains. The march was difficult and toilsome in the extreme. The Spaniards, encumbered by the weight of their armour and weapons, and oppressed by the heat of a tropical climate, were obliged to climb rocky precipices, and to struggle through close and tangled forests. Their Indian allies aided them by carrying their ammunition and provisions, and by guiding them to the most practicable paths.

'On the 8th of September they arrived at the village of Ponca; the ancient enemy of Careta. The village was lifeless and abandoned; the cacique and his people had fled to the fastnesses of the mountains. The Spaniards remained here several days to recruit the health of some of their number who had fallen ill. It was necessary also to procure guides acquainted with the mountain wilderness they were approaching. The retreat of Ponca was at length discovered, and he was prevailed upon, though reluctantly, to come to Vasco Nunez. The latter had a peculiar facility in winning the confidence and friendship of the natives. The cacique was soon so captivated by his kindness, that he revealed to him in secret all he knew of the natural riches of the country. He assured him of the truth of what had been told him about a great pechry, or sea beyond the mountains, and gave him several ornaments ingeniously wrought of fine gold, which had been brought from the countries upon its borders. He told him, moreover, that when he had attained the summit of a lofty ridge, to which he pointed, and which seemed to rise up to the skies, he would behold that sea spread out far below him.

'Animated by these accounts, Vasco Nunez procured fresh guides from the cacique, and prepared to ascend the mountains. Numbers of his men having fallen ill from fatigue and the heat of the climate, he ordered them to return slowly to Coyba, taking with him none but such as were in robust and vigorous health.

'On the 20th of September he again set forward, through a broken rocky country, covered with a matted forest, and intersected by deep and turbulent streams, many of which it was necessary to cross upon rafts.

'So toilsome was the journey, that in four days they did not advance above ten leagues, and in the meantime they suffered excessively from hunger. At the end of this time they arrived at the province of a warlike cacique, named Quaraquà, who was at war with Ponca.

'Hearing that a band of strangers were entering his territories, guided by the subjects of his inveterate foe, the cacique took the field with a large number of warriors, some armed with bows and arrows, others with long spears, or with double-handed maces of palm wood, almost as heavy and hard as iron. Seeing the inconsiderable number of the Spaniards, they set upon them with furious yells, thinking to overcome them in an instant. The first discharge of fire arms, however, struck them with dismay. They thought they were contending with demons who vomited forth thunder and lightning, especially when they saw their companions fall, bleeding and dead beside them, without receiving any apparent blow. They took to headlong flight, and were hotly pursued by the Spaniards and their blood-hounds. Some were transfixed with lances, others hewn down with swords, and many were torn to pieces by the dogs, so that Quaraquà and six hundred of his warriors were left dead upon the field.

'After this sanguinary triumph, the Spaniards marched to the village of Quaraquà, where they found considerable booty in gold and jewels. Of this Vasco Nunez reserved one-fifth for the crown, and shared the rest liberally among his followers. The village was at the foot of the last mountain that remained for them to climb. Several of the Spaniards, however, were so disabled by the wounds they had received in battle, or so exhausted by the fatigue and hunger they had endured, that they were unable to proceed. They were obliged therefore reluctantly to remain in the village, within sight of the mountain-top that commanded the long sought prospect. Vasco Nunez selected fresh guides from among his prisoners, who were natives of the province, and sent back the subjects of Ponca. Of the band of Spaniards who had set out with him in this enterprise, sixty-seven alone remained in sufficient health and spirits for this last effort. These he ordered to retire early to repose, that they might be ready to set off at the cool and fresh hour of day-break, so as to reach the summit of the mountain before the noon-tide heat.'—P. 168.

'Chapter IX.

'Discovery of the Pacific Ocean.

'The day had scarce dawned, when Vasco Nunez and his followers set forth from the Indian village, and began to climb the height. It was a severe and rugged toil for men so wayworn; but they were filled with new ardour at the idea of the triumphant scene that was so soon to repay them for all their hardships.

'About ten o'clock in the morning they emerged from the thick forests, through which they had hitherto struggled; and arrived at a lofty and airy region of the mountain. The bald summit alone remained to be ascended; and their guides pointed to a moderate eminence, from which they said the southern sea was visible.

Digitized by Google

'Upon this Vasco Nunez commanded his followers to halt, and that no man should stir from his place. Then, with a palpitating heart, he ascended alone the bare mountain-top. On reaching the summit, the long desired prospect burst upon his view. It was as if a new world were unfolded to him, separated from all hitherto known, by this mighty barrier of mountains. Below him extended a vast chaos of rock and forest, and green savannahs and wandering streams, while at a distance the waters of the promised ocean glittered in the morning sun.

'At this glorious prospect Vasco Nunez sank upon his knees, and poured out thanks to God for being the first European to whom it was given to make that great discovery. He then called his people to ascend: "Behold, my friends," said he, "that glorious sight which we have so much desired. Let us give thanks to God that he has granted us this great honour and advantage. Let us pray to him to guide and aid us to conquer the sea and the land which we have discovered, and which Christian has never entered to preach the holy doctrine of the Evangelists. As to yourselves, be, as you have hitherto been, faithful and true to me, and by the favour of Christ you will become the richest Spaniards that have ever come to the Indies; you will render the greatest services to your king that ever vassal rendered to his lord; and you will have the eternal glory and advantage of all that is here discovered, conquered, and converted to our holy Catholic faith."

'The Spaniards answered this speech by embracing Vasco Nunez, and promising to follow him to death. Among them was a priest, named Andres de Vara, who lifted up his voice and chanted Te Deum Laudamus—the usual anthem of Spanish discoverers. The rest, kneeling down, joined in the strain with pious enthusiasm and tears of joy; and never did a more sincere oblation rise to the deity from a sanctified altar, than from that wild mountain summit. It was indeed one of the most sublime discoveries that had yet been made in the New World, and must have opened a boundless field of conjecture to the wondering Spaniards. The imagination delights to picture forth the splendid confusion of their thoughts. Was this the great Indian Ocean studded with precious islands, abounding in gold, in gems, and spices, and bordered by the gorgeous cities and wealthy marts of the East? or was it some lonely sea locked up in the embraces of savage uncultivated continents, and never traversed by a bark, excepting the light pirogue of the savage? The latter could hardly be the case, for the natives had told the Spaniards of golden realms, and populous, and powerful and luxurious nations upon its shores. Perhaps it might be bordered by various people, civilized in fact, though differing from Europe in their civilization; who might have peculiar laws and customs, and arts and sciences; who might form, as it were, a world of their own, intercommuning by this mighty sea, and carrying on commerce between their own islands and continents; but who might exist in total ignorance and independence of the other hemisphere.

'Such may naturally have been the ideas suggested by the sight of this unknown ocean. It was the prevalent belief of the Spaniards, however, that they were the first Christians who had made the discovery. Vasco Nunez, therefore, called upon all present to witness that he took possession of that sea, its islands, and surrounding lands, in the name of the Sovereigns of Castile; and the notary of the expedition made a testimonial of the same, to which all present, to the number of sixty-seven men, signed their names. He then caused a fair and tall tree to be cut down and wrought into a cross, which was elevated on the spot from whence he had first beheld the sea. A mound of stones was likewise piled up to serve as a monument, and the names of the Castilian sovereigns were carved on the neighbouring trees. The Indians beheld all these ceremonials and rejoicings in silent wonder, and while they aided to erect the cross, and pile up the mound of stones, marvelled exceedingly at the meaning of these monuments, little thinking that they marked the subjugation of their land.

'The memorable event here recorded, took place on the 26th of September 1513; so that the Spaniards had spent twenty days in performing the journey from the province of Careta to the summit of the mountain, a distance which at present, it is said, does not require more than six days travel. Indeed the isthmus in this neighbourhood is not more than eighteen leagues in breadth in its widest part, and in some places merely seven; but it consists of a ridge of extremely high and rugged mountains. When the discoverers traversed it, they had no route but the Indian paths, and often had to force their way amidst all kinds of obstacles, both from the savage country and its savage inhabitants. In fact, the details of this narrative sufficiently account for the slowness of their progress, and present an array of difficulties and perils, which, as has been well observed, none but those "men of iron" could have subdued and overcome.'—P. 173.

We must add the account of Vasco's reaching the sea, and taking possession of it!

'Vasco Nunez being rejoined by his men from Quaraquà, now left the greater part of his followers to repose and recover from their sickness and fatigues, in the village of Cheapes; and taking with him twenty-six Spaniards, well armed, he set out on the 29th of September, for the sea coast, accompanied by the cacique and a number of his warriors. The thick forests, which covered the mountains, descended to the very margin of the sea, surrounding and overshadowing the wide and beautiful bays that penetrated far into the land. The whole coast, as far the eye could reach, was perfectly wild, the sea without a sail, and both seemed never to have been under the dominion of civilised man.

'Vasco Nunez arrived on the borders of one of those vast bays, to which he gave the name of St Michael, it being discovered on that saint's day. The tide was out, the water was above half a league distant, and the intervening beach was covered with mud; he seated himself, therefore, under the shade of the forest trees until the tide should rise. After a while the water came rushing in with great impetuosity, and soon reached nearly to the place where the Spaniards were reposing. Upon this, Vasco Nunez rose and took a banner on which were painted the Virgin and Child, and under them the arms of Castile and Leon; then drawing his sword and throwing his buckler on his shoulder he marches into the sea until the water reached above his knees, and waving his banner, exclaimed with a loud voice: "Long live the high and mighty monarch Don Ferdinand and Donna Juana, sovereigns of Castile, of Leon, and Arragon, in whose name, and for the royal crown of Castile, I take real, and corporal, and actual possession of these seas, and lands and coasts, and ports, and islands of the south; and all thereunto annexed; and of the kingdoms and provinces which do or may appertain to them, in whatever manner, or by whatever right or title, ancient or modern, in times past, present, or to come, without any contradiction; and if other prince or captain, christian or infidel, or of any law, sect or condition whatsoever, shall pretend any right to these lands or seas, I am ready prepared to maintain and defend them in the name of the Castilian sovereigns, present and future, whose is the empire and dominion over these Indias, islands and terra firma, northern and southern, with all their seas, both at the arctic and antarctic poles, on either side of the equinoxial line, whether within or without the tropics of cancer and capricorn, both now and in all times, as long as the world endures, and until the final day of judgment of all mankind."

'This swelling declaration and defiance being uttered with a loud voice, and no one appearing to dispute his pretensions, Vasco Nunez called upon his companions to bear witness of the fact of his having duly taken possession. They all declared themselves ready to defend his claim to the uttermost, as became true and loyal vassals to the Castilian sovereigns; and the notary having drawn up a document for the occasion, they all subscribed it with their names.'—P. 179.

It is difficult to think of the human being, thus taking fancied possession of a great ocean, without calling to mind the King of Lilliput drawing his sword in case the Man-Mountain should break loose. Moral grandeur, however, restores human nature to its dignity. Into this sea, Vasco Nunez afterwards transported the first ships that ploughed it, across the mountains; the inhabitants of its islands are able to laugh at the King of Spain, and the descendants of his followers, if they have any, laugh at him themselves, and are helping to extend liberty over the globe.

It is painful to reflect on the calamitous circumstances under which these high-minded adventurers were accustomed to terminate their careers, however brilliant their successes by the way. They got riches and territory for others, and generally died in poverty, often of wounds and disease, sometimes by the hands of the executioner. Pinzon, who first crossed the equinoctial line in the New Hemisphere, and discovered Brazil, got nothing by his voyage of discovery but heavy losses. Nicuesa disappeared, and was supposed to have perished at sea. Valdivia was killed and eaten by cannibals. Ponce de Leon, who thought to discover the fountain of youth, died of a wound exasperated by mortified pride and disappointment. The lofty and romantic Don Alonzo de Ojeda died so poor, that he did not leave money enough to provide for his interment; and so broken in spirit, that with his last breath he entreated that his body might be buried in the monastery of San Francisco, just at the portal, in humble expiation of his past pride, that "every one who entered might tread upon his grave." And Vasco Nunez de Balboa, "one of the most illustrious and deserving" of the whole brotherhood of discovery perished on the scaffold, "a victim to the basest and most perfidious envy." His fate, adds Mr Irving, "like that of his renowned predecessor, Columbus, proves that it is sometimes dangerous even to deserve too greatly." It is to be recollected, however, that such men accomplish the first object of their ambition—renown; and that life, and not death, is the main thing by which we are to judge of their happiness.

Mr Irving's book is written in his usual tranquil and pleasing style. We observed but one Americanism (or what we presume to be such) in the use of the word tale as a verb. Vasco Nunez ordered a brawling ruffian a hundred lashes, "which were taled out roundly to him upon the shoulders." The phrase in England, we believe, is never any other than told. Another word (at page 321) must be a momentary slip of the memory, and therefore we need not point it out to the author; but he will be glad to correct it when reprinted. Mr Irving, we hope, will go through the round of early American history; and give us a life of Cortes, with the fine head of him, after Titian, a print of which is to be found in the English translation of De Solis's 'Conquest of Mexico.'

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—The Brigand.—The Illustrious Stranger.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—The Chancery Suit.—Hide and Seek.—And the Pantomime.

ADELPHI.

THE farce of Billy Taylor is one of the broad burlesques which they sometimes bring out at this theatre, and, we think, not one of the best, though there are some good touches in it, and REEVE is in high condition. The hero, like Æneas, who does not know? him, the the same false Billy Taylor, who forsook his mistress, as the other forsook Dido, and who fell by her hand, as the other deserved to do? His adventures are here told at greater length; but the author has departed from the heroic simplicity of the original.

Billy Taylor (Mr REEVE) a fat apprentice in an advanced stage of his youth, but habited like a boy, is observed by his Mistress (Mrs FITZWILLIAM), from her wooden balcony,

> '——————— walking the streets
> With two improper women'

(for the drama is in blank verse). Billy suddenly recollects that he is close to the lady's house, dismisses the two other ladies (who, having robbed him of his watch, beg him not to apologize), and turning to his injured but forgiving fair, commences a scene in the Romeo style, in which he is interrupted by his rival Carolus (videlicet, Charley, a watchman), who defies him to single combat. They fight to pleasing music, accommodating each other with harmonious blows; and Carolus is finally run through the body with Taylor's bludgeon, which is passed and re-passed through him several times. Billy struts off, conqueror. Carolus rises (for death, on these occasions, is always a trifle, not worth detaining a man) and proceeds to raise the Devil, by putting into a cauldron such ingredients as a pawnbroker's ball, the conscience of a Marshalsea attorney, a bad sixpence paid at the door of the Adelphi theatre, &c. The Devil comes up, and turns out to be a lawyer. Carolus (Mr O. SMITH by the way, who is generally the devil himself) requests his assistance against Taylor. The fiend turns himself into a pretty girl (Miss GLOVER), gets acquainted with Taylor at a Finish, and betrays him into the hands of a press-gang, who take him to sea. The watchman, now converted into a police-man, and claiming, in right of his office, the privilege of becoming acquainted with > '——————— all the inmates of a house

> Particularly the cooks and chambermaids," proceeds to throw himself at the feet of Mary, Taylor's mistress, who rejects him, and resolves to follow her true-love. She accordingly dresses herself like a sailor-boy, and joining the ship's company, observes with anguish her false Billy solacing his captivity with the beauty of the she-devil. An engagement takes place between the vessel and a whole fleet, which, by the heroical exertions of Billy and his Mistress, are blown up; she discloses herself, and shoots him; the police-man, who has followed her, is followed by the Devil, who has cheated him in a bond he gave him, and comes to claim him at the end of two days instead of six years. Taylor then gets up, of course, from so small an overthrow as death, and the piece concludes by putting a cocked hat on the head of the forgiving bride, and making her a lieutenant.

The reader will guess at some of the pleasant touches we spoke of, by those we have quoted. REEVE is as burly, quaint, flustered-looking, and energetic as usual; kicks a hornpipe in good style; sings one or two songs (not good); and gives one of his very best pieces of gusto, where he tells the watchman that his life may be taken, "but his body never." At this last sentence he puts himself in warlike attitude, jumps up with his legs apart, and, in order to give the sentiment its proper energy, comes down upon the word in Italics with all his might. But this amusing actor, with all his cleverness, is too apt to confound humour with coarseness; and the writers here seem too anxious to encourage him in his mistake; which is a pity; for there is ample room for burlesque without it, and the audience, by a silence which does them credit, might surely prove to the managers that they would do well to clip the exuberance. We dislike the common cant and mistake about "vulgarity," as much as any one; but for that very reason, we love to see a large and liberal humour divested of what degrades any class of life.

We are sorry the author did not adhere to the simple incidents of the ballad. The piece would have been better for being shorter, and the pithy proceedings of the heroine would have had more justice done them. In the matter of the swords and pistols, for nstance, which she calls for—

> '(Strait she call'd for swords and pistols,
> Brought they was at her command,
> She fell on shooting Billy Taylor,
> With his lady in his hand).'

The beautiful improbability of this circumstance (Brought they was at her command) would have told much better in a street, than on board ship. Anybody may call for swords and pistols on board ship, and have them supplied; but to make a demand for them in Holborn or Ratcliffe Highway, and find them immediately put into one's hands by a start of unknown shopmen, is an incident worth keeping in all its truth. ☞

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

TRUE DISPATCH.—Sir Amyas Paulet, when he saw too much haste in any matter, was wont to say, "Stay awhile, that we may make an end the sooner."—Bacon.—[This is a paraphrase on the adage Festina lente, of which we have a counterpart in the English saying, "Make a little slow haste." It is translated with great brevity in the name of ONSLOW. The Onslow family of baronets have Festina lente for a motto.]

ONE OF THOSE MAXIMS OF WHICH IT IS SAID THAT THEY "CANNOT BE TOO OFTEN REPEATED."—A knave will often succeed better, for a time, than an honest man. It is in the long run that he fails.—Irving's Companions of Columbus.—It may be added, that final success is impossible to a knave, however he may appear to attain it; because he will have spoilt in the process all true relish for enjoyment.]

LORD BACON'S FATHER—THE GENEROUS TURN HE GAVE TO A QUESTION ABOUT TREASON.—The book of deposing King Richard the Second, and the coming in of Henry IV, supposed to be written by Dr Hayer, and who was committed to the Tower for it, had much incensed Queen Elizabeth; and she asked Mr Bacon, being then of her learned counsel, "Whether there were any treason contained in it?" Mr Bacon, intending to do him a pleasure, and to take off the Queen's bitterness with a merry conceit, answered, "No, madam, for treason I cannot deliver opinion that there is any; but very much felony." The Queen apprehending it gladly, asked, "How? and wherein?" Mr Bacon answered, "Because he had stolen many of his sentences and conceits out of Cornelius Tacitus."

NATURAL SLUGGISHNESS OF THE PEOPLE TO RIGHT THEMSELVES.—(Patriotism therefore the more desirable.)—That the business of most kingdoms has been ill managed, proceeds from this; it imports the lower ranks of men only, and the people (whose cries seldom reach the Prince till it is too late, till all is past remedy) that matters should be frugally ordered, because Taxes must arise from the sweat of their labour. But the great ones who heretofore have had the Princes ear as favour, or who hoped to have him in their possession, were swayed by another sort of interest; they like profusion, as having had a prospect to be gainers by it, they can easily set their account even with the state; a small charge upon their land is more than balanced by a great place or a large pension.—[The correspondent who kindly sends us this, and other seasonable passages, quotes at the end of it, "Daven. ii. 268"—we presume Davenant, the statist.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The kind recommendation of Δ has been anticipated. He will see, before long, his wishes put in execution.

AMELIA has always our best thanks; and must not think ill of us, or of herself, if what she writes does not always happen to suit our pages.

An answer was left for Epsilon, as he desired; but has been returned us, uncalled for. It is again left at the office in Catherine street.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, Lord BYRON's Tragedy of

WERNER, OR THE INHERITANCE.

[Adapted by Mr MACREADY.]

Josephine, Mrs PAUCIT, Ida Stralenheim, Miss PAUCIT.
Werner, Mr MACREADY, Ulric, Mr WALLACK, Gabor, Mr COOPER,
Baron Stralenheim, Mr H. Wallack, Fritz, Mr Younge, Otto, Mr Cohen,
Henric, Mr Salter, Eric, Mr C. Jones, Idenstein, Mr W. Bennett,
Rodolph, Mr Cooke, Arnheim, Mr Fenton, Meister, Mr Eaton,
Ludwig, Mr Cathie, Herman, Mr S. Jones.

Previous to the Tragedy will be performed, Heinrich Marschner's Overture to "Der Vampyr."

After which,

PERFECTION.

[By Mr BAYLY.]

Kate O'Brien, Mrs WAYLETT, in which she will sing "My own Blue Bell," and "Kate Kearney."
Susan, Mrs ORGER.
Charles Paragon, Mr VINING, Sir Lawrence Paragon, Mr W. BENNETT,
Sam, Mr WEBSTER.

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

To-morrow, Rob Roy; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, the Tragedy of

FAZIO.

[By Mr MILMAN.]

Marchesa Aldabella, Mrs CHATTERLEY, Clara, Miss PHILLIPS,
Bianca, (4th time) Miss F. KEMBLE. Giraldi Fazio, Mr WARDE,
Duke of Florence, Mr EGERTON. Bartolo, Mr BLANCHARD,
Philario, Mr Henry, Falsetto, Mr Parry, Gonsalvo, Mr Baker,
Theodore, Mr Mears, Keeper, Mr Fuller, Pietro, Mr Turnour,
Gentleman, Mr Irwin, Antonio, Mr Heath, Aurio, Mr Crumpton.

Previous to the Tragedy, a Grand MS. Overture by Friedrich Kuhlau.

After which,

TEDDY THE TILER.

[By Mr G. H. RODWELL.]

Lady Dunderford, Mrs Daly, Oriel, Miss Lawrence, Flora, Miss Nelson,
Julia, Mrs Brown. Lord Dunderford, Mr Evans, Henry, Mr Duruset,
Frederick, Mr Baker, Bombardine, Mr Henry, Mr Scrivener, Mr Turnour,
Teddy Mulowney, the Tiler, Mr POWER,
Tim, Mr Addison, Stiff, Mr Mears, Apewell, Mr Irwin.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PRAKE.] Characters by
Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

To-morrow, Cinderella; and the Pantomime.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

The following Performers will appear for the First Time in London:—
Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY, du Theâtre du Gymnase.
Madame ALBERT, du Theâtre des Nouveautés.
M. LEPEINTRE, Ainé, du Theâtre du Vaudeville.

This Evening,
On commencera à Sept Heures et demie, par

LA DEMOISELLE A MARIER.

Vaudeville nouveau en Un Acte, de MM. SCRIBE et MELESVILLE.
Madame Dumesnil, Mme. Préval. Camille, sa Fille, Mlle. HERMINIE.
M. Dumesnil, M. Cloup. Alphonse de Luceval, Prétendu de Camille, M. Alfred.
Ducoudrai, Ami de M. Dumesnil, M. Gamard. Baptiste, Domestique, M. Guenée.

Suivi de la Première Représentation de

JULIEN.

Vaudeville en Deux Actes, de MM. DARTOIS et XAVIER.
1er. ACTE.
Il se passe au Chateau du Baron, avant la Révolution.
Emilie, Fille du Baron, Mlle. St. Ange.
La Comtesse, Grand'maman d'Emilie, Madame Préval.
Fanchette, Villageoise, attachée a Emilie, Mademoiselle HERMINIE.
Le Comte d'Hercourt, M. ST AUBERT.
Le Marquis de Mirval, Futur d Emilie, M. Alfred.
Jacques, Fermier du Baron, Oncle de Julien, M. Laporte.
Julien, Neveu de Jacques, M. DERVAL.
Garou, Jardinier, amoureux de Fanchette, M. Gamard.
2me. ACTE,
Il se passe a Paris, chez le Baron de Stétin, après Vingt-cinq Ans d'entr'acte.
Camille, Fille du Baron, Mademoiselle FLORVAL.
Madame Dufour de Mirval, Mlle. St. Ange.
Fanchette, Femme de Garou, Mademoiselle HERMINIE.
Le Baron de Stetin, M. DERVAL. Jacques Sollié, son Oncle, M. Laporte.
Ernest, jeune Peintre, Fils de Mad. me de Mirval, M. PAULIN.
Garou, ancien Domestique de Madame Dufour, M. Gamard.
Lefleur, Comtois et Champagne, Valets du Baron, MM. Arnaud, Granville et Guenée.

On Finira par la Première Représentation de

LA FAMILLE DE L'APOTHICAIRE.

Vaudeville nouveau en Un Acte, par MM. DUVERT, DESSERGES et VARIN.
Henriette, Femme de Barnabé, Mademoiselle St. Ange.
Heloïse, Fille de Benoit, Mlle. FLORVAL.
Gertrude, vieille Gouvernante, Madame Baudin.
M. Benoit, Pharmacien, M. Préval. Barnabé, son Neveu, M. Laporte.
Gusman, élove Pharmacien, M. Arnaud.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

Act I.—WINTER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mr DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.
[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—SUMMER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

To which will be added, a New Comic Burletta, called

WAS I TO BLAME?

Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

After which, the Burlesque Burletta, called

BILLY TAYLOR.

Mary Wagstaff, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Kitty Sligo, Miss M. GLOVER.
Billy Taylor, Mr J. REEVE.
Carolus, Mr O. Smith. Captain Flatbottom, Mr S. SMITH.
Old Nicholas, Mr Chapman. Ben Blockhead, Mr Sanders.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, a Comic Burletta, to be called

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER. Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond. Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget. Capt. Cape, Mr W. VINING.

After which, a Comic Burletta, called

THE CHASTE SALUTE.

[From M. SCRIBE's "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]

The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,
Philippe, Mr Newcombe, Thibaut, Mr Collier.

To which will be added, a Comic Burletta, called

THE LITTLE JOCKEY.

Arinette, Miss FOOTE, in which she will sing, "The Boy in yellow wins the day."
Clotilda, Miss Nursey, Maude, Miss Kibrey.
The Baron D'Acourt, Mr W. VINING,
De Limburg, Mr Paget, Floriville, by a Gentleman, Jocose, Mr Collier,
Denis, Mr W. Young, Pierre, Mr Brown.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN's, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Manufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young.
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe,

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, an entirely new Melodrame, entitled

ZAMOR, THE MEXICAN.

The Music, by Mr Blewitt.
Ora, Miss SOMERVILLE. Joan, Miss VINCENT.
Dame Mabil, Madame SIMON. Robert, Baron Fitzallan, Mr GOUGH.
Henry Fitzallan, Nicol Colbrande, Blid, and Broadland, Mr H. KEMBLE.
Zamor, Mr OSBALDISTON. Edmund Erpingham, Mr C. HILL.
Martin Walbourn, Mr DIBDIN PITT. Peter Poundtext, Mr Webb.
Abel Lackbrain, Mr Asbury. Walter Altringham, Mr VALE.
Ralph Perkyn, Mr Rogers. Monk, Mr Young.
Raymond and Hubert, Messrs. Hobbs and Tully.

After which, a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,

THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE].

The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.
Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

To conclude with, an entirely new Drama, entitled

NANCY OF PORTSMOUTH.

Nancy Bloomfield, Miss SOMERVILLE, The Widow Crabjuice, Mad. SIMON.
Constantia, Miss Jordan, Kitty Bustle, Miss Vincent, in which she will sing a Parody on "Cherry Ripe," Old Margery, Mrs Rogers,
Becky Sims, Miss Rummens. Sir Edward Gayton, Mr Gough,
Frederick Gayton, Mr Edwin, Captain Splashaway, Mr Hicks,
Joe Barton, Mr C. Hill, Fiery Ned, Mr D. Pitt, Tim Tipple, Mr VALE,
Bounce, Mr Rogers, Capt. Friendly, Mr Lee, Tapwell, Mr Hobbs,
Jemmy Gonimble, Madlle. Rosier, Long Bill, Mr Almar, Short Bill, Mr Webb.

COBURG THEATRE. — Wat Tyler and Jack Straw—Harlequin Silver Penny.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—A Deed of Blood.—Harlequin and Mother Goose.—Golden Pippin.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

No. 121.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 22, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Letter I, to Lord Viscount Althorpe, on the Ruinous Consequence of the Oligarchical System of Government. By J. V. 8vo. pp. 33. Ridgway.

We regard this pamphlet not only as a sensible production, but as a striking sign of the times. Its main object is one of great importance, hitherto little noticed, but which will force itself into notice more and more every day; and which arises out of a natural impatience of a people in a rapidly increasing state of knowledge, to be governed either in great or small matters, by a privileged few. In other words, thousands of Englishmen feel themselves better qualified to direct the nation, by dint of the sincerity which they unite with their intelligence, and the necessity there is for both, than men whose corrupt interests polute and neutralize what honesty they possess, who are no wiser by nature than the others, and not half so wise by zeal for the common good.

We do not agree with every one of the author's positions. We are surprised indeed at one or two of them which are plainly refuted on his own showing. He describes England, for example, as "the country that enjoys at this moment more intelligence, zeal and energy in its inhabitants, than can elsewhere be found;" but how can he say this, when he argues that the public voice has nowhere an opportunity of expressing itself? and that "cities and boroughs are generally ruled by a knot of self-elected rotten magistrates, sold to some aristocrat for court patronage?" On the same grounds, how does he make out that the House of Peers is "wisely hereditary?" We do not say whether it is so or not; though we have an admirable pamphlet by the side of us, by Mr Bentham, which we suspect will settle that question with many who doubt it at present. But what is there in the pamphlet before us, the express purpose of which is to show us the ruinous consequence of an oligarchical system of government, to prove that the House of Peers is "wisely hereditary?" The author says in his very next sentence, that the House of Peers nominates a majority of the House of Commons: and every page goes to prove that the undeserving few rule and misrule at the expence of the many, solely upon the ground of their having continued to do so. Now, what sort of wisdom of inheritance is this? If the sentence is a mere tub to the hereditary whale, thrown out to conciliate, we think it is high time for all intelligent men to put an end to these insincerities. They are but poor weapons for parrying hostility, and should be left to those who are in the habit of paying a cause the ill-compliment of thinking it needs them. State tricks should be left to the State. The cause of mankind is not to be argued in a barrister's gown, but without disguises and mummeries of any sort.

We gladly turn from these little defects in the pamphlet, to make some extracts from it, which we think highly deserving attention. If we do not agree with the author in thinking that Englishmen, just now, are more intelligent, zealous, and energetic than the inhabitants of any other country, we believe that there is a great desire among them to recover their reputation to that effect, and quite enough power to do all that the author wishes, if they set heartily about it. Nor is there any symptom of their wish to do so, that we hail with more pleasure than a pamphlet of this nature, and those inquiries, lately set on foot, into Select Vestries. The man that first inquired into the merits of select vestries, was doing more harm to the "select" of all conditions than he was aware of.

'It is but too well known,' says our author, 'that from the administration of Sir Robert Walpole until that of the Duke of Wellington, the measures of government, with all their jobs, have been carried through by a majority of the House of Commons, which majority was obtained by dealing out the government patronage to boroughmongers and others holding seats in the House. The tremendous profusion and profligate expenditure of Pitt's administration, enabled that minister, and those of his school who succeeded, to command more ample and devoted majorities than had ever been known before: but these were acquired by running the nation into debts and difficulties, and by forestalling the patronage of future administrations; and thus the system, which worked so long and so well for those who had a voice in the management of affairs, but so ill for the nation at large, has fairly worked itself to an end, and the utmost patronage now left to government is unable to purchase a majority in the House of Commons, and administrations must now be constrained to throw themselves and measures for support on the feeling and opinion of the public; and justice will be at last redeemed by there remaining no longer interests to contend against it; matters have been at the same time drawing fast to a head in another quarter. The middle and lower classes of the people had become too enlightened on the management of public affairs not to see with disgust the perversion of general interests to particular ones, and the baneful effects of the monopoly of power by the landowners, by which they had been enabled, in a great lapse of time, to build up an artful system of policy for their own immediate benefit; but tending to the slavery, the demoralization, and the misery of the poor, with whom, evil has increased to a degree full of alarm and danger to the monopolists themselves. These two causes, originating in such opposite points, and proceeding from such different classes of people, have met, as extremes generally do when things get to the worst.'—P. 2.

'Laissons nous à faire, was the answer of the French merchants to Louis XIV, when he desired to legislate for their interests, and that is the motto and the remedy I propose for all our evils. Let the people manage their own affairs; that is, let them be everywhere fairly and freely represented. From the aristocrats we have had thousands of acts of parliament, mostly tending to make a plain question a confused one, to create a dozen mischiefs in stopping one, to make a worse appear a better reason, to prefer a bad precedent to a good argument, to shield and uphold a false system of over-legislation and vexation; for as one lie requires many, so does one unjust political act require many. But enough of them: let us now try our hands. The King and the House of Peers are hereditary: so let them be. But the House of Commons, in the true spirit of our constitution, and in common sense and common honesty, is the patrimony of the people. Let us begin there to enjoy a free representation of the people! Let every man have a voice who has a stake in the welfare of his country, as the first step in our political redemption! Next let the counties, cities, boroughs, hundreds, and parishes be thrown open to the management of those freely elected by the people. Thus and thus only can we expect to find a force sufficiently wide and grasping to emancipate us from our burthens and wrongs; and from such a new order of things fairly developed, should I expect to see the British empire rise from its fallen state, and shake off its weakness and distress, as a lion shakes the dew from his mane. Questions of great national import would then stand on their naked merits, disencumbered of the difficulties thrown in by chicanery through interested motives, and all the talent and zeal of the nation would be embarked in the public direction of affairs through every grade of the state and the communities.

* * * * *

'At the present moment, the public mind looks too intensely to a reformation of parliament as a cure for all our evils. If this delusion prevails, disappointment must ensue: it is, indeed, the FIRST IN ORDER, but not in importance. It is in the provinces and parishes, with which our interests are most nearly allied, that we must look for the voice of the people producing its principal effect. We desire to live in a well-ordered town, but still more so in a well-ordered street, and most of all in a well-ordered house. Of what advantage to us is a voice in parliament, if deprived of one in our county and parish? It is in the details of the management that improvements must take place to produce great effects: there we must recover our influence, and there exercise our vigilance.

* * * * * * *

'This directly leads me to treat of another class of evils, that have materially assisted in the misrule and consequent distress of the country. I allude to the state of the system of divisions and subdivisions of the empire, of which it is impossible to speak, except as that of a mass of confusion, tending, instead of facilitating good management, to place difficulties in the way of every kind of management.

'Our very renowned king and lawgiver, Alfred of sacred memory, about the year 890, divided his kingdom into shires, hundreds, tithings, &c., creating a regular series of divisions, by which his code of laws found an easy and effectual administration. But it is now nearly one thousand years since that wise prince formed his code of laws, and founded the divisions of his empire. The first was, in a great measure, upset by William the First. But the divisions still remain, though no longer on the equable and useful plan of the founder: many alterations have been made since his time, to meet private purposes, but defeating public utility. In Henry the Second's time, Rutlandshire was taken out of Northamptonshire, and the boundaries of others have been varied, and parts of one county consigned to another; so that many of the faults and irregularities of the present system are not due to Alfred, but have been introduced since his time to meet selfish ends.

Digitized by Google

'No man who has paid attention to the administration and application of laws, and all those other regulations necessary to internal management and order, can have failed to perceive that nothing but a well-combined system of divisions can give due effect to these. It is to such a precise system that the modern armies of Europe maintain their discipline and order and facility of management, and, consequently, superiority; and I contend, that it is to the want of such a system in the British empire, that we owe much of our weakness and distress; for under the existing state of divisions, so varied in the size of the county and parish, that they are the same but in name, and would require separate enactments for the good government of each individual community. What is a parish in London? Some of the large ones contain nearly 100,000 inhabitants; while in the same city there are one hundred parishes, the total amount of the inhabitants of which do not exceed 100,000. Here we have one equal to one hundred, and one hundred equal to one, in the self-same city. I may ask, would no advantage arise from equalising and defining these communities? Does not clerical patronage stand in the way? And does not that patronage, continued for the interests of a few, stand successfully opposed to the interests of the many? Let but the London parishes be remodified and restricted to a population of about one thousand souls, and there will be an end to parish jobbing and select vestries, &c.

'It would not answer to make frequent changes in the divisions of the state; better to suffer some inconvenience from inequality of population than to be changing too often. But as one thousand years have now passed since a remodification has taken place, it cannot be deemed a too early or frequent reformation, if now carried into effect. Amongst the numerous evils of the first French Revolution, France obtained some important benefits, and one of the greatest was a new system of divisions, which ensured an efficacious and faithful application of the new laws and institutions of the empire; and indeed without which they could not have been framed: and such must also be the case in Britain, if any important improvement in the interior economy of the empire is ever permitted to take place.

'The following facts are selected from the population return of 1821, to show the state of disorder and irregularity into which the present system of divisions has fallen.

'England, Scotland, and Wales, contain eighty-four counties, of which, the three most populous contain an average of 1,146,200 inhabitants, and of which the three least populous contain an average of 7,500 inhabitants; that is, the average population of the three highest is one hundred and fifty-three times greater than the average of the three lowest.

'The average population of all the counties is 170,878; so that the county of York is seven times greater than the average, and the county of Selkirk is twenty-five times less than the average.

'England, Scotland, and Wales, contain 11,641 parishes, of these Norfolk has five parishes with an average population of only 14½ souls, and Middlesex has five parishes with an average population of 62,343, being four thousand two hundred and seventy times more than the average of the five smallest in Norfolk.

'The average population of all the parishes in Great Britain is 1,233, so that the most populous parish, Marylebone, is seventy-eight times greater than the average, and the five small Norfolk parishes are eighty times less than the average.

'There are twenty-four counties with a population under 50,000, and there are about a dozen parishes with a population above it.

'A county is therefore a community containing from 6,800 souls to 1,197,100; and a parish is a community containing from 10 souls to 96,040; and a parish, which ought to be a subdivision of a county, may contain a population fourteen times greater.'

The author adds, that

'In Norfolk, which consists of seven hundred and twenty-two parishes, about 30,000*l.* a-year is spent in litigation between them, for which there could neither be a pretext or necessity, if a well-defined chain of relations had existed between the parishes and counties.'

At page 12 is a long passage from Lord Byron's 'Age of Bronze,' remarkable for resembling the prosaic homeliness of De Foe's verses, as well as breathing his love of freedom; when it is well known, that there was no greater aristocrat than his Lordship, nor one who cared less for the people, except where he thought he could use their cause as a weapon of offence or a help to notoriety. He was one of those who adopt a popular side of politics, not out of sympathy with the many, but rivalry of the few;—a common mistake with proud men, and a rock on which, sooner or later, their reputation is sure to split.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Werner.—Perfection.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Fazio.—Teddy the Tiler.—And the Pantomime.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.

WE have been much pleased and interested with a little piece we saw here last night, called The Lost Son. There is an amiable domesticity about it, which before the late French Revolution would have induced us to think it taken from the German; for though we always thought that enough justice was not done to the social virtues of the French, yet the predominance of wit and raillery in their literature had not left us free from prejudice on that head; while, on the other hand, the enthusiasm of the German poets, and the pretty household pictures so common in the novels of Augustus La Fontaine, had induced us to people half Germany with the most loveable of young women. And we have great faith still in those novels and the pictures they paint; but after the late noble Revolution in France, there is not a virtue nor a charm under the sun for which we could not give credit to the French nation, particularly the younger part of it.—After all, there is nothing particularly virtuous in the piece before us; but it has a character of domestic simplicity and single-heartedness, not commonly to be found in the gay burlettas of our lively neighbours; and the novelty pleased us, as well as the matter.

Madame Sainville (Mrs KNIGHT) has a son (Mr BROUGHAM) who is an officer serving in Russia, and whom by some chance, of which we did not catch the elucidation, she has not seen since he was a child. At least, we presume so, for otherwise the subsequent events become unaccountable. We remember there was something said by the sister (Miss FOOTE) about not having seen him a great while; but though we saw the whole piece, we do not recollect the explanation of the mother's ignorance of his features This ignorance, however, is absolutely necessary to the story, and therefore we conclude it is accounted for, though we did not happen to hear it.—Well: Madame Sainville and her daughter expect every day to hear from her son, perhaps to see him. Madame is in bad health, which is not the better for her son's long absence; and in her anxiety for her child's welfare, she has found her a suitor, more lively than agreeable, in the person of the Baron de Neirstein (Mr COOPER) a fantastic gentleman in a large embroidered coat. A young officer (Mr RAYMOND) suddenly makes his appearance before this gentleman, (who haunts the house of his proposed mother-in-law) and requests to be shewn to the lady. The Baron refuses, on the groundof her ill health, till he understands that the stranger comes from Russia; upon which he darts off, in order to indulge his volatility and self-importance with being the first to announce the arrival of the long expected son,—which the stranger is not. Madame and Mademoiselle Sainville come rejoicing in, and embrace the young officer as son and brother; who, for his part, finds himself in a cruel state of perplexity. Charmed with the daughter, and not having the heart to undeceive the mother by telling her that her son is drowned (which he thinks him) he gives into the delusion: and here ensues the most amusing portion of the piece, which consists in what would be so much love-making on the part of the poor girl, if she did not think the young officer her brother. She rejoices in having such a brother, praises his handsomeness and his eyes, expresses to him her wonder that he does not embrace her, and to crown all, whispers into his fraternal ear, while the mother is sleeping, that she has no inclination for the proposed match with the Baron, her heart having been forestalled in a very singular manner by the praises which her brother's letters from Russia lavished on a certain Eugene de Nerseuil, a brother officer, who saved his life; that is to say, the man himself who stands before her. Eugene is delighted, but becomes full of uneasiness at his involuntary deception, dreading the effect which the disclosure will make on the mother's health, and which every moment nevertheless renders more necessary.

Digitized by Google

Meanwhile the attentions of the unconscious Leontine (for such is her name) continue, and give rise to some amusing passages. At length, the disclosure is forced open upon all but the mother, by the arrival of Henriette, niece to Madame (Miss Nursey) who is the promised wife of the absent son, and must have been personally acquainted with him, for she knew him by sight, and therefore sees that the officer before her is not the man. The Baron, who happens to be present at this discovery, threatens to go and tell the sick lady, and is with difficulty prevailed upon not to do so. Leontine is now in a sad dilemma, on her side, and threatens to be angry with her new suitor for ever, for palming himself upon them for her brother (an accusation, by the by, hardly compatible with the innocence and kindliness of her nature). The mother, at this juncture, comes in, and after wondering what could have happened to make them all look so grave, gives her daughter a chain of the latter's hair, which she had been plaiting on purpose, and orders her to put it round her 'brother's' neck. She does it, with a very ill grace. Madame then tells the 'brother' to give his sister a kiss for it, which causes a new perplexity. In a word, the moment for the disclosure has now inevitably come, and the whole party are wondering how it can take place, when the Doctor (Mr W. Vining) who is always coming backwards and forwards to feel Madame's pulse, and who had been summoned to attend a stranger, makes his appearance, and gradually gives his patient to understand, that the officer before her is not her son, and that the stranger is; his life having been miraculously preserved, after his friend thought him gone. Due preparation having thus been made for the shock, the stranger (Mr Brougham) enters, embraces his mother and sister, gives the hand of the latter to his friend; and the curtain drops.

There is something extremely tranquil, natural, and home-like in the conduct of this little piece throughout; and it is acted in a manner highly creditable to the performers. Mrs Knight, in the mother, behaved very much as a lady under her circumstances would; took to her arm-chair in a very gentlewomanly, unfussy manner; and rallied her daughter and supposed son on their gaucherie in a style of affectionate pleasantry. Mr W. Vining is a good, gossipping, pulse-feeling, never-ending village doctor, as fussy as the lady is the reverse; and Miss Foote makes an excellent daughter and "good girl," as attentive as can be to the good mamma, and with enough heart in her to overflow at a minute's notice towards the gallant stranger, whom she takes for her brother, and to whom she confides the dreams of her love. And the others act very reasonably, especially Mr Cooper in the Baron. We would recommend Mr Raymond to return the embraces of the two ladies a little less remotely, while he is about it: and when the real son makes his appearance, surely there ought to be much more embracing than there is.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Pleasing Quartett.—Alphonso of Arragon said, that he was greatly pleased with four things, viz. dry wood for firing, wine of a year old for drinking, an old friend for conversation, and an old book for reading.—[This quartett, we fear, is old; but so are many of Mozart's, which we are yet pleased to "have again."]

Religious Unity.—There is nothing wanting to make all rational and disinterested people in the world of one religion, but that they should talk together every day.—Pope. [It might be added, that the same thing only is wanted, to make mankind of one opinion in politics.]

The Comet.—The presence of the comet in the constellation Ophineus, brings to memory the fine lines of Milton, describing the combat between Death and Satan:—

> So spake the grisly Terrour, and in shape,
> So speaking and so threatening, grew tenfold
> More dreadful and deformed. On the other side,
> Incensed with indignation, Satan stood
> Unterrified, and like a comet burned,
> That fires the length of Ophineus huge
> In the arctick sky, and from his horrid hair,
> Shakes pestilence and war.

Alas! it is now understood that comets have had much injured reputations; and that wars have been shaken out of the horrid wigs of the old gentlemen who have hitherto undertaken to rule this earth.

Tutors in Nubibus.—Happy those princes, who are educated by men who are at once virtuous and wise, and have been for some time in the school of affliction; who weigh happiness against glory, and teach their Royal pupils the real virtue of fame; who are ever showing the superior dignity of man to that of Royalty; that a peasant who does his duty is a nobler character than a king of even middling reputation.—Goldsmith.—[But where are these happy princes and fine tutors?]

Capacity for Friendship.—We may often exercise a choice as to who shall be our companions, but we have little control over the circumstances out of which friendship grows; and, therefore, instances of its successful formation, though delightful to hear of, can seldom be held forth for imitation. Yet the experienced may do well to warn the warm-hearted and confiding not to rely implicitly on any man, however kind and generous may be his present conduct, if he do not possess, besides a naturally amiable disposition, a conscience regulated by principle, and an understanding clear of discernment, and too strong to be swayed by the opinions of a multitude, or,—what is not less influential on the weak-minded,—the vicissitudes of fortune.—F. F.

Good in Evil.—There is a class of evils which afflict mankind, which are rightly called imaginary. It is not, however, disputed that their effects are real. What is the remedy? A resolute exercise of the judgment, for the disease has arisen from the improper ascendancy of the imagination. There is a reverse case; the evil is confessedly real, and it is felt but too painfully to be so. The mind, confined as within walls, is conscious of nothing but the present moment. Here the imagination is at fault, and the judgment is a sufferer by its undue depression. Otherwise, it would be remembered that troubles no less than pleasures are transitory; that at some future time, when altered circumstances shall have left no trace of present annoyances, the latter shall be reflected on, even with a sort of pleasure such as the traveller feels when he thinks of his hair-breadth escapes and perilous adventures. Is it not strange that admitting, as men do, the uses of adversity, and conscious as they are that their past troubles have yielded them good fruit subsequently, cannot so project themselves into futurity as to be able to snatch from thence somethiug of that reversionary interest which, by the same rule, may be expected to result from their actual evils!—F. F.—[To the "resolute exercise of the judgment," so properly recommended by our correspondent, we would add a resolute exercise of the legs; to wit, bodily exercise in general. When the mind overbalances the body, it is the body that must restore the equilibrium.]

The Charms of Royalty.—Ungeronaumeth, the eldest son of Usumcassan, King of Persia, being impatient to ascend the throne, conspired against his father. The monarch was so much beloved by his subjects, that not one of them seconded the evil designs of the prince; who, finding himself unsupported, and dreading his father's resentment, secretly escaped from Persia, and took refuge in the Court of Mahomed the Second, with whom Usumcassan was at war. The King, irritated at his son's conduct, meditated revenge. To effect it, he feigned himself sick, had the gates of his palace all shut, and a report given out, soon after, that he was dead. The news quickly arrived at the Court of Constantinople, where the prince resided, who, pursuaded of the truth of what he heard, made all possible haste to take possession of the Kingdom of Persia. Usumcassan had his spies, who soon gave advice of his son's arrival. He ordered him to be received with great marks of joy and respect, and that, leaving him still in the dark, they should bring him into the palace, as if to assist at the funeral obsequies of the King his father. The poor prince, imposed upon by those about him, who appeared all in mourning, suffered himself to be conducted into the Palace Royal: but, how was he surprised when he saw the King himself sitting on his throne! His reception was such as he deserved. After reproaching him with his crime, Usumcassan had him locked up in prison, where within a few days he was strangled. Usumcassan died, in the seventy-eighth year of his age, a short time after the death of his son. Jacobus, or Yacubeck, his second son, succeeded him. This prince had a treacherous wife, who, being in love with a Persian lord, resolved to poison her husband, and advance her lover to the throne. For this purpose, she prepared a subtle poison, which she put into a liquor that she gave the King at his coming out of the bath. The king mistrusted her fidelity, and observing her countenance to turn pale at the instant, declared that he would not drink, unless after her. The Queen seeing her death inevitable, did not long hesitate. The poison seemed the easiest way: she still hoped the King would follow her example; and it was no small matter with a woman of her character, that she could have the consolation of destroying her husband with herself. She took the draught, and swallowed a part of it. The King, no longer apprehending danger, took also a reasonable dose, and gave the rest to his eldest son, a child about eight years old. They were all three found the next morning dead in their beds.—History of Thomas Kouli Khan.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A "Reader and Admirer" is informed, that an article on the subject he speaks of, will appear at the beginning of the week.

Subscribers are informed, that some of the numbers of the present year which were out of print, have been reprinted, and complete sets from the commencement, may now be had of the Publisher.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

Act I.—Winter.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mr DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS,
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—Summer.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH,
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

To which will be added, a New Comic Burletta, called

WAS I TO BLAME?

Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

After which, the Burlesque Burletta, called

BILLY TAYLOR.

Mary Wagstaff, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Kitty Sligo, Miss M. GLOVER.
Billy Taylor, Mr J. REEVE.
Carolus, Mr O. Smith. Captain Flatbottom, Mr S. SMITH.
Old Nicholas, Mr Chapman. Ben Blockhead, Mr Sanders.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr Buckstone].

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.

Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, a Comic Burletta, to be called

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER. Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond. Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget. Capt. Cape, Mr W. VINING.

After which, a Comic Burletta, called

THE CHASTE SALUTE.

[From M. Scribe's "Baiser au Porteur."]

The Music, by C. E. Horn.

The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Derville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,
Philippe, Mr Newcombe, Thibaut, Mr Collier.

To which will be added, a Comic Burletta, called

THE LITTLE JOCKEY.

Arinette, Miss FOOTE, in which she will sing, "The Boy in yellow wins the day,"
Clotilda, Miss Nursey, Mause, Miss Kibrey.
The Baron D'Acourt, Mr W. VINING,
De Limburg, Mr Paget, Floriville, by a Gentleman, Joocse, Mr Collier,
Denis, Mr W. Young, Pierre, Mr Brown.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of Colman's, by Mr Planche and Mr C. Dance.]

Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.

Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe.

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, a new Nautico-Domestic Drama, entitled

ROVER'S BRIDE.

[By Mr George Almar.]

Act. I.—Winter.

Alice Manners, Miss SCOTT. Bella Manners, Miss SOMERVILLE.
Dame Bellerton, Miss NICOL. Nancy Blackberry, Miss ELLIS.
Lawrence Glennon, Mr DIBDIN PITT.
Miles Bellerton, Mr C. HILL. Marmaduke Magog, Mr VALE.
Diedrick Van Voorn, Mr Honor. Bobby Blackberry, Mr Rogers.

[Between the First and Second Acts a lapse of Five Years is supposed to take place.]

Act II.—Summer.

Alice Manners, Miss SCOTT. Bella, Miss SOMERVILLE.
Mary Blackberry, Miss RUMENS. Kitty Spiteful, Mrs ROGERS.
Captain Glennon, Mr DIBDIN PITT.
Barbelot, Mr Jones. Diedrick Van Voorn, Mr Honor.
Culverdine and Avery, Mr Ransford and Mr Lee.
Marmaduke Magog, Mr VALE. Bobby Blackberry, Mr Rogers.
Bluff Laconic, Mr C. Hill.
Master Marmaduke Magog, Jun. Master Carberry.

After which, a new Drama, entitled

BARON TRENCK.

[By Mr Osbaldiston.]

Victorine, Miss SOMERVILLE. Countess of Hulsdorff, Madame Simon.
Countess of Lewemberg, Miss Rumens.
The Count of Linsdonn, Mr Gough. Augustus, Mr Edwin.
Major Muffledori, Mr Dibdin Pitt.
Frederick Baron de Trenck, Mr OSBALDISTON.
Boltzheim, Mr Almar. François Passentromp, (with a Comic Song) Mr C. Hill.

To conclude with, an entirely new Melodrama, entitled

ZAMOR, THE MEXICAN.

The Music, by Mr Blewitt.

Ora, Miss SOMERVILLE. Joan, Miss VINCENT.
Dame Mabil, Madame SIMON. Robert, Baron Fitzallan, Mr GOUGH.
Henry Fitzallan, Nicol Colorande, Blid, and Broadland, Mr H. KEMBLE.
Zamor, Mr OSBALDISTON. Edmund Erpingham, Mr C. HILL.
Martin Walbourn, Mr DIBDIN PITT. Peter Poundtext, Mr Webb.
Abel Lackbrain, Mr Asbury. Walter Altringham, Mr VALE.
Ralph Perkyn, Mr Rogers. Monk, Mr Young.
Raymond and Hubert, Messrs. Hobbs and Tully.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, the Opera of

ROB ROY MACGREGOR.

[Adapted by Mr Pocock.]

Diana Vernon, Miss PEARSON, in which she will introduce,
The Song—"He's what they ca' a Bonnie Lad."
Katty, Miss BRUCE. Mattie, Mrs CRAWFORD. Helen Macgregor, Mrs FAUCIT.
Sir Frederick Vernon, Mr Younge. Rasleigh Osbaldistone, W. H. Wallack.
Francis Osbaldistone, Mr SINCLAIR, who will sing,
"My Love is like the red red Rose;" "Auld Lang Syne;" "Hey! the bonnie Breast Knots;" and the Duet, "Tho' I leave thee now in sorrow," with Miss PEARSON.
Owen, Mr. W. Bennett. Captain Thornton, Mr Thompson.
Dougal, Mr Webster. Rob Roy Macgregor Campbell, Mr MACREADY.
Major Galbraith, Mr Bedford.
M'Stuart, Mr Yarnold. Jobson, Mr Salter. Andrew, Mr Hughes.
Bailie Nicol Jarvie, Mr LISTON.

Previous to the Opera, will be performed the Overture to "The Heart of Mid-Lothian," (adapted chiefly from Scottish Airs.)

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. Barrymore.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.

Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm-House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr Stanfield.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Magiore, with the Boromean Islands

On Monday, William Tell; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, the New Grand Comic Opera, (in Three Acts) called

CINDERELLA.

The Music, by Rossini.

Cinderella, Miss INVERARITY. Clorinda, Miss CAWSE.
Thisbe, Miss HUGHES. Fairy Queen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Felix, Mr WILSON. Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. PENSON.
Alidoro, Mr G. STANSBURY. Dandini, Mr MORLEY.
Pedro, Mr KEELEY,

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr Farley.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.

With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr Peake.] Characters by
Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.

Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES

THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

On Monday, Fazio; and the Pantomime.

Coburg Theatre.—What Tyler and Jack Straw—Harlequin Silver Penny.

Sadler's Wells Theatre.—A Deed of Blood.—Harlequin and Mother Goose.—Golden Pippin.

Published by J. Onwhyn, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. Chappel,—Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange; A. Hays, 165 Regent street; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at Ebers's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. Reynell, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº. 122.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, JANUARY 24, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

AN accident prevents us today from making our usual remarks upon the books we notice; we must content ourselves, therefore, with a few extracts. The first, which is taken from a new pamphlet written by the greatest jurist of the age, and one of the most enlightened and virtuous men that ever lived, casts a heavy additional shade on the memory of a prince who was cried up in his time as the "best of kings," and whose best excuse for being one of the most pernicious, was, that he was subject to an unhappy malady, which ought to have prevented him from being king at all.

Jeremy Bentham to his Fellow-Citizens of France, on Houses of Peers and Senates. 8vo. pp. 45. Heward.

'MR BENTHAM'S ACCOUNT OF GEORGE III.—The commencement of his reign was distinguished by the endeavours of many years to ruin a man for an indecorous word: this endeavour ended in making the man's fortune.

'His income was somewhat less than that of your Charles the Tenth: it did not satisfy him.

'In the course of that same reign, nine different bankruptcies did he commit. Nine different times did he make those Lords and Commons of his pay those debts which he had contracted without their consent. So at least it was said in that same House of Commons, and no contradiction given to it.

'As often as a tax was imposed upon all other incomes, those of all other functionaries included, he caused his own to be exempted from it.

'At his instigation, a King of Sweden afflicted Russia with a war as completely unprovoked as any that is to be found in history. To feed this war he laboured to plunge into it his own country:—he failed; and my latest breath will be cheered with the thoughts of my having been the author of that failure.

'He shared with my virtuous but misled friend, Brissot, the authorship of your Revolutionary war, with the debt under which we are everywhere still groaning.

'When war was made by England upon Spain (it would be foreign to the subject to enquire upon what grounds) he caused it to be begun in a piratical manner; and of this manner seventeen millions sterling, placed at his private disposal, was the fruit,—the faith of Parliament,—his own, with that of his Lords and Commons,—being thus broken, to the injury of the men, at the price of whose blood the booty had been earned,—the work of blood and plunder being begun by surprise—no declaration of war made, if at all, till this booty had been secured.

'If—with Peers, and nominees of Peers, for instruments of his goodness—such a king was the best of kings,—what think you of an average one?'

The Scientific Gazette: a Record of Discoveries and Improvements in Science, the Liberal and Fine Arts, Manufactures, Agriculture, Commerce, and Natural History; with proceedings of Scientific Societies. Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. 8vo. (A new weekly publication.) Griffiths.

CASES OF SPONTANEOUS COMBUSTION.—"Monsieur Bonureau, curé of Piergeur, near Dol,' says M. Le Cat, "wrote to me the following letter, dated February 22, 1749:"—

'Allow me to communicate to you a fact which took place here about a fortnight ago. Madame de Boiscon, about 80 years of age, extremely meagre, who had drunk nothing but spirits for several years, was sitting in her chair before the fire while her waiting-maid went out of the room for some moments. On her return, seeing her mistress on fire, she immediately gave an alarm; and some people having come to her assistance, one of them endeavoured to extinguish the flames with his hand, but they adhered to it, as if it had been dipped in brandy or oil on fire. Water was brought, and thrown on the body in abundance, yet the fire appeared more violent, and was not extinguished till the whole flesh had been consumed. Her skeleton, exceedingly black, remained entire in the chair, which was only a little scorched; one leg only and two hands detached themselves from the rest of the bones. It is not known whether the clothes had caught fire by approaching the grate. The lady was in the same place in which she sat every day; there was no extraordinary fire, and she had not fallen.—What makes me suspect that the use of spirits might have produced this, is, that I have been assured, that at the gate of Dinan an accident of the like kind happened to another woman under similar circumstances.

'The 'Journal de Medicine,' vol. 59, p. 440, contains an account of a similar case related by M. Muraire, a surgeon, as occurring at the town of Aix, in Provence. In the month of Feb, 1779, Mary Jauffret, widow of Nicholas Gravier, shoemaker, of a small size, exceedingly corpulent, and addicted to drinking, having been burnt in her apartment, M. Rocass, my colleague, who was commissioned to make a report on the state of her body, found only a mass of ashes and a few bones, calcined in such a manner, that at the least pressure they crumbled into dust. The bones of the cranium, one hand, and a foot, had, in some measure, resisted the action of the fire. Near these remains stood a table untouched, and under the table a small stove, the grating of which having been long burnt, afforded an aperture, through which it is probable the fire, which occasioned the melancholy accident, had been communicated: one chair which stood near the flames had the seat and fore feet burnt. In other respects there was no appearance of fire either in the chimney or the apartment; so that, except the fore part of the chair, it appears to me that no other combustible matter contributed to this speedy incineration, which was effected in the space of seven or eight hours.

'The other case contained in the 'Journal de Medicine,' occurred at Caen, and is thus related by M. Merille, a surgeon of that place. Being requested, on the 3rd of June 1782, by the King's officers, to draw up a report of the state in which I found Mdlle. de Thuars, who was said to have been burnt, I made the following observations:—The body lay with the crown of the head resting on one of the irons, at the distance of eighteen inches from the fire; the remainder of the body was placed obliquely before the chimney, the whole being nothing but a mass of ashes. Even the most solid bones had lost their form and consistence; none of them could be distinguished except the coronal, the two parietal bones, the two lumber vertebræ, and a portion of the tibia; and these even were so calcined, that they became dust by the least pressure. The right foot was found entire, and scorched at its upper junction; the left was more burnt. The day had been cold, but there was nothing in the grate except a few pieces of wood, about an inch in diameter, burnt in the middle; none of the furniture in the apartment was damaged. The chair, on which Mdlle. Thuars had been sitting, was found at the distance of a foot from her, and absolutely untouched. This lady was exceedingly corpulent; she was about sixty years of age, and much addicted to spirituous liquors; the day of her death she had drunk about three bottles of wine and one bottle of brandy, and the consumption of her body had taken place in less than seven hours.

'The town of Caen affords several similar instances, and M. Boufet, a physician of Argentan, author of a work on intermittent fevers, relates one of a female, who had only the extremities of her body spared.

'The case which we shall now relate was attended with circumstances of peculiar interest, because the unhappy man survived the accident some time, and gave an account of the various circumstances by which it was preceded and followed. The case was published in one of the journals of Florence for October 1776, by M. Battaglia, the surgeon who attended the unfortunate sufferer.—Gio. Maria Bertholi, resident priest at Monte Volente, went on business to a neighbouring fair; and having spent the day in walking about the country, arrived in the evening at Jernielle, intending to sleep at the house of his brother-in-law. He was immediately on his arrival, at his own request, conducted to his chamber, when he had a handkerchief placed between his shirt and shoulders, and immediately commenced his devotions. Scarcely a few minutes had elapsed when an uncommon noise, attended with cries, was heard issuing from his apartment. The people of the house were alarmed, and rushing in, found the priest stretched out upon the floor, and surrounded by a light flame, which receded as they approached, and ultimately vanished. He was immediately placed in bed, and on the following morning visited by the surgeon, who, on examination, found the skin of the right arm and fore-arm detached from the muscles, and hanging loose. From the shoulders to the thighs the integuments were similarly injured. These detached portions of skin having been altogether removed, and mortification being perceived on the right hand, which had suffered most severely, the parts were scarified. Notwithstanding this precaution, it had fallen the next day into a state of gangrene. On the third day, all the other scorched parts were discovered to have degenerated into the same condition. The unhappy man complained of unquenchable thirst, and was horribly convulsed; the discharges from his mouth were putrid and bilious, and his strength was exhausted by continual vomitings, accompanied with delirium and a burning fever. After lying two hours in a state of insensibility, he expired on the fourth day. While he lay in this lethargic sleep, his attendant observed with astonishment that putrefaction had made considerable progress, so that the body exhaled an intolerable odour; worms crawled from it on the bed, and the nails were spontaneously detached from the fingers of the left hand. This unfortunate man informed the surgeon, that first of all he had felt a blow, like that inflicted by a cudgel, upon the right arm; and that at the same time he saw a light blue flame attach itself to his shirt, which was instantly reduced to ashes, yet his wristbands at the same time remained untouched. The handkerchief across his shoulders remained untouched. His drawers and breeches had equally escaped, but his cap was entirely consumed, although not a hair of his head had suffered by the flame. All the symptoms of the disease were those of a severe burn. The night of the accident was calm, and the atmosphere very clear; no empyreumatic smell, nor appearance of smoke, was perceived in the chamber; but the lamp, before full of oil, was become dry, and its wick reduced to a cinder.'

Digitized by Google

The Mayor of Garratt, a Comedy. By Samuel Foote, with an Historical Account of the Mock Election. Illustrated with Designs, by R. Seymour; Engraved by Nesbit, Slader, Welch, and Johnson. 18mo. pp. 45. Miller.

Extract from the History of the Mock Election, with an account of the most illustrious Member of Parliament of Garratt.

'Manning and Brav, in their History of Surrey, 1826, say, "that the Hamlet of Garratt is on the road from Wandsworth to Tooting. About two centuries ago, it appears to have been a single house, called the Garvett: this house was pulled down about fifty years ago. Garratt now contains about fifty houses. This used to be, for many years, the scene of the celebrated mock election."

'Foote's "Mayor of Garratt" may be deemed a faithful epitome of the prevailing ludicrous manners observed by the populace at Wandsworth, during the farcical election. This dramatist sketched so much from the life, that it is doubtful whether every marked character in this comedy had not its living original.* It is well-known, that he drew Major Sturgeon from old Justice Lamb, a fishmonger at Acton, and a petty trading Justice, whose daughter was married to Major Fleming, a gentleman also "of the peace," yet every way a more respectable man than his father-in-law.

'The first edition of Foote's "Mayor of Garratt," was printed in 1764, and is called "a comedy in two acts; as is performed at the theatre royal in Drury Lane." On turning to the "dramatis personæ," it will be found, he performed Major Sturgeon himself, and, likewise, Matthew Mug, in the same piece: Mrs Clive playing Mrs Sneak, to Weston's Jerry Sneak.

'The truly ridiculous custom of electing a Mayor of Garratt, originated, says Mr Massey, of Wandsworth, "in a party of watermen, belonging to Wandsworth, dining at the Leather Bottle, a public house at Garratt, and, while spending a merry day, being the time of a general election, in the midst of their frolic, they took it into their heads, to choose one of their company a representative of that place; and having gone through the usual ceremonies of an election, as well as the occasion would permit, he was declared duly elected." In the Gentleman's Magazine, July 1781, it says, "several persons who lived near that part of Wandsworth which adjoins to Garratt Lane, had formed a kind of club, not only to eat and drink, but to concert measures for removing the encroachments made on that part of the common, and to prevent others being made for the future. As the members were most of them persons in low circumstances, they agreed at every meeting to contribute some small matter, in order to make up a purse for the defence of their collective rights —When a sufficient sum of money was subscribed, they applied to a very worthy attorney in that neighbourhood, who brought an action against the encroachers, in the name of the president (or, as they called him, the Mayor) of the club. They gained their suit with costs; the encroachments were destroyed; and ever after, the president, who lived many years, was called The Mayor of Garratt." This event happening at the time of a general election, the ceremony upon every new parliament, of choosing out-door members for the Borough of Garratt, has been, till lately, constantly kept up.

'From this beginning, the mock usage gradually increased; but little account was taken of it till about 1750; Sir John Harper was elected 1777; and in 1781, he was again returned, the burlesque election being conducted with uncommon pomp and magnificence, in the plebeian mode of pageantry. At this election he had six rivals to contend with;—among whom was that formidable opponent, the celebrated Sir Jeffrey Dunstan, who was then unsuccessful. Sir John Harper was by trade a weaver, and qualified, by power of face and speech, and infinite humour, to sustain the burlesque character he assumed. His chief pretensions to represent Garratt was grounded on his reputation, circulated in printed handbills, which described him as a "rectifier of mistakes and blunders." In the year 1785, Sir John Harper vacated his seat by death, when Sir Jeffrey Dunstan again became a candidate for the suffrages of the virtuous and truly independent electors of Garratt, and issued his celebrated address to the electors On the day of election Sir Jeffrey left London in a splendid phaeton, his procession extending a mile in length; and he was triumphantly returned by an immense majority: it was his good fortune to retain his seat for Garratt until the general election 1796, when he was ousted by Sir Harry Dimsdale, a man as much deformed as himself.

'Sir Jeffrey Dunstan was a child of chance—a foundling. He was picked up in the year 1759, at a churchwarden's door in St Dunstan's in the East, and, not being owned, was reared in the workhouse, so as ultimately to attain about two-thirds the usual height of manhood, with knock-knees, and a disproportionately large head. At twelve years old he was bound apprentice, for nine years, to the "trade and mystery" of a green grocer: this period was too long for Jeffrey's soaring ideas of true independence, and having adopted the idea that "time was made for slaves," he broke through servitude, and ran away to Birmingham. During his stay in this "workshop of Europe," his mind gained strength, and he returned to London, in 1776, with his knees and his head knocking together much more than before. He soon afterwards formed a matrimonial alliance, and the fruits of this happy union were two daughters, "Miss Nancy" and "Miss Dinah," who testified their filial politeness, by uniformly calling him "Papa."

'At the persuasion of the Proprietors of the Haymarket, Sir Jeff. reluctantly consented to perform the part of Doctor Last. The announcement drew a crowded house; but, notwithstanding infinite tutoring, when the curtain drew up, the heart of our hero failed him, and he blundered on, making nothing of his part, until the hisses of the house at last in kindness dismissed him from the boards.

'At an early period of his life, he too frequently sacrificed at the shrine of "Sir John Barleycorn," and very seldom saw the inside of a pot of beer without going to the bottom of it; indeed, his love for the quart-pot was so great, that after drinking the beer, he sometimes took the liberty of carrying away the pot, which unfortunate propensity got him into many scrapes, and his body suffered imprisonment, as well as severe castigation at the cart's tail round Covent Garden Market. His invincible attachment to "free trade" was go great, that he had four wigs for his armorial bearings, with a quart-pot for his crest.

'What rendered Sir Jeffrey so very conspicuous in the metropolis, was the vending old wigs (which he used to carry in a bag carelessly thrown over his shoulder) and the singularity of his cry. He wore his shirt open, and the collar turned down, exposing his breast. In life, his face was dark and dirty, but when coffined, his skin was remarkably fair and clear. After the toils of the day, Sir Jeffrey would retire to the Horse and Leaping Bar, Bethnal-green, where, in a "regular" manner, he got "regularly" drunk. Here he amused the company by singing the "London Cries," reciting his mock speeches on the corruptions of parliaments, and, placed in an arm chair on the table, nightly afforded sport to a merry company.

'In 1790, this celebrated Member for Garratt exhibited a melancholy instance of a great man whose popularity is worn out. He still carried his sack, but it seemed a part of his identity, rather than an implement of his profession—a badge of past grandeur. His cry of "old wigs" had lost all its charms of eccentricity: his quips were silent too, and his brain was as empty as his sack; he slank, and seemed to decline popular observation. If a few boys followed him, it seemed rather from habit, than any expectation of fun—

> Alas, how changed from HIM,
> The life of humour, and the soul of whim,
> Gallant and gay, on Garrat's hustings proud.

But it is thus the world rewards its favorites in decay!

'We come now to the close of the life of this never-to-be-forgotten Mayor of Garratt. Having called at the Red Lion, (opposite the London Hospital) he was so abundantly supplied with "Hodges's best," that he soon became insensible, and being placed in a wheel-barrow, was carried to the door of his house, situate on the north side of the "Ducking-pond," and there left to perish, for he was found a corpse the next morning. Thus dying, like Alexander the Great and many heroes renowned in historic page—of suffocation from excessive drinking!'

* "Old Jack Jones, the sawyer," who was Master of the Horse at the last election, says, he remembers "when Foote, the player, came to Wandsworth, to have a full view of all the goings on." According to his account, the English Aristophanes "paid nine guineas for the fore-room at Surgeon Squire's, facing the church, for himself and friends to sit in, and see the fun."

Effect of Absence on Friendship.—Absence does but hold off a friend, to make one see him the more truly.—Swift.

Court Caution Penetrated.—I have know many great ministers ready enough to hear opinions, yet I have hardly seen one that would ever descend to take advice; and this pedantry ariseth from a maxim themselves do not believe, at the same time they practice by it,—that there is something profound in politics, which men of plain honest sense cannot arrive to.—Swift.

Philosophical Diffidence.—Mr Boyle, in the Preface to his Essays, makes an apology for the frequent use of the words "perhaps," "it seems," "'tis not improbable," as implying a diffidence of the justness of his opinions: and this diffidence arose, as he informs us, from repeated observations that what pleased him for a while, was afterwards disgraced by some further or more recent discovery.—Percival.

Digitized by Google

COMMENCEMENTS OF CONVERSATION WANTED.

DEAR MR TATLER,—The excellence of your tattle upon paper sets one upon making comparisons between its wit, liveliness, and good sense, as well as originality, and the "chartered dullness" of common conversation. This disease, however, is in process of cure by the spirit of intelligence that is abroad; but there is an evil that admits of present remedy, and to you, Sir, as "the Tatler" par excellence, I beg leave to apply in this case. Will you be so kind and candid as civilly to tell the town what a community of dumbness and distrust it is? and that all those who "stand mute," when proper occasion allows them liberty of speech, will henceforth be deemed ciphers? The quiescent state is rarely a refuge for blatant absurdity or garrulous meaning; asses commonly bray, and bores (no pun) are insufferably noisy: it is of the more intelligent and intelligible part of the community of whose sealed lips I complain. Many of these mutes are so by temper, or habit, or constitution, or are "bound in the icy chain" of custom. But if it were decreed, that a sprightly address to a stranger seated next you at the theatre, or any place of public amusement, or on a bench in the Park or Kensington Gardens, were not only an evidence of good breeding and sense, but that the absence of such greeting were hoggish or asinine, I think we should find a great many pleasant tattlers where all seems "close as a ledger." Not only as regards individual gratification at the moment, but with a view to the diffusion of information, the interchange of opinion on public affairs, and all topics interesting to the intelligent part of the community, would such a practice be beneficial? It would be a great promoter of public feeling, also, among the middle and influential classes; and prejudices that would stand against a ponderous article in a review, would yield to the convictions awakened by urbane discussion, and logic tempered with amenity. I am, I beg to say, a listener, and mute through timidity; therefore I am arguing against myself: but I have sat with timorous hesitation, endeavouring to make up my mind and mouth to address a neighbour whom chance has thrown me beside, and have just opened my mouth to give utterance to the most unmeaning phrase I could have fixed on, when he has incontinently got up and walked away. So have I also endeavoured to break the ice of decorum to a fair neighbour—the sex makes one bold, and fearful of being set down for a dummy—and having stammered out a few words which only admitted of a monosyllabic reply, have wearied out my beautiful model of patience, so that, just as I was beginning to grow eloquent, she despairs of any entertainment but that at my expense, and with most provoking liveliness bids me good morning. The other night, at the play, dear Tatler, I luckily found myself next to a public man whom I honoured and admired, and whom I would have given my ears to know, and during the whole performance, and its intervals, I was intent upon making up my mind to address him, and at last had internally resolved, and I had actually gone so far as to fix upon a phrase with which to commence; but by the time I had selected one, and mustered courage to utter it—nay, had even got the word on my tongue with a desperate resolution, the curtain dropped, and my courage fell with it. I can't follow him, I thought, but I can ask him the time! —but perhaps he does not carry a watch—or if he did, what then?—He was gone, and I felt that I had been a bigger fool than I took myself to be. But I grow tedious. Will you be good enough to fix upon a formula of self-introductory phrases, to be used on all occasions by nervous people, that shall be a sign that the said nervous person would willingly try to converse; thus leaving it at the option of the party addressed to encourage or not his colloquial advances! Or, if you would make lively persons understand that it is a duty due from the strong to the weak to promote tattling, by giving the first word, it would be an inestimable service to the mutes. There is no fear—or little—of putting in motion a cherry-clapper sort of tongue to a hollow head, for physiognomy is a good help to the quick-witted; and there is many a one who is "not such a fool as he looks." All I would ask of you, in this gossipping letter, is to take the subject of "Tattling" into your consideration. I had some thoughts of writing a pamphlet, to be called 'Hints on Promiscuous Conversation, by a Silent Man;' or 'The Tattler's Vade-Mecum,' or 'Manual of Self-Introduction,' or 'Commencements of Conversation,' or 'The Lounger's Guide to Agreeable Chat,' or 'A Help to the Bashful:' but, on second thoughts, I preferred troubling you on the subject, knowing that your authority would do more good than twenty pamphlets.

Do, dear Mr Tatler, give this subject your attention, and oblige, amongst myriads of others,

Your grateful and admiring reader,

Dulwich, Jan. 21st, 1830. TIMOTHY TIMOROUS.

N.B. The only occasion when I mustered courage to address a man of genius was afforded me through the medium of your paper. I made you introduce me, by drawing his attention to one of your criticisms on a popular actress, of whose merits he had been hearing an opinion from an incompetent critic; with trembling hand I held out the number of the Tatler for the day, and pointing to your remarks, left him to read them. (I was at the theatre, where I always enjoy your writings.) He was pleased, and returning the paper with an assenting remark, I was induced to rejoin, and enjoyed (thanks to you) a delightful conversation, and one which I shall ever remember with pleasure. He seemed not to have been a reader of the Tatler, at which I was surprised, and recommended to him a political article for perusal at his leisure: he put your journal in his pocket, since which he has (I am sure) been a constant reader of it.—Ever since, I always brandish a Tatler when I want to address any one at the theatre; but unluckily I was unable to avail myself of this challenge to conversation, in the instance of my stupid (what shall I call it) which I before mentioned.

T. T.

[If we have many such letters written to us as this, we shall take ourselves for "Tatler" indeed; for it reminds us of the correspondence in "our great original." We regret we cannot answer it on the spot; but if we can hit upon anything which we think will please our lively mute, he shall hear of it.]

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Rob Roy Macgregor.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Cinderella.—And the Pantomime.

DRURY LANE.

WE took a farewell view, on Saturday night, of the magnificent Diorama in the pantomime at this theatre: not that it is to be seen no longer, (we exhort those who care nothing for pantomimes, to go nevertheless and see it, if they care for beauty and grandeur) but because, among the other infelicities of critics, it is not allowed us to see a good thing as often as we like. Something new is expected of us, albeit we are contented with the old. We are already, it seems, thought to be in love with Miss INVERARITY, because we have seen her seven times; which is surely very little for lovers. However, we confess the charge. We have a trick of being in love, whenever we find cleverness and amiableness united, or what appears to be the union. What is it that BEN JONSON says?

> 'I do claim a right
> In all that is call'd lovely. Take my sight
> Sooner than my affections from the fair:
> No face, no hand, proportion, line, or air
> Of beauty, but the Muse hath interest in:
> There is not worn that lace, pearl, knot, or pin,
> But is the "critics" matter; and he must
> "If he's a true one," love.'

Unfortunately we carry this principle so far, in our critical character, and are such very general lovers, that we fear the individual objects of our attachment would have nothing to say to us. We are in love, for instance, besides Miss INVERARITY, with the honest good-humoured smile of little HARRIET CAWSE; with Madame VESTRIS, in Fra Diavolo, when she holds out her hand to the forgiven lover; and with Miss FOOTE, in the Lost Son, when she wheels out the chair for her sick mamma. Miss MORDAUNT much inclined us, once or twice, when she acted her serious parts at the Haymarket; and (unless the truth is no longer in her) we shall be exceedingly in love with Madame PASTA next March, as we were two years ago.

But to return to the Diorama. We have only to express our thanks once more to the painter, and again to exhort the "unacquainted" to go and see it. It really is like giving the mortal man the pleasure of a spirit, and making the earth roll its fair scenes before his eyes. Instead of taking a journey over the Alps, the Alps take a journey for us; mountains arise and pass before us, like things conscious; secluded vallies unbosom themselves; Italy and her lakes come swimming into our ken,—a golden summer! One of the scenes, by a pleasing anachronism, presents Bonaparte, in his cocked hat, standing on one of the fine parapeted roads that he made afterwards, and seeing a regiment of his troops march up to him; for it actually does so; the whole body moves up to him, while he himself and the rest of the scene are stationary. We think there is something affecting in this scene. That great soldier and mistaken man seems restored to the world a moment, only to render us more sensible of his downfall, and to make him seem the broken tool of destiny. Surely, whatever were his mistakes, the bitterness of his end was enough to expiate them; nor (considering his military education) can even the lovers of liberty (who alone have a right to reproach him) grudge him the previous comfort of having lived, a few lustres, with the music of glory in his ears.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, the Play of

WILLIAM TELL.

Emma, Miss HUDDART.
Annell, Miss FAUCIT' Agnes, Miss FAUCIT.
Gesler, Mr H. Wallack. Sarnem, Mr Thompson. Struth, Mr W. Bennett.
Rodolph, Mr Howard. Lufold, Mr Howell. Braun, Mr Ross.
William Tell, Mr MACREADY.
Albert, Miss Poole. Melchtal, Mr Younge. Erni, Mr Cathie.
Furst, Mr Fenton. Verner, Mr Cooke. Waldman, Mr Hughes.
Michael, Mr COOPER. Jagheli, Mr J. VINING.
Pierre, Mr Eaton. Theodore, Mr Honner.
Savoyards—Miss Crawford. Mr Price. Mr S. Jones.

Previous to the Play, Rossini's Overture to "Guillaume Tell."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.
DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.
The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.
Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands

To-morrow, School for Scandal; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

This Evening, the Tragedy of

FAZIO.

[By Mr MILMAN.]
Marchesa Aldabella, Mrs CHATTERLEY, Clara, Miss PHILLIPS,
Bianca, (6th time) Miss P. KEMBLE. Giraldi Fazio, Mr WARDE,
Duke of Florence, Mr EGERTON, Bartolo, Mr BLANCHARD,
Philario, Mr Henry, Falsetto, Mr Parry, Gonsalvo, Mr Baker,
Theodore, Mr Mears, Keeper, Mr Fuller, Pietro, Mr Turnour,
Gentleman, Mr Irwin, Antonio, Mr Heath, Aurio, Mr Crumpton.

Previous to the Tragedy, a Grand MS. Overture by Friedrich Kuhlau.

After which will be revived, a Farce, in One Act, called

THE IRISHMAN IN LONDON.

Caroline, Mrs Pindar. Louisa, Miss Lawrence. Cubba, Mrs Brown.
Mr Frost, Mr F. Matthews. Capt. Seymour, Mr Duruset.
Mr Colloony, Mr Baker. Edward, Mr Parry. Cymon, Mr Addison.
Murtoch Delaney, (first time) Mr POWER.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

To-morrow, Cinderella; and the Pantomime.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

The following Performers will appear for the First Time in London:—
Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY, du Theâtre du Gymnase.
Madame ALBERT, du Theâtre des Nouveautés.
M. LEPEINTRE, Aîné, du Theâtre du Vaudeville.

This Evening,
On commencera à Sept Heures et demie, par

LE PAYSAN PICARD.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de M. BRAZIER.
Eliza, Fille de Gercour, Mlle. Coba. Marton, sa Femme de Chambre, Mlle. Eliza.
M. Gercour, ancien Négociant, M. Cloup. Ernest, son neveu, M. Alfred.
St. Léon, Capitain de Hussards, amant d'Eliza, M. PAULIN.
Frontin, Valet d'Ernest, M. Gamard.

Suivi de

YELVA; OU, L'ORPHELINE RUSSE.

Vaudeville nouveau en Deux Parties, par MM. SCRIBE et DEVILLENEUVE.
La Première Partie se passe a Paris dans une Maison de la Rue St. Jacques, La Deuxième dans la Pologne Russe, à quelques lieues de Wilna.
Yelva, jeune Orpheline, muette, Mlle. HERMINIE.
La Comtesse de Césanne, Mlle. St. Ange.
Feodora, Cousine de Tcherikof, Mademoiselle Eliza.
Gertrude Dutilleul, Gouvernante d'Yelva, Madame Préval.
Alfred, fils de Comte de Césanne, M. PAULIN.

Tchérickof, Seigneur Russe, M. Alfred. Kalouga, Cosaque, M. Gamard.

LES VISITANDINES.

Opéra Comique en Deux Actes, Paroles de M. PICARD, Musique de M. Devienne.
L'Abbesse, Mlle. Eliza. La Tourrière, Mme. Preval.
Euphémie, Novice, Mlle. FLORVAL.
Religieuses—Agathe, Mlle. Emma. Ursule, Mlle. Corra. Agnese, Mme. Gamard.
Josephine, Mlle. Victorine. Augustine, Mlle. Pauiin.
M. DERVAL, remplira le Role de Belford Fils.
M. Belfort, Père, M. Cloup. Gregoire, Jardinier du Convent, M. Préval.
Le Cocher, M. Granville. Frontin, Valet de Belfort Fils, M. Laporte.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

This Evening, an entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Grizzle Glowworm, Mrs Beaumont. Susan, Miss Barnett. Amoret, Miss M. Glover.
Attendant Spirits, Misses Stallard, Gallot, Angellina, Rose, and S. Barnett.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
Linaro, Alpanor, and Spirit Hunters, Messrs Morris, Winning, Fry, Taylor, &c.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Sebastian, Gregory, and Adam, Messrs Sanders, Willson, and Paulo, Jun.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Andrew and Karl, (his Children) Masters Calkin and Barnett.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.
Franzel, Mr Charles. 1st Chamois Hunter, Mr S. Smith. 2nd do. Mr V. Webster.
Spirits of the Alps, Chamois Hunters, Villagers, &c.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called

WAS I TO BLAME?

Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].
The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

This Evening, a Comic Burletta, called

THE CHASTE SALUTE.

[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]
The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,
Philippe, Mr Newcombe, Thibaut, Mr Collier.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called

THE GRENADIER.

Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

To which will be added, a Comic Burletta, to be called

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER. Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond. Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget. Capt. Cape, Mr W. VINING.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Manufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe.

SURREY THEATRE.

This Evening, the admired Play, entitled

THE STRANGER.

[By KOTZEBUE.]
Mrs Haller, Miss M. C. POOLE, (her first appearance)
Countess Wintersein, Miss Scott. Charlotte, Mrs Vale.
Savoyard, (with a Song) Miss SOMERVILLE. The Stranger, Mr OSBALDISTON.
Count Wintersein, Mr Honor. Baron Steinfort, Mr D. Pitt. Peter, Mr Vale.
Solomon, Mr Williams, Francis, Mr C. Hill. Tobias, Mr Gough.
The Count's Son, Master Carbery. The Stranger's Children, M. and E. Clarke.

After which, a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,

THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE].
The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.
Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

COBURG THEATRE.—Peter the Great and Charles XII. Harlequin Silver Penny—Wat Tyler and Jack Straw.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—Harlequin and Mother Goose—A Deed of Blood—The Morning after Marriage.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

N° 123.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 25, 1831.

TWENTY-THREE REASONS

WHY THE MANAGERS OF THE GREAT THEATRES OUGHT NOT TO PREVAIL AGAINST MR ARNOLD.

A CORRESPONDENT has expressed his surprise at our having said nothing on this question; but the truth is, that it appears to us so easy of solution, and we look upon the result as so inevitable, in the hands of the accomplished lawyer and philosopher who now presides in the Chancery Court, that we held our good word to be unnecessary. It is true, there may seem to be an assumption in this remark, resembling the pleasantry of Swift, who said, that he had an infallible test for knowing whether an author was in the right,—to wit, whether he thought or not as he himself did. But we are paying ourselves no such compliment, when we speak of a subject upon which it appears to us that every impartial person must agree; and what we mean, by thinking it safe in the hands of the present Chancellor is, that we look upon him to be free from those prejudices of station and profession, which have given judges, otherwise intelligent, a confined view of the interests of humanity, and of the wisdom of diffusing liberal pleasures. We mean, in short, that there have been judges who would take a precedent for a larger thing than a principle, and their own ignorance of an accomplishment for a perception of its inutility. The last Chancellor but one fancied that he threw discredit upon all the professors of music, from Orpheus downwards, by declaring that he would not give sixpence to hear all the finest singing in the world; a judgment that would have been heard with equal horror by Plato and M. Laporte. The public need fear no such blunders as these from Lord Brougham. If he differ with them, it will be for some reason that has not yet struck them If he agree, no false pride, nor foolish value for a difference of opinion as such, will hinder him from expressing his agreement; that is to say, from giving the universal opinion on this subject the sanction of his concordance. He will even understand (no man better) that an accordance with the public is desirable on its own account, especially where a tranquil and intellectual pleasure is concerned. Law will be no obstacle in the court where Equity presides; and law, equity, common sense, common feeling, the common interest, are surely all arrayed against the claims of the great theatres.

The case may be briefly stated thus:

Mr Arnold, the proprietor of the English Opera, petitions for a license to perform all the year round, in order to indemnify him for losses occasioned by the fire at the Lyceum. His original license, which was granted him in 1809, by George III, for the purpose of cultivating English music in contradistinction to the Italian, allowed him the whole range of the year which he at present requires: but during the late reign was restricted, as at present, to the summer months, which are stated to be the most unfavourable season for theatrical performances.

The patentees of Drury Lane and Covent Garden theatres protest against the re-extension of Mr Arnold's license, on two grounds; first, on that of justice, because it will be injurious to their own interests, which are of a larger nature than Mr Arnold's, and have long been struggling with difficulties; and second, on that of law, because they inherit the exclusive right of acting plays, derived from a patent granted by Charles the Second to Killigrew and Sir William Davenant.

Mr Arnold does not pretend to any right: he merely petitions for a kindness, which he conceives, however, to be desirable, not only for his own benefit, but for that of the public.

The patentees of the two great theatres request a kindness, and at the same time demand a right. We are not aware that they argue upon grounds of public benefit, as their case, at this present writing, has not yet been fully stated by counsel; but they are peremptory on the ground of right, arguing, that no license can be given by the crown, in prejudice to a patent given already.

Now we will state, as briefly as we can, the reasons why we conceive these positions of the patentees to be untenable We say nothing in depreciation of the motives of either party. There are doubtless men now living, and their numbers will increase with the growth of knowledge and freedom, who if they happened to enter into a theatrical concern, would sacrifice any ordinary notions of self-interest to what they conceived to be the public good, and be content to share and share alike with the chances common to all: but, as it would be unfair to look for Benthamites or Fayettites among those men of the town, however respectable, in whose class the managers of theatres are to be found, we take it for granted that neither party has reason to complain of the other,—that Mr Arnold, if he were a patentee of Covent Garden or Drury Lane, would think, that justice consisted in maintaining monopoly,—and that the patentee of Drury Lane or Covent Garden, if they were in the situation of Mr Arnold, would be loud against a monopoly of kindness. We have, therefore, no partiality on either side. We are sorry that either party suffers, or is likely to suffer; but we should be more sorry if the public good suffered from the success of either: and it is because we think it would, that we desire to see the triumph on the side of Mr Arnold.

1. In the first place it would be difficult, we conceive, for the complainants to prove that they hold their present possession from the patent granted by Charles II, that patent having been at various times contested, suspended, superseded by licenses, and overgrown with various interests derived from family connexions and shares.

2. Supposing the derivation of the right to be traceable to the patent, the holders of it have been so doubtful of the tenure, as to obtain repeated licenses for playing; so that by their own shewing, they would seem to have no more right to the patent than Mr Arnold has; for he only seeks to maintain himself by a similar permission.

3. They argue, that no license can be granted to the prejudice of a patent; but on this principle the licenses obtained by the great theatres from time to time were themselves to the prejudice of the patent, because they shew that the patent was not sufficient of itself; and a patent which is not sufficient for its purposes, is no patent.

4. If the claimants of a new license have no right to injure the property of the patentees, neither have the latter any right to injure the property of any possible claimants of public favour, by abusing their own right of patent; that is to say, by abusing it to purposes never contemplated by the granter; which we hold to have been the case, by overbuilding and setting up whole companies of shareholders: in other words, by forcing all speculators in theatrical entertainments to come into their set, and thus elude those natural demands of new times which would have produced, (as they will assuredly do,) a variety of new houses. For,

6. In a court of Equity, we must look for a question to be discussed on the ground of equal dealing, and of the spirit of a patent as well as its letter; and, therefore, it is necessary to consider,

7. On what ostensible grounds Charles II granted the patent. This patent, which was given in 1662, was preceded by a grant in 1660, at which time a company which had set up for itself, was suppressed on the ground of its acting scandalous plays, of raising the price of admission, and of acknowledging no authority.* In the Grant,† it is expressly stated that the holders must carefully abstain from acting any dramatic entertainment, containing matter of "profanation, scurrility, and obscenity;" and in the Patent‡, the same injunction is repeated. Now the present applicant for a license has offended in none of these points, though the great theatres have in one of them, (the raising the price,) and how far the former patentees acted up to the spirit of the directions, we shall see in the next section.

8. On what real grounds Charles the Second granted the patents. These were, unquestionably, to bring, and to keep, an important branch of public amusement under the control of government; and to oblige one or two persons at court. Davenant, besides being a wit, a poet, and a gay liver, had been an active sufferer in the cause of royalty. Killigrew was one of his Majesty's merry companions, full of wit and want. Charles's mistresses did not leave him sixpence to give his friends; and therefore he helped them (when the

* See a petition of Robert Shatterel and others in Malone's Historical Account of the English Stage, Prolegomena to Reed's Edition of Johnson and Stevens's Shakspeare, Vol. iii. p. 306.

† See a Grant in the same vol. p. 302.

‡ The Patent was published in yesterday's Morning Chronicle.

Digitized by Google

humour was upon him) in other ways. But do we suppose that he cared a jot for what should come to the patents in after times? The only points looked to in granting them, were the king's pleasure and the government's authority. As to the debauching of manners, we all know what sort of plays were written up to the time of the Georges: and in little more than a year after the first grant to Killigrew and Davenant, the price at the latter's theatre was doubled.* There is nothing said about prices in the patent; we gather the objections on that score, and upon the ground of authority, from the petition above referred to: but the last patent, as well as the first grant, especially enjoined the avoidance of "profaneness, scurrility, and obscenity." How was that injunction attended to?

9. In the reign of William the Third, the managers of the united companies, acting under the authority of the patents granted to Davenant and Killigrew, behaved in a manner so arbitrary, especially to the great actor Betterton, that he obtained a new patent from the crown, and set up a theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields. What then became of the exclusive right derived from the patent of Davenant and Killigrew?

10. The managers of Drury Lane and Covent Garden allege, that they are in difficulties; or that their task is beset with difficulties, and must be guarded. They might have added, that proprietors and managers of theatres have been beset with difficulties ever since they existed, and that no privileges have saved them from ruin. How then does this allegation make out their case? It is the nature of an unjust tenure to make people abuse it; and it is the nature of what may be called the social instinct of things, to make them suffer for the abuse. No one man, or set of men, ever did or can obtain real success from endeavouring to monopolize a good which ought to be common to all. This is the secret, in various shapes, of the whole present misfortunes of society; and the managers of the theatres have certainly not escaped. But is this a reason why the selfish interests of a monopoly should be continued? The managers may undoubtedly suffer at the moment, but so do others in the transition from particular good to general, and there is nothing in the nature of a theatrical tenure to make it an exception to the rule.

11. When Charles granted his patent, the size of London was but that of a second-rate city to what it is now; and the multitude of play-goers had been considerably diminished by the growth of puritanism, which long continued to influence the middle classes of society, notwithstanding the gaiety of the court. Now the number of theatres must of necessity increase with the number of houses; and if modern methodism answers in some degree to old puritanism, it affects the population of London in nothing like the same degree; and the population has wonderfully increased. Suppose (to put a case more in unison with the feelings of the patentees, than with the dramatic dignity which they do not consult) that there had been at one time in London but two public-houses, and that these two public-houses had got a patent for the exclusive sale of beer: do the managers mean to say, that no other public-houses than those two ought ever to have been set up in London? or that if there had, the sale of the beer should be restricted to those two during the season in which people were most thirsty?

12. Since the time of Charles, and especially in our time, knowledge has been wonderfully diffused, and the tastes for intellectual pleasures of all sorts of course augmented, for in diffusing one part of knowledge we inevitably open channels for all. The number of theatres, therefore, must increase upon that principle.

13. The reign of Charles II was notoriously an arbitrary reign, and therefore of necessity at variance with the free growth of intellectual amusement. It is the interest of a freer government to show that it can afford to do better; and the present government values itself upon being able to do so. A seasonable article in the Court Journal of Sunday week, informs us, that during "the sixteen years of theatrical freedom" which preceded the Imperial Government in France, there were never less than sixteen theatres in Paris; that during that whole period many of these theatres succeeded brilliantly; that not one of them was in a state of bankruptcy; that a galaxy of fine actors and composers were then at their greatest lustre; and that the whole of the theatres together did not cost the state a sous; while, on the other hand, from the moment that Napoleon restricted the number of theatres to seven, and placed them under the protection of government,—that is to say, made them patent theatres,—the entertainments fell off, managers got poor and displaced one another, and annual subsidies charged on the civil list did not hinder the most ruinous consequences, bankruptcies included, which have continued up to the present time, though the number of theatres has risen again to thirteen or fourteen, in spite of the law.

14. One of the consequences of a patent is, that the entertainments are meted out to the public according to the limited intellect of the patentees, and their notions of their own interest; whereas all intellectual pleasures should be suffered freely to grow out of the amount of the general intellect of the times.

15. At the time when tragedy most flourished in this country, which was in that of Shakspeare, and comedy, which was in that of the late Stuarts and King William, the principal theatres were small to what they are now. In fact, the two great winter theatres are several theatres in one! They have evaded the spirit of the patent in this, as in every other respect; and in so doing, is not the patent forfeited by law? Is it not certainly nullified in equity? The increasing wants of successive periods have demanded several theatres, instead of two: the two theatres have pretended to obviate those wants by swelling themselves into the dimensions of several, and thus destroyed the means of enjoyment, by rendering sight and hearing difficult, often impossible. Now suppose when people were going to see three or four different sights, and to hear discourses at three or four different places, the persons who had hitherto occupied two such places were to get the others suppressed, and in answer to the complaints made in consequence, were to say, "Oh, but if you come to us, you shall sit in a grand place, where you can hear and see nothing at all."

16. As people, however, have been unable to hear and see properly in these large theatres, spectacles and sounds were obliged to be got up, which they could hear and see; and the consequences have been notorious: show has taken the place of substance, and actors have been encouraged to bawl and rant. The boast of a principal theatre ought to be, that we can hear good plays, and see the fine expression and the faces of good actors; but, as Sir Edward Sugden observed, people are compelled to resort, first to eye-glasses, then to lunettes and opera-glasses, and finally, he supposed they must have recourse to telescopes; with the addition of a speaking trumpet to hail their friends in the pit. Everybody feels this caricature to be founded on truth. Surely it would require a telescope to discern the modesty of the patentees, when, under such circumstances, they ask for a stoppage of minor theatres.

17. It is argued, that Mr Arnold, on his side, has violated his license, because he obtained it from George III, on the sole ground of encouraging native music, in contradistinction to foreign; whereas he has adapted to the English stage, and brought out, with great and shameful painstaking, several foreign operas. This enormity, we grant, violates the letter of the license; but we maintain that it preserves the spirit of it, for Mr Arnold was not aware, when he made his application to George III, that music, notwithstanding a pleasing composer here and there, was an art yet to be created in England, and that one mode of creating it, was to bring the natives acquainted with the productions of musical countries; nor can we think that George III, who was so fond of Handel, would have been displeased to see Mr Arnold bringing forward the compositions of two other natives of Germany, Winter and Mozart. The English are of German origin themselves; and it may not be too great a refinement to suppose, that if ever they become a musical people, except by an alteration of climate, or some other equally unlooked for source of pleasure put into their veins, it will be by something of a complexional sympathy with productions from the same parent stock.

18. The interruption in 1829 of Mr Arnold's license for performances throughout the year, took place upon no public grounds, or if it did, the public are not acquainted with them. It is understood to have been owing to the superior interest obtained by the managers of the great theatres with the predecessors of the present Lord Chamberlain. We lay no stress on the recognition of Mr Arnold's license by Mr Sheridan, when the latter entered into an agreement with him for the use of his theatre until Drury Lane was rebuilt; for Mr Sheridan, if it had been convenient to him, would have acknowledged Mr Arnold's right to the moon; besides, recognition would prove nothing, under whatever circumstances. But it is much to show that individual interest, and not public, is alone opposed to him.

19. All monopoly is bad, and all competition useful. One of the consequences of Mr Arnold's own encouragement of music is, that another musical theatre is announced; and no sooner is this the case, than Madame Vestris announces a new singer at the Olympic, taken fromt he same Academy of Music which furnishes the principal singer to this new Opera House. Thus, out of many singers, the public obtain a choice, and in the long run have a chance of obtaining a variety of good singers. The same prospect holds good with performers; whereas, at present, the managers of the great play-houses think it their interest, like the most sordid traders, to give us as bad wares as possible for our money; trying to do with three or four good performers, and fifty indifferent ones, and subjecting the character of the Management to charges not only of personal vanity (which is excusable, of all men, in actors) but the grossest favouritism. At both the great theatres there is a lamentable deficiency both in first-rate and second-rate actors, and at one of them the town have been astonished to see dull and inefficient performers thrust before them, for whose appearance they could not account; nor is it pleasant to be told that we must learn the secret in the green-room. The town has nothing to do with green-rooms; nor ought the influence of the green-rooms to be forced upon their cognizance.

20. The proprietors of the great theatres have been warned, after the destruction of the houses by fire, not to rebuild them of the same size. They have been advisedto build four theatres rather, instead of two. They have been recommended even to break up their theatres, and convert them into smaller ones. These, it may be said, are desperate steps, and the last one is so; but managers have taken nothing but desperate steps ever since management existed. They have only avoided being forced into a reasonable one. They will be forced into it at last, but this is surely nobody's fault but their own.

21. The truth is, that managers have aimed at being too rich, and cutting too great a figure; and as they are more inclined, for various short-sighted reasons, to encourage mediocrity rather than genius,

* Pepys. 8vo. Vol. 1. P. 235.

Digitized by Google

they have made so much use of indifferent declamatory actors, that the latter have obtained far more pay than they deserve, while better ones, from a natural pique as well as a sense of their superiority, have raised their demands to such a height, that they are either seldom employed, or entirely laid aside: an attempt is then made to force somebody into notice, in order to take their place, or to see how far it is possible to work some favourite actor, short of killing him; while others go and set up those very houses for themselves, of which the managers who have driven them to the necessity complain. Now middling actors ought not to have fourteen, and fifteen, and twenty guineas a week, merely because they are obliged to be much used, and are invited to stand between the self-love of those who employ them, and the pretensions of their betters. They ought not to be used so much: they ought not to stand in those places. It has been often wondered, why the profession of an actor is not held in more respect than it is, and various reasons have been found for the mystery, such as the superstition once existing against them in Catholic countries, their personal subjection to the chance of public displeasure, the loose lives of some of them, &c. These reasons have no doubt had their influence, at different times, but they are not sufficient to account for them at all others. The public are better instinctive reasoners than conscious ones. Millions can approve and disapprove in the right places, when sitting in a theatre, who have not the misfortune of being able to see a critical reason for their disapproval; and we have no doubt, that the real cause of the low estimation in which actors in general are held is, the instinctive certainty in the public mind that such acting is a very easy art, and might be attained to with no more trouble than that of shoemaking. Natio comœda est. Everybody is more or less capable of being an actor, by the very fact of his being a member of society. He may be taught to strut like the proud, or to grin like the foolish, though he may be able to do neither of these things well. A truly great actor is as rare as other men of genius, and partakes of their sensibility and intuition. Any performer who does in a particular line what others cannot, supposing it to be worth doing, is a performer of merit, and deserves respect; but as for the common run, they are mere accidents; occupiers of places, for which they are no fitter than for twenty others; and one of the advantages of a multitude of theatres would be, that such persons would be reduced to their just pretensions, and society would be hampered with a dull falsehood the less.

22. But it is not so much for the purpose of setting aside dull persons, as for bringing forward clever and entertaining ones, that the contemplaters of theatres in this point of view must wish for their extension. We do not hold it to be necessary, at this time of day, to argue upon the utility of theatrical amusements. The diffusion of knowledge is of necessity accompanied with a spirit of mild and humane indulgence, and with as great diminution as possible of those austere notions, which are found to be ill guardians against false pleasure, and are a pain in themselves. The theatres teach a large and liberal humanity. They inculcate all the generous virtues. The faults which they seem most to tolerate, are at least not those of intolerance and self-interest, or which put us in a state of unwillingness to consider the comfort of others. Tragedy inspires us with fortitude and forbearance, and teaches us, with its poetry, that we have something within us worthy of a more elevated language than the one which we naturally find suitable to us in ordinary. Comedy satirizes false taste and artificial manners, and hinders us from thinking too highly of worldly success and intrigue. The great poet finds out the "soul of goodness in things evil;" and possessing at the same time the sweetest of natures, he teaches us, that such a discovery, so far from being hostile to improvement, saves us from the most dangerous of all its enemies, despair and scorn.

23. The parties claiming under the patent have submitted, it seems, after all, to the jurisdiction of the Lord Chamberlain, not pretending to be placed beyond it; the Lord Chamberlain has referred the case to the Lord Chancellor, who is consulted also by his Majesty, in consequence of Mr Arnold's petition. Our good-natured Sovereign, doubtless, wishes to oblige the greatest number of people; that is to say, supposing nobody to be unjustly treated, no abuse maintained, and that no ultimate harm can come of the obligation. Now we hold, under the circumstances, that Mr Arnold is the person to be obliged;—

1st. For all the reasons above-mentioned; 2dly. Because his theatre has violated no good taste and no spirit of improvement, as the others have; 3dly. Because all his exertions have gone to do the reverse; 4thly. Because his present difficult situation is the consequence of misfortune, unconnected with any conduct of his own; 5thly. Because the managers of the great theatres will ultimately be compelled to convert them to their proper purposes, or change them for others; and 6thly. Because, though there may be a greater show of distress in the event of a decision against two establishments employing a greater number of persons, yet any transition of things even to a better state is accompanied with a certain portion of trouble, and the more theatres there are, the more will all persons connected with theatres ultimately find themselves advantaged, with the exception of those whose prosperity is at variance with that of the public.

And so we leave the matter in the hands of Lord Brougham, with much the same feeling as we should have entertained could we have seen it in the hands of Lord Bacon, in times more favourable to the exercise of his wisdom.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—William Tell—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Fazio.—Irishman in London.—And the Pantomime.

OLYMPIC.

THE town was so full of novelties last night, that we were at a loss which to see first, and which to postpone. There was a new piece at the Adelphi, with Mr MATHEWS in it; another at the Olympic with Madame VESTRIS; Mr KNOWLES's revived play of William Tell at Drury Lane, with Mr MACREADY; and the Irishman in London at Covent Garden, with Mr POWER. Perplexed into our abundance, and growing luxurious upon it, we bethought ourselves of the custom which our gallant printer has introduced into these pages, of setting the ladies' names first in the play-bills, and accordingly we resolved upon paying our first duties to Madame VESTRIS. Besides, we like the short, smart pieces they are in the habit of playing at this theatre; there is a sort of French vivacity and good humour in its arrangement; the ladies take the lead in the discourse, and as Mr WORDSWORTH said of them in Paris, are "very subtle;" Madame VESTRIS sees so far into a generosity, that she has collected a number of handsome and pretty women about her; and then there is Mount Olympus itself, with all its gods and goddesses, brilliant and coloured as in a new French book of mythology. In a word, we find our steps involuntarily turn thither, before we have settled our arguments for going, out of a certain instinct of diversity, as if the grave business of the day would certainly find its proper contrast and amusement. At the Adelphi we hardly know what is going to happen; and at the great theatres they have a trick lately of reviving disagreeable plays, full of sordid passions (not assuredly Mr KNOWLES's), as if there were not mud and dirt enough all day long in the rest of the world. Hail then, thou little back drawing-room of a theatre, full of the younger, and merrier, and fairer branches of the great histrionic family! Hail, thou sublimation of little laughs! thou bit of the millinery part of heaven! thou empyrean forty feet in height!—Viam affectomus Olympo.

The new trifle here (the Grenadier) is of the usual sort, and is soon described. Capt. Doughty (Mr FREDERICKS) is jealous, and is to be cured by the object of his attachment (Madame VESTRIS) who disguises herself as a Savoyard and a grenadier, carries messages to herself in the former character, makes love to herself in the latter, and puts the poor Captain in a dreadful state. He, for his part, assumes the disguise of a housewife, in order to watch her for an opposite lodging, and is very violent in his petticoats, especially when he sees the "tall grenadier." At length, an old lady requests an interview with the old gentlewoman, who is taken for the Captain's aunt, and requests to see the young officer. The Captain goes out, returns in statu quo, and to his horror, has a passion disclosed to him on the part of his reverend visitor. Suddenly, the old face turns young; the visitor laughs at him, and drops her disguise; and his affectionate mistress stands before him, claiming his gratitude for taking so much trouble to cure him of ungenerous suspicions.

There is a little under-plot, in which the footman thinks it necessary to put on his master's fault, as if it were a sort of moral livery, and be jealous of the lady's maid; who for her part, reflects the good sense of her mistress, and contrives to cure the footman. Miss PINCOTT did the part very well, and looked as smart and pretty as became the maid of a handsome mistress. Madame VESTRIS sang two or three songs with her usual mixture of sound musical taste and the style popular: and surprised us by the old age of the face she contrived to put on. We confess, that the more handsome and agreeable a woman is, the less, in general, we like her to be a mimic; but there is an address in all things, which can reconcile them; and Madam VESTRIS seems never to lose it, except when she plays sentimental young ladies. Mr FREDERICKS cut a very proper unbearable figure in the woman's dress; but when left by himself, he might have shown occasionally a more humorous forgetfulness of it, or still more humorous consciousness; have lounged more on his chair, beaten his boot with his stick, &c.

Our first article to-day has gone to such length, that we are obliged to leave off without noticing Mr POWER, whom we saw after this piece.

ALTER ET IDEM.—You tell us your wine is bad, and that the clergy do not frequent your house, which we look upon to be tautology.—Gay to Swift.

A SHREWD GUESS.—A lad, delivering milk, was asked what made it so warm. "I don't know," replied he, with much simplicity, "unless they put in warm water, instead of cold."—New York Paper.

A PLAIN ANSWER TO A PLAIN QUESTION.—A few years ago, a couple went to a country church to be married. When, in the course of the marriage service, the minister asked the bridegroom, in the usual form, "Wilt thou have this woman to thy wedded wife?" he coolly answered, "To be sure I will; I'm come o' purpose.

Digitized by Google

TELL ME YOUR GOVERNMENT, AND I'LL TELL YOU WHAT COMPANY IT KEEPS.—Vice and ignorance are the only support of tyranny, as virtue and knowledge are the only support of freedom. Tell a wise man what kind of government is established in any particular society, and he will tell you what are the manners and what are the understandings of the members of that society. The Court sycophant, Clarendon, makes it a matter of wonder, that the Parliament's army was more orderly than the Tyrant's. But it was to be expected that the better cause should have the better defenders, and contrarywise.—From a Correspondent.

INSURRECTIONARY MOVEMENTS.—Lord Cartaret's speech in the House of Peers, A. D. 1737, on occasion of the affair of Porteus, is very just, and applicable to the present state of affairs.—The people seldom or ever assemble in any riotous or tumultuous manner, unless when they are oppressed, or imagine at least they are oppressed. If the people should imagine they are oppressed when they are not, it is the duty of the next magistrate to endeavour, first, to correct their mistake by fair means—just reason? In common humanity, he is obliged to take this method, before he has recourse to such methods as may bring death and destruction upon a great number of his fellow countrymen, and this method will generally prevail where they have not met with any real oppression: but when this happens to be the case, it cannot be expected they will give ear to their oppression, nor can the severest laws, nor the most rigorous execution of those laws, always prevent the people's becoming tumultuous; you may shoot them, you may hang them, but, till the oppression is removed or alleviated, they will never be quiet, till the greater part of them are destroyed.—The same.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROAYL, DRURY LANE.

The Comedy of
THE JEALOUS WIFE.
[By G. COLMAN, the Elder.]
Mrs Oakly, Miss CHESTER. Lady Freelove, Mrs ORGER.
Harriet, Miss MORDAUNT. Toilet, Mrs NEWCOMBE.
Mr Oakly, MACREADY. Major Oakly, Mr FARREN.
Charles Oakly, Mr COOPER. Russet, Mr DOWTON.
Sir Harry Beagle, Mr HARLEY. Lord Trinket, Mr VINING.
Captain O'Cutter, Mr H. Wallack. Paris, Mr B. Hill.

In the course of the Evening, F. Schndider's Grand Overture, "A la Chasse;" and Mozart's Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito."

After which,
DEAF AS A POST.
[By Mr POOLE.]
Sophy Walton, Mrs Newcombe. Amy Templeton, Miss E. Absolon.
Sally Mags, Mrs Orger. Mrs Plumpley, Mrs C. Jones.
Captain Templeton, Mr COOPER. Tristram Sappy, Mr LISTON.
Old Walton, Mr W. Bennett. Crupper, Mr Hughes. Gallop, Mr Salter.

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called
DAVY JONES.
[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV, Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.
DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.
The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.
Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 500 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands

To-morrow, Werner; Turning the Tables; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The New Grand Comic Opera, (in Three Acts) called
CINDERELLA.
The Music, by Rossini.
Cinderella, Miss INVERARITY. Clorinda, Miss CAWSE.
Thisbe, Miss HUGHES. Fairy Queen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Felix, Mr WILSON. Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. PENSON.
Alidoro, Mr G. STANSBURY. Dandini, Mr MORLEY.
Pedro, Mr KEELEY,

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called
HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.
[By Mr FARLEY.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
☞ Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.
THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Rourk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. he Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake o Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, Fazio; the Youthful Queen; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called
THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.
Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Grizzle Glowworm, Mrs Beaumont. Susan, Miss Barnett. Amoret, Miss M. Glover.
Attendant Spirits, Misses Stallard, Gallot, Angellina, Rose, and S. Barnett.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
Linaro, Alpanor, and Spirit Hunters, Messrs Morris, Winning, Fry, Taylor, &c.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Sebastian, Gregory, and Adam, Messrs Sanders, Willson, and Paulo, Jun.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Andrew and Karl, (Iris Children) Masters Calkin and Barnett.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.
Franzel, Mr Charles. 1st Chamois Hunter, Mr S. Smith. 2nd do. Mr V. Webster.
Spirits of the Alps, Chamois Hunters, Villagers, &c.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called
WAS I TO BLAME?
Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called
GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.
[By Mr BUCKSTONE].
The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, called
THE CHASTE SALUTE.
[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]
The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,
Philippe, Mr Newcombe, Thibaut, Mr Collier.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called
THE GRENADIER.
Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

To which will be added, a Comic Burletta, to be called
CLARISSA HARLOWE.
Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER. Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond. Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget. Capt. Cape, Mr W. VINING.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled
OLYMPIC REVELS.
[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young.
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Play of
THE IRON CHEST.
[By G. COLMAN, the Younger.]
Helen, Miss Scott. Blanche, Mrs Vale. Judith, Madame Simon.
Barbara, Miss SOMERVILLE. Sir Edward Mortimer, Mr OSBALDISTON.
Fitzharding, Mr D. Pitt. Wilford, Mr C. Hill. Adam Winterton, Mr Williams.
Rawbold, Mr Gough. Samson Rawbold, Mr VALE. Armstrong, Mr Almar.
Orson, Mr Asbury. Robber, Mr Webb. Robber's Boy, Miss Ellis.
Gregory, Mr Lee. Peter, Mr Boulanger. Walter, Mr Grammer.

After which, a Drama, entitled
THE DIAMOND ARROW.
[By W. T. MONCRIEF.]
Lucille, Miss SOMERVILLE. Dame Lodoline Fontaine, Mrs VALE.
Mons. Fontaine, Mr VALE. Mons. Anselm, Mr Young. Courier, Mr Lee.
Hilaire, Mr Edwin.

To conclude with an entirely New Historical Drama, called
THE BEGGAR OF CRIPPLEGATE.
Marian, Miss SOMERVILLE, in which she will introduce, "Tell me my heart."
Millicent, Miss VINCENT. Mother Middoll, Mrs Rogers. Alison, Miss Boden.
Annot, Miss Nicol. Kate, Miss Rumens.
King Henry VIII. Mr D. Pitt. Godfrey Osgood, Mr Gough.
Vincent Lorimer, Mr Honor. Sir Piers Mantravers, Mr Almar.
The Beggar of Cripplegate, Mr C. Hill. Barnaby, Mr Williams.
Cocke Lorell, Mr VALE. Father Ignatius, Mr Ransford. Fabian, Mr Asbury.
Valentine, Mr Rogers. Wynkin Cross-eye, Mr Webb. Ambrose, Mr Young.

COBURG THEATRE.—Peter the Great and Charles XII. Harlequin Silver Penny—Wat Tyler and Jack Straw.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—Harlequin and Mother Goose—A Deed of Blood—The Morning after Marriage.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL.—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

№ 124.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 26, 1831.

SEVEN MORE REASONS

WHY THE GREAT THEATRES OUGHT NOT TO SUCCEED AGAINST MR ARNOLD'S PETITION.

SINCE writing our yesterday's article on this subject, we have seen the report in the newspapers of the continuation of the arguments of counsel against Mr Arnold's petition. Had we been aware that any gentleman at the Chancery bar would in candour have thought himself bound to confess the little amount of his information upon theatrical matters, compared with that of the ordinary readers of a newspaper (for such is the inference from one of the answers put to a question made by the Lord Chancellor), we should have entered upon the question at an earlier period, in the hope of facilitating its progress. But though changes of times bring all sorts of changes along with them, we have been so much in the habit of allowing ourselves to fancy every Templar a Templar of the days of Congreve and Wycherley, or at least, that every young lawyer, like a young Somers, Cowper, or Hyde, looked upon an acquaintance with such matters as a part of his literæ humaniores, or the requisite universality of his stock of knowledge, that we no more thought of supplying the bar with information on such points than of reminding them of the unbounded variety of subjects which they may be called upon to discuss. We do not say this in any spirit of disrespect towards the gentleman alluded to, who is probably an excellent lawyer of his standing in other respects; but out of regret at seeing the interest in theatrical subjects decline in any quarter; since nothing can do away with their importance, whether we consider the wide circle of knowledge the drama deals with, or the influence of theatres upon society. At the same time we have the pleasure of knowing, that one of the very best theatrical critics, and of the highest description, is a young lawyer whose practice at the bar promises to equal the knowledge he brings to bear upon it: and we should be surprised indeed, if the decision of the present Chancellor did not prove him equal or superior to his accomplished predecessors above-mentioned, in his ability to settle the question on the very broadest grounds. We do not assume that these must be our own; but we should certainly be greatly surprised, if in giving a different opinion from what we look for, his Lordship did not supersede those broad grounds by others still broader, and of still greater concern to the common welfare.

The new arguments of the counsel amount to these; which we shall answer as we go:—

1. That if the present renters of Drury Lane Theatre had supposed the possibility of Mr Arnold's obtaining an extension of his license, they never would have thought of entering into their engagements. But this proves nothing, if the exclusiveness of the patent is in itself injurious to the public good and amusement. Otherwise, it might be as well argued, that if any persons had been laying out money in doing an expensive wrong, nobody should propose to do a less expensive right. Nor in any point of view does a want of moral calculation, however remote, determine the rights of an arithmetical one.

2. We are told that the share-holders of the two theatres "relied upon the word and good faith of his Majesty, George III, that no third theatre would be allowed:"—or to phrase it in the language of another report, that the word of that prince might be almost said to have been "pledged and embarked in the maintenance of the present position of the theatres." But to say nothing of the indiscretion of reminding us of all that may be said with regard to the good faith of this prince, what has the word of a king, who reigned in other times, to do with the necessities of the present,—or why is the opinion of George III on any point, to influence that of posterity? Besides, George the Third notoriously wished well to Mr Arnold; and we believe if he were living, he would wish him still better, both on account of the German and English Operas which he has brought out at the Lyceum, and for reasons (we do not say whether right or wrong), which he would think he had, to object to the present use of the patent.

3. Lord Sidmouth, the Chamberlain in 1816, gave an opinion favourable to the present application of the great theatres; in consequence of which it is asked, "what situation is theatrical property placed in, if, after fourteen years, when all the circumstances remained the same, the whole question was to be opened again, merely because there was a new Sovereign on the throne." Why the natural situation in which all property is placed, which is of doubtful tenure, more than doubtful management, and liable to modifications of times and manners. We have a great respect for the private character of Lord Sidmouth, however we differ with him in matters of public opinion; but as he is fallible on one point, he may be fallible on others; and as the decisions of government officers, under one particular system, are apt to be modified on all points by considerations connected with that system, so it would be unreasonable to expect, that new views of policy would not occasion new views upon any other question. A "new Sovereign" is much! as we all know to our great pleasure.

4. It is stated, that the great size of the winter theatres, and the other inconveniences complained of by the Solicitor-General, have nothing to do with the present question, which is said to "relate only to the performance of musical dramas and of ballets of action;" and that for such performances the great size of the theatre is a positive advantage. But the anti-petitioners are bound, in the spirit of the question, to shew that their patent gave them a right to set up theatres as large as two or three others, and so hinder the increase of patents with the growth of the town. The great size of the theatres, though favourable to powerful singing like that of the Italians, is injurious to that expression of the countenance and goodness of acting which ought to be visible in fine performers of any kind. The patentees ought to prove, that they have a right to devote their theatres to sound and spectacle, or to monopolize the right without an entire devotion to it. And, as the Lord Chancellor observed, this question is thrown open to discussion with regard to the whole of its merits, and to the spirit of it as affecting the public, and not merely upon the narrow grounds here assumed.

5. Mr Arnold, though he obtained his license on the ground of affording encouragement to English composers and singers, is said not to have hitherto produced a single eminent English musician, or an approved musical work; whereas the patentees, besides bringing out an immense number of performers, who have received the highest salaries, have produced "upwards of fifty works of English musicians, with various success, since the year 1790.' Yes; that is to say, nineteen years before Mr Arnold's theatre was in existence, and about two hundred years from the appearance of a theatre in Drury Lane. Most of the composers enumerated in the report, namely, Mazzinghi, Storace, Dibdin, Arne, Shield, Linley, Jackson, and Bishop, flourished before the reign of the present managers,—all, indeed, but Bishop, and he, we believe, was a theatrical composer before the Lyceum existed. The Lyceum has produced the most admired English male singer that has appeared for a long time—Mr H. Phillips. Miss Paton, the most celebrated female singers, came out at one of the smaller theatres; and Mr Arnold's moderately sized stage has the credit of having brought into due popularity, the talents of one of our most interesting and affecting actresses—Miss Kelly. Theatres, like everything else, must have time. But we refer to what we have said before on this head. The real question is, not merely whether Mr Arnold is to be allowed his musical theatre, but whether the great theatres are to monopolize music and everything else, at the seasons when the town is most desirous of entertainment, and when it must be at the mercy of their judgment, convenience, and creditors.

6. There has been a considerable falling off in the receipts of the great theatres for the last thirty-five years, which the counsel for the patentees attribute to "the combined influence of religious feeling, the weight of taxation, and late dining hours." We do not think that religion is to be taken into the account: for though methodism has been on the increase till of late, an unmethodistical population has been encreasing also. The hours of dining have had an influence, and the weight of taxation. But the deficiency of good plays and performers has been too much complained of by everybody, to be left out of the calculation; and the feeling on this point has been aggravated by that very growth of knowledge, which otherwise tends to encrease the number of play-goers. We must with candour add, however, that this tendency does not immediately develope itself; and we have no doubt that one of the very greatest causes of the decreased inclination for the theatres, observed up to a late period, has been owing to that spread of a love for books and music, which conspiring with the necessity of retrenchment has enabled people to find so much entertainment in their own homes. The, love, however, of theatrical entertainments, is reviving; or why should Mr Arnold wish to rebuild his theatre, and so many theatres start up in different parts of the town? On what instinct is it also, that the great theatres are so afraid of Mr Arnold, if their merits are so obvious and exclusive with the public, and yet theatrical entertainments decline? Is it not likely that his would be the ruined concern, and not theirs? No; the truth is that they feel they should have to lower their pretensions, and that the public would ultimately get many good small winter theatres instead of two large bad ones. Their best way would be to produce at once nothing but opera and spectacle, and to let all the other theatres do as they please. Even this would not hinder a house a size smaller, from beating them even in opera; and we are convinced that if these enormous theatres, are not either entirely devoted to spectacle, or to opera singing for a certain portion of the year, like the King's Theatre, (which would be impossible perhaps for both) managers must still consent to be ruined, as their custom has been, or the theatres must come down. The reasonable progress of the age is no more to be hindered in this than in any other respect. Wherever a temporary license should be wanted, it would by some means or other be gained, upon the mere strength of its reasonableness; and before long such an increase of theatres could, and will, put an end to the monopoly, even if the wisdom of the Chancellor should not think fit to anticipate the blow, by recommending a deliberate acquiescence with circumstances.

Digitized by Google

7. "The Lord Chancellor.—What is the date of the last stock-piece produced at the large theatres—I mean a play that is acted frequently—a rational comedy or tragedy, fit for the amusement of men and women? (A laugh).

Mr Harrison, after some hesitation, mentioned Lord Byron's Werner and Mr Milman's Fazio.

The Lord Chancellor.—How long has Werner been acted?

Mr Harrison.—Three weeks.

The Lord Chancellor.—How long has Fazio been acted?

Mr Harrison.—It was acted some years since, and is now reproduced.

The Lord Chancellor.—How long is it since any play was produced like the School for Scandal, or the Rivals?

Mr Harrison said he attended so little to these matters that he was unable to afford his Lordship much information on the point.

The Lord Chancellor.—Has there been any play of the description I have mentioned produced since 1804?

Mr Harrison replied, that John Bull, a very popular play, had been produced and repeatedly acted since that period.

The Learned Counsel afterwards said, that "before he sat down he would read to their Lordships the titles of several stock-pieces produced since 1804, which had been handed to him since the Lord Chancellor proposed the question. Their titles were as follow:—Speed the Plough; A Cure for the Heart-Ache, by Morton; The Heir at Law; the Poor Gentleman; The Wheel of Fortune; The Iron Chest, by Colman; Brutus, by Mr Howard Payne; Virginius, by Mr Knowles; and Bertram, by Maturin."

But none of the comedies here mentioned are at all to compare with the School for Scandal or the Rivals. Fazio is a poor tragedy, founded on poor passions: and Werner, though with a powerful dramatic surprise in one part of it, is another. Virginius, indeed, is a tragedy eminently and emphatically deserving the attention both of "men and women." But it appears to us, that it is less the want of good plays which is to be complained of at the great theatres, than the inability to hear and see properly any plays at all. The power to create or even to improve dramatic talent, is perhaps not to be looked for, in any managers, however liberal or wealthy. An existing drama springs out of the nature of the times. Comedy is the flower of manners; tragedy of passion and thought. The greatest era of tragedy in England was when the minds of people had been set free, and their purposes invigorated, by the reformation. The most flourishing period of comedy, was when artificial manners were predominant, and the greatest things in people's heads were the feathers in their caps. The mind of the age has been again shaken up by the revival of noble doctrines, by the diffusion of that knowledge of which his Lordship has been so eminent a promoter, and by the glorious example of the second French revolution, which has exhibited the social virtues in a new and almost unhoped-for light, and given confidence to the noblest expectations. On all these accounts, and in common with every other improvement, the drama is likely to revive. At all events, a social feeling, including a love of the drama and delighted to draw on the theatrical stock of our lively and illustrious neighbours, is rapidly on the increase, as may be seen by the increasing number of theatres and the pieces they produce. All the goods, intellectual as well as otherwise, of Europe, promise to be interchanged; monopolies of all sorts are decried and thought vicious; and the more widely the sphere of competition is thrown open, the sooner will the best and worst things find their proper level, and intellect in every shape maintain the rule it ought.

Mr Morris says, that if Mr Arnold is allowed to perform all the year, the theatre in the Haymarket should be allowed to perform too. We need not add, that everything which has here been said in favour of Mr Arnold, applies with equal justice to Mr Morris. The point is, not that this or that person should succeed, but that equity should succeed, and that the spirit of the times should be forwarded, in a manner equally conducive to its necessities and tranquillity.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

THEATRICAL RIVALRIES.—It is curious, that Drury Lane Theatre at one time used to complain of the expensive splendours of an elder sister house, then existing in the present Dorset street, Strand. The following lines in one of Dryden's prologues are a hit at the great rival.

We, broken bankers, half destroyed by fire,
With our small stock to humble roofs retire;
Pity our loss, while you their pomp admire.
For fame and honour we no longer strive,
We yield in both, and only beg—to live;
Unable to support their vast expence,
Who build and treat with such magnificence,
That like the ambitious monarchs of the age,
They give the law to our provincial stage.
Great neighbours enviously promote excess,
While they impose their splendour on the less.

RIVAL SINGERS.—Dr Arne was once asked by two vocalists of Covent Garden Theatre, to decide which of them sung the best. The day being appointed, both parties exerted themselves to the utmost, and when they had finished, the Doctor, addressing the first, said, "As for you, sir, you are the worst singer I ever heard in my life." "Ah, ah! sir," said the other, with an air of triumph, "I knew I should win my wager." "Stay, sir," says the Doctor, "I have a word to say to you before you go,—as for you, sir, you cannot sing at all."

COLONIES WEAKEN THE PARENT STATE.—It is in the politic as in the human constitution; if the limbs grow too large for the body, their size, instead of improving, will diminish the vigour of the whole. The colonies should always bear an exact proportion to the mother country; when they grow populous, they grow powerful, and by becoming powerful, they become independent also. Thus subordination is destroyed, and a country swallowed up in the extent of its own dominions.—Goldsmith.

WORLDLY ECCLESIASTICS.—The worldly ecclesiastic cries, "No innovations [reformations he means, and reformations he dreads] in the Church. They will produce disturbances." He is pretty sure of this fact, for he intends to produce disturbance by opposing every salutary proposal. Yet we know that Christianity was an innovation upon Heathenism—the Protestant Religion upon Popery. The reformers of states and churches, the deliverers of mankind from tyranny and bigotry, the friends of human nature, the prime benefactors of our world, thought it worth while to risk a temporary disturbance for a lasting advantage.—J. B., 1775.

PENSIONERS.—If the nation is to be plundered, it would be some comfort to think that the spoil was divided among the deserving, if it might be supposed any deserving person would be concerned in plundering his poor indebted country. But it is too notorious, that Courts reward according to a different system of morales from that which the ancient philosophers, prophets, and apostles taught: which makes Dr Johnson's definition of the word Pension appear but too accurate, viz. "Pay given to a state-hireling for treason to his country!"

COMMON-PLACE NOVELS.—That class of fictitious works called novels, though much more like real life than the romances which preceded them, is yet full of lucky incidents and adventures, which are introduced as the chief means towards the ultimate success. A young man without fortune, for instance, is precluded from making his addresses to a young female in a superior situation, whom he believes not indifferent to him, until he can approach her with such worldly advantages as it might not be imprudent or degrading for her to cast a look upon. Now how is this to be accomplished? Why, I suppose by the exertion of his talents in some practicable and respectable department; and perhaps the lady, besides, will generously and spontaneously condescend to abdicate, from partiality to him, some of the trappings and luxuries of rank. You really suppose this is the plan? I am sorry you have so much less genius than a novel-writer. This young man has an uncle, who has been absent many years, nobody knew where, except the young man's lucky stars. During his absence, the old man has made a large fortune, with which he returns to his native land, at a time most opportune for every one but a highwayman, who, attacking him in a road through a wood, is frightened away by the young hero, who happens to come there at the instant to rescue and recognise his uncle, and to be in return recognised and made the heir to as many thousands as the lady or her family could wish. Now what is the intended impression of all this on the reader's mind? What if he certainly have no uncle in any foreign fortune-making country? But there are rich old gentlemen who are uncles to nobody. Is our novel-reader to reckon on it as a likely and desirable chance, that one of these, just after returning from the Indies with a ship-load of wealth, shall be set upon by a highwayman; and to take it for certain that in that case, he, the novel-reader, shall have the luck to come to the very spot in the nick of time, to send the dastard robber galloping off, to make an instant and entire seizure of the old gentleman's affections, find himself constrained to go and take a present share of the opulence, and the heirship of the whole, and have his patron to join his pleading that Amelia, or Alicia, or Cecilia (as the case may be), may now be willing and be permitted to favour his addresses?—Foster's Essays.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—The Jealous Wife.—Deaf as a Post.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Cinderella.—And the Pantomime.

ADELPHI.

HAD we been aware of the fine moral contained in the new piece which was brought out here last night, called The King of the Alps and the Misanthrope, we should have waived our gallantry towards the Olympic, and gone there first; for though in general we do not like to have a moral thrust in our faces, especially if there be vice in it (which is not seldom the case), yet the one inculcated by this new piece is so truly deserving of the name, so undogmatical, so good-natured, as well as enforced in so very new and surprising a manner, that everybody is interested in giving it precedence. It is a comment, but a very genial one, upon the wish expressed by the poet that heaven would give us the power

To see ourselves as others see us.

Bishop TAYLOR informs us, that when he passed a bad man, he used to say, "There goes my wicked self:" which was a very good and Christian speech for a bishop, but still left the speaker at a genteel distance, and perhaps did not always do justice to the passenger. The piece before us makes a violent, bad-tempered man behold, in the person of another, his mistaken self,—mistaken, because he had thought others wicked when they were not so. This is a higher strain of Christian philosophy than the bishop's.

John Rappelkoff, a retired bookseller (these German authors have long got rid of Tory distinctions in tragedy!) has acquired a morbid suspicion of all about him, in consequence of some ungrateful deceptions he has experienced from others. His first wife deceived him. He thinks his second is like her. He thinks his daughter leagued with her: he suspects his brother; he hates a young painter who wishes to become his son-in-law; and he fancies that his servant intended to murder him. He leaves home in loathing and despair and hastens into a mountain solitude. Astragalus, King of the Alps, a benevolent spirit, takes pity on the poor man; and assuming the form of a hunter, obtains his acquaintance by his blunt manners, and endeavours to reason him out of his misanthropy. Rappelkoff is not to be convinced. Astragalus tells him, that his opinions are owing in great measure to his own defects; that self-love, as well as misfortune, blinds him; and that others are not what he takes them for, nor he himself quite so good as he supposes. The Misanthrope is not convinced. The spirit then appears in his own shape, kingly, and with his clouds about him; and the solitary, in the dangers of a tempest, and the visitations of supernatural beings, undergoes the hard lessons of physical and mental suffering. Even these do not convert him. His benevolent and pertinacious monitor then tells him, that he shall change shapes with his brother; that his brother shall be taken for himself, and vice versa; and that being thus put into a state not to be imposed upon, he shall finally be made sensible of his error. The spirit then himself takes the shape of Rappelkoff, Rappelkoff that of the brother (who does not otherwise appear); and the latter returning home to put the experiment to the test, finds everything just as the spirit had described it. The wife laments to her fancied brother-in-law her husband's disappearance; the daughter is bitterly grieving; the young painter, her suitor, says he would have done anything to gain Rappelkoff's good will; and all express the greatest pity and regard for him, except the servant; who startles him by describing him as a very devil, a fellow of a horrible temper who makes everybody wretched,—a perfect "household fiend." Rappelkoff is not convinced at once: he at first still doubts his wife; he is astonished and mortified, yet not convinced, by the servant; he cannot bear the sight of the painter; but the unaffected sorrow of his daughter, aided by her likeness to himself, makes a deep impression upon him; and this is completed by the appearance of his brother in his own likeness, who begins displaying his suspicions and bad temper in the most violent way, treats wife, daughter, and painter with the greatest scorn, at length challenges his brother (while the family stand round in horror), threatens to shoot himself, and finally rushes out in order to throw himself in the river. In horror, despair, and remorse, the now converted misanthrope sinks to the earth and calls upon the King of the Alps for assistance. His prayer, after a while, is heard; Astragalus re-appears in his own shape; and the reader may guess the rest.

There is a little underplot, not quite worthy of the other, in which a drunken coal-burner (REEVE) is made to lose his little boy in a forest. One of the benevolent spirits of Astragalus comes to his assistance, and upon a promise that he will abide by a certain condition, undertakes to see the child restored. He promises: the condition is, that he shall become sober. He pronounces it "hard," but undertakes it, and regains his boy. The truth of the supposed circumstance is here sacrificed to a pleasantry, or to the moral lesson. No parent would think any condition hard, by which a lost child could be restored. The difficulty of a drunkard's reformation however is thus exhibited with an extreme force.

There is another striking lesson still to be mentioned. The character of a dumb man is introduced, for the purpose of showing the violent passions generated by any extreme accident of difference from the rest of mankind, and the necessity of treating it kindly. We did not thoroughly see this part; but such we suppose to be the inference. What we did see of it was excellently performed by Mr O. SMITH, who has more in his face and acting than we were aware of. His heavy mode of speaking is not in his favour.

Upon the main plot, and upon all concerned in it, we have almost unqualified praise to bestow. The German author, Mr FERDINAND RAIMUND, whose name we become acquainted with for the first time through the medium of the play-bill, and whose original piece under the title of "Alpenkonig" (The Alp-King) is stated to have been produced at Vienna with "extraordinary success," is evidently a writer of no common cast of mind. The plot is a new invention, as far as we remember. Misanthropy has been described before, and its self-love retorted upon it; hypochondria might with reason have been allowed to effect more than it does, though perhaps not upon a man undisciplined with intellectual pursuits; but the enabling him to discern the thoughts of others, was a happy hit, worthy of a resort to supernatural means; dignus vindice nodus; and the process is excellently contrived and performed. The household scenes are highly striking, and calculated to go home to many a bosom. Rappelkoff is not a mere gloomy, frowning misanthrope, always talking in one humour, like the man in the Stranger. The author was wiser than KOTZEBUE, and has made him full of jests as well as taunts. He describes himself as being naturally of a mirthful disposition, and his mirth has not forsaken him in the very thick of his melancholy; which is a point of nature, at once consolatory and affecting. Then the author has very pleasingly as well as naturally made the female part of the family equally aware of Rappelkoff's mistakes and his merits. They suffer bitterly on his account; but we do not cease to love people, merely because we suffer for them. If they have good hearts, we suffer with them also, and continue to love them. The gross clown of a servant, who has no tincture of knowledge, is the only person who entertains a thoroughly bad opinion of his master; which is a mistake of the true vulgar sort, and admirably in character. Mr BUCKSTONE performs this part very well. Mrs YATES is natural and affecting, as usual, in the daughter; REEVE surprised us by exhibiting real touches of pathos when he regains his child (and yet perhaps we ought not to say so, for what a fund of feeling is there not in almost every bosom, especially where there is imagination to help it)? MATHEWS highly interested, but did not surprise us, by shewing a natural and serious vein of feeling in the midst of his gibes and jokes; for anybody may see by his face, that he is a man of sensibility. But YATES astonished us by his admirable and almost startling personation of MATHEWS. In walk, manner, voice, gesture, and very countenance, it is as near to a fac-simile as the difference of two persons can make it. His look seemed withered on the sudden,—at least altered from its greater look of robustness to one more used and sensitive. He has the same peculiar voice, modified by the turn of the mouth; the same restless energy; the same vitality of the head and body triumphing over the weaker extremities: in short, it is so much the very MATHEWS, that MATHEWS himself, when he looks in the glass of the other's face, seems with difficulty to control his surprise; and the audience break out into repeated manifestations of delight.

Digitized by Google

Now here is a piece which is far superior to the common run of the novelties at the Great Theatres, and which affords another reason why there should be no patent monopolies.

We ought not to have omitted, that the making the King of the Alps a benevolent spirit, instead of the usual grim piece of malignity, is another instance of the author's refinement, and an evidence of wise insight into the powers and operations of nature, even in their most awful shapes.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE verses written in a lady's diary, speedily.

The letter of Mr J. T. is received with thanks.

The Correspondent who has pleasantly pointed out some critical blunders in a certain periodical publication, is informed, that we do not wish to trouble ourselves with attacking the Editor, as long as he abstains from attacking us. We believe the rogue got the start of us once, the other day, in a kind of side manner; but we shall let the score be in his favour, till he "aggravates;" when he shall be paid double.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

Lord BYRON'S Tragedy of
WERNER, OR THE INHERITANCE.
[Adapted by Mr MACREADY.]

Josephine, Mrs FAUCIT, Ida Stralenheim, Miss FAUCIT.
Werner, Mr MACREADY, Ulric, Mr WALLACK, Gabor, Mr COOPER,
Baron Stralenheim, Mr H. Wallack, Fritz, Mr Younge, Otto, Mr Cohen,
Henric, Mr Salter, Eric, Mr C. Jones, Idenstein, Mr W. Bennett,
Rodolph, Mr Cooke, Arnheim, Mr Fenton, Meister, Mr Eaton,
Ludwig, Mr Cathie, Herman, Mr S. Jones.

In the course of the Evening, H. Marschner's Overture to "Der Vampyr," and P. Lindpainter's Overture to "Der Vampyr."

After which, a New Farce, called
TURNING THE TABLES.
[Partly from the French, by Mr POOLE.]

Miss Knibbs, Miss FAUCIT. Mrs Humphries, Mrs C. JONES.
Patty Larkins, Mrs ORGER. Mr Knibbs, Mr HUGHES.
Mr Jeremiah Bumps, Mr COOPER. Mr Edgar de Courcy, Mr VINING.
Mr Thornton, Mr J. VINING. Jack Humphries, Mr LISTON.

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called
DAVY JONES.
[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

To-morrow, The Brigand; the Illustrious Stranger; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Tragedy of
FAZIO.
[By Mr MILMAN.]

Marchesa Aldabella, Mrs CHATTERLEY, Clara, Miss PHILLIPS,
Bianca, (6th time) Miss F. KEMBLE. Giraldi Fazio, Mr WARDE,
Duke of Florence, Mr EGERTON, Bartolo, Mr BLANCHARD,
Philario, Mr Henry, Falsetto, Mr Parry, Gonsalvo, Mr Baker,
Theodore, Mr Mears, Keeper, Mr Fuller, Pietro, Mr Turnour,
Gentleman, Mr Irwin, Antonio, Mr Heath, Aurio, Mr Crumpton.

Previous to the Tragedy, a Grand MS. Overture by Friedrich Kuhlau.

After which,
THE YOUTHFUL QUEEN.

Christine, Miss E. TREE. Emma, Miss LAWRENCE.
Count d'Oxenstein, Mr F. MATTHEWS. Frederick Bury, Mr ABBOTT.
Steinberg, Mr WRENCH. Officer, Mr Irwin.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called
HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.
[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, The Resource of a Day; the Omnibus; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called
THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elisabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Grizzle Glowworm, Mrs Beaumont. Susan, Miss Barnett. Amoret, Miss M. Glover.
Attendant Spirits, Misses Stallard, Gallot, Angellina, Rose, and S. Barnett.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
Linaro, Alpanor, and Spirit Hunters, Messrs Morris, Winning, Fry, Taylor, &c.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Sebastian, Gregory, and Adam, Messrs Sanders, Willson, and Paulo, Jun.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Andrew and Karl, (his Children) Masters Calkin and Barnett.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.
Frassel, Mr Charles. 1st Chamois Hunter, Mr S. Smith. 2nd do. Mr V. Webster.
Spirits of the Alps, Chamois Hunters, Villagers, &c.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called
WAS I TO BLAME?

Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called
GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.
[By Mr BUCKSTONE].

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nancy Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Corridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, called
THE CHASTE SALUTE.
[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]

The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,
Philippe, Mr Newcombe, Thibaut, Mr Collier.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called
THE GRENADIER.

Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Della, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

To which will be added, a Comic Burletta, to be called
CLARISSA HARLOWE.

Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER. Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond. Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget. Capt. Cape, Mr W. VINING.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled
OLYMPIC REVELS.
[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]

Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young.
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Play, entitled
THE STRANGER.
[By KOTZEBUE.]

Mrs Haller, Miss M. C. POOLE, (her 2nd appearance)
Countess Wintersein, Miss Scott. Charlotte, Mrs Vale.
Savoyard, (with a Song) Miss SOMERVILLE. The Stranger, Mr OSBALDISTON.
Count Wintersein, Mr Honor. Baron Steinfort, Mr D. Pitt. Peter, Mr Vale.
Solomon, Mr Williams, Francis, Mr C. Hill. Tobias, Mr Gough.
The Count's Son, Master Carbery. The Stranger's Children, M. and E. Clarke.

After which, a Drama, entitled
THE DIAMOND ARROW.
[By W. T. MONCRIEF.]

Lucille, Miss SOMERVILLE. Dame Ledoine Fontaine, Mrs VALE.
Mons. Fontaine, Mr VALE. Mons. Anselm, Mr Young. Courier, Mr Lee.
Hilaire, Mr Edwin.

To conclude with a new Drama, from SCRIBE, entitled
BARON TRENCK.
[By Mr OSBALDISTON.]

Countess of Hulsdorff, Madame Simon. Countess of Lewemberg, Miss Rumens.
Victorine, Miss SOMERVILLE.
The Count of Linsdonn, Mr Gough. Major Mufflefdorf, Mr D. Pitt.
Frederick, Baron de Trenck, Mr OSBALDISTON. Augustus, Mr Edwin.
Boltzhelm, Mr Almar. François Bassontrompdorf, with a Comic Song, Mr C. Hill.

COBURG THEATRE.—Peter the Great and Charles XII. Harlequin Silver Penny—Wat Tyler and Jack Straw.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—Harlequin and Mother Goose—A Deed of Blood—The Morning after Mariage.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

N° 125.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 27, 1831.

PATENT THEATRES AND MR ARNOLD.

THE further consideration of this question before the Lord Chancellor is postponed till Monday. Meanwhile it has been once more resumed, but we find nothing new in the arguments. The most ingenious thing in the whole discussion is the eschewal of the real spirit of the question. His Lordship in vain endeavours now and then to bring it a little into play.

'The Lord Chancellor.—In a book published by the late Lord Carlisle—a person of no mean authority in theatrical opinions and affairs—it was stated, that the largeness of the theatres was inimical to the developement of the expression of the actors' faces, &c. which, accordingly, prevented the representation of any fine comedies. This was an argument used by many persons, and he only wished, for his own information, to know whether such was the case or not.

'Mr Adam said it certainly was not the case in either of the theatres. Not only old pieces, but new were represented—amongst which was The Chancery Suit, a piece of five acts, and one which bade fair to be a stock-piece. For the sake of the many eminent persons who had written the comedies, he wished their Lordships to be informed, that the drama had not decreased in such a way as might appear from the discussion on the preceding evening.'

The use of the word "any" in the Lord Chancellor's speech (if the report be correct) here enabled the learned Counsel to answer truly, as far as regards the letter of the question: but the spirit of it is always evaded. The largeness of the theatres has certainly not prevented the representation of every fine play; but as certainly, it is inimical to the habit of representing fine plays. A few of the best pieces produced, in later times, such as the School for Scandal and the Rivals, Goldsmith's comedy of She Stoops to Conquer, and some of the pieces of O'Keefe, are kept alive by the inheritance of certain favourite parts from one popular actor to another. These actors, when they make their debut, try their strength in them, in order to prove their claims to be considered successors to the others; and a certain small round of good plays are repeated in consequence, as long as these principal performers can render them attractive. But the rest of the pieces, with the exception of one of Otway's and a few of Shakspeare's, which are, for the most part, ill performed, and which struggle on between the marvellous force of their appeals to nature, and the appearance of a single good actor or so in one of the characters, are generally of a mediocre description. There are the plays of Morton, for instance, of Murphy, of Tom Dibdin, of Colman, &c. and a world of melodramas and other feeble monsters, which generally die soon after they are born, but how often is it that we hear of Congreve, Wycherley, and Farquhar? and what a mine is there of precious dramatists of the old time, includin; Beaumont and Fletcher, which, if it depended for fame on the theatres, would almost remain unknown? The managers tell us that the productions of these writers, however beautiful, would not attract audiences. True; not in immense theatres where they cannot be heard, and with bad actors, who exist there upon the strength of their faces being invisible. What would be the use of being invited upon one side of Salisbury Plain, to hear Handel performed on the other, or to see one of the paintings of Raphael? The plays of Shakspeare, of Massinger, of Beaumont and Fletcher, of Decker, Webster, and others, came out in small theatres, not bigger sometimes than those yards of inns from which they were in fact copied, and of which our present pit and boxes are imitations. The very best actors only draw occasionally and for short periods; and when they do, only half the house can hear and see them properly; which is the reason why they are not more attractive. Now and then some new debutante attracts the public curiosity, generally to no lasting purpose, and with injury to the very powers evinced, because of the temptation to rant. The most genuine satisfaction is caused by singing and spectacle, because in those cases the appeals to hearing and eyesight are on a large scale, and the new stars pierce the remote regions of the upper boxes. Acting, too, is not expected of singers, partly because they have been accustomed to do without it. As to melodrama, nobody looks for expression in the whiskered cheeks and Tamerlane gestures of a bandit: an elephant can dispense with delicacy of inspection; and storms, murders, Newgate-Calendar plots, shipwrecks, crashes of music, dogs, horses, real water, anything, in short, but real plays, are at length not only tolerated but desired by the public, out of an instinctive sense that they are the best things which the houses are fit for. For our parts, we have no objection to a spectacle when it is good of its kind, still less if it is founded on one of those fairy or Eastern tales, which are not less full of genius and delight because they are the delight of children. But the success of these upon the stages most fit for them ought not to hinder the creation of other stages fitter for the performance of tragedy and comedy. The counsel for the patentees the other night mentioned, as a curious fact illustrative of this question, that the same dramas which had attracted full houses in the large theatres, were performed by the same actors in the Haymarket Theatre to half-empty benches. Name! Name! as they cry in parliament. We know not how truly this gentleman may have been informed nor does he mention how often the fact occurred, or under what circumstances; but we will venture to affirm, either that the dramas must have been bad ones, or of such an inferior nature as to demand a large house, or else that it was wholly owing to difference of season and the emptiness of the town. On the other hand, if our memory does not greatly deceive us, the same dramas which attract full houses at the Haymarket, have been acted to half-empty benches in the great theatres, though we cannot say whether or not in the same hands. At all events, the argument nullifies itself; for, as the Solicitor-General observed, if little theatres cannot draw full houses, and great ones can, why do the latter fear them? and if it is not desirable to see and hear in the very best manner, why are good actors requisite at all? and how is it that the great theatres do not get rich? Sir Charles Wetherell, who appeared for Mr Morris during the last mooting of the question, said, that Mr Arnold, instead of producing musical dramatic entertainments and ballets of action, had done little but emulate the "spurious performances" of Sadler's Wells and the Olympic; while he gave us to understand that no such performances were represented at what he called the "three regular theatres." The truth is, that the Haymarket is the most regular theatre at present existing; if by that term we are to understand a theatre devoted to regular plays, farces and opera; and accordingly, with the help of its being a small theatre, it is in general well filled, in spite of its performing during the summer months only. We may venture on this occasion to observe, as speaking from critical experience, and a love of the stage, that it is on that account solely our own favourite play-house, and that we have often expressed our pleasure at sitting there, and coming as it were into social contact with the dramatis personæ. Nor has this opinion been expressed by ourselves only. People have been in the habit of observing how well the Haymarket fills, in spite of the heat of summer time, and of adding, that it must be owing to the facilities afforded for seeing and hearing. We do not think, we confess, that the heat of the summer is so great an objection as people suppose it, the greater amount of animal spirits during that season being perhaps more than an equivalent for any inconvenience occasioned by the smallness of the accommodation. But not to lose sight of Sir Charles Wetherell, the two great theatres notoriously partake to a great extent in the spurious performances which he attributes exclusively to Sadler's Wells and the Olympic. The Adelphi complains, that they deprive it of its nautical after-pieces. Their condescension to show and spectacle, to dogs and horses, have been repeatedly burlesqued by the minors; and in brigands and bandits, and Old Bailey plots, they absolutely strive hard to outdo Sadler's Wells and the Coburg. The very best pieces they have produced for a long time are such as those which the Olympic, the Adelphi, Mr Arnold's theatre, and Mr Morris's, have been producing every day, namely, light little pieces from the French: the only other good novelties, with the exception of the appearance of Miss Inverarity, (and we speak with the utmost deliberation, and from the experience of nightly attendance) have been the beautiful series of landscape scenery in the present pantomime at Drury Lane, and the custom introduced in the orchestras of playing the finest pieces of Mozart and others. Even the two pantomimes now running at the great theatres, notwithstanding the means possessed of giving them the greatest effect, are in the universal opinion of the town inferior to the pantomime at the Adelphi. The Adelphi is constantly producing new pieces that do it great credit; the Olympic, in its light way, promises to do as much; the Haymarket has always maintained its reputation; and from what we hear of the Coburg and the Surrey, and have seen of a variety of printed dramas which have been sent us, performed at those theatres, and written by Mr Jerrold, they have been making the most praiseworthy exertions for informing as well as amusing the important multitudes that visit them; a circumstance, we may venture to say, which is not unworthy the serious consideration of the Lord Chancellor, as serving to shew him the importance of exciting intellectual emulation among a variety of play-houses. Sir Charles Wetherell has given it as his opinion, that a multiplicity of theatres is injurious to good morals, and he says that this opinion was confirmed, many years ago, by a speech which he heard at Oxford from the lips of the present Archbishop of Canterbury. What the Archbishop said, or how this confirmation of ancient date has withstood all the precious accumulation and vigorous coherency of Sir Charles's ideas in the interval, we are not told; neither do we think it necessary to repeat anything on the point. Liberal knowledge must advance in a liberal manner, and in a just confidence that real morals and intellectual freedom will flourish together. The more the world know, the more they will know wisely; and the more good naturedly they are taught the knowledge, the sooner it will come.

Digitized by Google

There was one thing we were very sorry to see in the report of these later arguments. It was the appearance of a gentleman on the behalf of the Duke of Bedford, who joins the patentees in opposing the extension of Mr Arnold's license, in consequence of his being the ground landlord of Covent Garden. His Grace, we presume, who has the reputation of being a good-natured man, has condescended to come forward for the benefit of others. We are sorry for it, because he is very rich, and might have afforded to let the question take its most liberal course.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Behaviour towards Superiors.—The highest point of good-breeding, if any one can hit it, is to show a very nice regard for your own dignity, and with that in your heart, express your value for the man above you.—Steele.

Battle of Agincourt.—A gentleman, long famous for the aptitude of his puns, observing a violent fracas in the front area of a gin-shop, facetiously termed it "The battle of a-gin-court."

Yorkshire Wit.—"Now, John," says Mrs P. to her man-servant, "you must go with my compliments, and enquire how old Mrs Q. is?" (there being two Mrs Q.'s). "Yes, ma'am." On his return, John said, "Mrs Q. will be 84 next birth-day, ma'am."

Microscopic Wonders.—A few twigs, full of sap, were placed in a small quantity of water for several days, until a part of the sap became incorporated with the water. A drop of this water was put on the head of a large pin, and by the solar microscope it was found to contain more than thirty thousand living creatures!

A Politic Resolution.—I believe Mr Anderson talks partially of me as to my looks; I know nothing of the matter, as it is eleven years since I have seen my figure in a glass, and the last reflection I saw there was so disagreeable, that I resolved to spare myself such mortification for the future, and shall continue that resolution to my life's end.—Lady M. W. Montagu.

A Useful Hint.—The vain man takes praise for honour; the proud man, ceremony for respect, the ambitious man, power for glory. These three characters are indeed of very near resemblance, but differently received by mankind. Vanity makes men ridiculous, pride odious, and ambition terrible. The foundation of all which is, that they are grounded upon falsehood: for if men, instead of studying to appear considerable, were in their own hearts possessors of the requisites for esteem, the acceptance they otherwise unfortunately aim at, would be as inseparable from them, as approbation is from truth itself. By this means they would have some rule to walk by; and they may ever be assured, that a good cause of action will ever receive a suitable effect. It may be a useful hint in such cases, for a man to ask of himself, whether he really is what he has a mind to be thought? If he is, he need not give himself much further anxiety—Steele.

Economical Obsequies.—"So you bury attorneys, in this country," said a stranger to a farmer, as a funeral procession entered the churchyard.—"Bury them!" said the farmer, "to be sure we do, don't you?"—"Oh! no, when an attorney dies, we lay him out, throw open the windows, and lock the door,—in the morning the body is gone. There is, to be sure, a strong smell of burning brimstone, but it goes off."—American Paper.

Seeing the Good one does.—I would not crawl upon the earth without doing a little good when I have a mind to do it. I will enjoy the pleasure of what I give, by giving it alive, and seeing another enjoy it. When I die, I should be ashamed to leave enough to build a monument, if there were a wanting friend above ground.—Pope.

False Punctuation.—By the misplacing of a comma, the grocers in a certain village in America, are licensed by the legislature to be drunk in their own houses for a year together. The passage runs thus:—"And it shall be lawful for such grocer or grocers on receiving such license and giving such bond to sell such strong and spirituous liquor, to be drunk in the building in which he, she, or they, shall keep such grocery, for the term of one year from the date of such license." In one of the American papers, a further improvement was made, by printing the word awful, for lawful. It was an apt one.

Court Courtesy.—The Ministry is like a play at Court; there's a little door to get in, and a great crowd without, shoving and thrusting who shall be foremost; people who knock others with their elbows, disregard a little kick of the shins, and still thrusting hastily forward, are sure of a good place. Your modest man stands behind in the crowd, is shoved about by everybody, his clothes torn, almost squeezed to death, and sees a thousand get in before him, that don't make so good a figure as himself.—Lady M. W. Montagu.

Cure for a terrible Disorder in the Mouth, commonly called Scandal.—Take of "Good-nature" one ounce; of an herb, called by Indians "Mind your own business," one ounce; mix these with a little "Charity for failings," and two or three sprigs of "Keep your tongue between your teeth." Simmer them together in a vessel called Circumspection, for a short time, and it will be fit for use.—American paper.

Conversation.—If I were to choose the people with whom I would spend my hours of conversation, they should be certainly such as laboured no farther than to make themselves readily and clearly apprehended, and would have patience and curiosity to understand me. To have good sense, and ability to express it, are the most essential and necessary qualities in companions. When thoughts rise in us fit to utter among familiar friends, there needs but very little care in clothing them.—Steele.

Fine Sense.—If things were put in a true light, and we would take time to consider that man, in his very nature, is an imperfect being, our sense of the matter would be immediately altered, and the word imperfection would not carry an unkinder idea than the word humanity. It is a pleasant story that we, forsooth, who are the only imperfect creatures in the universe, are the only beings that will not allow of imperfection.—Steele.

Music and Murder.—Alessandro Stradella flourished about the middle of the seventeenth century. He was a fine singer, and an excellent performer on the harp. He held for some years the situation of composer to the opera at Venice, and also taught music there. A mutual passion arising between him and one of his pupils, named Hortensia, the mistress of a nobleman, they agreed to elope, and escaped to Rome. On discovering their flight, the Venetian dispatched two assassins, with directions to murder both Stradella and the lady, wherever they should be found. The assassins understanding Stradella was to give an oratorio in a church, attended the performance, determined to follow the musician and his mistress out of the church, and then strike the fatal blow.—The exquisitely pathetic music, however, softened the hearts of the murderers. They not only desisted from their purpose, but exerted all their influence to preserve the lovers, who having thus escaped the malice of their enemy, fled to Turin, and the assassins returned to their employer, whose disappointment served but to sharpen his resentment. He found means to attach the father of Hortensia to his interest, and instigated the old man to become the murderer of his daughter. In this he succeeded, and joining two others, they set off, with the resolution of destroying the unfortunate pair. The Duchess of Savoy was at this time Regent of Turin, and being informed of their situation, placed the lady in a convent, and retained Stradella as her principal musician.—Thus secured, his fears began to abate; but one evening taking the air on the ramparts, he was attacked by three assassins, who each stabbed him in the breast. The villains escaped through the protection of an ambassador. Stradella's wounds not proving dangerous, he was soon cured. A year elapsed, and no fresh disturbance having been made, he thought himself secure; but the Venetian had placed spies over him, who were watching a favourable moment for revenge.—The Duchess, deeply interested for two persons who had suffered so much, herself united them in marriage. After the ceremony, they wished to visit Genoa, and went thither, with a resolution of returning again to Turin. They reached the end of their journey, but the moment of their arrival terminated their existence; the murderers rushed into their chamber, and stabbed them both to the heart. This is, perhaps, as remarkable an instance of the perseverance of Italian revenge as any upon record.—Musical Biography.

Digitized by Google

AWFUL SIGNS OF THE TIMES.—The butler of a gentleman of my acquaintance, living at ——, in Surrey, imbibing the martial spirit of the times, and entertaining the propriety of providing for future emergencies, has had his child christened by the name of "Major John;" and when asked the reason for such an absurdity, stated his conviction that his son would at no distant period be called upon to rally round the standard of liberty, and fight in common with others, for his country's wrongs; and as his means would not allow him to purchase a commission for his son, he therefore thought it right, in order to support the dignity of the family, to provide him with one at the baptismal font.—From a Correspondent.

MODERN MEANINGS TO OLD WORDS.—Incumbent. One on income bent.—Satisfaction. The pleasure of compelling a fellow to shoot you through the head, because he had called you an ass.—Palpable absurdity. Anything discordant to your opinions.—Knowing fellow. One who suspects every one to be a rogue.—Luxuries. Any dainty used by your neighbour.—Necessaries. Any luxury used by yourself. Seditious rascal. A fellow out of work, who cannot starve without complaining.—Minister. One whom half the parish are bound to minister to.—To die universally lamented. To die without paying your debts.—American Paper.

CIVILIZATION AND BARBARISM.—Extract of a letter from Hobart-town, Van Diemau's Land, dated March 26, 1829.—There is no want here; there are none of those pallied, care-worn, anxious faces, that look from every corner and street in London. There is no misery but what results from idleness, debauchery, and unwarrantable speculations. The black population is not very numerous, but utterly insensible to the blessings of civilization. They are such arrant idiots as to prefer nakedness in a climate where clothes are not requisite, to being incased with woollens offered to them in exchange for their liberty; and they prefer a life of ease and independence to one of labour and restraint. The whites, wisely disgusted by such brutel folly, express their difference of opinion, by arguing upon them from the musket; and the blacks acknowledge these appeals to their undertaking, by spearing the whites at all convenient opportunities. The controversy must be interminable until one color has extinguished the other.

THE MUSICAL SMALL-COAL MAN.—The most extraordinary piece of Musical Biography in the work so entitled, is that of Thomas Britton, the musical small-coal man. He was not a composer of music, but his history is so interesting, says the editor, that we cannot avoid inserting some account of it. He served an apprenticeship to a dealer in small-coal, and after some time, hired a stable in Clerkenwell, which he converted into a dwelling-house, and began the trade for himself. He was celebrated for an extensive knowledge of chemistry, and for a great degree of skill in the theoretical and practical parts of music. He collected a number of books, many of them on the occult sciences, and after his death his collection of musical instruments were sold for eighty pounds. The prudence of Britton's deportment to his superiors in wealth, procured him great respect. Sir Robert L'Estrange, and many other men of wit, learning, and rank, honoured his musical society with their company. He was so much distinguished, that when passing the streets he was frequently accosted with such expressions as "There goes the musical coalman, a lover of learning, a performer of music, and a companion for gentlemen." Notwithstanding the meanness of his habitation, its attractions were so great, that the genteelest audiences were frequently present at his musical entertainments. Among many others of great note, Handel performed there—and that afterwards-celebrated performer, Mr Matthew Dubourg, then a child, played for the first time in public a solo on the violin, in Britton's poor abode, being elevated on a stool for the purpose. About this time the rage for collecting old books had seized many of the nobility. Britton was well skilled in the prices and titles of these articles, and in conjunction with the Earls of Pembroke, Oxford, Sunderland, Winchilsea, and the Duke of Devonshire, every Saturday morning during the winter was spent by him in search of old books and manuscripts. It was the custom of these persons to assemble at a bookseller's in Paternoster-row, at twelve o'clock, when Britton would regularly make his appearance, clad in his blue frock, and with his sack of small-coal on his shoulder. He would pitch his sack on the bulk of the shop window, and then go in and join his noble friends, who, after an hour's conversation, adjourned to a tavern to spend the remainder of the day. The artist Woolaston was one of Britton's friends and admirers, and painted a picture of him, now in the British Museum. The occasion of its painting was as follows:—Britton had nearly emptied his sack earlier than usual, and finding himself close to the abode of his friend, wished to call on him. He did not like to make his appearance dressed as he was, but he determined to cry small-coal while passing through Warwick lane, and thereby stand a chance of attracting that gentleman's notice. Mr Woolaston, who had never heard him there before, immediately beckoned him in, and intimated a desire to take his picture, which Britton modestly yielded to, and was painted with his blue frock and small-coal measure in his hand. The circumstances of his death are not less remarkable than those of his life. Mr Robe, a magistrate, secretly introduced a ventriloquist into his house during one of the musical meetings, for the purpose of terrifying him. The ventriloquist announced from a distant part of the room, that Britton would die in a few hours, unless he repeated the lord's prayer on his knees. The poor man did as he was told, but he was so dreadfully alarmed that he died in a few days.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Werner—Turning the Tables—and the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Fazio—The Youthful Queen—and the Pantomime.

COVENT GARDEN.

THERE was nothing new at the theatres last night. Tomorrow there will be a new opera, and on Monday Mr KEAN re-appears. Meanwhile we have nothing better to offer the reader but a remark or two on Mr POWER's Irishman in London; for the piece itself is hardly worth notice, though there are one or two other parts in it which afforded opportunities for clever actors to draw them out, and garnish them with jokes of their own. Its title explains the humour of the principal character, who is an Irishman suddenly brought by his master into the English metropolis, hustled about by the crowd, having his pocket picked of a banker's check that he holds in his hand, standing up in defence of his country when his master (who would fain be a Londoner, and says leedies) wishes to cut it, and thrusting himself before him in company to instruct the young ladies how they ought to admire the oyster-beds in Poolbeg, the foundling and lying-inn hospitals in Dublin, and other manufactories.

We need not say that Mr POWER acquitted himself to admiration. He does not seem able, like the late Mr JOHNSTONE, to throw in those little touches of heart and serious feeling which are sometimes to be found in the broadest and most comic characters. He always stops short of a sentiment. He never seems, for instance, to be moved into any real tenderness towards the sable maid-servant, who in her simplicty makes love to him. JOHNSTONE, in the midst of raillery and laughter, would have contrived to show, now and then, that his heart really misgave him for the poor girl. He would not have merely uttered a word or two of sympathy. He would have made a real humanity of it, and shewed us that his nature was above the jest into which his humour, and two bottles of wine, had betrayed him. Mr POWER cannot do this: neither can he sing, and we understand he cannot perform genteel Irishmen. But in all the main points of such a character as the one before us, nothing can surpass him, we doubt whether JOHNSTONE equalled him. If the latter seemed to have come from a more refined part of Ireland, POWER appears like the native of one given up to a more entire spirit of drollery and carelessness. JOHNSTONE stood firmly, though quaintly, as if upon the pavement of a town; POWER, with an equal Irish aversion to locomotion, as though he would not trouble himself with taking a step in life, balances himself and sways to and fro with indolent security, as if he stood upon the borders of the bog-trotters, and was prepared to hop and skip a few yards on occasion; which he does: for your genuine bog-trotter has something of the sailor in his legs, and while he skips over the more treacherous ground, as the sailor does to his deck, commits the rest of his body to what may happen. Then the words are perpetually sliding out of POWER's mouth, as if he loved to do nothing else but talk: there is no interruption to them: his style is the most flowing conceivable, welling out of a perpetual spring head of quaintness and confidence; and nothing can surpass the repose of it. In these two latter respects we think JOHNSTONE might have envied him.

THE CONSTANT TURNER.—An American paper contains the marriage of Master David Turner of Palermo, aged seventeen, to Miss Almina Brown, of Liberty, aged fourteen, after a courtship of five years. Certainly the little god was in one of his finest frolics, when he aimed his darts at the breasts of 12 and 9 years.—He must have taken a sip of nectar too much. We can imagine Master David—"a curly-headed little urchin with a bib on chin" discoursing love to the little Miss Brown.—After a courtship of five years, he thought that she had been Brown long enough on one side—so he would Turn-her. He was, however, much more constant than the swain mentioned in the old epigram:—

When I was young and debonnaire,
The brownest girl to me was fair;
But now I'm old, and wiser grown,
The fairest girl to me is Brown.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Grizzle Glowworm, Mrs Beaumont. Susan, Miss Barnett. Amoret, Miss M. Glover.
Attendant Spirits, Misses Stallard, Gallot, Angellina, Rose, and S. Barnett.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
Lingro, Alpanor, and Spirit Hunters, Messrs Morris, Winning, Fry, Taylor, &c.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Sebastian, Gregory, and Adam, Messrs Sanders, Willson, and Paulo, Jun.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Andrew and Karl, (his Children) Masters Calkin and Barnett.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.
Fransel, Mr Charles. 1st Chamois Hunter, Mr S. Smith. 2nd do. Mr V. Webster.
Spirits of the Alps, Chamois Hunters, Villagers, &c.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called

WAS I TO BLAME?

Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].
The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, called

THE CHASTE SALUTE

[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]
The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,
Philippe, Mr Newcombe, Thibaut, Mr Collier.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called

THE GRENADIER.

Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

To which will be added, a Comic Burletta, to be called

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER. Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond. Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget. Capt. Cape, Mr W. VINING.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe.
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,

SURREY THEATRE.

The Opera of

GUY MANNERING.

Lucy Bertram, Miss SOMERVILLE, in which she will introduce 'The Soldier's Tear.' Julia Mannering, Miss VINCENT, in which she will introduce 'Rise Gentle Moon.' Gypsey Girl, Miss M. Somerville. Flora, Mrs Vale.
Mrs M'Candish, Madame Simon. Meg Merrilies, Miss M. C. POOLE.
Henry Bertram, Mr EDWIN, in which he will introduce 'Be mine, dear Maid,' 'Draw the sword, Scotland,' 'Oft in the stilly Night,' 'The Pilgrim of Love,' and the Duet, 'Now Hope, now Fear,' with Miss Vincent.
Colonel Mannering, Mr C. Hill. Gilbert Glossin, Mr Gough.
Baillie Mucklethrift, Mr Williams. Dominie Sampson, Mr VALE.
Dandie Dinmont, Mr D. Pitt. Dirk Hatteraick, Mr Almar.
Gabriel, Mr Ransford. Sebastian, Mr Lee. Franco, Miss Ellis.
Jock Jabos, Mr Asbury. Serjeant M'Crae, Mr Hobbs.

To conclude with an Operatic Extravaganza, (in Two Acts) entitled

GIOVANNI IN LONDON.

[By W. T. MONCRIEFF.
Miss Constantia Quixote, Miss VINCENT. Mrs Leporello, Mrs Rogers.
Mrs English, Miss Rumens. Squalling Fan, Mrs Vale. Mrs Porous, Miss Boden.
Mrs Drainemdry, Madame Simon. Mrs Simpkins, Miss Perry.
Proserpine, Miss Withers. Succubus, Miss Rayner. Tartarus, Miss Jones.
Don Giovanni, Miss SOMERVILLE, she will introduce 'I've pluck'd the fairest flower,' and 'Come where the sapens quiver.' Leporello, Mr VALE.
Finikin, Mr Honor. Popinjay, Mr Lee. Deputy English, Mr Young.
Pluto, Mr Almar. Charon Mr Gough. Firedrake, Mr Ransford,
Drainemdry, Mr Eden. Porous, Mr Webb. Simpkins, Mr Rogers.
Shirk, Mr Nichols. Cobbler, Mr Asbury. Styles, Mr Grammer. Nokes, Mr Ford.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Drama, (in Two Acts) called,

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]
Maria Grazia, Mrs W. BARRYMORE, Ottavia, Miss FAUCIT.
Prince Bianchi, Mr Younge, Nicolo, Mr Webster, Fabio, Mr Hughes,
Albert and Theodore, Mr H. WALLACK and Mr J. VINING,
Alessandro Massaroni, Mr WALLACK,
Rubaldo, Mr Bedford,
Spoletto, Mr Bland, Uberto, Mr Robinson, Carlotti. Mr Yarnold.

In the course of the Evening, Rossini's Overture to "Semiramide," and Mozart's Overture to "Die Entfurung aus dem Serail."

After which, a Musical Piece, (in Two Acts) called

THE ILLUSTRIOUS STRANGER.

[By Mr KENNEY.]
Irza, Miss FAUCIT, Fatima, Mrs WAYLETT,
Aboulifar, Mr Thompson, Aman, Mr Bland. Alibajou, Mr Webster,
Bowbell, Mr LISTON, Gimbo, Mr HARLEY,
High Priest, Mr Fenton, Officers, Mr C. Jones and Mr Horner.

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.
The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.
Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands

To-morrow, Werner; the Lady and the Devil; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The New Comedy of

THE CHANCERY SUIT.

Emily Traverse, Miss E. Tree. Mrs Post, Mrs Gibbs. Mrs Snare, Mrs Pindar.
Jenny, Mrs J. Hughes. Miss Willowly, Mrs Daley.
Miss Sallowfield, Mrs Brown. Mrs Gravebury, Miss Appleton.
Mrs Tapsley, Mrs Tayleure. Sir Bernard Blazoncourt, Mr EGERTON.
Frederick Blazoncourt, Mr. ABBOT. Guy Thistlebloom, Mr BARTLEY.
Jeremy Thistlebloom, (under the assumed name of Courtington) Mr WARDE.
Murphy O'Doggrely, Mr POWER. Snare, Mr MEADOWS.
Winterfield, Mr BLANCHARD.
Tapsley, Mr F. Matthews. Michael, Mr Addison. Ben, Mr Evans.
Sheriff's Officer, Mr Fuller. Beadle, Mr Atkins.

Previous to the Comedy, Rossini's Overture to "Il Barbiere di Saviglia."
Previous to the Farce, Mozart's Overture to "Die Zauberflote."

After which,

TEDDY THE TILER.

[By Mr G. H. RODWELL.]
Lady Dunderford, Mrs Daly, Oriel, Miss Lawrence, Flora, Miss Nelson,
Julia, Mrs Brown. Lord Dunderford, Mr Evans, Henry, Mr Duruset,
Frederick, Mr Baker, Bombardine, Mr Henry, Mr Scrivener, Mr Turnour,
Teddy Mulowney, the Tiler, Mr POWER,
Tim, Mr Addison, Stiff, Mr Mears, Apewell, Mr Irwin.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.
THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, Cinderella; and the Pantomime.

COBURG THEATRE.—Peter the Great and Charles XII. Harlequin Silver Penny—Wat Tyler and Jack Straw.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—Harlequin and Mother Goose—A Deed of Blood—The Morning after Mariage.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL.—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 126.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 28, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Lives of the Italian Poets. By the Rev. Henry Stebbing, M. A. M. R. S. L. With twenty medallion portraits. 3 vols. 8vo. Bull.

A BIOGRAPHY of the Italian Poets has long been a desideratum. Mr Stebbing has here supplied one, which, if more defective in some respects than might be wished, is not a common-place production, and will be gladly placed on his shelves by the lover of Italian literature. To ourselves, to whom a set of book-shelves is one of the most delightful of sights, and who never behold a set of the Tuscan bards upon them, without thinking we see a lump of sunshine, it will be no small pleasure to contemplate the very backs of the books, with the title upon them,—LIVES OF THE ITALIAN POETS. What particular objections we have to make to any of Mr Stebbing's remarks, or what agreement to express with them, will appear as we go through his volumes. To speak generally, we have to thank him for an addition to the stock of biography, containing evidences of elegant scholarship and graceful feeling; while we cannot help regretting that he has not given us a little more criticism, with occasional specimens; that he has inserted the lives of some authors who are hardly to be called poets, (Lorenzo di Medici for instance, Aretin and Politian); brought in such a man as Pulci under Politian's cloak, as if he had not been far more worthy of a chapter than twenty Politians; said not a word of Redi and Forteguerri, two of the most popular poets of their kind, the former an original; and among his minor poets, made distinguished mention of Apostolo Zeno; omitting altogether the names of Rucellai, Tansillo, Pastorini, the Zappi, Cassiani, Morando, and twenty others, far better than some to whom he has given an elevated station. Politian was only a scholar, read him as you will: we are not aware of one touch of poetry in that bully of his time, Aretin: and much as we admire and love the author of the Basil story, the Falcon, Griselda, &c. we cannot think that even Boccaccio has a right to be admitted among the Italian poets, though his passionate admiration of poetry was something more akin to the possesion of it, than the highest powers of some of the writers admitted into Mr Stebbing's work. Boccaccio was mastered by what he admired. His finest things, (and divine they are,) are like the reports of a wondering child. He could not concentrate at will, as the poet does; his poetry is languid prose. If he had lived now, he could have written the Waverley Novels, and put finer women into them. But no real poet could have written his Filocopo, and his Amorosa Fiametta.

The lives written by Mr Stebbing, are those of Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio, Lorenzo di Medici, Politian, Boiardo, Sannazzo, Ariosto, Bembo, Vittoria Colonna, Aretin, Tasso the father, Trissino, Berni, Alamanni, Guarani, Tasso, Chiabrera, Tassoni, Marini, Metastasio, Zeno, Filicaia, Guidi, Parini, and Alfieri: with incidental notices of Pulci, Frugoni, Achillini, Testi, and others.

It is difficult to know what to make of the character of Dante, according to the notions entertained of him. He has a grave and almost holy reputation with the world, something analogous to that of Milton, and no poet has been bitterer upon licence than he, yet during some period of his exile, we find that he formed an "illicit connexion." He married at a time when his thoughts are said to have been occupied with another woman, and the marriage is said to have become unhappy on that account, yet he seems to have taken no pains to conciliate his wife. To take for granted the poetical justice of his great work, he has condemned and eulogized none but such as deserved it: yet upon the least investigation it turns out to be written in the most violent party spirit: good men are damned without mercy, and fellows put into heaven, who according to orthodox morality, have no more business there than the devil himself. Nothing can be more certain, nevertheless, than that he was a very great poet, and that he was capable of writing with great occasional tenderness and sweetness; though we think that the entireness of his feeling in the latter respect has been overrated, and that something of a morbid wish to give pain, or at least to dwell upon painful inconsistencies, is apt to mingle with his kindness. We cannot conceive, for example, on what principle of benevolence or compliment, public or private, he thought it necessary to put the daughter of his host, Guido Novello, into hell, while his host was alive and a reader of him, however gently he has done it, or whatever pity has been pleased to bestow upon her. He also might have refrained from damning several of his friends and acquaintances. Some have conjectured that he wished to bring the belief in an infernal region into contempt. But, it is to suppose him long-sighted, indeed, beyond his time, to think that he had an intention of this sort, when he has put so many enemies there, as well as friends.

The illicit connexion, except on the part of a man of so austere a character, would not prove so much as might be thought in that age; since it is the nature of excessive theories of restraint to produce laxity, as was the case with the church-men who kept mistresses; and it is remarkable, that out of the four great poets of Italy, three had illegitimate children, (Dante, Petrarch, and Ariosto,) and the fourth (Tasso) had no objection to them, if we are to trust his "Rime Amorose," and his famous ode on the "Golden Age." We have a favourite theory, which we think it worth while to insist upon, when speaking of the inconsistencies of a great man, and this is, that they are traceable to his progenitors. Dante may have had a very austere father, and a kind mother: he would partake of the nature of both; and hence the perplexity in his character. He was the greatest, though certainly not the most pleasing poet in Italy. It would be unnatural to like to live in his world, as we do in the good-natured one of Ariosto, or the love-haunted solitudes of Petrarch. His poem, seldom amiable, sometimes affecting, but always forcing the thoughts strongly upon themselves, is rather calculated to work out some ultimate good, by seconding the vigour of particular minds, than to become popular even in a small degree. It is like a capricious book of martyrs, furnishing pictures for children, and reflections destructive of its own dogmas to men; but can never take hold of the world at large.

The person of this extraordinary man, and the general aspect of his moral character, are well described by Mr Stebbing: "The person of Dante, according to the descriptions of contemporary writers, and the various medals and paintings which have multiplied his likeness, are strikingly representative of his intellectual character. The expression of his visage, which was long, and deeply embrowned, was grave and severe; his eyes were large and penetrating; his nose aquiline; his under lip advanced beyond the upper; and the hair, both of his head and beard, thick, black and crisp. In stature he was not above the middle size, and as his years advanced, he was somewhat bowed by infirmity: but his appearance was always haughty and dignified, and his slow step and composed countenance impressed all who saw him with respect. With regard to his general character, its principal features were great ardour in whatever he undertook, unrestrained freedom of both acting and speaking, according to his own ideas of right, great warmth in his attachments, and an impatience of flattery or dissimulation. His sentiments were pure, and the natural temper of his mind inclined to devotion. For the most part, his life seems to have corresponded to his principles; but the discontent which existed between him and his wife, and the consequent unsettled state of his affections, led him, during some period of his exile, into an illicit connexion. We have scarcely, indeed, any opportunity of judging correctly of his character as a father and a husband. He certainly was open to the accusation of having thrown all the asperity of his feelings into his domestic relations, and of having deserted or neglected them through a large portion of his life. But, from the time of his being elected prior, to the day of his death, he seems to have been wholly occupied with politics or with the studies, which either abstracted him from the world or ministered nourishment to the bitter and passionate emotions with which he regarded his faith. He was hence borne along by a torrent which swept all milder sympathies and regards from his bosom,—the only channel through which any tender feeling could insinuate itself into his heart was memory; but, with the recollection of his native city and the scenes of his youth, were too intimately blended the deep-seated resentment o the injured citizen; and thus, both in his life and poetry, the gentler feelings of his nature cast only a rare and fitful gleam over the prevailing gloom."—Vol. I, p. 57.

Digitized by Google

We may add, that Dante, perhaps, partook of more of the scepticism for which some of his friends were famous, than might be supposed from his designing a department in hell to unbelievers, and putting them in it. He was a Platonist and metaphysician, and probably refined upon his doubts in some such way as to reconcile them, or fancy he reconciled them, with the opinions required of him.

[To be continued.]

THE SLAVE.

BY ROBERT DALE OWEN.

In the pleasant island of Martinique, there lived, about thirty years ago, a rich planter, named Monsieur Haima. Possessed of a princely fortune, gifted with a polished address, and a mild and friendly character, he was one of the most influential colonists on the island. His plantations were numerous and flourishing, and he was master of many hundred slaves, whom he treated with humanity and gentleness. To one of these, a young man of colour, he accorded the most implicit confidence. Antoine was a slave in nothing but the name. He had but to express a wish, and it was gratified. His master made him general overseer of his property, and manager of his affairs; and Antoine might be seen mounted on a superb charger, with silver bit and spurs,—the adopted son, it seemed, rather than the servant, of the opulent planter. M. Haima had large droves of mules, and numerous herds of oxen, which, for a long period, increased year by year. At last a mortality appeared among them, and he lost a great number. A few of his negroes, too, died suddenly; and the disease which carried them off, was not understood. The next year the mortality increased. The negroes died in numbers, and, among them, the parents and other relations of Antoine. The ablest physicians were consulted, and several gave it as their opinion that the mortality was caused by poison. The third year, it raged to a yet more frightful extent: men, women, and children died daily. The symptoms of poison were now too evident to be mistaken, but he who administered it remained unknown and unsuspected. M. Haima had always lived upon friendly terms with his neighbours.

One day, when the mortality was at its height, several of M. Haima's friends called to consult and condole with him. "Let me advise you," said one of them, "to apply to the Sorceress who lives at the foot of the mountains."

"What!" said M. Haima in surprise, "old Catiche! You surely do not suspect me of giving credit to the foolish stories which are circulated and believed among the slaves of her supernatural powers?"

"By no means, but a reputation like her's is seldom acquired without some foundation. Do not imagine that I give her more credit than yourself for her powers of witchcraft. But for shrewdness and sagacity, I do give her credit. By her spies, or otherwise, she obtains information regarding even the most secret doings of her neighbours. Scarce a whisper can be spoken, but it comes to her ears; and if any one can inform you who is your secret enemy, it is old Catiche."

M. Haima recurred next day to his friend's advice. "I shall be a beggar," thought he, "if this mysterious mortality continues much longer. And, after all, a wise man may profit even by the superstition of fools. At all events, I cannot lose much by the trial."—So he mounted his horse, and rode unattended to the hut of the sorceress.

She sat in its furthest corner, muffled in a huge blanket, and muttering unintelligibly to herself; and did not, by word or gesture, intimate her recognition of the planter as he entered. He seated himself by her, and inquired if she could throw any light upon his late misfortunes.

"How should I?" returned the hag in her sharpest key. "How should a poor old creature like me know anything of such doings?"

M. Haima replied,—"I do not suppose, as many do, Catiche, that you have other means of obtaining information, than any one else might have, with the same acquaintance and opportunity; but you do get to know almost everything that passes in the island."

"And if I cannot speak with spirits, why do you come to me? You have your own eyes and ears, and can use them as well as I can."

M. Haima drew from his pocket a couple of gold pieces, and as he put them into her withered hand, he said, "Catiche, I have not time to argue with you. Tell me, if you can tell me, who it is that poisons my slaves and my cattle."

The old woman looked at the gold, cast a searching glance round the room, and then, approaching her lips close to the planter's ear, pronounced in a low whisper, the name of "Antoine!"

"How!" said M. Haima, out of all patience, "him whom I have treated as a son, and loaded with benefits! You rave. What are your proofs?"

Catiche remained silent;—and not another word could the planter draw from her. So he was forced to take his leave, very ill satisfied with his visit.

"I told you how it was;" replied he to his friend's inquiry regarding his success, "the old fool knows nothing of the matter; and, out of envy, for aught I know, or for want of some one else to accuse, she lays the blame on poor Antoine. But I deserved no better, for my folly in going to consult a sorceress."

"Be advised," returned his friend, "Catiche is well informed regarding all that passes on our plantations, and she would not hazard such an assertion without good reason. You have an unlimited confidence in Antoine, but see that it is not misplaced; he has opportunity enough to do you this injury, if he be so disposed."

"But how should he be so disposed? I have shown him more favour, than any one else on the plantation. He has whatever he asks, or wishes for. Interest, if not gratitude, would make him regard my welfare as his own."

"Well," said his friend, "do not trust too much to probabilities. Order Antoine to be seized, and brought before you. Tell him that all his villainy is discovered, and see how he will conduct himself."

M. Haima was exceedingly loth to agree to a proposal which seemed to cast an unjust imputation on his favourite; but, at last, his friend's repeated representations induced him to adopt it. Antoine was manacled and brought before him. He uttered no complaint, nor did he evince any signs of trepidation or guilt. His master already repented the course he had adopted; and, as he looked on Antoine's steady eye, and collected demeanour, found no little difficulty in acting the part he had consented to assume.

"It is you, then," at last he said, "who have been my secret enemy, who have wantonly destroyed my property, and all but effected my ruin."

"I, Monsieur Haima?"

"Yes, you. Disguise is no longer necessary. All your plots are discovered. Everything is known to me, except the motive that could have induced one on whom I have conferred such benefits, to act the serpent towards his protector and benefactor."

Antoine was silent, but a slight, scarcely perceptible, yet contemptuous curl of the upper lip aroused his master's suspicions, and determined him to follow up the examination in a similar tone.

"I treated you with the care and confidence of a father. I distinguished you above all your companions, and you have abused my favour—repaid my kindness with the blackest treachery. You have plotted, and but too successfully effected, a revenge, such as the cruellest mind conceives against its bitterest enemy."

Antoine still remained silent, but the kindling, almost exulting, expression of his eye, confirmed M. Haima's surmises. "Antoine," continued he, with increasing emotion, "have I merited this at your hands? Have I given cause for such deadly revenge? Interest, if not gratitude, might surely have secured your fidelity. What was wanting to your comfort and happiness? Say!—What could you wish for, that you did not possess?"

"My liberty!" said the African, in a tone of mingled pride and bitterness.

"And did I not grant you more than liberty could have afforded you?"

"I was your slave!" and Antoine drew up his tall and handsome form to its full height, and clenched the manacles that bound his hands, as if he would crush the iron chain in his grasp.

"Wretched man!" said his master, as a conviction of the truth at last settled on his mind; "these, then, were your motives! But your own father and mother—your nearest relations?"

"Had I not poisoned them, I should myself have been suspected."

"Good God!" exclaimed the planter, "and this is the man I had treated as my own child, and to whom I had confided all I possess?"

"He was but a part of your property," said the slave, with a scornful smile.

"Do you feel no compunction—no remorse, for the multiplied and ungrateful crimes you have committed?"

"None."

"Had I ever given you the shadow of a cause to complain of my conduct towards you?"

"Never."

Antoine was forthwith conducted to prison, tried, and executed.

M. Haima's fellow-planters, as the story circulated among them, moralised on the danger of evincing partiality for a slave; and bade their overseers double their vigilance and increase their severity. While the philosopher and the friend of freedom thence deduced, with greater reason, a striking argument against slavery itself, be its form or disguise what it may.

I have not related a tale of fancy. I hold the above facts from a French gentleman who resided on the island at the time they happened, who was personally acquainted with M. Haima, and who had seen the high-spirited and misguided Antoine in the height of that favour and prosperity, which could not weigh with him against the name of SLAVE.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—The Brigand.—The Illustrious Stranger.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—The Chancery Suit.—Teddy the Tiler.—And the Pantomime.

COVENT GARDEN.

THE new opera that was to have been produced last night, is postponed; and the Chancery Suit was performed instead, probably in consequence of its having been mentioned before the LORD CHANCELLOR, during the question between the great theatres and Mr ARNOLD. The reader knows our opinion of this play. It is creditable to the author; but it is not a comedy, in the high sense of the term; nor will it be a stock piece. Mr PEAKE has a genuine turn for humour; and, in his character of Geoffrey Muffincap, has shewn that he has even invention; but it is all of the smaller kind. He wants the knowledge, and literature, and high wit, necessary to sustain a comedy. He can run up pleasant little tents, to laugh and make merry in; but he cannot build a house of five stories.

There was nothing new at the theatres. In our notice of the Irishman in London, yesterday, we omitted to mention Mr BAK whom we do not remember to have seen before, and who performed the part of the footman with good bustle and effect. But why does Mr BAKER dress as if he were undressed? When he took his coat off, we were alarmed lest he should lay aside his waistcoat also; in which case it seemed doubtful what would have remained to be doffed. Now this is not so well at any time; and though Mr BAKER's lower extremities appear to have been turned by nature with much symmetry, he seems to have forgotten that a good deal of fat has been superinduced upon his proportions; so that as he walked up and down before the stage lamps, gallantly refusing to put on the injured coat, of which his master had ordered him to strip, we were in that painful state of mind which is felt by people sitting in a conscious multitude, who know that they are all making the same objection internally, but feel it to be inexpressible. Milton's Adam, in the French translation, always appears to us to be a naked gentleman in a cocked-hat. Now, if this gentleman had exchanged his cocked-hat for a round one, and his character for that of a footman, and could have made his astounding reappearance in the world, in the farce of the Irishman in London, having in the meanwhile grown fat, he would have looked as Mr BAKER did, when he walked up and down before the lamps the other night, dazzling the stage-boxes, and lifting the eye-brows of the pit.

The readers of the TATLER will not accuse us of prudery; but by reason of our very contempt for it, we feel bound to caution the fat and lively against these extreme overt-acts of innocence.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

INCENDIARIES.—Fancy to yourself a man sets the city on fire at Cripplegate, and that fire continues, by means of others, till it comes to Whitefriars, and he that began it would fain quench it: does not he deserve to be punished most that first set the city on fire? So 'tis with the incendiaries of the state. They that first set it on fire (by monopolizing forest business, imprisoning Parliament-men, &c.)—[In our age we may say,—by Corn laws, Game-laws, Power of Imprisonment-laws, and fifty other cruel oppressions]—are now become regenerate and would fain quench the fire: certainly they deserve most to be punished for being the first cause of our distractions.—Selden.

WHAT THEN?—In all times the Princes in England have done something illegal to get money: but then came a Parliament and all was well: the people and the prince kissed and were friends; and so things were quiet for awhile. Afterwards there was another trick found out to get money, and after they had got it, another Parliament was called to set all right, &c. But now they have so outrun the constable. . . .—Selden.

There is no stretching of power: 'tis a good rule—"Eat within your stomach." Act within your commission.—Selden.

[Abuse of power, or of stomach, will assuredly recoil upon the aggressor, sooner or later.]

SUPERIORITY TO REVENGE.—The illustrious Descartes used to say, that when an injury was offered to him, he seated himself so high above it, that it could not reach him.

THE MANY AGAINST THE FEW.—"In the beginning of Queen Elizabeth there was a difference between the Protestants and Papists, and Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Chancellor, was appointed to be judge; but the conclusion was, the stronger party carried it: for so religion was brought into kingdoms, so it has continued, and so it may be cast out, when the State pleases."—Selden's Table Talk.—[And when the State does not please, the people, if they know their own power, will cast out the State.]

SELDEN'S OPINION OF THE CLERGY.—All confess there never was a more learned clergy; no man taxes them with ignorance. [N.B. This opinion was not written in the nineteenth century.] But to talk of that is like the fellow that was a great wencher: he wished God would forgive him his carnalities, and lay usury to his charge. The clergy have worse faults.—Selden.

MAGNANIMITY AND PARVANIMITY.—A gallant man is above ill words: an example we have in the old Lord Salisbury (who was a great wise man) Stone had called some lord about court "Fool," the lord complains, and has Stone whipped. Stone cries, "I might have called my Lord Salisbury "Fool," often enough, before he would have had me whipped."—Selden.

AN AMERICAN CALCULATION.—The annual income of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who lately died in England, was no less than 25,000*l.* This is equal to the compensation that we allow to our President and Vice-President, the four Secretaries of the great departments, the Post-master General, the Chief Justice, and the Six Associate Judges of the Supreme Court, and the support of our Minister at London into the bargain. The Bishop of London succeeds to this golden manager of "the Church."—American Paper.

SINGULAR COINCIDENCE.—It is a remarkable coincidence that five successive Presidents of the United States have gone out of office in the 66th year of their age:—

Washington,	born Feb. 22, 1732.	Inaugurated	1789.
J. Adams,	Oct. 19, 1735.	—	1797.
Jefferson,	Apr. 2, 1743.	—	1801.
Madison,	Mar. 5, 1751.	—	1809.
Monroe,	Apr. 2, 1759.	—	1817.

JOY AND GRIEF.

None can be always one: our griefs and joys
Hold several sceptres in us, and have times
For their divided empires.—Chapman's Bussy d'Ambois.

COURT SIGHTS AND TRANSFORMATIONS.

I'll tell you what you shall see;
You shall see many faces of man's making,
For you shall find very few as God
Left them: and you shall see many legs too;
Amongst the rest you shall behold one pair,
The feet of which were in times past sockless, but are now,
Thro' the change of time (that alters all things)
Very strangely become the legs of a knight
And a courtier; another pair you shall see,
That were heir-apparent legs to a glover,
These legs hope shortly to be honorable;
When they pass by they will bow, and the mouth
To these legs will seem to offer you some courtship,
It will swear, but it will lie; hear it not.
Beaumont and Fletcher's Woman Hater.

TEMPERANCE IN DRINKING.—Whenever you begin to consider whether you may safely take one draught more, it is then high time to give over.—Jeremy Taylor. [A similar maxim would be found equally salutary with respect to eating; excess in which has been, until recently treated with undue indulgence,—particularly by the clergy.—F. F.]

LILLIPUTIAN NEWSPAPER.—The smallest newspaper in the known world, has just reached us from Salem. It is called "The Hive," and may be read profitably by all our little statesmen and stateswomen, in the nursery, before breakfast. The paper is five inches long, by three in width.—Boston Palladium.

WOMAN.—Never shrink from a woman of strong sense. If she become attached to you, it will be from seeing and valuing similar qualities in yourself. You may trust her, for she knows the value of your confidence; you may consult her, for she is able to devise, and does so at once with the firmness of reason, and the consideration of affection. Her love will be lasting, for it will not have been lightly won: it will be strong and ardent, for weak minds are not capable of the loftier grades of passion. If you prefer attaching yourself to a woman of feeble understanding, it must be either from fearing to encounter a superior person, or from the poor vanity of preferring that admiration which springs from ignorance, to that which approaches to appreciation.

The best and most forcible sense of a word is often that which is contained in its etymology.—Coleridge.

AN ELEGANT SOPHISM AGAINST REVOLUTIONARY INNOVATION.—I might refer our hurrying enlighteners and revolutionary amputators to the gentleness of nature, in the oak and the beech, the dry foliage of which she pushes off only by the propulsion of the new buds, that supply its place. My friends! a cloathing even of withered leaves is better than bareness.—Coleridge.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

Lord BYRON's Tragedy of

WERNER, OR THE INHERITANCE.

[Adapted by Mr MACREADY.]

Josephine, Mrs FAUCIT, Ida Stralenheim, Miss FAUCIT.
Werner, Mr MACREADY, Ulric, Mr WALLACK, Gabor, Mr COOPER.
Baron Stralenheim, Mr H. Wallack, Fritz, Mr Younge, Otto, Mr Cohen,
Henric, Mr Salter, Eric, Mr C. Jones, Idenstein, Mr W. Bennett,
Rodolph, Mr Cooke, Arnheim, Mr Fenton, Meister, Mr Eaton,
Ludwig, Mr Cathie, Herman, Mr S. Jones.

In the course of the Evening will be performed Sphor's Overture to 'Alruna;' and Mozart's Overture to 'Il Don Giovanni.'

After which,

THE LADY AND THE DEVIL.

Zephyrina, Mrs WAYLETT, Negombo, Miss CRAWFORD.
Wildlove, Mr VINING, Signor Rafael, Mr ANDREWS,
Claudian, Mr COOKE, Jeremy, Mr HARLEY.

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands

To-morrow, William Tell; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The New Grand Comic Opera, (in Three Acts) called

CINDERELLA.

The Music, by Rossini.

Cinderella, Miss INVERARITY. Clorinda, Miss CAWSE.
Thisbe, Miss HUGHES. Fairy Queen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Felix, Mr HUNT. Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. PENSON.
Alidoro, Mr G. STANSBURY. Dandini, Mr MORLEY.
Pedro, Mr KEELEY.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PRAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, the Carnival at Naples; and the Irishman in London.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

In the course of the Season, the following Performers will appear for the first time in London.

Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY, du Théâtre du Gymnase.
Madame ALBERT, du Théâtre des Nouveautés.
M. LEPEINTRE, Aîné, du Théâtre du Vaudeville.

By General Desire. The favorite Pieces of JEAN, and LA SECONDE ANNEE; ou, A QUI LA FAUTE? having been received with unbounded applause from a fashionable and crowded audience, will be repeated this Evening.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie, par

LES MAUVAISES TETES.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de M. SEVRIN.

Madame de Granville, Sœur de Richardin, Madame Préval.
Sidonie, Mariée secrettement a Alphonse, Mademoiselle HERMINIE.
Lisette, sa Suivante, Mlle. Emma.
Alphonse Dermont, Officier de Hussards, M. Alfred. La Medaille, M. Gamard.
Richardin, Oncle de Sidonie, M. Préval. Fribourg, vieux Suisse, M. Guenée.

Suivi de

LA SECONDE ANNEE; OU, A QUI LA FAUTE?

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de M. SCRIBE.

Caroline, Femme de Denneville, Mademoiselle FLORVAL.
M. DERVAL remplira le Rôle de Denneville. Gervault, Caissier, M. Gamard.
Edmond, Comte de St. Elme, Ami de Denneville, M. PAULIN.

On Finira par

JEAN.

Pièce en Quatre Parties Mêlée de Chant, par MM. THEAUDON et A. SIGROL.

Madame de Ligny, Mlle. FLORVAL.
Madame de Sirval, Parente de Madame de Ligny, Mlle. Eliza.
La Marquise d'Olban, amie de Madame de Ligny, Madame Paulin.
Madame veuve Chapin, Limonadière, Mme. Préval.
Adelaïde, sa Fille, Mlle. St. Ange. Louise, Femme de Chambre, Mme. Gamard.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Grizzle Glowworm, Mrs Beaumont. Susan, Miss Barnett. Amoret, Miss M. Glover.
Attendant Spirits, Misses Stallard, Gallot, Angellina, Rose, and S. Barnett.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
Linaro, Alpanor, and Spirit Hunters, Messrs Morris, Winning, Fry, Taylor, &c.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Sebastian, Gregory, and Adam, Messrs Sanders, Willson, and Paulo, Jun.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Andrew and Karl, (his Children) Masters Calkin and Barnett.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.
Fraasel, Mr Charles. 1st Chamois Hunter, Mr S. Smith. 2nd do. Mr V. Webster
Spirits of the Alps, Chamois Hunters, Villagers, &c.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called

WAS I TO BLAME?

Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, called

THE CHASTE SALUTE

[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]

The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY,
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,
Philippe, Mr Newcombe, Thibaut, Mr Collier.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called

THE GRENADIER.

Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Della, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

To which will be added, a Comic Burletta, to be called

CLARISSA HARLOWE.

Clarissa Harlowe, Mrs GLOVER. Mrs Harlowe, Miss Fitzwalter.
Clerimont, Mr Raymond. Mr Harlowe, Mr Paget. Capt. Cape, Mr W. VINING.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]

Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Opera of

ROB ROY MAC..REGOR.

Diana Vernon, Miss SOMERVILLE, in which character she will sing 'The Young Cavalier,' and 'A Highland Lad my Love was born,'
Helen Macgregor, Miss M. C. POOLE, Mattie, Mrs VALE,
Jean M'Alpine, Miss RUMENS, Martha, Miss NICOL.
Rob Roy, Mr OSBALDISTON,
Sir Frederick Vernon, Mr GOUGH, Rashleigh Osbaldistone, Mr D. PITT,
Francis Osbaldistone, Mr EDWIN, in which character he will sing 'My love is like the red, red rose,' 'Auld lang syne,' 'The lass o' Gowrie,' and the Duets, 'Though I leave thee now in sorrow,' and 'Forlorn and broken hearted,' with Miss Somerville.
Bailie Nicol Jarvie, Mr WILLIAMS, Owen, Mr YOUNG,
Major Galbraith, Mr Ransford, Dougal, Mr Asbury, Captain Thornton, Mr Almar, M'Stewart, Mr Lee, Saunders Wylie, Mr Webb, Andrew, Mr Rogers.

After which, a Drama, entitled

THE DIAMOND ARROW.

[By W. T. MONCRIEF.]

Lucille, Miss SOMERVILLE. Dame Lodoline Fontaine, Mrs VALE.
Mons. Fontaine, Mr VALE. Mons. Anselm, Mr Young. Courier, Mr Lee.
Hilaire, Mr Edwin.

To conclude with the Nautico-Domestic Drama, entitled

THE ROVER'S BRIDE.

[By Mr G. ALMAR.]

Act I.—WINTER.

Alice Manners, Miss SCOTT. Bella Manners, Miss SOMERVILLE.
Dame Bellerton, Miss Nicol. Nancy Blackberry, Miss Ellis.
Lawrence Glennon, Mr D. Pitt.
Miles Bellerton, Mr C. Hill. Marmaduke Magog, Mr VALE.
Diedrick Van Voorn, Mr Honnor. Bobby Blackberry, Mr Rogers.

[Between the First and Second Acts, a lapse of Five Years is supposed to take place.]

Act II.—SUMMER.

Alice Manners, Miss SCOTT. Bella, Miss SOMERVILLE.
Mary Blackberry, Miss Rumens. Kitty Spiteful, Mrs Rogers.
Captain Glennon, Mr D. Pitt.
Barbelot, Mr Jones. Diedrick Van Voorn, Mr Honnor.
Culverdine and Avery, Mr Ransford and Mr Lee.
Marmaduke Magog, Mr VALE. Bobby Blackberry, Mr Rogers.
Bluff Laconic, Mr C. Hill. Master Marmaduke Magog, Jun. Master Carbery.

COBURG THEATRE.—Peter the Great and Charles XII. Harlequin Silver Penny—Wat Tyler and Jack Straw.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—Harlequin and Mother Goose—A Deed of Blood—The Morning after Mariage.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 127.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 29, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Substance of a Speech delivered by Henry Revell, Esq. before a Special Board of the Select Vestry of the Parish of St Pancras. December 23, 1830. 8vo. pp. 22. Hilton. Ribau. Onwhyn.

We are happy to see gentlemen of intelligence and information come forward to oppose the pretensions of Select Vestries. Parish influence, not in its old dull and corrupt shape, but in the shape of the most intelligent private individuals, is destined before long to come into play all over England, and if reform be deferred, or not commenced with sufficient spirit, into formidable play; and it is highly desirable, that men should come forward, like the maker of this speech, equally alive to the necessity of reform, and capable of advocating it in a kindly spirit. It is curious to see this gentleman enlightening a Select Vestry to their faces on the demerits of their institution, and this too with the chance of making an impression. Such an effect, however, was not altogether to be unlooked for. The very fact of so addressing them without violence, implies that they are men capable of appreciating a reason, which to a Select Vestry is no small compliment: and when Mr Revell intimates to his hearers, that the prince whom we have now the good fortune to possess is a man of the world, he gives them to understand, that even men of the world have perceived the folly of the old system, and that the present is one of those rare epochs, most rare, in the history of mankind, in which cunning and wisdom find themselves miraculously seated together. This marvellous conjunction, however, being really the case, we do not see that it was a part of the Speaker's candour to repeat certain common-places respecting a prince like George III, who is long gone by, and who is here designated as a man of "most excellent moral character." George III, as many respectable people have not scrupled to repeat of late years, obtained a character for moral excellence with the last generation, because he lived with his wife, went to church, eat mutton, and took care of the main chance. But without denying the merits of some of these passages in his history, he was also, as Mr Benthain and others have shewn, not omitting his tutor Lord Waldegrave, sulky, obstinate, avaricious, capable of violent antipathies, vindictive, and could persevere (as America shewed) in continuing to waste the blood and treasure of others, when everybody protested that it was of no use. How such a man can be of most excellent moral character, we cannot conceive; nor can we discover what such a panegyric has to do with a character drawn of his son William, who however excellent, as we believe him to be, has not always shewn his morality in precisely the same style as his father. His sympathies have been a little less ceremonious, and his antipathies none. At least if he has any, he has not let the public feel the ill effects of them.

This little blemish excepted, (and we have been more particular in noticing it because it must form part of our extract,) we have no fault to find with Mr Revell's speech, and shall proceed to lay a good long passage from it before the reader. The speech becomes the more interesting from a circumstance related by the publisher in his introduction, which we shall quote first:—

'It may not be deemed irrelevant,' says he, 'to offer a few words in explanation of the motives which have led to the present publication, and also of the causes which have prevented its earlier appearance from the press.

'On the first of these points, it is only necessary to say, that the following speech, on its delivery, made a considerable impression on the minds of many persons who heard it; and, conceiving that its publication would have a most useful tendency in other parishes, as well as that of St Pancras, they felt a desire to see it in print. But for this purpose, it was requisite to obtain the consent of the author, and this leads us to the subject of the delay to which we have adverted.

'The speech was delivered at a private board, to which reporters were not admitted; and as it was wholly unpremeditated, the author had considerable difficulty in recalling the passages to his mind, in the same order and language which he adopted in the spontaneous effusion of his opinions. Some time and enquiry were, therefore, necessary to render the report, in substance, as faithful and accurate as circumstances would permit. The following pages, excepting on this account, would have appeared sooner.'

We now extract the passage alluded to, and hope it will incite all readers who can turn their acuteness and public spirit to the same account, to do all they can towards extending the same opinions:—

'Permit me,' says Mr Revell to the Select Vestry, 'to put you a case. The present sovereign is descended from one of the most ancient families in Europe; his father was a man of most excellent moral character; he himself has received an admirable education; he has seen a considerable portion of the globe; he has mixed with general society, and is fairly entitled to the character of what is commonly called a man of the world. Now, suppose that this excellent prince were to dismiss both houses of parliament, and to rule, after the manner of this board, by the advice of a council of his own selection; suppose he were to erect palaces, build and equip fleets, and raise armies, of his own will, and with the advice of such a council as I have described, and that he were to tax the people of England to pay the cost of these buildings and armaments, would this board, brought up as its members have been in the principles of the British constitution, tamely and quietly submit to such jurisdiction? I am certain of your reply. As members of a free state, you would consider such proceedings as the acts of tyranny and not of government. You must confess, that were you so situated, your masters would be tyrants, and yourselves slaves. And yet the power of which you, in this case, would naturally complain, is the identical authority which you exercise over us; and, therefore, you have no cause to wonder that we are dissatisfied with the institution and acts of a self-elected board.

'I would strongly impress upon your mind this maxim of an ancient writer—I would recommend you to imprint it upon your memory as you walk through the streets, or as you lay your head upon your pillow, that the slave makes the tyrant, rather than the tyrant makes the slave.

'A board like this is not suited to the atmosphere of the British metropolis, but it may be well adapted to that of St Petersburgh. Suppose there were in the latter city, one hundred and twenty-two gentlemen, self-elected, and for life; suppose them sitting in deliberation, having under their charge all the poor of the city; suppose them authorized to create offices and officers, and to distribute large emoluments; suppose them, also, empowered to tax the people for these purposes, and for the maintenance of the poor—why, a board of this description would be considered by the inhabitants of that city as the acme or perfection of civilization. It would be hailed as a redeeming quality under a government of absolute sway: and if any Englishman were to enquire how the inhabitants of St Petersburgh could endure to live under such dominion, they would point to that board, and say, here we have the principle of your boasted constitution, here we have a deliberative parliament, and, in fact, in this board we have all the united authority of your King, Lords, and Commons. Yes, in that city such a board would be hailed with delight and satisfaction. It would command the affections of all the subjects of a country in which the sovereign, by his arbitrary conduct, daily soils the ermine of royalty with blood, converts the sword of justice into the dagger of the assassin, and consigns those of his wretched vassals, who dare "to hint a fault or hesitate dislike" against his supreme will, to the dungeons of Cronstadt or the mines of Siberia. But the citizens of a free state, such as that in which we live, consider all institutions, whether of general or of local jurisdiction, exercising the power of taxation, independently of the right of representation, as unwarrantable and tyrannical.

'All governments depend upon opinion. De Lolme, in his Essay on the Constitution of England, says, (I quote his words from memory), that the government of even the Grand Signior is dependant upon the superior influence of opinion. That writer says that, if he were allowed the use of only a single mosque, and permitted freely to express his opinions for the instruction of the people, in less than six months he would tear the crescent from the turban and roll it in the Bosphorus.

'The opinion of the inhabitants of this parish is at war with this board,—a board assuming the power of taxation while it refuses the right of representation; and if public opinion be so powerful as to be able to overthrow such a government as that of the Grand Signior, how absurd is it to suppose that, in a country like England, a board of this stamp can long protract its existence against the utterance of the general voice. Now, what are our complaints? A great city, under the denomination of a parish, containing 120,000 inhabitants, raising a revenue sufficient to have enabled the ancient kings of England to have conquered France; a parish equal in population, knowledge, and wealth, to many first-rate cities in the realm, and which even send members to Parliament; this great parish is under the direction of a board, in the appointment of the members of which the inhabitants have no voice nor control whatever. What, Sir, we want, is, that the principle of election should be adopted in the appointment of those by whom we are governed,—that those who are invested with office of trust should be subject to responsibility.

Digitized by Google

'Mr Hobhouse has introduced a bill into the House of Commons, for the better regulation of all parishes in England and Wales, which bill, even when amended, or rather, shaped, by a committee of that house, establishes the right of election in the appointment of committees of vestries. But observe, Sir, I do not come to this board to advocate the grand principle of public right. That right will be determined and established by a power over which neither you nor I have much control. I feel, in the present state of the times, that if I, as an advocate, were endowed with tenfold the powers of persuasion I possess, and if you were masters of a much greater resisting authority than any to which you can lay claim, I know that I, on my part, could neither advance that right or principle, nor can you, on your part, retard it. All that at the present time is passing before our eyes—in France, in Belgium, in Poland, in England, is tending to confirm the right of the people to elect the persons by whom they are governed. The people of England know, perhaps to a man, the constitutional axiom, that no man shall be taxed, except by his own consent, given through his representative. All that I require of you is, for the sake of your own reputation, for the sake of your own interests, to yield to general opinion. The King of England himself has set you an illustrious example. When he came to the throne, he found an administration, at the head of which was the intimate friend of his late Royal brother, that friend, a nobleman who had advanced the glory and promoted the security of these realms, by a long series of splendid military achievements. That minister lost his popularity by his opposition to the public will. The voice of the country demanded a cheap government, and a reform in the mode of returning its representatives. The King accepted the resignation of the minister and his colleagues, because his Majesty felt that they had lost the confidence of the people.

'Permit me to tell you what a great writer, Mr Burke, in a publication entitled "Thoughts on the Cause of our late Discontents," written during the period of the American war, says of the great value of the confidence of the people. He supposes himself addressing the sovereign, and he says, "Sire, you have lost the confidence of your people; do not imagine that the annual Mutiny bill gives you all the power of your standing army, or all the strength of your navy. I tell you, no. Without the confidence of the people, your standing army is nothing better than an idle rabble, and your boasted navy of no more value than rotten timber." But if you are inclined to be inattentive to the great example of your monarch, who has one quality which I would earnestly intreat you to imitate as well as admire,—I mean the virtue of yielding to circumstances, and bending to public opinion. I would, nevertheless, exhort you, upon another ground, to follow the course I now recommend, if even as a matter of policy, and that is, to adopt the line of conduct of a neighbouring board—that of the parish of Mary-le-Bone; in which the ruling authorities have not only conceded the right of election to the parishioners, but they have done so in a tone and spirit of conciliation, which prove them not to be insensible to the temperament of the times in which they live.

'Never forget the advice of Lord Chesterfield to his son: "My son, the great art of life consists in saying 'No!'" If that proposition of my Lord Chesterfield be a truth, by a parity of reasoning, the converse of that proposition must be equally true. All sovereigns and all parties in authority should learn, that the great art of government consists in say, "Yes," in conformity to public opinion. When governments depart from first principles, they are certain to fall into error. Taxation without representation, is as great a folly as a crime. Taxation without representation has lost Charles the Tenth of France his kingdom. Taxation without representation, has lost William of Nassau the beautiful provinces of Brabant. Taxation without representation, lost the King of England the united provinces of America. Taxation without representation, has lost this board the confidence of the inhabitants of the parish of St Pancras: and taxation witout representation, if the present system be continued, either in small or in large districts, or throughout the kingdom, will lose the King of England what is of far more value than the united provinces of America—the confidence and affections of his people.'

UTILITY OF METHOD.—There were some mathematicians, that could with one fetch of their pen, make an exact circle, and with the next touch point out the centre: is it therefore reasonable to banish all use of the compasses? Set forms are a pair of compasses.—Selden.

MISTAKEN MODE OF CORRECTING VIOLENT TEMPER.

TO THE TATLER.

MR TATLER,—I do not know whether, in your admiration of your predecessor, you are willing to defend all his maxims and opinions; but having a complaint to lay against the Tatler of September 30, 1710, I know not where I could more properly seek redress, than from yourself. Although Mr Bickerstaff in several of his papers throws out observations upon the general injustice shown to women, yet he has himself aided and abetted that injustice, and given it a sanction; the more mischievous, as proceeding from a man of so much genuine feeling and wisdom. You will remember, Sir, that the paper in question turns upon the violent temper of a young lady, who is brought to the habits of obedience, by the yet greater violence affected by the man who marries her. This has been a favourite subject:—'Rule a Wife and have a Wife,' 'Catherine and Petruchio,' and the modern comedy of 'The Honeymoon,' all represent this insulting conduct as a great and manly triumph. It may be the way to render a violent woman obedient, to reduce female tyranny to servile hypocrisy; for, whether in a male or female spirit, the bully and the coward, the tyrant and the slave, are most commonly united. But where is the great triumph of this? If a man merely wants a spaniel, to fawn on him the more, the more he kicks, let him possess himself of one in its true form, and leave his friends to decide which is the nobler animal, the dog or its master. But we are generally given to suppose that the hero is a man of superior understanding, that he would have a wife who should be his dearest companion, his best friend, his other self; who, with affectionate sympathy, should heighten his pleasures, solace his troubles, and shed the general light of cheerfulness upon his home. Wishing, and by his own amiable temper deserving such a wife, he unhappily finds his affections engaged to a woman of a violent and wayward spirit; he perceives, however, that she has qualities which give him hope that this temper may be amended; he woos, wins, and marries her. Not having been so blinded by love as to be insensible to the lady's faults, it would seem to have been more judicious, as well as ingenuous, had he commenced his plans of reformation before marriage. Conceding this point, however,—let me ask—could such a man adopt so absurd and unamiable a mode of admonishing the woman he loved? Would any man of common sense for one moment suppose that it could be efficacious? Surely not. Her real, taking a license from his assumed, violence, and wanting the restraint of respect, might probably become greater than before; in a mean spirit, it might be held down by fear, but only to break out the more fiercely upon occasions where fear did not operate. Would such a change satisfy an amiable and sensible man? Had Mr Bickerstaff told his story without commending any of the parties,—had he spoken of it as the silly scheme of a silly man, who had married a silly woman, it would have been innocent enough, and natural enough; for, taking away the comments, and judging the lady by her conduct, the result would appear just what might be expected. The hero showed, indeed, that of four men married to four sisters, he was "the most master at home;" but he does not show that he was the most happy in his wife. Had he really sought her good, he would have worked upon her love, not her fear; he would have endeavoured to convince her reason, not to shatter her nerves; but it seems that he wanted a slave; and if so, he selected and treated the poor creature who was to become that slave, judiciously enough; and he attained his object. Upon such conduct, Mr Bickerstaff might have been expected to bestow censure, rather than applause. In 'The Honeymoon,' the plan of the bridegroom is, perhaps, somewhat less absurd than usual, but scarcely less objectionable on the whole. The violence used is of a different kind, but it is violence still; women's hearts are not won, nor their tempers corrected by violence, falsehood, and injustice. I would humbly suggest, Mr Tatler, that another and more liberal treatment of the subject would be new to the drama, and more worthy of the times, and might have a beneficial influence upon many who are yet so far behind the age they live in, as to admire what, in common justice, they should condemn. When men are superior to all infirmities of temper, then let them, if then they are so disposed,—triumph thus insultingly over the frailties of women. A. A.

VAN DIEMAN'S LAND.—(Extract of a Letter from that place.)—"This is indeed a lovely country! Take the climate of Italy, the mountain scenery of Wales, the fertility of England,—combine these, and you have Van Dieman's Land. Of fruits, and other productions of the earth, there is a constant succession, for in this place there is no winter, unless about two months of rain and wind in June and July may deserve the name of that season. All fruit, grain, and vegetables, have a finer flavor, and grow to much greater perfection than in England. I think, if Dr Gall had examined the cranium of the world, he would have discovered the bump of philoprogenitiveness on this spot, for positively, cattle, sheep, hogs, dogs, children, and other animals, increase so fast as to become a nuisance. * * * Here are no game laws; the possession of a gun is the only qualification, and your ability to walk and to take good aim your only certificate for shooting when, where, and what you please. Wild ducks are fine and fat, and so numerous, that I saw a man bring down twenty-four at one discharge of his gun.—American Paper.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Werner—The Lady and the Devil—and the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Cinderella—and the Pantomime.

DRURY LANE.

BETWEEN the tragedy and the pantomime here last night, they played The Lady and the Devil. It is a pannel story, and looks like some older piece re-made. A young lady (Mrs WAYLETT) finds her way by chance through an unexpected door in a wall, and overhears a gentleman (VINING) who has been introduced to her for her suitor giving a rakish opinion about marriage. She likes him, and speculates upon making him like herself well enough to forego the opinion in her favour; to which end she addresses him out of doors as an incognita in a veil, and leaves letters upon his writing-table. A letter taken away by herself from this table (which is in the apartment communicating with her uncle's house) induces the gentleman's servant (HARLEY) to suppose that the devil has been in the room; which makes him subsequently enter it in fear and trembling, and occasions a very diverting scene. The servant, after gaining courage by the security in which he finds himself, sits down, in a fit of enthusiasm, to write some verses. The lady, who observes him through the pannel, and who has left a letter on the table which she does not wish him to see, steals softly into the room in her black gown and veil, and is in the act of filching her letter back, when the servant, who has suddenly got a poetical thought, exclaims, "I have it!" and clapping his hand on the table as he utters the word, finds that he has got the hand of the diabolical fair one. He retains sufficient courage (not very naturally) to keep hold of it; the lady begs him to let her go; he refuses, and calls out for his master; the lady, in despair, seeing a snuff-box on the table, seizes a pinch of it, and throwing it in his eyes, escapes back through the pannel, just before the master and some friends of his come in. The scene falls on the first act, amidst hundreds of enquiries and hustles, which the poor footman endures from all around him, his body being twisted from one to another, while his eyes are tortured by the snuff.

In the next act, the lady appears in a park as the incognita, and after coquetting with the young officer (for such he is) and trying in vain to get him to offer marriage, is taking her leave, when he forcibly detains her. She pretends a sudden and dreadful headache, sinks on a seat, and sends him for sal-volatile. Next time she is again caught in the haunted room, by servant and master together. The latter recognizes her manner, and tells her she shall not escape this time. She motions to him the request that he will send the servant out of the way. He does so; and she then, begging him to turn away his face in order to accommodate even her veiled blushes, confesses to him in a song the tender regard she has for him. Her maid-servant, a negress, comes through the pannel meanwhile, to see if she is safe; the mistress beckons her to her assistance, and while the song is concluding, shifts her black gown and veil on to the negress's person, and putting the latter's hand on the Captain's shoulder, slips gently away, leaving her place thus fondly supplied. The negress, on her young lady's departure, making little helpless sobs and lamentings, full of a strange sort of pathos, instead of continuing the song, the Captain is induced to turn round in order to comfort her. The footman returns to see how his master gets on, bringing a friend of the latter's with him, who has come to make a call. They find the Captain in the act of kneeling to the unknown, with triumphant love in his face, which becomes the more lively at seeing them. He entreats the "fairest of her sex" to remove the veil; he offers it a pleasing violence: it falls, and discloses—the devil! as the footman thinks. The Captain, with astonishment, laments his mischance, and vows he shall never have any peace if he does not see the lady again. The gentleman, who is in the secret, tells him he may do so, upon one condition. The lover consents: it is marriage. In fine, the lady is brought back, and finds her end obtained.

Mr HARLEY gives us some of his best acting in the scene where he makes acquaintance with the haunted room. His terrors, his tremblings, his sudden musterings up of courage, his occasional abrupt hems! and other daring evidences of misgiving, were very ludicrous, and obtained him hearty laughter and applause. Mrs WAYLETT sang one or two songs with an agreeable neatness.

COVENT GARDEN.

Instead of BAKER, we find that the lively actor at this theatre, who appeared in the undress the other night, is PARRY. We shall have pleasure in seeing him speedily again; by which time, we presume, his toilet will be finished. ☞

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

An author's pen, like children's legs, improves by exercise.—Coleridge.

WORDS AND ACTIONS.—The soldiers say they fight for honour; when the truth is they have their honour in their pocket. And they mean the same thing that pretend to fight for religion. Just as a parson goes to law with his parishioners he says, for the good of his successors, that the church may not lose its right; when the meaning is to get the tythes into his own pocket.—Selden. [Witness the disinterested zeal of our fire-act clergy.]

A POET'S CRITICISM.—After quoting Mr Wordsworth's poem—"My heart leaps up when I behold," &c.,—Mr Coleridge subjoins the following note, which no one could have written but a poet at heart, and a man of exquisite sentiment. "I am informed, that these lines have been cited as a specimen of despicable puerility. So much the worse for the citer. Not willingly in his presence would I behold the sun setting behind our mountains, or listen to a tale of distress or virtue; I should be ashamed of the quiet tear on my own cheek. But let the dead bury the dead! The poet sang for the living. Of what value indeed to a sane mind, are the likings and dislikings of one man, grounded on the mere assertions of another? Opinions formed upon opinions—what are they but clouds sailing under clouds, which impress shadows upon shadows.—Coleridge's Friend.

A SPLENDID IMAGE.—Legitimate reasoning is impossible without severe thinking, and thinking is neither an easy nor an amusing employment. The reader who would follow a close reasoner to the summit and absolute principle of any one important subject, has chosen a chamois-hunter for his guide. Our guide will indeed take us the shortest way, will save us many a wearisome and perilous wandering, and warn us of many a mock road that had formerly led himself to the brink of chasms and precipices, or at least in an idle circle to the spot from whence he started. But he cannot carry us on his shoulders: we must strain our own sinews as he has strained his; and make firm footing on the naked rock for ourselves, by the blood of toil from our own feet.—Coleridge.

A COMMON SPECIES OF INTEGRITY.—Tom Courtly never fails of paying his obeisance to every man he sees, who has title or office to make him conspicuous; but his deferences is wholly given to outward considerations. I, who know him, can tell within half an acre, how much land one man has more than another, by Tom's bow to him. Title is all he knows of honour, and civility of friendship: for this reason, because he cares for no man living, he is religiously strict in performing what he calls his respects to you. To this end he is very learned in pedigree; and will abate something of the ceremony of his approaches to a man, if he is in any doubt about the bearing of his coat of arms. What is the most pleasant of all his character is, that he acts with a sort of integrity in these impertinences; and, though he would not do any man a solid kindness, he is wonderfully just and careful not to wrong his quality. But as integrity is very scarce in the world, I cannot forbear having respect for the impertinent: it is some virtue to be bound by anything. Tom and I are upon very good terms, for the respect he has for the house of Bickerstaff. Though one cannot but laugh at his serious consideration of things so little essential, one must have a value even for a frivolous good conscience.—Steele.

THE LADIES OF SAXONY.—The ladies are models of industry; whether at home or abroad, knitting and needle-work know no interruption. A lady going to a route, would think little of forgetting her fan, but could not spend half an hour without her implements of female industry. A man would be quite pardonable for doubting, or entering such a drawing-room, whether he had not strayed into a school of industry. At Dresden, this is carried so far, that even the theatre is not protected against sticking wires. I have seen a lady gravely lay down her work, wipe away the tears which the sorrows of Thekla, in Wallenstein's death, had brought into her eyes, and immediately resume her knitting. The Weimarese have not yet found it necessary to put softness of heart so absolutely under the protection of the work-bag. They are now more attached to music than to dancing, and sometimes a desperate struggle is made to get up a masquerade; but they want the vivacity, without which, a thing of that sort is the most insipid of all amusements. The higher class leaves the masquerade to the citizens, who demurely pace round a room in black dominoes, and stare at each other in black faces.—Russell's Tour in Germany.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Grizzle Glowworm, Mrs Beaumont. Susan, Miss Barnett. Amoret, Miss M. Glover.
Attendant Spirits, Misses Stallard, Gallot, Angellina, Rose, and S. Barnett.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
Linaro, Alpanor, and Spirit Hunters, Messrs Morris, Winning, Fry, Taylor, &c.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Sebastian, Gregory, and Adam, Messrs Sanders, Willson, and Paulo, Jun.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Andrew and Karl, (his Children) Masters Calkin and Barnett.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.
Fransel, Mr Charles. 1st Chamois Hunter, Mr S. Smith. 2nd do. Mr V. Webster
Spirits of the Alps, Chamois Hunters, Villagers, &c.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called

WAS I TO BLAME?

Julia, Mrs YATES, Melville, Mr YATES,
Lord Charles Everard, Mr Hemmings, Mathew Multiply, Mr Bayne.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.

Columbine, Miss STALLARD.

Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Noscy Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, called

THE HOUR OF TWELVE.

Flora, Mrs EDWIN.
Isabella, Miss Fitzwalter. Donna Francesca, Miss Stuart.
Marquis Fernando, Mr Raymond. Don Sciprano, Mr W. VINING.
Pedro, Mr Knight, Nicolo, Cooper. Lopez, Mr Newcombe. Ambrose, Mr Coates.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called

THE GRENADIER.

[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]

Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

To which will be added, a Comic Burletta, called

THE CHASTE SALUTE

[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]

The Music, by C. E. Horn.

The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,
Philippe, Mr Newcombe, Thibaut, Mr Collier.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]

Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.

Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.

IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.

Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe.
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,

SURREY THEATRE.

The Play, entitled

THE STRANGER.

[By KOTZEBUE.]

Mrs Haller, Miss M. C. POOLE.
Countess Wintersein, Miss Scott. Charlotte, Mrs Vale.
Savoyard, (with a Song) Miss SOMERVILLE. The Stranger, Mr OSBALDISTON
Count Wintersein, Mr Honor. Baron Steinfort, Mr D. Pitt. Peter, Mr Vale.
Solomon, Mr Williams, Francis, Mr C. Hill. Tobias, Mr Gough.
The Count's Son, Master Carbery. The Stranger's Children, M. and E. Clarke.

To conclude with, the Grand Serious Spectacle, in Two Acts, entitled

OBI: OR, THREE-FINGER'D JACK!

With the original Music, by the late Dr Arnold.

Rosa, Madame Simon. Quashee's Wife, Mrs Vale. Sam's Wife, Miss Jordan.
Captain Orford, Mr Honor. Planter, Mr Almar.
Overseer, Mr Edwin. Three-Finger'd Jack, Mr C. Hill.
Quashee, Mr T. Hill. Sam, Mr Asbury. Jonkanoo, Mr Grammer.
Old Woman, Mr Webb. Officer, Mr Lee. Tucky, Mademoiselle Rosier.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

This Evening, the Play of

WILLIAM TELL.

Emma, Miss HUDDART.
Anneli, Miss FAUCIT' Agnes, Miss FAUCIT.
Gesler, Mr H. Wallack. Sarnem, Mr Thompson. Struth, Mr W. Bennett.
Rodolph, Mr Howard. Lufold, Mr Howell. Braun, Mr Ross.
William Tell, Mr MACREADY.
Albert, Miss Poole. Melchtal, Mr Younge. Erni, Mr Cathie.
Furst, Mr Fenton. Verner, Mr Cooke. Waldman, Mr Hughes.
Michael, Mr COOPER. Jagheli, Mr J. VINING.
Pierre, Mr Eaton. Theodore, Mr Honner.
Savoyards—Miss Crawford. Mr Price. Mr S. Jones.

Previous to the Play, Rossini's Overture to "Guillaume Tell."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.

Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.

Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,

Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands

On Monday, Richard the Third; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Play, in Three Acts, called

THE CARNIVAL AT NAPLES.

Music by John Barnett.

Duchess di Fontana, Mrs Lovell. Aurora di Cosenza, Miss Hughes.
Zoranthe, Miss H. Cawse, Rodriga, Mrs Tayleure. Nina, Miss TAYLOR.
Theresa, Miss Phillips. Female Mask, Mrs Brown.
Duke di Fontana, Mr Egerton. Count Cosenza, Mr Blanchard.
Manfredi, Mr WALDE.
Valentine, Mr Henry. Benedetto, Mr G. Bennett. Harry Fortescue, Mr Abbott.
Dermot O'Donovan, Mr Power. Rufo, Mr Evans.
Gaspero, Mr F. Matthews. Guiscard, Mr Irwin. First Mask, Mr Mears.
Second Mask, Mr Hall.
Neapolitan Lovers, Mons. D'Albert, Mrs Bedford, Mirth, Mrs Vedy.
Cupid, Miss Kendall.

After which will be revived, a Farce, in One Act, called

THE IRISHMAN IN LONDON.

Caroline, Mrs Pindar. Louisa, Miss Lawrence. Cubbs, Mrs Brown.
Mr Frost, Mr F. Matthews. Capt. Seymour, Mr Dunsett.
Mr Calloony, Mr Baker. Edward, Mr Parry. Cymon, Mr Addison.
Murtoch Delaney, Mr POWER.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.

With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by
Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.

Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.

Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

On Monday, Fazio; The Omnibus; and the Pantomime.

COBURG THEATRE.—Peter the Great and Charles XII. Harlequin Silver Penny—Wat Tyler and Jack Straw.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—Harlequin and Mother Goose—A Deed of Blood—The Morning after Mariage.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL.—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

№ 128.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, JANUARY 31, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Lives of the Italian Poets. By the Rev. Henry Stebbing, M.A. M. R. S. L. With Twenty Medallion Portraits. 3 vols. 8vo. Bull.

[Continued.]

It is a "refreshment" to turn from the character of Dante to the gentler affections, the elegance, and entire humanity of Petrarch. We do not even think the less of him for his having been a dandy in his youth! for the word applies to this great man in all its nicety, at one period of his life. He and his brother Gerard, when they first collected their little property after the death of their parents, became two of the greatest beaux in Avignon: but the poet evinced at the same time what was in him, by his studies and his generosity:—

'Influenced,' says Mr Stebbing, 'by the love of gallantry and the desire of being esteemed the most accomplished men in Avignon, they generally appeared drest in the most valuable costume, and frequented the society most esteemed for its selectness and elegance. Petrarch reminded his brother, some time after they had lost their taste for such a course of life, how carefully they were accustomed to consult their looking-glasses in arranging their habits, the least spot on which, or the rumple of a fold, would have been a matter of serious concern; how they wore shoes, so tight, that it was martyrdom to walk in them: and how carefully they curled their hair, losing their sleep often to make it lie gracefully. But while thus engaged in the absolute laws of fashion, he was neither idle nor corrupt, and his benevolence to his aged master, Convenevole, deserves to be recorded in every narrative of his life. The poor old grammarian, after spending near seventy years of his existence in teaching rhetoric, was now shivering on the brink of the grave in almost abject poverty. Petrarch alone supplied him with the comforts necessary to his infirmities; his purse was always open to him as long as anything remained in it, and when all was spent and the old man wanted more, he gave him his books to pledge, which was the greater instance of benevolence, as he valued them above everything in the world, and lost several through the negligence of Convenevole: among others, a copy of Cicero's treatise on glory, which has been lamented by every succeeding generation of scholars.—Vol. i. p. 82.

Petrarch has become so great a name with posterity that the following letter of his good friend Cino da Pistoia, exhorting him to give up his poetical studies and become a good lawyer, is read by us with smiles, as if it were a piece of dotage; though it was probably reckoned a very sensible letter at the time.

'"My dear Francis," says the good professor, "I have many times deplored your blindness, I have often prayed the lord to lead you back to a more profitable course of life or to destroy the recollection of you in my mind. I can never think of you, and think of you I do night and day, without repenting that I ever loved you so much. In one word, you must be yourself again, and change your manner of living, or I hope I shall ever again hear of a man so unworthy of having been my pupil. I had prepared a solemn discourse for your promotion to the degree of doctor. I wished to do you an honour which I had never rendered to any one else,—but the gods have not heard my vows; your studies and my labours have been all in vain. What efforts, what toil are all lost! How can you suffer yourself to be deceived by false appearances? What can the family to whom you trust procure you, although it be very illustrious and very noble? Who will repay you for that which you will lose? Might you not have lived honourably at Avignon in the court of the Pope, with the title of Jurisconsult? But I have, perhaps, said too much. I fear my friendship has carried me too far. If you retain any of your former sentiments of respect for your master, give these counsels such a place in your heart as his friendship merits. May the Lord induce you to return to the studies which you have forsaken. This would be a great consolation to me, and a great happiness to you."—Vol. i. p. 88.

Cino had written verses himself, and love verses; which probably furnished his young friend with a provoking reply.

In speaking of Petrarch, it is impossible to pass over the subject of Laura. We extract the well-known opinion of the Abbé de Sade, for the purpose of adding Mr Stebbing's comment:—

'Laura desired,' says the Abbé de Sade, 'to be loved by Petrarch, but never to hear him speak of his love. She treated him with the greatest rigour when he attempted to tell his passion, but when she saw him despairing and ready to abandon all hope, she re-animated him by a slight favour, a look, or a single word. This alternative of great punishments and little favours, so distinctly indicated in Petrarch's poems, is the key to Laura's whole conduct. It was by this artifice, called by our author an innocent one, but not altogether, perhaps, deserving such an epithet, that she contrived, he says, to hold in captivity, for more than twenty years, a man of the most ardent and impetuous disposition, and without making even the smallest sacrifice of her honour. Those, concludes he, who would understand Petrarch aright, ought never to lose sight of this circumstance.

'Supposing, indeed, that Petrarch wrote a sonnet for each variation which he thought he could discover in Laura's countenance, the theory of this excellent biographer may be correct; but with great respect for the ingenuity with which he has thus formed a perfect chronicle of his hero's love, it may reasonably be doubted whether the sonnets admit of so absolute and close an application. That the lover might, in his visits to Avignon, and his meetings with Laura in public places, watch her very earnestly, is not unlikely; that she did not always appear with the same frown or the same smile on her countenance, is still more probable. It is also equally possible, that Petrarch might be affected according to the chance expression which her features wore; but it is almost more than theorizing, to assert that each sonnet may be taken out of its place, and so arranged as to form, with its companions, a sort of chronological table, from which, having put them into prose, we may write a veritable history of the loves of Laura and Petrarch.

'There is something, however, so pleasing in every discovery which tends to prove that the inspiration of poetry, and true fervent feeling are the same, that we might be fairly tempted to leave the Abbé's theory untouched; but it involves another question than that respecting the truth of the poet's sentiments at the moment he was writing. Supposing de Sade to be correct in his explication of the sonnets, Laura is proved beyond question to have been one of the greatest and most perfect coquettes that ever existed. Her ingenuity in so duly apportioning her smiles and frowns, the keenness of her penetration in discovering the true state of the poet's feelings, and the selfish indifference with which she seems to have sacrificed his peace to her pride, would bespeak a sterner appellation than coquetry; but the exquisite delicacy in which Petrarch himself placed the chief beauty of Laura, renders as unwilling to suppose that she was so hackneyed in the vulgarest arts of her townswomen. Avignon was remarkable for the almost rude licentiousness of its inhabitants; but it was for the most angelic purity, both of manners and sentiments, and for a modesty which gave her whole figure the air of a Madonna, that she was beloved so passionately by our poet. It is difficult to believe that this attractive sweetness of demeanour, which preserved her image fresh and unsullied in her lover's mind to his latest day, could have been kept unmarred had she exercised so much art. Nor is it likely, we may add, if her purpose had been so decidedly to hold Petrarch in her trammels for the gratification of her pride, that he could have failed to discover some sign of her intentions, which, it is not improbable, would have broken the spell with which admiration of her modest beauty had at first possessed his soul. He was neither unacquainted with the world, nor unskilled in the knowledge of the female heart; he had suffered too much, if his love was real, not to seize on the discovery of Laura's coquetry as an argument to forget her; and if he only wanted an object on which to bestow immortality by his verses, or by a pretended passion for whom he might acquire, the name of a devoted lover, Laura would have had no occasion to practise any art against him; and if she had, a reputed coquette would have been the least suited of all women for the ethereal portraitures of Francesco.'—Vol. 1, p. 108.

The truth, we suspect, lies between the Abbé and Mr Stebbing. To suppose Laura capable of the excessive artifice attributed to her, and yet to call it innocent, is an opinion worthy of an abbé under the old regime. On the other hand, there is plenty of evidence in her lover's poetry, to shew that she portioned out the shade and sunshine of her countenance in a manner that had the instinctive effect of artifice, though we do not believe there was any intention to practise it.' [And this is a reasonable conclusion, warranted by the experience of the world. It is not necessary to suppose Laura a perfect character, in order to excite the love of so imaginative a heart as Petrarch's. A good half, or two thirds of the love, may have been assignable to the imagination. Part of it was avowedly attributable to the extraordinary fidelity with which she kept her marriage vow to a disagreeable husband, in a city so licentious as Avignon, and therefore partook of that not very complimentary astonishment, and that willingness to be at an unusual disadvantage, which makes chastity cut so remarkable a figure amidst the nauseous rakeries of Beaumont and Fletcher. Furthermore, Laura may have not understood the etherialities of Petrarch. It is possible that less homage might have had a greater effect upon her; and it is highly probable (as Petrarch, though he speaks well of her natural talents, says she had not been well educated), that she had that instinctive misgiving of the fine qualities attributed to her, which is produced, even in the vainest women, by flights to which they are unaccustomed, and which makes them resent their own incompetency upon the lover who thus strangely reminds them of it. Most women, however, would naturally be unwilling to lose such an admirer, especially as they found the admiration of him extend in the world: and Laura is described by her lover as evidently affected by it. Upon the whole, we should guess her to have been a very beautiful, well meaning woman, far from insensible to public homage of any sort (she was a splendid dresser, for instance) and neither so wise nor so foolish, as to make her seriously responsible for any little coquetries she practised, or wanting in sufficient address to practise them well. Her history, perhaps, as far as regards herself, is only a lofty comment upon the line in the Beggar's Opera,

Digitized by Google

"By keeping men off, you keep them on."

With regard to the sonnets with which this great man immortalized his love, and which are full of the most wonderful beauties, small and great, (the versification being surprisingly various and charming, and the conceits of which they have been accused being for the most part as natural and delightful as anything in them, from a propensity which a real lover has to associate his mistress with everything he sees). Mr Stebbing has done justice to their gentler beauties in some graceful criticism, but not, we think, to their intensity and passion. Romeo should have written a criticism on Petrarch's sonnets. He would have done justice both to their "conceits" and their fervour. We think it is Ugo Foscolo who remarks, that Petrarch has given evidences of passion felt in solitude, amounting even to the terrible. His temperament partook of that morbid cast which makes people haunted by their ideas, and which, in men of genius, subjects them sometimes to a kind of delirium of feeling, without destroying the truth of their perceptions. Petrarch more than once represents himself in these sonnets, as struggling with a propensity to suicide; nor do we know anything more affecting in the record of a man's struggles with unhappiness, than the one containing a prayer of humiliation to God on account of his passion, beginning

Padre del ciel, dopo i perduti giorni,
(Father of heaven, after the lost days)

which the commentators tell us was wri.ten on a Good Friday, exactly eleven years from the commencement of his love.

[To be continued.]

May Ball in America.—On Thursday evening last, May the 1st, Mr Lewis Caruci gave his anniversary May Ball, in his spacious hall, which was decorated with great elegance and taste for the occasion, with every green and every flower of the season. It was truly an interesting spectacle; for, according to the best calculations, there were assembled more than a thousand persons, of every age, from two years old up to seventy-five; but all seemed of the same age in the enjoyment of the scene. At eight o'clock, the May Queen elect, a young lady of about fourteen, was ushered in for coronation. This was done with a very pretty ceremony; twelve Maids of Honour, of nearly the age of the Queen, attended her, and then followed twenty-four Floras, sweetly dressed, and ornamented with flowers, carrying with them baskets of flowers garnished with evergreen. After these ceremonies were over, the dance began. The groups were formed without any bustle, and the cotillions commenced with the children, amidst their brothers, sisters, parents, and grand-parents, and strangers from the frozen, the temperate, and the torrid zones; and all seemed to enjoy the offerings that Youth, Innocence, and Beauty brought for the Goddess of Flowers. This is one of the oldest holidays that is now kept up. It was observed at Rome from her primitive days, and in England ever since she became acquainted with Roman customs. It contains in it a perpetual principle,—the flow of gratitude for the beauties of Spring, coming from the hearts of purity, gaiety, and affection, as yet untainted by suffering or evil.—An American paper of 1828.

TO THE TATLER.

My Dear Mr Tatler,—My object is to enlighten the world, and I know no better medium to be selected for that purpose, than your delightful paper, if you can be persuaded to afford me a corner of it. There is a phrase, very often and generally used, which has puzzled me not a little, and which I have been sometimes tempted to believe very ill applied. I doubt not but others have been at a loss to reconcile this phrase with its application, as well as myself. "She has finished her education," says an old lady, with a proud glance towards her grand-daughter. Follow her eyes, and you will see a pretty girl smiling with conscious importance, as she suffers herself to be led to the piano-forte. She takes her seat, plays and sings a few modern ballads, and is almost deafened with admiration.—(Admiration is as noisy on these occasions, as she is silent on some others.) You desire to hear some fine composition of some of the more popular of the great composers, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Winter, &c. She is very sorry, but she does not know it;—you put it before her, but she has not practised it. She plays 'the Light Guitar,' 'Cherry Ripe,' 'Oh, no, we never mention her,' &c. Well, some of these modern ballads are pretty enough,—and you are willing to be pleased. You petition for some favourite Scotch or old English ditty;—the young lady smiles with scornful pity, as she replies she does not play those "common old-fashioned things." In the course of the evening you endeavour to converse with this young lady;—she is willing enough to talk; but of what?—of the company present:—one lady makes so ridiculous a figure, that she should be ashamed to be acquainted with her, for,—look at her sleeves!—why, they are not more than an ell wide!—and then, what a waist; it is, at least, a quarter of an inch too short! And that short lady on the other side—she has actually got on green ribbons, when nobody "who knows anything at all," wears any colours but lavender or primrose! You endeavour to turn her attention to something more interesting; you lose your pains—she does not understand, she does not even hear you. Ah! she is young, she has gay spirits, she is volatile; you resolve upon getting better acquainted with her another time. She does not look stupid, and as she has finished her education, she must be able to speak about something rational. It happens that you pass weeks in the same house with this educated damsel; you discover that she can dance, perhaps sketch a butterfly or a flower, can talk nonsense, either in French or English, play the fashionable game at the card-table, make fire-screens, weave toy-baskets with straws or feathers, embroider muslin, and do various other such things, very well as occasional pastimes, but not altogether satisfactory for the sole employments of life. She reads novels and annuals, it it true; but her mind is totally uninformed, and she is far less companionable than a child. She has no ideas, but of dress and fashion. How should she? Books, conversation, and nature, are alike unknown to her; and her whole time being spent in one eternal pastime, she has not leisure to suspect her own deficiencies. Deficiencies! Has she not finished her education? If she is not fitted to be a rational companion, she would look pretty and fashionable at the head of her husband's table. If she is totally unfitted for the care of a family, she could give orders to her servants. If she should be unable to teach her children, she could send them to school. If she could not cheer a sick room, she could hire a nurse. If she could give no solace in affliction, she could avoid its presence. She is not perhaps qualified for the duties of a wife, a mother, or a friend;—but her education is finished. Ah! Mr Tatler, how much I have been mistaken! I had a notion, that to educate a young lady was to qualify her for the duties, the pleasures, and the troubles of life; that it was to enrich her mind with knowledge; to cultivate her natural tastes; to give grace to her person nnd her movements, through the medium of mental refinement; to qualify her for society, companionship, and solitude; to enable her to respect herself as a rational human being, without forgetting that she was but one among many.—No such thing.—Education is nearly connected with what is termed "coming out." It is indeed almost the same thing. You will pity my ignorance, Mr Tatler, but as there are many of your readers who are no better informed, it will be useful to make the confession, that it was but the other day I discovered the real meaning of the word. I consulted an etymological work, which informed me, that to educate is to lead forth. So that it seems, the only difference between education and coming out is, that the latter signifies the actual introduction to the company in the drawing-room of the world; the former, the progress to it, and the "Hold up your head" and "Turn out your toe," directions given by the way. To have finished her education, merely signifies that a young lady has reached the drawing-room door; it has no sort of reference to her attainments, be they what they may. I have known some well-informed persons who never finished their education, and some ignorant persons whose education was finished many years ago. If you ever finished your's, Mr Tatler, you will have too much gallantry to refuse admission to this useful hint, from one who subscribes herself

Your constant and cordial Admirer.

Digitized by Google

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

CROSS-READING.—"On Tuesday Doctor Bedale and Mr Vipond of Manchester, crossed the (river) Mersey from Liverpool to Runcorn.—The road, which has been recently Macadamised, was very dusty. It ought to be more frequently watered."

A COURTEOUS ANSWER.—At a country election, the popular candidate of a Northern County waited on a shoemaker to solicit his vote. "Get out of my house, Sir," said the shoemaker, "you once turned me out of your estate, and I was determined to turn you out of my house; but for all that, I will give you my vote."—Crispin Anecdotes—(an American Publication.

TRAVELLING TITLES.—The Washington Chronicle, speaking of titles, says that some time since, twenty-five gentlemen, strangers to each other, assembled together at dinner, on board a steam-boat on the Ohio. They were principally from the states of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio. At dinner, the Captain said, addressing one of the company whom he knew,—"General, shall I help you to a piece of roast-beef?"—Upon which, twenty-three of the twenty-five replied to his civility.

SIR SIMON EYRE.—The annals of commerce present few instances of successful speculation more memorable than is exhibited in the life of Sir Simon Eyre, and none to which shoemakers ought to feel more indebted, when they visit the great mart of their staple commodity, Leadenhall. He was originally a shoe-maker in Leadenhall street, and hearing that a vessel laden with leather from Tripoli, was wrecked on the coast of Cornwall, conceived that he might make great advantages from purchasing. He accordingly collected as much money as his narrow means would permit, and departed, on foot, from London to Penzance, where he bought the leather, returned to London, commenced dealer in that article, and soon amassed a considerable fortune, sufficient to build Leadenhall, obtain a knighthood, fill the office of Lord Mayor, and form a splendid ecclesiastical brotherhood.—Crispin Anecdotes.

GEORGE FOX—the founder and head of the English Quakers, was born at Drayton, in Leicestershire, in the year 1624, and died in 1681. He was brought up a shoe-maker, and followed his trade at Nottingham. Whatever may be objected to some of his erratic procedures and mental vagaries, all of which, his friends themselves do not attempt to justify, he certainly was an extraordinary man; and has had the honour of founding a sect, the most amiable in their social manners, and the most praiseworthy in their public intercourse; to whom the legislature have made concessions and granted dispensations, denied to every other sect. A high character of George Fox's spirit of piety and depth of understanding, is given by William Penn, in the "Rise and Progress of the People called Quakers."—Crispin Anecdotes.

HOW TO ENJOY A BATH.—The spring hath come—"refreshing earth, reviving all but man"—your head aches, and you feel occasionally drowsy, languid, and uncomfortable. Take a warm bath; it will relieve you in an hour. But take it in the proper way—

"When 'tis done, 'twere well
'Twere not done quickly"—

for in this lies the mischief of warm-bathing. A man generally posts to a bath, as if he were carrying an express. He is out of breath and in a perspiration on his arrival. He undresses himself in a great hurry, souses his body in the hot water, kicks about for five minutes, emerges with every pore open, puts on his garments, looks complacently in the mirror, and thinks he has taken a warm bath! No such thing; he has taken nothing but a cold! In one hour he begins to sneeze, and the next day he commences coughing and cursing the bath. Philosophy grieves over his folly, but will not relieve his head and lungs. Why did the bath give him a cold? Because he was in a perspiration when he went into the water, which said perspiration was incurred by the heat, and checked as soon as he raised his body from the water into the colder region of the air. The order of nature must be reversed to prevent a man from taking cold under such circumstances. Now, reader, we will tell you how to take a bath. In the first place, if you have any quarrel on hand, whip, or get whipped at once; tranquillity of mind is all-important in rendering the warm bath beneficial. Walk leisurely to the house of ablution, and disrobe yourself with moderate haste. You may have the water hot enough to parboil you, if you choose—that is left to your own taste. In with you, and to beguile the time, you may read a newspaper or smoke a cigar; taking care, however, to keep the cigar above water. If you don't, it will go out. In about half an hour, the water will cool to nearly the temperature of the air, and you will have gone gradually and safely through half a dozen climates. You will have left the torrid for the temperate zone. Then let in the cold water very slowly, almost drop by drop, and in the course of twenty minutes you will find yourself in a cold bath. Your pores will have closed grndually and moderately, your sensations will be exquisite during the process, and you will feel strength and elasticity in every limb. You emerge from the cold water into the warmer air—dry your body thoroughly with a coarse towel, and feel like a new man. It is an impossibility for you to take cold; if you do, you are at liberty to come and box our ears for giving you bad advice.—An American paper.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—William Tell—and the Pantomime.

COVENT GARDEN.—The Carnival at Naples—The Irishman in London—and the Pantomime.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.

THE farce of the Midnight Hour was produced here on Saturday night under the title of The Hour of Twelve, the part of Flora by Mrs EDWIN, who performed it at Drury Lane in 1821. We do not exactly see the reason why old dramas are produced at this theatre under new titles; but the alteration has one pleasant effect. Any gloss of novelty, even in a name, gives something of a new zest to old favourites. We believe we should read the "Soliloquy of Hamlet" itself with new pleasure, if another title were given to it in the Enfield Speaker.

We are loth to say anything in dispraise of Mrs EDWIN, who might perhaps have been a very frequent as well as useful actress, had she contented herself with parts purely subordinate; but there was always a studied articulation and formal energy in her style, more favourable to the letter than to the spirit of the stage; and we are under the necessity of saying, that years have not mended it.

A fine theatrical week has arrived;—Mr KEAN to-night; a new piece to-morrow at Covent Garden; a new operatical playhouse called the Queen's Theatre to open on Thursday (we understand in a genuine spirit of emulation) and the opera itself on Saturday, with glorious PASTA in the perspective! Madame VESTRIS must summon round her all her graces; Miss INVERARITY must be put in double requisition; YATES in the new piece must be excessively MATHEWS; in short, the more theatres there are, the more all must try to excel; and it is hard if we do not get the very best of which they are capable, out of all of them. ☞

THE YOUNG ASTRONOMER.—The Abbé La Caille, who ranked among the first astronomers of the age, was the son of the parish clerk of a village. When he was ten years old, his father sent him every evening to ring the church bell, but the boy always returned home late. His father was angry, and beat him, yet still the boy returned an hour after he had rung the bell. The father suspecting something mysterious in his conduct, one night watched him, and saw his son ascend the steeple, ring the bell as usual, and remain there during an hour. When the unlucky boy descended, he trembled like one caught in the fact, and on his knees confessed that the pleasure he took in watching the stars from the steeple, was the real cause of detaining him from home. As the father was not born to be an astronomer, like the son, he flogged the boy severely. The youth was found weeping in the streets, by a man of science, who, when he discovered in a boy of ten years of age a passion for contemplating the stars at night, and who had discovered an observatory in a steeple, in spite of such ill treatment, decided that the seal of nature had impressed itself on the genius of that boy. Relieving the parent from the son, and the son from the parent, he assisted the young La Caille in his passionate pursuit, and the event completely justified the prediction.—The Literary Character Illustrated by the History of Men of Genius.

JOHN KNOX.—Thevet, writing of the affairs of Scotland, thus speaks of this celebrated Scotch Reformer:—"This Diaphorist, who was fond of dissentions, was not contented to tread in the steps of Luther and of his master Calvin, who had lately redeemed him from the gallies of Cupua, in which he had remained three years for his crimes, unlawful amours, and execrable whoredoms, and for his dissolute living, and for having been convicted of parricide and murder, committed on the Archbishop of St Andrewes;—this Simonist, who had been a Priest before in our Church, and fattened with benefices, which he sold for ready money, seeing he could not prove his cause to be good, fell into the most horrid blasphemy in the world. First, he denied the power of God; he preached openly that virginity was no better than marriage; and he induced many devout wives and religious virgins to prostitute themselves," &c. &c.—Are not people, observes the judicious Bayle, that write with so little judgment, well qualified to make us question the truths they advance, supposing any such escape them?

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Our friend R. and another Correspondent will have seen that we corrected the error which they were good enough to point out.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Tragedy of

KING RICHARD III.

[By SHAKSPEARE].

Elizabeth, Queen of Edward the Fourth, Mrs FAUCIT.
Lady Anne, Miss FAUCIT. Duchess of York, Mrs Webster.
King Henry, Mr Younge. Prince of Wales, Miss Chikini.
Duke of York, Miss Poole. Duke of Norfolk, Mr Thompson.
Duke of Glo'ter, Mr KEAN.
Earl of Oxford, Mr Howard. Lord Stanley, Mr Hammerton.
Duke of Buckingham, Mr COOPER. Earl of Richmond, Mr WALLACK.
Lord Mayor, Mr Andrews. Sir Robert Brackenbury, Mr Yarnold.
Sir William Catesby, Mr Cooke. Sir Richard Ratcliffe, Mr Cathie.
Sir Walter Blunt, Mr Eaton. Tressel, Mr J. Vining. Tyrrel, Mr Honner.

Previous to the Tragedy, Lindpainter's Overture to 'Der Bergkonig.'

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.

Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.

Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,

Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory. and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV, Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands

Tomorrow—A Melo-dramatic Opera; the New Pantomime; and Masaniello.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Tragedy of

FAZIO.

[By Mr MILMAN.]

Marchesa Adabella, Mrs CHATTERLEY, Clara, Miss PHILLIPS,
Bianca, (8th time) Miss F. KEMBLE. Giraldi Fazio, Mr WARDE,
Duke of Florence, Mr EGERTON, Bartolo, Mr BLANCHARD,
Philario, Mr Henry, Falsetto, Mr Parry, Gonsalvo, Mr Baker,
Theodore, Mr Mears, Keeper, Mr Fuller, Pietro, Mr Turnour,
Gentleman, Mr Irwin, Antonio, Mr Heath, Aurio, Mr Crumpton

Previous to the Tragedy, a Grand MS. Overture by Friedrich Kuhlau.
After the Tragedy, A. Romberg's Overture to 'Scipio.'

After which, a Farce, in one Act, called

THE OMNIBUS.

[By Mr TAIN.]

Julia Ledger, Miss Lawrence. Mrs Dobbs, Mrs Tayleure.
Miss Damper, Mrs Daly, Miss Jemima Damper, Miss Appleton.
Mr Ledger, Mr BLANCHARD. Mr Dobbs, Mr BARTLEY.
Tom Dobbs, Mr KEELEY. Pat Rooney, Mr POWER,

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

Tomorrow—Cinderella; and the Pantomime.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

In the course of the Season, the following Performers will appear for the first time in London.
Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY. du Theâtre du Gymnase.
Madame ALBERT, du Theâtre des Nouveautés.
M. LEPEINTRE, Aîné, du Theâtre du Vaudeville.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie, par

MALVINA; OU, UN MARIAGE D'INCLINATION.

Vaudeville nouveau en Deux Actes, de M. SCRIBE.
Malvina, Fille de M. Dubreuil, Mlle. St. Ange.
Marie, Nièce de M. Dubreuil, Mademoiselle FLORVAL.
Catherine, Femme de Charge et Gouvernante, Madame Baudin.
M. DERVAL remplira le Rôle d'Arved Dubreuil.
M. Dubreuil, M. ST. AUBERT. M. de Barentin, Ami de la Maison, M. Alfred.

Suivi de la Première Représentation de

MADAME GREGOIRE.

Vaudeville nouveau en Deux Actes, de MM. ROCHEFORT et DUPEUTY.
La Scène est a Paris, en 1760.
Madame Grégoire, Cabaretière, Mlle. St. Ange.
Fanchette, Auvergnate, et Femme supposée de Benoit, Mademoiselle Eliza.
Manon Giroux, Blanchisseuse, Mme. Gamard. Mariotte, Servante, Mlle. Emma.

On Finira par

LE CHATEAU DE MON ONCLE.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de MM. DESAUGIER et ARMAND.
Laure, Fille du Baron, Mlle. FLORVILLE. Mme. Derbois, son Amié, Mlle. Corra.
Madame Grimardeau, Gouvernanle du Chateau, Madame Baudin.
Rose, Fille du Chateau, Mlle. HERMINIE.
Le Baron de St. Val, M. Cloup. St. Ernest, Officier de Cavalerie, M. Alfred.
M. Grimardeau, Intendant du Chateau, M. Préval. Labrie, M. Arnaud.
Le Franc, Hussard, Domestique de St. Ernest, M. Gamard. Simon, M. Granville.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Grizzle Glowworm, Mrs Beaumont. Susan, Miss Barnett. Amoret, Miss M. Glover.
Attendant Spirits, Misses Stallard, Gallot, Angellina, Rose, and S. Barnett.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
Linaro, Alpanor, and Spirit Hunters, Messrs Morris, Winning, Fry, Taylor, &c.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Sebastian, Gregory, and Adam, Messrs Sanders, Willson, and Paulo, Jun.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Andrew and Karl, (his Children) Masters Calkin and Barnett.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.
Fransel, Mr Charles. 1st Chamois Hunter, Mr S. Smith. 2nd do. Mr V. Webster
Spirits of the Alps, Chamois Hunters, Villagers, &c.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called

THE MARRIED BACHELOR.

Lady Courtall, Miss DALY. Grace Gaylove, Mrs FITZWILLIAM.
Sir Charles Courtall, Mr YATES. Sharp, Mr J. REEVE.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, called

THE HOUR OF TWELVE.

Flora, Mrs EDWIN.
Isabella, Miss Fitzwalter. Donna Francesca, Miss Stuart.
Marquis Fernando, Mr Raymond. Don Sciprano, Mr W. VINING.
Pedro, Mr Knight, Nicolo, Cooper. Lopez, Mr Newcombe. Ambrose, Mr Coates.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called

THE GRENADIER.

[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]

Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

After which, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called

MIS-APPREHENSION.

Miss Clementina Bramble, Miss Stuart. Fanny, Miss Pincott. Ellen, Miss Kabrey.
Miss Bramble's Maid, Miss Berresford. Frank Hartley, Mr Raymond.
Thomas, Mr Cooper. Money, Mr W. VINING. Mr Williams, Mr Coates.
Police Officer, Mr Worrell. Shopmen, Messrs Young and Hutchinson.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe.
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,

SURREY THEATRE.

Will be revived the celebrated Drama, entitled

THE ITALIAN WIFE.

Bianca, Miss M. C. POOLE,
Marchesa Aldabella, Miss Scott, Clara, Miss Jordan.
Duke of Venice, Mr Dibdin Pitt, Gonsalvo, Mr Gough, Falsetto, Mr Honner,
Giraldi Fazio, Mr OSBALDISTON,
Bartolo, Mr Williams, Philario, Mr Almar, Antonio, Mr Young,
Theodore, Mr Webb, Piero, Mr Lee, Gentleman, Mr Tully, Keeper, Mr Hobbs.

After which, a Drama, entitled

THE DIAMOND ARROW.

[By W. T. MONCRIEF.]

Lucille, Miss SOMERVILLE. Dame Lodoline Fontaine, Mrs VALE.
Mons. Fontaine, Mr VALE. Mons. Anselm, Mr Young. Courier, Mr Lee.
Hilaire, Mr Edwin.

To conclude with, the Grand Serious Spectacle, in Two Acts, entitled

OBI: OR, THREE-FINGER'D JACK!

With the original Music, by the late Dr Arnold.
Rosa, Madame Simon. Quashee's Wife, Mrs Vale. Sam's Wife, Miss Jordan.
Captain Orford, Mr Honor. Planter, Mr Almar.
Overseer, Mr Edwin. Three-Finger'd Jack, Mr C. Hill.
Quashee, Mr T. Hill. Sam, Mr Asbury. Jonkanoo, Mr Grammer.
Old Woman, Mr Webb. Officer, Mr Lee. Tucky, Mademoiselle Rosier.

COBURG THEATRE.—Bonaparte's Destiny—The Silver Knight—Jack Sheppard—And All Halow Seen.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck; or the Buccaneer's Bridal—Harlequin and Mother Goose—And Satisfied.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 129.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Lives of the Italian Poets. By the Rev. Henry Stebbing, M.A. M. R. S. L. With Twenty Medallion Portraits. 3 vols. 8vo. Bull.

[Continued.]

We must again express our regret that Mr Stebbing has not devoted a chapter to Pulci. His 'Morgante Maggiore' was published seven or eight years before the 'Orlando Innamorato' of Boiardo; and he, therefore, may claim to be considered the founder of Italian Romance. He looks like the founder of modern banter and burlesque. His poem would deserve to be regarded as a curiosity, were it only for containing passages which seem to be the germ of the style of Voltaire; but, while it has others of a less entertaining singularity,—attributable, perhaps, to a half-admiring, half-bantering imitation of the popular story-tellers, and, as Dryden says of another poet, sometimes "runs upon a flat" for too long a time, it is highly worthy of perusal throughout. Morgante is a good-natured, friendly giant. Onthe other hand, we have a giant named Margutte, who is a personification of an impudent and disgusting worldliness. The poem concludes with a fine description of the death of Orlando at Roncesvalles. We cannot read the first canto without discovering the author's genius, both for tenderness and wit. Of the latter, in corroboration of what we have said respecting the style of Voltaire, we will lay a specimen before the reader, in a few stanzas from that canto. The passages respecting the manna are highly Voltairesque.—

Orlando comes upon a set of monks in a desert, who are pestered by three giants, their neighbours. The giants, who are of course infidels or Mahometans, are in the habit of throwing great stones at the abbey, so that the monks cannot go out for provisions. Orlando, in his knight errantry, comes to the abbey door and knocks for some time in vain. At length he is let in, and the abbot apologizes by stating the blockade in which they are kept. The holy father then proceeds to make some very singular comments:—

'Gli antichi padri nostri nel deserto,
Se le lor opre sante erano e giúste,
Del ben servir da Dio n' aver buon merto:
Né creder sol vivessin di locuste:
Piovea dal ciel la manna, questo è certo;
Ma qui convien che spesso assaggi e guste
Sassi, che piovon di sopra quel monte
Che gettano Alabastro e Passamonte.

E'l terzo, ch' è Morgante, assai piu fiero,
Isveglie e pini e faggi e cerri e gli oppi,
E gettagli infin qui: questo è pur vero,
Non posso far che d' ira non iscoppi.
Mentre che parlan cosi in cimitero,
Un sasso par che Rondel quasi sgroppi;
Che da 'giganti giù venne da alto
Tanto, ch' e' prese sotto il tetto un salto.

Tirati dentro, cavalier, per Dio,
Disse l'abate, che la manna casca.
Rispose Orlando: caro abate mio,
Costui non vuol che'l mio caval piu pasca:
Veggo che lo guarrebbe dal restio:
Quel sasso par che di buon braccia nasca.
Rispose il santo padre: io non t'inganno;
Credo che'l monte un giorno gitteranno.'

The eremites of old, if just and true
And righteous in their works, had blessed cheer;
God's servants in those days no hunger knew,
Nor lived on those same locusts all the year;
Doubt not they had the rain of manna too:
But as for us, our pretty dishes here
Are stones; which Passamont and Alabaster
Rain down upon our heads, by way of taster.

And yet those two are nothing to the third:
He tears me up whole trees, whole horrid oaken
Trunks by the roots: he does, upon my word—
Our heads infallibly will all be broken."

While thus, as if he could be overheard
The monk stood talking low, there came a token
So close upon the horse, it seemed all over
With the poor devil, who leaped under cover.

"For God's sake come in doors, Sir!" cried the priest
"The manna's falling!" "'Tis, indeed, said t'other;
They seem to grudge his feed to the poor beast·
They'd cure his restiveness. Well, such another
Stunner as this, proves no weak arm at least,
No son, dear abbot, of a feeble mother."
"The Lord!" exclaimed the monk, "look down upon us!
Some day, I think, they'll cast the mountain on us."

Boiardo, the other father of romantic Italian poetry (for these authors were probably occupied with their productions at the same period, and the Orlando Innamorato was the undoubted precursor of the great work of Ariosto), was a poet of singular good fortune. He was successful in the world, and yet unspoiled by it. He was one of those feudal barons of whom we read in romances, and yet accomplished enough to write a romance himself. He was rich, admired, beloved; and, though he shone at courts and festivals, passed the greater part of his time in sylvan shades, and the composition of poetry.

'Sometimes in Ferrara,' says Mr Stebbing, 'and at others at Scandiano, he shared his honours between the splendid amusements of a courtier, and the luxurious reveries of a poet. The rank and fortune he possessed secured him from the cares to which by far the greater number of literary men are subject; and, which was still further conducive to the tranquillity of both his mind and his life, he reaped the golden harvest of fame as quickly as he sowed the seed. Unlike most other writers, especially of long narrative poems, he had not to wait for years before he could meet the encouraging smile of applause;—or to labour at correction, and then depend, when all is finished, on the capricious humour of the public. As soon as a Canto was composed, he took it with him to Ferrara, and there, in the presence of a brilliant Court, of which every member from the Prince to the youngest page, was prepared to applaud him, he recited his gay and charming inventions.'—Vol. II. p. 10.

We are not acquainted with the poem of Boiardo. We have that pleasure to come, and are enabled to indulge it by its long-desired re-publication, with which the zeal of Signor Panizzi has at length favoured the world. It is so rare, even in Italy, that we enquired for it in vain among the booksellers of two of the principal cities in that country. Berni's Rifacimento we know, and a very charming poem it is, more abundant in some of the delights of fiction and scenery than the Furioso itself; but we never supposed that the most serious and earnest parts of it were furnished by the wit and man of the world, who remodelled the original. These we fully expect to find in the old romancer. Boiardo's name and title sound like a romance,—Matto Maria Boiardo, Count of Scandiano. Mr Stebbing relates a popular anecdote of him, which is of doubtful authenticity, but which, from the very singularity of it, and the romance of the poet's habits, we are inclined to believe. Speaking of the scenery in the neighbourhood of his estate, the feudatories of which are supposed to have furnished him with appellations for his heroes,—Gradasso, Mandricardo, Sacripante, and others,—his biographer adds (noticing at the same time the doubtfulness of the tradition), 'It was while hunting in the woods of Fracasso, a short distance from Scandiano, that he discovered a name for his chief character. He had been long, it is said, in vain endeavouring to invent one which should be sufficiently sounding for a hero of the highest prowess and valour. All at once, Rodomonte started into his mind, and instantly turning his horses head towards Scandiano, he rode rapidly to the castle, and ordered all the bells to be rung in honour of Rodomonte, filling his vassals, it is said, with astonishment, as they had never heard before of such a saint.'—Vol. II. p. 7.

The mixt pleasantry and enthusiasm of this incident, renders it, we think, exceedingly probable. It is very like what one should expect from a man who united the vivacity of a court gallant with the fervour of a bard. The ostentatious magniloquence of the character in his poem, which he thus christened, has made the name pass into a proverb. From Rodomonte we have rodomontade.

Digitized by Google

Before we proceed further, we must correct a mistake in our former article. We said that Mr Stebbing had made no mention of Rucellai. We had overlooked the name. He speaks of him in the second volume under the head of his friend Trissino, but he says nothing of his only popular poem, Le Api, a Virgilian composition, of great taste and sweetness. The mistake in the notice of Ariosto, of attributing to Pope an epitaph by Cowley, must be a slip of the memory. With the remarks on the want of a moral in Ariosto's poem, we do not altogether coincide; but the following passage appears to us to be beautifully written by Mr Stebbing, and to contain a delightful image:—

'Morality is the true foundation of unity, and the latter never exists in poetry or painting but when the writer or artist is powerfully impressed with some ruling sentiment, round which his thoughts and the creations of his imagination may cluster, and which may be as an imperishable altar of gold, on which love and romance may safely burn their incense, rendered more precious and odorous by the very sacredness of the altar.'—Vol. II. p. 82.

Upon the whole, the criticism on Ariosto's poem is one of the best in the book.

'Imagination,' says Mr Stebbing in one part of it, 'never gave birth to a greater, or more splendid variety of scenes, incidents, and characters; and never did poet hold the minds of his readers more completely captive to the charm of his song. At one time, we seem carried by some magic car over wide-stretching countries, varied with every wonder and glory of Nature; at others, led by a hermit, or the singing of a solitary bird, through green and quiet dells; then again transported through the air, and, making our passage amid gorgeous clouds, we find ourselves on tented battle-fields, or surrounded by throngs of dames and barons, in the hall of some lordly castle. Nor does the charm of the poet consist only in this wild variety and brilliancy of the objects with which it regales the fancy. Both the sentiments and incidents are often exquisitely tender and impassioned: gaiety and splendour give way to pathos, and the music of the verse becomes as deep and plaintive as it was before light and flowing.'—Vol. II. p. 86.

[To be concluded.]

THE WHITE HUNTER AND HIS INDIAN BRIDE.

A TALL athletic white man, as the sun sunk slowly behind the western foreign shade, was seen to enter a lonely cabin, upon the woody shores of the Miami. He had scarcely thrown off his hunting apparatus, before the horrid war-cry of the ferocious Sioux struck upon his ear; and soon a numerous band bounded, like startled deer, through the frail barrier of his dwelling. Here, however, they met with an unfriendly reception; for, soon the sharp report of the hunter's rifle announced the departure of an Indian's spirit to the hunting-ground of the blest. They then bound him, and departed towards the setting sun; and, on the evening of the succeeding day, drew near to the village of their tribe. Here they halted, and sent forward a deputation to inform the chiefs of their return. On the return of the messengers, the whole party moved onward. The village exhibited a long dark row of swarthy old men, squaws, and children, who lined both sides of the open trail; and upon seeing their well-known friends, screamed out with horrid yells. One singularly-dressed squaw (the wife of the fallen chief), tore handfuls from her dishevelled locks, while she laid her flesh open to the bone with a sharp instrument, and continued howling the death-cry of the Sioux; but, upon seeing the white hunter, as he ran the gauntlet, she caught a hatchet from the hands of a warrior, and gave the victim a deep wound in the thigh; then, pressing the crimson fluid to her lips, she returned the hatchet to its owner: and, shaking her finger at the hunter with a hollow laugh, entered a neighbouring lodge, while the hunter was conducted to prison. As the first rays of morning gleamed upon the hill, the hunter saw through the crevises of his prison, numerous swarthy chieftains moving amid the vistas of the forest, towards the council fire. Half an hour or more passed, and the hunter, tortured with suspense, turned from the openings in his apartment, and threw himself upon the boughs of pine which composed his bed. At that instant, he heard a rustling outside, and immediately a window opened in what heretofore had appeared to him to be solid logs, through which a young Indian maiden entered. She at once, with a sharp knife, severed the withs that confined his arms, and set him at liberty. She then placed her hand upon her breast, while a deep sigh burst from her lips; and, raising her eyes, said, in the hunter's tongue. "The Sioux chiefs have doomed you to be burnt;—but the Sioux maiden loves the pale chief. She has set him at liberty;—will the pale face, in return, let the light fawn live in his wigwam?"

"God knows I will!" cried the young hunter in ecstacy.

"It is enough," said the maiden: then turning, she blew a small reed, and presently three savages entered, bearing each a knapsack, gun, and other equipments for a march. She pointed to a heap of dry drift wood, which the savages quickly moved; and handed to the hunter his trusty rifle, and a knapsack well lined with provisions. They then assisted the maiden to climb to the window, and she was safe on the other side, followed by the hunter, and the three Indians, who struck off into a lonely and rugged trail, and were soon far from the Sioux lodge. When the evening shades settled down upon the leafy forest, they reached a Chippewa village. Here, upon declaring their wishes to a French Jesuit, who married them, they were received with open arms by the chiefs, who gave them a beautiful hut on the borders of a pleasant stream, and bade them live in safety. The white man soon became a favourite with the Chippewa chiefs, and one morning against the wishes of his lovely wife, joined a hunting expedition towards the west. Three tedious weeks had rolled away, and nought was heard of the little band; but on the evening of the first day of the fourth week, an Indian runner, breathless with haste, entered the village, and soon communicated to the Indian girl the sad news of her husband being captured and doomed to death by a party of her incensed nation. She spoke not,—for a long time she stood motionless; then, as though a ray of hope had dispelled the forebodings of her imagination, she departed towards the west, with the utmost secrecy, and in the course of the next day, stood upon a high ascent, which overlooked the village of the Sioux. Loud war-hoops fell upon her ear, sending back the warm blood to her heart. She looked again towards the village, and perceived a prisoner led out, and bound to the stake. She uttered a faint scream, darted down the hill with the rapidity of the elk, entered the circle, and threw herself upon her husband's neck. "The squaw of the pale chief will die with him," answered she, to her husband's reproof for seeking him.

The eyes of the painted warriors glistened with tears of admiration, at this token of love; but their hearts were changed to stone, by the hoarse voice of their chieftain, commanding them to sing the war-song of the Sioux, as he advanced with his lifted tomahawk towards the prisoner. For a moment he gazed upon the hunter's features, and then with a horrible denunciation, let fall the glittering hatchet, but the girl sprang forward, and received the blow. Then, with an angelic smile, she pressed the hand of her husband, and fell lifeless into the arms of her agonized father. The chief cast one look upon the remains of his once lovely daughter —and then bidding the hunter depart in safety to the land of his fathers, he buried his head in his blanket, and was led by the young warriors to his lodge. The hunter, after shedding tears of deep sorrow over the light fawn's grave, returned to the settlement of the whites on the shores of the Atlantic, while the Sioux chief wandered forth upon the banks of the Miami, an unhappy maniac.—The Boston Traveller.

THE GAME OF CHESS.—This game is generally allowed, we believe, to possess as great or greater interest than any other of the sedentary ones. But this is not its only recommendation. There are many people, to whom a certain degree of excitement is necessary, which they procure by various means, and among them by playing at cards. But one great objection to all games at cards is, that being mainly, or at least in a great degree, dependant on chance, they are so insipid as to require, to make them at all interesting, the additional strong stimulus of money, and that to no fixed amount, but just according to the extent of the gambling spirit in the players. They frequently defeat, besides, their own legitimate object, amusement, by giving rise to all sorts of petty animosities and contentions, the more common, as success or failure cannot be accurately divided between chance and skill. Chess is liable to none of these objections. It is not played for gain, because it supplies sufficient excitement without that aid. Its interest is formed by the multitude of the pieces, the variety and close connection of their movements. Another advantage is, that it is played by the smallest number that can play at any game. The idea entertained by many, that it is an abstruse and difficult game, and requires a great deal of time and study to get a knowledge of it, is perfectly erroneous. Like anything else where skill is concerned, it would take some time to excel in it; but that is not at all necessary in order to be amused; and any one, who had played a few games, enough to make him feel interested, would derive as much (or more) pleasure in his progress to farther knowledge, as if he already knew all that he could learn. It is a game that very well suits all countries, but more particularly the very cold or very warm ones: in the former, where out-door amusements must necessarily be few, it is a good fire-side companion; in the latter, the intensity of the heat, for the greatest part of the day at least, makes all violent exercise and even great talking painful, and renders this quiet game very acceptable, whether played in the house or in cool shady places in the open air. A great and often effectual obstacle to some amusements (billiards, for instance) is the expence. It is none to this. The first cost is the whole, and that is so small, that a good and durable set of men and board might be purchased for one pound—a price which could not well be heavy to those who had any time for recreation. The merits of Chess then are these: its cheapness, its adaption to the climate, the great interest it creates, and its freedom from those ill consequences which attend most other great excitements; it will not, like excessive drinking, insure a headache, or, like great eating, a nightmare, to those who indulge in it. It affords room, besides, for a little pleasant politics, and will give cause for triumph, in the various changes of the game, to men of all opinions. The loyal man will delight to see the king trampling upon the hostile plebeians; and how the Jacobin will exult (the Habeas Corpus being restored) when an insolent pawn, regardless of rank and dignity, arrests the progress of a king, or captures a helpless bishop! It has been thought that chess might, by long study and practice, be reduced to a mathematical calculation. This may possibly have been done in Turkey or the East, where the people are fond of it to excess, and frequently play it all day, or by some individuals elsewhere; but it is not at all likely that the inhabitants of this country, considering the coldness of the climate, and the general attention to business, will ever pursue it with much ardour.—Yellow Dwarf.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT

DRURY LANE.—King Richard III.—and the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Fazio—The Omnibus—and the Pantomime.

DRURY LANE.

THE manager of this theatre says he has prevailed on Mr KEAN to re-appear for a few nights in some of his best characters; and Mr KEAN accordingly presented us last night with that of Richard III. He was welcomed, if not with the thunder of a whole house, yet with the acclamations and waving hats of an enthusiastic pit; nor was a good deal of applause wanting from some other parts of the house. It was not the deafening crash of his most favoured times; but considering the formal dislike of some persons to any kind of broken word, the jealousy of others, and the grudges of various sorts which may be supposed to beset the return of such a man to the stage, it was a handsome reception. For our parts, we think the broken promises of a man of genius much more excusable than those of lovers; and, in our critical capacity, we felt thankful to Mr KEAN for letting us again behold him. He is unquestionably the finest actor we ever saw. Nobody comes near him except MACREADY; and he, we think, even surpasses him in one point,—the expression of domestic tenderness. KEAN'S tenderness is a voluntary grace; MACREADY'S, a real emotion. In everything else, though more approached by that fine actor than any other, he reigns lord paramount.

We say reigns, for he still does so, having resumed his dominion; but we are sorry to add. that he does not grasp his sceptre with the same physical force, nor can he issue his commands so loudly. In plain words, his voice, which was never of the strongest, painfully fails at times; nor does he distribute over his evening's performance the same amount of vigour as formerly. But we look upon the falling off as entirely physical; at least there was nothing in the performance of last night, to indicate that it had anything to do with mental decay. All the fine points appeared to us as well conceived as ever, and only impeded (when they were so) by manifest bodily weakness. In the tent scene for instance, where he starts up from his horrid dream, he made such a feeble business of the rush forward (or coming rather) that the house seemed inclined to be angry with it:—yet he began it, on first awaking, with as fine a dismal and natural groan as tragic spectator could desire; and it was clear to us, that his bodily strengh suddenly failed him. So in "a horse! a horse! my kingdom for horse!"—he could hardly get the words out; and a similar want of power was observable throughout the play generally It was thought at first, that he was husbanding his strength; but it did not turn out so. We could not help persuading ourselves that Mr KEAN might recover all that he wanted. There is nothing in his time of life to hinder it, if the excitements of his style of acting and the consequences but too natural to them do not hinder it. We have always wondered how actors of sensibility could bear up as they have done; and we have had a profane notion in consequence, that GARRICK could not have been quite so fine as he was described. KEMBLE had no more wear and tear than a statue. We fancied Mr KEAN looked a little larger than he used in the cheeks.

While speaking of deficiencies, we will notice the only fault we observed in this great actor last night,—which we take to be a common one with him, and hardly to have been expected in a man of his extreme sense of the natural. We do not mean to applaud the homely natural at the expense of the proper tragic mixture of the natural and ideal, which no man exhibits better than he, even in the passages in which he seems most familiar; for the ideal is only the imaginative added to the extreme of feeling, or rather the extreme in the most imaginative state of which it is capable; and there is always a certain grace as well as force of truth in what appear to be the homeliest of Mr KEAN'S ebullitions. But in the instances we allude to, which are those of the more tranquil kind, he appears to us to abandon his usual relish of the truth, for a strange kind of acquiescent commonplace, little to be expected of him. Thus, last evening, in speaking the fine lines descriptive of the noises of either army the night before the engagement, he did not pause, and hearken (as it were) over them,—he did not lay forth his ear to catch the sounds, or look as if he was particulrrly sensible of them. He did little but repeat the verses with an undulating tranquillity of recital, like some mild gentleman with an Enfield Speaker reading them out of the book.

But low fine he is, when he is fine! how true! how full of gusto! how intense! what a perfect amalgation there is of the most thorough feeling and the most graceful idealism! The first four lines which Richard utters on coming on,

'Now is the winter of our discontent, &c.'

were as beautifully delivered as they ever could have been, especially the last:

'And all the clouds that lower'd upon our house,
In the deep bosom of the ocean buried.

KEAN, in speaking this last line, held forth his arm, and in a beautiful style of deliberate triumph, uttering his words with inward majesty, pointed his finger downwards; as if he saw the very ocean beneath him from some promontory, and beheld it closed over the past.

Several of his favourite passages were given with their old effect, notwithstanding what has been said above. Among them was the question about Stanley's friends, "What do they in the North?" &c. and particularly the order for Buckingham's execution. We think we never heard the latter given even so finely. There was a contemptuous levity on the word "Buckingham,"—a sort of fondness and forsoothness of sarcasm (if the expression be allowed us) which seemed to set the poor Duke and his pretensions at a distance ludicrously immeasurable. The points in the wooing scene with Lady Ann were also much applauded,—the only unnatural scene (for we cannot help thinking it so) in SHAKSPEARE.

But the crowning point was the look he gave Richmond, after receiving the mortal blow. This has been always admired; but last night it appeared to us that he made it longer and therefore more ghastly. He stood looking the other in the face, as if he was already a disembodied spirit, searching him with the eyes of another world; or, as if he silently cursed him with some new scorn, to which death and its dreadful knowledge had given him a right. We thought he overdid the subsequent length of the talk of him, while lying on the ground: but his look was still very terrible.

Mr WALLACK came forward after the tragedy, to give the new pieces,—and afterwards did give them out,—but Mr KEAN was obliged to make his appearance in the interval. The reader, who was not present, may guess how unfit these enormous theatres are for sick actors, when we tell him, that although we sat within a short distance from the stage, and are quick of hearing, we could not distinguish above half he said. To be sure, he was, as he said, "exhausted;" but two-thirds of the audience must have been unable to hear properly the whole evening. The upshot is, that we cannot give a proper account of Mr KEAN'S speech. We understood him to say that he was very grateful,—exceedingly grateful;—that he should always be so;—and that he wished all the ladies and gentlemen as much pleasure ever afterwards, as they had given him at that moment. It was expected, that he would act again on Wednesday; but "Monday next" only was mentioned, the character the same as last night. We are surprised, by the way, that Mr KEAN chose so trying and loud a one at present. Would not Shylock be better? or the finest of all his characters, Othello? The season is also against him. We felt for him while lying upon the cold boards on this enormous stage, as if inviting the winds to make his hoarseness worse. The house was full, but not outrageously so.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A.A. is received with thanks. Item, the CHESS-PLAYER.

The space will be reserved for the article enquired about last night.

O. G.'s feelings do him credit, but he has not yet learnt the art of putting them into verse.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Scrio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called
THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.
Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Grizzle Glowworm, Mrs Beaumont. Susan, Miss Barnett. Amoret, Miss M. Glover.
Attendant Spirits, Misses Stallard, Gallot, Angellina, Rose, and S. Barnett.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
Linaro, Alpanor, and Spirit Hunters, Messrs Morris, Winning, Fry, Taylor, &c.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Sebastian, Gregory, and Adam, Messrs Sanders, Willson, and Paulo, Jun.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Andrew and Karl, (his Children) Masters Calkin and Barnett.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.
Franzel, Mr Charles. 1st Chamois Hunter, Mr S. Smith. 2nd do. Mr V. Webster
Spirits of the Alps, Chamois Hunters, Villagers, &c.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called
THE MARRIED BACHELOR.
Lady Courtall, Miss DALY. Grace Gaylove, Mrs FITZWILLIAM.
Sir Charles Courtall, Mr YATES. Sharp, Mr J. REEVE.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called
GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.
[By Mr BUCKSTONE].
The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.
Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, called
THE CHASTE SALUTE
[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]
The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,
Philippe, Mr Newcombe, Thibaut, Mr Collier.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called
THE GRENADIER.
[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]
Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

After which, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called
MIS-APPREHENSION.
Miss Clementina Bramble, Miss Stuart. Fanny, Miss Pincott. Ellen, Miss Kabrey.
Miss Bramble's Maid, Miss Berresford. Frank Hartley, Mr Raymond.
Thomas, Mr Cooper. Money, Mr W. VINING. Mr Williams, Mr Coates.
Police Officer, Mr Worrell. Shopmen, Messrs Young and Hutchinson.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled
OLYMPIC REVELS.
[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe.
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,

SURREY THEATRE.

The Nautico-Domestic Drama, entitled
THE ROVER'S BRIDE.
[By Mr G. ALMAR.]
Act I.—WINTER.
Alice Manners, Miss SCOTT. Bella Manners, Miss SOMERVILLE.
Dame Bellerton, Miss Nicol. Nancy Blackberry, Miss Ellis.
Lawrence Glennon, Mr D. Pitt.
Miles Bellerton, Mr C. Hill. Marmaduke Magog, Mr VALE.
Diedrick Van Voorn, Mr Honnor. Bobby Blackberry, Mr Rogers.
[Between the First and Second Acts, a lapse of Five Years is supposed to take place.]
Act II.—SUMMER.
Alice Manners, Miss SCOTT. Bella, Miss SOMERVILLE.
Mary Blackberry, Miss Rumens. Kitty Spiteful, Mrs Rogers.
Captain Glennon, Mr D. Pitt.
Barbelot, Mr Jones. Diedrick Van Voorn, Mr Honnor.
Culverdine and Avery, Mr Ransford and Mr Lee.
Marmaduke Magog, Mr VALE. Bobby Blackberry, Mr Rogers.
Bluff Laconic, Mr C. Hill. Master Marmaduke Magog, Jun. Master Carbery.

After which a New Drama (from SCRIBE) entitled
BARON TRENCK!
[By Mr OSBALDISTON.]
Victorine, Miss SOMERVILLE. Countess of Hulsdorff, Madame Simon.
Countess of Lewemberg, Mr Rumens.
The Count of Lindonn, Mr Gough. Augustus, Mr EDWIN.
Major Muffleddorff, Mr Dibdin Pitt.
Frederick, Baron de Trenck, Mr OSBALDISTON. Boltzheim, Mr Almar.
François Bassontrompdorf, (with a Comic Song) Mr C. Hill.

To conclude with the Melo-Drama of
FOREST OF BONDY! OR, THE DOG OF MONTARGIS.
Dame Gertrude, Madame Simon. Ursula, Miss Vincent.
The Seneschal, Mr Almar. General Gontran, Mr Gough. Landry, Mr Asbury.
Chevalier Macaire, Mr D. Pitt. Aubri di Mont Didier, Mr C. Hill.
Bertrand, Mr VALE. Eloi, (the Dumb Boy) Mlle. ROSIER.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

First time, a New Melo-Dramatic Opera, in Two Acts, called
THE DEVIL'S BROTHER.
[Adapted to the English Stage, by A. LEE.]
Lady Pamela Goslington, Mrs ORGER. Zulina, Mrs WAYLETT.
The Concerted Music, by Misses Byfeld, Bruce, S. Phillips, Russell, and Mrs Bedford
Fra Diavolo, Mr WALLACK.
Sir Gregory Goslington, Mr HARLEY. Lorenzo, Mr SINCLAIR.
Lucro, Mr Bedford.
Banditti—Beppo, Mr Latham. Giacemo, Mr Bedford. 1st Carabineer, Mr Bland.
Postilion, Mr Honner. Francisco, Mr Eaton.

After which the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called
DAVY JONES.
[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.
Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory. and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV, Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.
The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.
Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands

To conclude with the Grand Opera of
MASANIELLO.
[By M. AUBER.]
Elvira, Miss Byfield. Fenella, Mrs W. Barrymore.
Masaniello, Mr SINCLAIR. Don Alphonso, Mr T. Cooke.

To-morrow—The Merchant of Venice; Turning the Tables; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The New Grand Comic Opera, (in Three Acts) called
CINDERELLA.
The Music, by Rossini.
Cinderella, Miss INVERARITY. Clorinda, Miss CAWSE.
Thisbe, Miss HUGHES. Fairy Queen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Felix, Mr HUNT. Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. PENSON.
Alidoro, Mr G. STANSBURY. Dandini, Mr MORLEY.
Pedro, Mr KEELEY.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called
HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.
[By Mr FARLEY.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by
Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.
THE ORDER OF SCENERY.
Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.
Tomorrow—Fazio; Married Lovers; and the Pantomime.

COBURG THEATRE.—Bonaparte's Destiny—The Silver Knight—Jack Sheppard—And All Halow Seen.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck; or the Buccaneer's Bridal—Harlequin and Mother Goose—And Satisfied.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 130.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Lives of the Italian Poets. By the Rev. Henry Stebbing, M.A. M. R. S. L. With Twenty Medallion Portraits. 3 vols. 8vo. Bull.

[Concluded from our last.]

It may be added, that one of the charms of Ariosto, as of Spenser, consists in his contriving to give us an absolute flesh and blood familiar interest in his wildest fictions. There is a beautiful instance, in the second or third canto (we forget which), where the Hipogryff is introduced. Bradamante riding towards a village, sees the people coming out of their doors and looking up at some object in the air. He looks up, and perceives a human being in some shining armour, riding upon a strange winged creature, which sails with him along, till he dips, and disappears among the hills. It here seems as if such things might really happen in villages, and it was natural for hills to receive into their bosom such extraordinary inmates.

'The person of Ariosto is described by his biographers with little variation in their language. His figure was large and well-formed, except about the shoulders, which were disproportioned to the rest of his person, and rendered still more so in his appearance by his habit of stooping as he walked. His step was slow and measured, and the expression of his countenance indicative of habitual contemplation. His thin cheeks and dark complexion added still further to the gravity of his looks, while his bald and lofty forehead, the rest of his head being covered with dark curly locks, his black penetrating eyes, and thick bushy beard, gave him the appearance of a man different from the common race of mortals. Nor was he wanting in the milder graces of person. His lips were beautifully formed, and when he smiled, expressed the soft and amiable sentiments, which so often grace his description; his voice was clear and harmonious, and all his gestures indicative of a lofty but affectionate disposition.

'Of his general character and sentiments, we may form, says one of his biographers, an accurate opinion from his poems, and especially from his satires, in which the opinions he utters seem to have been dictated by the purest morality, "and I will courageously assert," says the same writer, a man of learning and gravity, "that if he had lived in our days he would have afforded an example worthy of imitation, and made a conspicuous figure among the men whom we are accustomed to regard as most moral in their habits." And certainly if the love and exercise of justice, forbearance under injuries, temperance in living, humanity and kindness towards inferiors, and a pure and unshaken attachment to independence can make a man worthy of this praise, Ariosto richly deserved it, but we must not forget to lament his errors while we admire his virtues, nor buckle on charity as an armour, that we may fight with security against truth. The amours of Ariosto are a difficult theme for both his eulogists and his biographers.'—Vol I, p. 72.

This difficulty might have been lessened, perhaps, if the manners of the times had been properly considered, and due attention paid to that anomaly between the lawful and the permitted relations of the sexes, which appears to have afforded so remarkable a subject for reflection at all periods.

'Of the lighter amusements of Ariosto, "gardening was that in which he took most pleasure; and it was curious to know that he was as fond of altering the plan of both his house and grounds, as he was of re-modelling the stanzas of the Orlando. His son Virginio, proposed writing an account of his illustrious father's life; but, unfortunately, he never pursued his design beyond the commencement; and a few memorandums are all that have come down to us. From these, however, we learn the singular fastidiousness of Ariosto in his horticultural amusements, and some other traits of his character, which render him not less an object of our veneration, by shewing the simplicity as well as power of his mind. "In gardening," says Virginio, "he pursued the same plan as with his verses, never leaving anything he had planted more than three months in the same place: and if he set a fruit tree, or sowed seed of any kind, he would go so often to examine it, and see if it were growing, that he generally ended with spoiling or breaking off the bud. As his knowledge also of flowers was very limited, he many times mistook the plants which might be springing up by chance in the neighbourhood, for those he had set, and he would watch them with the greatest care till he was put beyond doubt as to his mistake. I remember, that having once sowed some caper-seed, he went every day to see what progress they were making, and was delighted, in a short time, with observing that they flourished extraordinarily well: he at last, however, discovered that he had mistaken a young elder-bush for his capers, and that his plants were not yet above-ground."

'We learn, from the same interesting document, that he had at first no intention of building a house for constant residence in this garden, but that, having raised a mere cottage for temporary shelter, he grew so fond of the spot, that he wished never to leave it. The structure, after all, was not fully suited to his taste, and he felt as great an inclination to improve it by continual alterations as his garden. His constant lamentation was, that he could not change the arrangement of his house as he could that of his verses; and a person having asked him one day, how it happened that he who could describe castles and palaces so magnificently, had built such a cottage, he replied, that he made his verses without the aid of money. That he was not a little proud, however, of his small but pleasant retreat, is proved by his putting an inscription over the door, signifying its convenience and adaption to his circumstances:—

"Parva sed apta mihi, sed nulli obnoxia, sed non Sordida, parta meo sed tamen ære domus."

'In his favourite garden he passed many hours of the day, deriving new inspiration from its green and refreshing solitudes.'—Vol. II, p. 57.

The other lives which are most interesting in Mr Stebbing's work are those of Aretin, Guarini, Tasso, Metastasio, and Alfieri; but several of the others are of a nature to make us wish them longer; and a reader of the English poets, who is not so well acquainted with their Italian brethren, will be forcibly struck, throughout, with the stir and vivacity of the careers of these southern geniuses, compared with those of the former. This is owing to the division of Italy into petty states. Individuals of striking character naturally come more prominently into action where the emulation is smaller, and the pride and necessities of the state more interested in their services. It is remarkable, that almost all the Italian literati of any eminence have been employed in government or diplomacy; and it is highly to the credit of the greatest of them, that they showed their sense of the dignity and demands of their pursuits by a high love of truth and independence.

Mr Stebbing has given the best account of Aretin that has yet appeared in English; but we must again express our surprise at seeing the life of this trader in abuse thrust among the poets, in whose company he has no more right to appear, indeed much less so, than numbers who are left out.

Too large a space is given to Bernardo Tasso, though an interesting person, and worthy to be Torquato's father.

It was right to speak of Trissino, on account of his connexion with the early Italian drama: (it was from his epic poem, the 'Italia Liberata,' that Spenser took the name of his goddess of luxury, Ærasia.)

We think Mr Stebbing, though his good-nature, upon the whole, is on a par with the other graces of his knowledge, is a little too severe on the character of Berni, whose love of the poem of Boiardo is alone an evidence in his favour.

Guarini's family wars present a most painful picture.

Metastasio's courtly timidity and prudence make a figure more curious than pleasing. We do not wonder at Alfieri's disgust at seeing him kneel with a fawning face to Maria Theresa. We should dislike him worse than we do, for his desertion of poor Marianna the singer, who first helped him to grow rich, and who continued to live with his father and mother till she died, long after he left them all, to become laureate to the German emperor, if we did not look upon his timidity and prudence as amounting to the morbid. Mr Stebbing thinks he led a happy life; but he was a sickly little shattered man, with a face full of jaundice, and subject to all the sedentary horrors, as may be seen from his 'Life and Correspondence,' by Dr Burney; (Mr Stebbing, by the way, never mentions any of the Italian biographies written by his countrymen before him.) As to the illegal nature of that connexion, the author, in speaking of such matters in Italy, never makes sufficient allowance for national manners; and there is no reason to believe that Metastasio led a more legitimate life at Vienna. He died worth a hundred and thirty thousand florins, solely produced by devoting a taste for simplicity and nature to the flattery of courts. The weakness of his temperament stinted the growth of the man.

Parini had a body unworthy of his mind; but in him the consciousness of infirmity took the nobler turn of sympathy with others, instead of a timid selfishness. This excellent, honest man, in his conscientious satire, his love of freedom, and perhaps in the amount of his genius, though not in style, bore considerable resemblance to Cowper, but with a fortunate difference on the score of religion. Parini's ideas of the Divinity were consolatory. An anecdote is related of him, delightfully illustrative of the spirit with which he approved of the French Revolution, at that time making its way in Italy:—

'Some violent demagogue wanted to force him one evening, at the theatre (at Milan), to join the mob in crying death to the aristocrats, instead of which he shouted, with so terrible a voice, "Live the Republic! Death to no one!" that tranquillity was immediately restored. The square opposite the theatre where this occurred, is still pointed out to the stranger as the scene of one of the best triumphs of virtue and a good character over popular feeling, that can be found recorded in history.'—Vol. III, p. 288.

Here is the device of Lafayette anticipated thirty years by the prophetic spirit of poetry.

Mr Stebbing's account of Alfieri is upon the whole an excellent abridgment of the auto-biography of that singular person; though some points are touched with a clerical caution, which in these times will be thought a little superfluous. At page 342, is a comparison of him with an eagle crossing the sea, which would be as happy as it is striking, if eagles were migratory.

We conclude our extracts with an account of the Platonical spirit with which Tasso in the nobler moments of his lofty excitement thought himself visited, and with which he fancied he held lofty dialogues. There is not a grander instance of illusion in the history of spectrology. Tasso's deep persuasion of the fact, his calling upon his friend to look at the window when the vision came, and the high strain in which he took his part in the fancied dialogue, present a most striking picture, and would almost incline us to imagine, that when a mind so great, is loosened from the common circle of impressions, it is put in a state, however unhealthy or unfit for this world, of real communication with the world about us:—

'Tasso, notwithstanding all his misfortunes, had as many friends as most men, and the Marchese della Villa was one of the warmest. Contented with rambling about the hills and woods, amidst which the monastery was embosomed, the poet resisted as long as he could all the invitations of his acquaintances to visit their houses. But Manso, a man of elegant mind, and whose perception of Tasso's feelings was as quick as his desire to soothe them, won his confidence, and rendered his society agreeable to him by that unobtrusive but warm friendship, which is especially acceptable to a mind so desirous of sympathy, yet so irritable and suspicious as that of Tasso. Having thus gained the confidence of the poet, Manso at length succeeded in persuading him to accompany him to his estate at Bisaccio. Besides the beautiful situation of the villa, Tasso there enjoyed the society of numerous persons distinguished for their talents, while to the graver pleasures of literary conversation were added the lighter ones of gay and splendid assemblies in which the Marquis sought to dissipate the melancholy of his venerated guest by light and festive amusements, and the songs of improvisatori, whose facility of versifying he is reported to have said he envied, nature having denied him the command of such fluency. But his mind was still under the dominion of the strange illusions which had begun to affect it before he left the hospital of St Anna. A change, however, it is worthy of remark, had in some degree taken place in the character of his supernatural visitants. While in the hospital, and agitated night and day by the apprehension of secret enemies, he was haunted by a demon whose chief attribute was a malicious cunning. Now that he was restored to freedom, and had been able to seek repose, and pass his meditating among the grand and soothing scenes of nature, his intercourse was with a loftier spirit—with one that seems to meet his thoughts midway to heaven, and to be sent to make his meditatious more solemn and sublime. Manso in a letter to the Prince of Conca, written while Tasso was staying at Bisaccio, gives a full account of the circumstances respecting the poet's supernatural visitant, having received the particulars from his own mouth as they used to sit conversing together before the fire. The writer observes, that he had used all the arguments in his power to convince him that his visions were the effect of a disordered imagination, showing the improbability of their reality, from the consideration that he had no reason to fear that demons would be permitted to torment him, and that it would be presumptuous to suppose that an angel would be visibly sent for his consolation. To these arguments Tasso replied, that the uniform character of the vision with which he had now for some time past been haunted, disproved the idea of its not being real, imagination working more capriciously and wildly. He remarked also, that the mind had not the power of reasoning distinctly while deluded by fancy, whereas he had held many and long and continued conversations with the spirit which attended him, and had heard from it things which neither he nor any other man had ever before heard, or read, or known. "To which remark," observes Manso, "I still continued to object, till one day in the heat of our argument, he said, 'Since I cannot convince you by reason, I will undeceive you by experience, and will make you see with your own eyes the spirit which you will not believe in from my words.' I accepted the proposal, and the following day, while we were sitting alone by the fire, he turned his face towards the window, on which he fixed his eyes, and when I spoke to him, he made no answer. At last, he said, 'See! the friendly spirit has courteously come to speak to me; attend, and you will perceive the truth of my words.' I instantly turned my eyes in the direction to which he pointed, but though I looked intently, could perceive nothing except the rays of the sun, which entered the room through the window. While, however, I was looking, I head Torquato commence a most sublime conversation with something or other, for neither saw nor heard anything but himself. His words, as the propounded and replied, were like those used by a person in earnest debate. From what he said, I could easily comprehend what the replies were which he received, though they were unheard by the ear. And these reasonings were so grand and marvellous, from the sublimity of the things they contained, and from a certain something not common in discourse, that I was almost stupified with wonder, and dare neither interrupt Tasso, nor make any inquiry respecting the spirit with which he made me acquainted, but which I saw not. I therefore continued to listen, full of wonder and delight, and unheeded by Tasso, till, as I understood from his words, the spirit was leaving him, when he turned to me, and said, "All donbts will now be for ever banished from your mind." To which I answered, they are but increased; for I have heard many things worthy of marvel, but have seen nothing that you promised to show me to dissipate my incredulity He replied, "You have perhaps seen and heard much more than . . . . . ." but there he stopped; and as I did not dare to trouble him with any further questions, the conversation ended.'—Vol. III, p. 125.

With the above interesting story some of our readers will have been already acquainted, through the medium of Black's Life of Tasso, an elaborate and excellent work, in two volumes, quarto, which deserves to be better known. Of other works illustrative of Italian literature, and not mentioned by Mr Stebbing, besides Dr Burney's Life of Metastasio, mention may be made of the treatises of Ugo Foscolo, and Lord Woodhouselee, upon Petrarch, Greswell's Lives of Fracastoro and others, Walker's Life of Tassoni, the same writer's Memoirs of Italian Tragedy, and two admirable essays, we believe by Ugo Foscolo, one in the Edinburgh Review of September 1818, upon Dante, the other in the Quarterly upon the Narrative and Romantic Poems of the Italians. We cannot mention the date of the latter, because we possess it only in a selection made from those two Reviews, and there are no dates in the pages of the Quarterly, as there are to those of its nobler contemporary.

By the by, we have a word to say, in a day or two, to our friend of Albemarle street.

CHEMICAL DANGERS.—Mons. Rouelle was an eminent French chemist, but not the most cautious of operators. One day, while performing some experiments, he observed to his auditors, "Gentlemen, you see this cauldron upon this brazier: well, if I were to cease stirring a single moment, an explosion would ensue, which would blow us all into the air."—The company had hardly time to reflect on this comfortable piece of intelligence, before he did forget to stir, and his prediction was accomplished! The explosion took place with a horrible crash: all the windows of the laboratory were smashed to pieces, and two hundred auditors whirled away into the garden. Fortunately, no serious injury was received by any one, the greatest violence of the explosion having been in the direction of the chimney. The demonstrator himself was quit with the loss of his wig only.

MONSIEUR GEOFFRIN.—A wag who was in the habit of sending books to M. Geoffrin, sent him several times in succession the first volume of Father Lobbat's Travels. The good man, with all the composure possible, always read the book over again without perceiving the mistake. "How do you like these Travels, Sir?"—"They are very interesting; but the author seems to be somewhat given to repetition." He read Bayle's Dictionary with great attention, following the line with his finger along the double columns! "What an excellent work," he said, "if it were only a little less abstruse."—However deficient the poor man was, he was permitted to sit down to dinner, at the end of the table, upon condition that he never attempted to join in the conversation. A foreigner, who was very assiduous in his visits to Madame Geoffrin, one day, not seeing him as usual at table, enquired after him. "What have you done, Madame, with the poor man whom I always used to see here, and who never spoke a word?"—"Oh! that was my husband—he is dead."

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.
DRURY LANE.—The Devil's Brother.—The Pantomime.—And Masaniello.
COVENT GARDEN.—Cinderella.—And the Pantomime.

Being prevented from writing our usual theatrical article last night, we present the reader with some observations on Mr KEAN's first appearance in the character of Richard, from a collection of masterly criticisms by the late Mr HAZLITT.

It is as well perhaps to state, that we were mistaken in supposing that Mr KEAN's impaired health prevented his appearing again till Monday, as we find, on looking at the bills, that he plays Shylock to-night, and Sir Edward Mortimer (in the Iron Chest) on Saturday.

Mr KEAN's manner of acting this part has one peculiar advantage: it is entirely his own, without any traces of imitation of any other actor. He stands upon his own ground, and he stands firm upon it. Almost every scene had the stamp and freshness of nature. The excellences and defects of his performance were in general the same as those he discovered in Shylock; though, as the character of Richard is the most difficult, so we think he displayed most power in it. It is possible to form a higher conception of this character (we do not mean from seeing others, but from reading SHAKSPEARE) than that given by this very admirable tragedian; but we cannot imagine any character represented with greater distinctness and precision, more perfectly articulated in every part. Perhaps, indeed, there is too much of this; for we sometimes thought he failed, even from an exuberance of talent, and dissipated the impression of the character by the variety of his resources. To be perfect, it should have a little more solidity, depth, sustained and impassioned feeling, with somewhat less brilliancy, with fewer glancing lights, pointed transitions, and pantomimic evolutions.

The Richard of SHAKSPEARE is towering and lofty, as well as aspiring; equally impetuous and commanding; haughty, violent, and subtle; bold and treacherous; confident in his strength, as well as in his cunning; raised high by his birth, and higher by his genius and his crimes: a royal usurper, a princely hypocrite, a tyrant, and a murderer of the House of Plantagenet.

> "But I was born so high
> "Our airy buildeth in the cedar's top,
> "And dallies with the wind and scorns the sun."

The idea conveyed in these lines (which are omitted in the miserable medley acted for Richard III), is never lost sight of by SHAKSPEARE, and should not be out of the actor's mind for a moment. The restless and sanguinary Richard is not a man striving to be great, but to be greater than he is; conscious of his strength of will, his powers of intellect, his daring courage, his elevated station, and making use of these advantages, as giving him both the means and the pretext to commit unheard-of crimes, and to shield himself from remorse and infamy.

If Mr KEAN does not completely succeed in concentrating all the lines of the character, as drawn by SHAKSPEARE, he gives an animation, vigour, and relief to the part, which we have never seen surpassed. He is more refined than COOKE; more bold, varied, and original than KEMBLE, in the same character. In some parts, however, we thought him deficient in dignity; and particularly in the scenes of state business, there was not a sufficient air of artificial authority. The fine assumption of condescending superiority after he is made king—"Stand all apart—Cousin of Buckingham," &c. was not given with the effect which it might have received. There was also, at times, a sort of tip-toe elevation, an enthusiastic rapture in his expectations of obtaining the crown, instead of a gloating expression of sullen delight, as if he already clutched the bauble, and held it within his grasp. This was the precise expression which Mr KEAN gave with so much effect to the part where he says, that he already feels

> "The golden rigol bind his brows."

In one who dares so much there is little indeed to blame. The only two things which appeared to us decidedly objectionable, were the sudden letting down of his voice when he says of Hastings, "Chop off his head!" and the action of putting his hands behind him, in listening to Buckingham's account of his reception by the citizens. His courtship scene with Lady Anne was an admirable exhibition of smooth and smiling villainy. The progress of wily adulation, of encroaching humility, was finely marked throughout by the action, voice, and eye. He seemed, like the first tempter, to approach his prey, certain of the event, and as if success had smoothed the way before him. We remember Mr COOKE's manner of representing this scene was more violent, hurried, and full of anxious uncertainty. This, though more natural in general, was, we think, less in character. Richard should woo not as a lover, but as an actor—to shew his mental superiority, and power to make others the play-things of his will. Mr KEAN's attitude in leaning against the side of the stage before he comes forward in this scene, was one of the most graceful and striking we remember to have seen. It would have done for TITIAN to paint. The opening scene in which Richard descants on his own deformity, was conceived with perfect truth and character, and delivered in a fine and varied tone of natural recitation. Mr KEAN did equal justice to the beautiful description of the camps the night before the battle, though, in consequence of his hoarseness, he was obliged to repeat the whole passage in an under-key.* His manner of bidding his friends good night, and his pausing with the point of his sword, drawn slowly backward and forward on the ground, before he retires to his tent, received shouts of applause. He gave to all the busy scenes of the play the greatest animation and effect. He filled every part of the stage. The concluding scene, in which he is killed by Richmond, was the most brilliant. He fought like one drunk with wounds: and the attitude in which he stands with his hands stretched out, after his sword is taken from him, had a preternatural and terrific grandeur, as if his will could not be disarmed, and the very phantoms of his despair had a withering power.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

The Theatre in Tottenham-street, which closed so abruptly a short time since, is to re-open on Thursday next, under the above name. Last night visitors, to whom cards had been presented, were admitted to view the entire structure, and the consequence was, a house as well filled as the Proprietors can desire for the whole season. The pit has been enlarged, and the stage appears to be considerably deepened; and a mild and sufficient light is afforded by a handsome chandelier. These improvements, together with the usual good effect resulting from new painting and decorations are likely, if the essential of good acting be made equally the concern of the managers, to give to this little theatre all the attraction of which it is susceptible.

* The defects in the upper tones of Mr KEAN's voice were hardly perceptible in his performance of Shylock, and were at first attributed to hoarseness.

CITY CONCERTS.

These performances, of which we hope to give a regular report as they occur, commenced on Monday evening. The orchestra is, we believe, in a great measure composed of amateurs, who are supported by some of the leading members of the musical profession. There were, for instance, Dragonetti, and his clever pupil, Mr Flower; Lindley, and Harper, and Mackintosh; and, unless our ears greatly deceived us, (for we could not see them) Tully and Willman and young Cooke. These, with one exception, are all Philharmonic men. The Directors therefore have only to exercise a little judgment in appointing the vocal compositions for the evening, to render their concerts a complete intellectual treat: the instrumental selection was all that could be wished: in proof of which, we need only state that it consisted of a new overture by Kuhlau, dedicated to William Shakspeare; (a gratifying piece of homage to the kindred spirit of the composer's countryman—Mozart) a duet from Corelli; the Jupiter symphony; a fantasia by De Beriot; and Weber's overture to Euryanthe.

> "We hope here be proofs!"

As we desire to quit this notice with pleasant recollections, we commence by stating that we were somewhat disappointed with the vocal performances. A Madame Mesi made her debut in this country upon the present occasion. Her first exhibition was 'Una voce poco fa.' In stating that her style does not please us (which is ornamented to a fantastical redundancy) we merely express an opinion opposed to a numerous class who prefer roulade to sentiment; leaps, flutterings, slurrings of semi-tones—and, in short, the very antipodes to the true cantabile style, to the just expression and feeling of the author: but the quality of Madame Mesi's voice does not please us; it wants weight and richness of tone: its compass is considerable, but her highest notes, when they were forced out, produced little more than a whistle through a straw. We say nothing of her getting all abroad from the key in one of her vagaries; that might be the effect of accident, or of confusion, or over-anxiety to exhibit at once to her audience all she could do in vocal gymnastics—and an unfortunate exhibition it was; but we cannot excuse her overpowering the four other singers in a quintett from Rossini's 'Turco in Italia'—here was total ignorance of the true spirit of concerted singing.

Miss H. Cawse sang with appropriate feeling and expression a plaintive ballad, composed by Mr Severn, in which she was encored. If Mr Parry would cultivate a little more energy he would become a valuable singer. His voice is a good baritone, and his style is agreeable and musician-like. As Mr Bregrez at no time of his life ever gratified us, either as to style or voice, so is he unlikely to do this when both have become inveterate. The air he introduced from Paer's 'Agnese' was, from the beginning to the end, little better than a determined and steady wail.

And now we turn to the real pleasures of the evening. The duet from Corelli, originally composed for the violin and violoncello, was performed by Messrs Lindley and Dragonetti on the violoncello and double bass in such exquisite perfection, that the last movement, a most extraordinary effort in point of execution, was accomplished by Dragonetti with such marvellous power and precision as to produce a universal and vehement encore. The Jupiter symphony, alone worth going to a concert to hear, was upon the whole very well performed. Surely that finale, with its four subjects so miraculously interwoven, is the ne plus ultra of counterpoint.

Mr Dando, the leader, played from memory a fantasia by De Beriot. This of itself was no child's work, but he played it beautifully: with one little exception only worth notice, correctly in tune; with neat and brilliant execution, and with a sweet tone. His cantabile movements we think his best performance. We must also take this occasion to compliment him upon

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called
THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.
Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elisabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Grizzle Glowworm, Mrs Beaumont. Susan, Miss Barnett. Amoret, Miss M. Glover.
Attendant Spirits, Misses Stallard, Gallot, Angellina, Rose, and S. Barnett.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
Linaro, Alpanor, and Spirit Hunters, Messrs Morris, Winning, Fry, Taylor, &c.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Sebastian, Gregory, and Adam, Messrs Sanders, Willson, and Paulo, Jun.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Andrew and Karl, (his Children) Masters Calkin and Barnett.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.
Frasnel, Mr Charles. 1st Chamois Hunter, Mr S. Smith. 2nd do. Mr V. Webster
Spirits of the Alps, Chamois Hunters, Villagers, &c.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called
THE MARRIED BACHELOR.
Lady Courtall, Miss DALY. Grace Gaylove, Mrs FITZWILLIAM.
Sir Charles Courtall, Mr YATES. Sharp, Mr J. REEVE.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called
GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.
[By Mr BUCKSTONE].
The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.
Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, called
THE CHASTE SALUTE
[From M. Scribe's "Baiser au Porteur."]
The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,
Philippe, Mr Newcombe, Thibaut, Mr Collier.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called
THE GRENADIER.
[By H. Bayly, Esq.]
Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughby, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

After which, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called
MIS-APPREHENSION.
[By Mr C. Dance.]
Miss Clementina Bramble, Miss Stuart. Fanny, Miss Pincott. Ellen, Miss Kabrey.
Miss Bramble's Maid, Miss Berresford. Frank Hartley, Mr Raymond.
Thomas, Mr Cooper. Money, Mr W. VINING. Mr Williams, Mr Coates.
Police Officer, Mr Worrell. Shopmen, Messrs Young and Hutchinson.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled
OLYMPIC REVELS.
[Adapted from a burlesque of Colman's, by Mr Planche and Mr C. Dance.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,
Esculapius, Mr Coates, Somnus, Mr James, Mars, Mr Brougham,
Cupid, Miss Josephine, Mercury, Mr Newcombe.
Hercules, Mr Worrell, Plutus, Mr Paget, Vulcan, Mr Brown,

SURREY THEATRE.

The Nautico-Domestic Drama, entitled
THE ROVER'S BRIDE.
[By Mr G. Almar.]
Act I.—Winter.
Alice Manners, Miss SCOTT. Bella Manners, Miss SOMERVILLE.
Dame Bellerton, Miss Nicol. Nancy Blackberry, Miss Ellis.
Lawrence Glennon, Mr D. Pitt.
Miles Bellerton, Mr C. Hill. Marmaduke Magog, Mr VALE.
Diedrick Van Voorn, Mr Honnor. Bobby Blackberry, Mr Rogers.
[Between the First and Second Acts, a lapse of Five Years is supposed to take place.]
Act II.—Summer.
Alice Manners, Miss SCOTT. Bella, Miss SOMERVILLE.
Mary Blackberry, Miss Rumens. Kitty Spiteful, Mrs Rogers.
Captain Glennon, Mr D. Pitt.
Barbelot, Mr Jones. Diedrick Van Voorn, Mr Honnor.
Culverdine and Avery, Mr Ransford and Mr Lee.
Marmaduke Magog, Mr VALE. Bobby Blackberry, Mr Rogers.
Bluff Laconic, Mr C. Hill. Master Marmaduke Magog, Jun. Master Carbery.

After which, a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,
THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.
[By Mr W. Barrymore].
The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.
Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

To conclude with an entirely New Historical Drama, called
THE BEGGAR OF CRIPPLEGATE.
Marian, Miss SOMERVILLE, in which she will introduce 'Tell me my heart,'
Millicent, Miss VINCENT. Mother Milldoll, Mrs Rogers.
Alison, Miss Boden. Annot, Miss Nicol. Kate, Miss Rumens.
Henry VIII, Mr D. Pitt. Godfrey Osgood, Mr Gough. Vincent Lorimer, Mr Honor.
Sir Piers Maltravers, Mr Almar. The Beggar of Cripplegate, Mr C. Hill.
Barnaby, Mr Williams. Cocke Lorell, Mr VALE.
Father Ignatius, Mr Ransford. Fabian, Mr Asbury. Valentine, Mr Rogers.
Wynkin Cross-eye, Mr Webb. Ambrose, Mr Young.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Comedy of
THE MERCHANT OF VENICE.
[By W. Shakspeare.]
Portia, Miss PHILLIPS. Jessica, Mrs WAYLETT. Nerissa, Miss FAUCIT.
Duke of Venice, Mr Younge. Salanio, Mr Cathie. Salarino, Mr Cooke.
Bassanio, Mr COOPER. Antonio, Mr H. Wallack. Gratiano, Mr Balls.
Shylock, Mr KEAN.
Lorenzo, Mr SINCLAIR. Launcelot, Mr HARLEY.
Gobbo, Mr Webster. Tubal, Mr Hughes. Balthazar, Mr Horner.
In the course of the Evening, Onslow's Overture to 'L'Alcade de la Vega,' and Boieldieu's Overture to 'La Dame Blanche.'

After which,
DEAF AS A POST.
[By Mr Poole.]
Sophy Walton, Mrs Newcombe. Amy Templeton, Miss E. Absolon.
Sally Mags, Mrs Orger. Mrs Plumpley, Mrs C. Jones.
Captain Templeton, Mr COOPER. Tristram Sappy, Mr LISTON.
Old Walton, Mr W. Bennett. Crupper, Mr Hughes. Gallop, Mr Salter.

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called
DAVY JONES.
[By Mr W. Barrymore.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.
Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.
DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr Stanfield.
The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.
Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands

To-morrow, (By Special Desire), The Brigand; The Illustrious Stranger; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Tragedy of
FAZIO.
[By Mr Milman.]
Marchesa Adabella, Mrs CHATTERLEY, Clara, Miss PHILLIPS,
Bianca, Miss F. KEMBLE. Giraldi Fazio, Mr WARDE,
Duke of Florence, Mr EGERTON, Bartolo, Mr BLANCHARD,
Philario, Mr Henry, Falsetto, Mr Parry, Gonsalvo, Mr Baker,
Theodore, Mr Mears, Keeper, Mr Fuller, Pietro, Mr Turnour,
Gentleman, Mr Irwin, Antonio, Mr Heath, Aurio, Mr Crumpton

Previous to the Tragedy, a Grand MS. Overture by Friedrich Kuhlau.
After the Tragedy, a favorite Overture, by J. N. Hummel.

After which, a New Petite Comedy, to be called
MARRIED LOVERS.
The Songs, composed by Mr Barnett.
Duchess D'Orleans, Miss PORDE. Marchioness de Meneville, Miss TAYLOR.
Lady Ascot, Mrs CHATTERLEY. Annette, Miss PHILLIPS.
Duc D'Orleans, Mr ABBOTT. Marquis de Meneville, Mr BARTLEY.
Sir John Ascot, Mr WARDE. Colonel O'Dillon, Mr POWER.
Pierre, Mr Irwin. Francis, Mr Mears.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called
HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.
[By Mr Farley.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr Peake.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.
THE ORDER OF SCENERY.
Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, The Romance of a Day; and the Pantomime.

Coburg Theatre.—Bonaparte's Destiny—The Silver Knight—Jack Sheppard—And Ali Halow Seen.

Sadler's Wells Theatre.—The Wreck; or the Buccaneer's Bridal—Harlequin and Mother Goose—And Satisfied.

Published by J. Onwhyn, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. Chappel.—Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange; A. Hays, 165 Regent street; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at Ebers's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. Reynell, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Nº 131.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Dr Lardner's Cabinet Library. Memoirs of the Life and Reign of George the Fourth. Vol. I. 8vo. pp. 307. Longman.

A Royal Equivoque.—A well-known individual, some time deceased, who was admitted to the Prince's familiarity upon his first entrance into life, and for several years after, described, or rather dramatized, with much humour, a scene which he professed to have had from the Prince himself. So much depends upon tone and manner, that the spirit of these pleasantries evaporates on paper. The story was in substance as follows:—'A new suit, destined for a ball that night at Cumberland-house, was brought home to the Prince, but ordered back by him for the purpose of undergoing immediate alterations. He gave directions that the tailor's return with it should be instantly made known to him. The Prince happened to pass the early part of the evening with the King and Queen at Buckingham-house. Whilst he was seated in the Royal group, a German page entered, and pronounced in a tone meant for his particular ear, but loud enough to be heard by every one present, "Please your Royal Highness, she is come." There was a moment's awful pause. "Who is come?" said his Royal Highness, in a tone between surprise, embarrassment, and anger. "Sir, she is come," repeated the page, with his bad English and German phlegm. "Eh! what, what! who is come?" exclaimed the King. "She, your Majesty," reiterated the unmoved German. "She is come!" cried the Queen, bursting with wrath, and supposing the visitor was one of the house of Luttrell, who already sought an undue influence over the Prince. All was for a moment inexplicable confusion. The Queen summoned another page, and asked him, with fury in her looks, "Who is she that dares enquire for the Prince of Wales?" "Please your Majesty," said the second oracle, "it is Shea, his Royal Highness's tailor!"'

First Meeting and Marriage of George IV and Queen Caroline.—Having arrived at three o'clock, she was introduced to her apartments in the palace. Lord Malmesbury stood prepared to present the Prince; the approach of the bridegroom was announced; he was in the next room; and Lord Malmesbury was on the alert, when the Princess, anticipating his services, and dispensing with forms, ran to meet her future husband. The gentleman, whether from the vivacity of the lady, or from other causes, was agitated; but soon rallied gallantly, and complimented her on the facility with which she expressed herself in English.—When the betrothed pair met next day, the Prince's behaviour was forced and cold. This has been ascribed to the suggestions of Lady Jersey in the mean time; but it may be accounted for as the result of his own reflections during the preceding night; for night, they say, brings counsel. Retreat, however, was cut off, and he led his ill-starred bride to the altar on the evening of the 8th of April 1795. The ceremonial was in substance the same as on other Royal marriages—but the conduct of the bridegroom was different: he manifested the bewildered absence of mind of one who scarce knew what was passing around him, and rose impatiently from his knees before the ceremony was half performed. The Archbishop stopped short; the King restored order, and the ceremony proceeded to its close. It has been stated in a variety of publications, that "the good old King,"—as George III has been styled for the imposing regularities of his private life, by canting sycophants and the common herd,—"shook his son's hand with a force which brought tears into his eyes." If tears came into the eyes of the Prince, it is more likely that they flowed from the same cause which produced his agitation at the altar;—from the consciousness of committing a moral, though not a legal offence; of violating an obligation which he had contracted, under the sanction of the law of honour and the forms of religion; and of being under the eyes of some who had also been present at his previous marriage.

William IV.—Prince William was refused leave to quit his ship at Cork, for the purpose of visiting Dublin; and at Plymouth, the absence of invitation from the King, or leave from the Admiralty, apprised him that his presence was not desired at Buckingham House. The Prince of Wales and Duke of York joined and passed some days with him at Plymouth, which for the time was enlivened by festivities and illuminations. Prince William could not obtain leave to quit his ship; but it was said that, like a true sailor, he consoled himself by falling in love. The supposed object of his affection was a young lady named Wynne, the daughter of a merchant. He was passing his time very agreeably at Plymouth, when a sudden order sent him to sea again, in command of the Andromeda, with Admiral Gower. The motive of this order was to separate him from the lady, and a trick was at the same time played upon him by the Admiralty. His ship, when he sailed, not being provided for a foreign station, he supposed himself going only on a short cruise. When the day came for the separation of the Andromeda from the squadron, he was informed that his destination was the West Indies; and that, to prevent the delay of his returning for stores, the Andromeda should be provided from some of the other ships, which "had luckily brought out the proper supply." He obeyed the signal for parting, walked the quarter-deck in no very tranquil mood, "muttered a prayer or two," with more energy than devotion, for the First Lord of the Admiralty, and ordered the master to direct his course for Antigua.

Private Memoirs of George III.—It was well known to be a habit of George III to write in various folios, for an hour after he rose in the morning. This practice was not obviously consistent with his want of facility and taste in any sort of composition; but his manuscripts were only registers of names, with notes annexed of the services, the offences, and the characters, as he adjudged them, of the respective persons. "In addition," says a publication of 1779, "to the numerous private registers always kept by the King, and written with his own hand, he has lately kept another, of all those Americans who have either left the country voluntarily rather than submit to the rebels, and also of such as have been driven out by force; with an account of their loses and services." It is somewhat cruel to lay bare "the bosomed secrets" of any man, even after the grave has closed upon his passions and weaknesses; but if these registers of George III still exist, and should ever come to light, they will be as curious private memoirs as have ever appeared: they doubtless promoted the remembrance and compensation of loses and services; but they also produced his petty long-cherishad resentments, less hurtful to their objects than injurious to his own character and torturing to his breast.

Extracts from the Harmonicon for February 1831.

Amateur Composers.—It seems pretty certain that an Italian Opera, composed by an Irish gentleman named Monck Mason, will be performed at the King's theatre during the ensuing season. Here is another Dilettante to be added to the swelling list; and I, as well as all lovers of music, and good patriots, must heartily wish him success. It is said that the English Opera House will open this year with an Opera written by a member of a celebrated dining club, well known in private society for his admirable comic songs, and set to music by a young northern dilettante, whose musical talents, particularly for composition, are of the highest order, and bid fair to rank him hereafter with the Meyerbeers, the Onslows, and the Mendlesohns of the age.—Art: Journal of a Dilettante.

Liberalism and Music.—It seems that the day is come again when musical airs are ranked in political importance with proclamations, manifestoes, &c. Everybody knows the story of the Swiss hired troops, the Ranz des Vaches, and the prohibition of this tune in France. A Polish air, the Dombrowski Mazourka, which the regiment of General Szembek played on entering Warsaw, has been forbidden by the Grand Duke Constantine, on pain of a penalty of 400 florins; the consequence of which is, that it has become the outward and audible sign of patriotism in every part of Poland; just as the Marseilles March and La Parisienne are, in France and the Netherlands, the signals of liberalism. During Mr Pitt's administration, an organ-grinder was committed to Newgate for playing 'Ah! ça ira' in the streets. This was a silly step but the fellow excited little commiseration, for the tune was the war-whoop of a few savages who were at that time deluging France with blood. It affords another proof, however, of the power ascribed by statesmen to instrumental music, interpreted by words, in exciting ideas and producing associations.

Rossini, Tell, the Tri-colour, and the Prussian Court.—A curious coup d'état, of the minor kind, has caused the failure of Rossini's Guillame Tell at Berlin. This opera was put into rehearsal, but government did not much relish the name of a man who made so noble and successful a struggle for freedom; so the music was applied to a translation of our drama, Hofer, the latter having been a loyal Austrian—that is to say, opposed to the tyranny of Bonaparte, which was infinitely more odious than that of the Court of Vienna. But when it became a question what colours were to be given to the French soldiers, the Prussian ministers were puzzled. In 1809, the year of Hofer's resistance, they bore the tri-colour. At length it was determined to throw a covering over the caps of the grenadiers, by which dignified contrivance the tri-coloured cockade was concealed! So ingenious a device exceedingly pleased the courtiers, but disgusted the people, and the failure of the piece was the result.

Digitized by Google

CHESS-PLAYING.

TO THE TATLER.

Mr Tatler,—Before paying my devoirs, as in duty bound, to Philoscaccharia, I beg to return my best thanks for the courtesy with which you have treated me in making the explanation subjoined to his last letter. In truth, I felt considerable doubt whether the discussion that might ensue, would be of sufficient interest with a great majority of your readers or even with nine-tenths of those who are Chess-players, to justify us in occupying a part of your valuable miscellany, which could be filled to better purpose; and for this reason I expressed the wish to be favoured, if possible, with Philoscaccharia's address.

As the matter now stands, I must in self-defence go on; but first two or three words with regard to "blunders." I frankly acknowledge that my account of the circumstances which I supposed might have induced Philidor to introduce Cunningham's name—for, in the absence of better proof, it was but a supposition—may not be "curious;" but there it must rest, till better reasons appear, for or against; and I shall feel obliged to Philoscaccharia to give us those he apparently is in possession of. He next rates me for having forgotten the two previous editions of Stamma (1737 and 1741). I did not forget them, having open before me at the moment, Twiss's book, where they are all enumerated. But it happens, oddly enough, that the edition of 1737, which I had seen, contains no openings; being nothing more than Stamma's famous hundred situations, which did not bear at all on the question; I trust to your correspondent's word, Mr Tatler, that there is a full edition of that date also. With respect to the edition of 1741, as I intend to prove by and bye, that Stamma's name and book are of no earthly consequence to our argument, I shall only add here, that I took the edition of 1745, as being printed in England, and the nearest in date to Philidor's first appearance here.

So much, Mr Tatler, for my blunders: now for Philoscaccharia's further mistakes, which, considering that he has buckled on his armour, and wields his books, I confess I am at a loss to account for. Had I known that he wrote his first letter from memory, and at a distance from his books, most certainly I would not have applied the epithet "gross," to his first mistake. But what shall we say now, when we find him falling into more—two devils worse than the first? In his second letter, Philoscaccharia deliberately says, that "so far as his (Philidor's) book is concerned, no evidence is to be found of even his knowledge of Stamma's work." I must be permitted to call this assertion strange, because if he turns to Philidor's work, he will find a note on the third move of the Queen's Gambit, where it is said, "A certain author, otherwise a very good player, teaches," &c. Not even Philoscaccharia will venture to deny that Stamma is here referred to; and I ask him, is not this evidence? Again, in his first letter, Philoscaccharia says, "he (Philidor) does not appear to have ever heard of the game (the Giuoco Piano), or of its commentators"—naming many of them—then he adds, "or even Greco." And in his second letter, he adds to his list many more Italian writers, amongst whom is Carrera; and he repeats the name of Greco. Here I must ask what offence has our old acquaintance, Dr Salvio, committed, to deserve a total exclusion from this list of his illustrious countrymen. I need not tell Philoscaccharia, that Salvio was an eminent writer, and a much better Chess-player than many of those whom he has announced with so much pomp; and that he has treated of the Giuoco Piano game. But I suppose I must tell him, that Philidor has given and commented on some of Salvio's games. I will not be ungenerous or malicious enough to surmise, that Philoscaccharia omitted Salvio's name intentionally; but the fact is as I have stated; and there I leave it, to return to Carrera and Greco; two more of those of whom he asserts Philidor was totally ignorant. I am afraid that, in his haste to decry Philidor, he has not properly examined his work. Philidor's preface mentions both Carrera and Greco; the latter, however, under his cognomen of the Calebrois; I need not further acquaint him that some of those Italians have called Philidor "an admirable player." Philidor therefore is held in high estimation in other countries than England, though Philoscaccharia seems to wish to inculcate the reverse.

So much, Mr Tatler, for blunders or mistakes. Let us now return to the question originally mooted—What right had Philidor, in 1749, to give Cunningham's name to the Gambit in question? To which Philoscaccharia answers, None! But why? Because Stamma had, a very few years before, called that game by another name, viz. "The Three Pawns Gambit;" and he further draws the conclusion,—certainly a very strange one,—that because Stamma had so called it, Philidor knew nothing of Stamma's book. In his second letter, he somewhat changes his ground, and gives us a sort of syllogism as lame as ever saw the light. Either (says he) Philidor did know it, or he did not. If he did know it, he was guilty of an impertinence in using Cunningham's name upon the ipse dixit of some one; not knowing it, he was guilty of presumption in professing to give a Complete Analysis of Chess without the study of all works that preceded him, and were accessible. I have proved that he did know it; therefore I leave the second leg of his proposition to rest in peace; but knowing it, as he did, he is guilty of impertinence in using Cunningham's name upon the ipse dixit of some one, or of any one. Indeed! Then Philoscaccharia may as well argue that the ipse dixit of Cunningham himself is not to be received. But after all, what has the unfortunate Philidor done? He has given a name that pleased him, to an opening of a game of Chess, just as Stamma did. Nor by so doing, has he deprived any one of a right. I cannot concede to Philoscaccharia that Bertin has nothing to do with the question; because, if there had been no such person as Stamma, every argument used by my opponent would be equally applicable to Bertin, and in some points better, inasmuch as he wrote earlier. Philoscaccharia has tortured this word into a meaning very different from that I gave to it. The context shews that I employed it only comparatively, as between Bertin and Stamma, and not with reference generally to the writers who preceded the former.

Philoscaccharia further asks, will "your correspondent favour us with some anecdotes from them?" And he adds, "I suspect he can." There are abundance of anecdotes of all kinds to be found in them, but unless your correspondent favours me with a specification of the nature and bearing of those he wishes for, I must decline the task; otherwise you, Mr Tatler, would curse the day which gave birth to the inventor of the game, whether he was of Greece, Tartary, India, or China.

In return, may I venture to impose a much more easy task upon Philoscaccharia—one which he may perform in three minutes—namely, the grounds upon which he rests his assertion, so dogmatically laid down,—That many players in the present London Chess Club would (I presume he means could) have given a rook to those contemporaries of Philidor who played against him in the different matches, without seeing the boards? But methinks, Mr Tatler, I hear you exclaim, Ohe! jam satis.

And I remain, your obliged humble servant,

A Lover of Chess.

LATE THEATRICAL HOURS.

TO THE TATLER.

Mr Tatler,—It is a common saying that "we cannot have too much of a good thing," and, surely it is a very false one,—unless it is intended as a quibble, by which we are meant to understand that the "too much" immediately converts a good thing into a bad one. If this be the case, it is undoubtedly applicable to our great theatres. This you have clearly shewn; and, as their merits and demerits are just now so much the subject of discussion, I wish you would say a few words of the "too much," in the entertainments, as well as the buildings. I will not presume to say, but these, too, may be good things in themselves. Entertainment is a good thing, and if the pieces represented afford it, so far, at least, they are good; but we may have too much even of entertainment. We may "make a toil of pleasure" The majority of those who visit the theatres, have some kind of employment during the day. They seek there an agreeable recreation after their hours of toil; and, a few hours so spent, would doubtless be a refreshment, giving them fresh vigour for the duties of the ensuing day; but they sit there for a period of six hours; the noise, the music, the lights, and the general excitement, are too powerful for so long continuance, and many return to their homes with weary frames and aching heads. They lie till a late hour in the morning, they rise unfit for business of any kind, and after a restless night, have to go through a day of languor. The late hour to which the performance is continued, prevents many persons from visiting, or taking their families to the theatre, but upon rare occasions. Every such indulgence deranges the usual habits of the family. It is more especially inconvenient to those who reside at a distance. Occasionally, people may be willing to pay this tax for their pleasure; but it will naturally deter them from a frequent enjoyment of it; and when people stay away from the theatre a long time, they become indifferent about it; the more they go, the more they wish to go; and finding the inconvenience so great, many persons find it easier to abstain altogether, than in part. It is true, that people are not compelled to sit out the whole performance; but, going seldom, the pieces being consequently new to them, and paying a high price for admission, they are tempted to make the most of it; not to mention that those whose habits of business would render the late hours the most inconvenient, are the very persons who would be most bent upon having their "pennyworth for their penny." Were two pieces performed instead of three, and the prices reduced in proportion, I am sure that many persons would go, at least two or three times, where they now go once. Here again the large houses are in fault. The managers being at great expense, charge high prices; they are anxious to attract full audiences, and they think they shall do this in proportion to the quantity they give in return. Having a large company in pay, the performance of a third piece is a small addition to their expense, and they believe it a great addition to their profits. There are, probably, some half-price visitors, who are tempted by this addition; but I am persuaded they are few in comparison with those who are thereby kept away from the whole performance.

A few hints on this subject from you, who are understood to wield the sceptre of dramatic criticism, might have good effect. Meantime, I hope you will not consider as an impertinence, the humble suggestion of one who has been many years

Your Reader and Admirer, A. A.

P.S. I do not speak from my own opinion only, but from the many complaints I have heard, not only of the lateness of the hour, but of the length of the entertainment itself, which overtires the attention. I have repeatedly heard people say that they preferred going at half price, on this account.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.
DRURY LANE.—The Merchant of Venice.—Deaf as a Post.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Pasio.—Married Lovers.—And the Pantomime.

DRURY LANE.

If the re-production of the plays of SHAKSPEARE were the only good effect attending the return of Mr KEAN to the stage, the lovers of nature and genius, as distinguished from the admirers of stage-tact and cold declamation, would have ample reason to be pleased; but when to this is added the opportunity of witnessing acting of the first order, and, although with some physical decay, increased mental vigour and the maturity of a fine judgment, they surely must have a disposition to consider things too curiously, who can feel regret that the actor who can be least spared should be once more in the sphere which most becomes him. The part of Shylock, the part in which Mr KEAN first appeared in London, was last night performed by him with all his original excellence. Unlike Richard the Third, the interest of this play is less concentrated in the principal character; and although the continual exertion, and consequent necessity for a great deal of bodily vigour, renders the former part one of the most arduous in the whole range of the drama,—demanding, as it equally does, corresponding mental powers,—the part of Shylock, to be played as SHAKSPEARE conceived it, makes hardly less demand on the capacity of the performer. Revenge is the master passion in the breast of Shylock, but in that breast there is also a strong sense of the injustice to which his nation is subjected, and a shrewd perception of the inequalities which the professors of a creed, whose real character is good-will to all men, are notwithstanding willing to perpetuate. Mr KEAN penetrates this feeling of the character; and there is no striking passage which he does not make strikingly expressive of it. Throughout, he vindicates with the calm dignity of reason the rights of his common nature, and shows but too truly that he may revenge even by Christian example.

The scene with Tubal, in which vexation at the elopement of his daughter, alternates with joy at the news he hears of Antonio's disasters, presented fine scope for varied talent; and the audience by their acclamations seemed to feel that the most was made of it. When he hears that one of Antonio's argosies has been cast away, the innate delight with which he "thanks God," and the subsequent rubbing of his hands, as he enquires, "Is it true? is it true?"—as if the intelligence were too good to be credited—was one of those fine touches of nature, of which the modern stage affords but too few examples. In the trial scene, Shylock justifies his demand to the letter of his bond, as one that has a right "to do what he wills with his own;" and in the consciousness that his cause is strong in law, he betrays no anxiety about mere opinion. Yet, not unwilling to have the advantage of the most influential person in court, he propitiates the favor of the judge, by insinuating that his pertinacity is to be attributed to his regard for truth.

> "An oath, an oath; I have an oath in heaven.
> Shall I lay perjury on my soul?
> No, not for Venice."

The whole scene abounds in opportunities for the display of such talents as only Mr KEAN possesses; and almost every part of it might be mentioned as displaying some kind of excellence; but it is sufficient to remark, that whether in the manifestation of the revengeful feeling, the confidence of ultimate triumph, which could submit to the tediousness of form while it brooded over the moment of its arrival, or the contending expressions of contempt for his judges and distraction at his own disappointment,—Mr KEAN challenged for himself the praise of being the legitimate representative of the Shylock of SHAKSPEARE.

The other performers exerted themselves creditably; but there was nothing to merit particular comment. The speech on Mercy was well delivered by Miss PHILLIPS, and called forth deserved applause.

F. F.

We yesterday gave Mr HAZLITT'S account of Mr KEAN'S first performance of Richard. To many of our readers it may not be uninteresting to read a critique, by the same masterly hand, on Mr KEAN'S first appearance in London, in the character of Shylock.

'Jan. 27, 1814.

'Mr KEAN (of whom report had spoken highly) last night made his appearance at Drury-lane theatre in the character of Shylock. For voice, eye, action, and expression, no actor has come out for many years at all equal to him. The applause, from the first scene to the last, was general, loud, and uninterrupted. Indeed, the very first scene in which he comes on with Bassanio and Antonio, showed the master in his art, and at once decided the opinion of the audience. Perhaps it was the most perfect of any. Notwithstanding the complete success of Mr KEAN in the part of Shylock, we question whether he will not become a greater favourite in other parts. There was a lightness and vigour in his tread, a buoyancy and elasticity of spirit, a fire and animation, which would accorp better with almost any other character than with the morose, sullen inward, inveterate, inflexible malignity of Shylock. The character of Shylock is that of a man brooding over one idea, that of its wrongs, and bent on one unalterable purpose, that of revenge. In conveying a profound impression of this feeling, or in embodying the general conception of rigid and uncontroulable self-will, equally proof against every sentiment of humanity or prejudice of opinion, we have seen actors more successful than Mr KEAN; but in giving effect to the conflict of passions arising out of the contrasts of situation, in varied vehemence of declamation, in keenness of sarcasm, in the rapidity of his transitions from one tone and feeling to another, in propriety and novelty of action, presenting a succession of striking pictures, and giving perpetually fresh shocks of delight and surprise, it would be difficult to single out a competitor. The fault of his acting was (if we may hazard the objection), an over-display of the resources of the art, which gave too much relief to the hard, impenetrable, dark ground-work of the character of Shylock. It would be endless to point out individual beauties, where almost every passage was received with equal and deserved applause. We thought, in one or two instances, the pauses in the voice were too long, and too great a reliance placed on the expression of the countenance, which is a language intelligible only to a part of the house.'

'Feb. 2.

'Mr KEAN appeared again in Shylock, and by his admirable and expressive manner of giving the part, fully sustained the reputation he had acquired by his former representation of it, though he laboured under the disadvantage of a considerable hoarseness. He assumed a greater appearance of age and feebleness than on the first night, but the general merit of his playing was the same. His style of acting is, if we may use the expression, more significant, more pregnant with meaning, more varied and alive in every part, than any we have almost ever witnessed. The character never stands still; there is no vacant pause in the action; the eye is never silent. For depth and force of conception, we have seen actors whom we should prefer to Mr KEAN in Shylock: for brilliant and masterly execution, none. It is not saying too much of him, though it is saying a great deal, that he has all that Mr KEMBLE wants of perfection. He reminds us of the descriptions of the "far-darting eye" of GARRICK. We are anxious to see him in Norval and Richard, and anticipate more complete satisfaction from his performance of the latter part, than from the one in which he has already stamped his reputation with the public.'

PETITION OF THE SOCIETY OF THE FRIENDS OF THE PEOPLE, formerly presented to the House of Commons by Mr Grey (now Lord Grey, and Prime Minister):—

1. "That the House is not an adequate Representation of the people of England.
2. "That it is prejudicial to the interests of the people, and contrary to the spirit of the Constitution.
3. "That the elective franchise is partially and unequally distributed.
4. "That the right of voting is regulated by no uniform or rational principle.
5. "That from the combined operation of the defects your petitioners have pointed out, arise scenes of disgraceful confusion, litigation, and expense—of tumults, disorders, outrages, and perjury.
6. "That eighty four individuals do of their own immediate authority send one hundred and fifty-seven Members; and this your petitioners are ready to prove, and to name the Members, and those who send them.
7. "That one hundred and fifty Members are returned, not by the collective voice of those who appear to send them, but by the recommendation of seventy powerful individuals.
8. "That the total number of patrons altogether are one hundred and fifty-four, who return a decided majority of the Honourable House."

BETTERTON.—Archbishop Sancroft once asked this celebrated actor, "Pray, Mr B. can you inform me what is the reason you actors on the stage affect your audience by speaking of things imaginary, as if they were real; while we in the church speak of things real, which our congregations receive only as if they were imaginary?" "Why really, my Lord," said B. "I don't know, except it is that we actors speak of things imaginary as if they were real, while you in the pulpit speak of things real as if they were imaginary."

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

BY SPECIAL DESIRE.

The Drama, (in Two Acts) called,

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]

Maria Grazie, Mrs W. BARRYMORE, Ottavia, Miss FAUCIT.
Prince Bianchi, Mr Younge, Nicolo, Mr Webster, Fabio, Mr Hughes,
Albert and Theodore, Mr H. WALLACK and Mr J. VINING,
Alessandro Massaroni, Mr WALLACK,
Rubaldo, Mr Bedford,
Spoletto, Mr Bland, Uberto, Mr Robinson, Carlotti. Mr Yarnold.

In the course of the Evening, Rossini's Overture to "Semiramide," and Mozart's Overture to "Die Entfurung aus dem Serail."

After which, a Musical Piece, (in Two Acts) called

THE ILLUSTRIOUS STRANGER.

[By Mr KENNEY.]

Irza, Miss FAUCIT, Fatima, Mrs WAYLETT,
Aboulifar, Mr Thompson, Aman, Mr Bland. Alibajou, Mr Webster,
Bowbell, Mr LISTON, Gimbo, Mr HARLEY,

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV, Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands

To-morrow, The Devil's Brother; Turning the Tables; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Operatic Drama, to be called

THE ROMANCE OF A DAY.

The Music, by H. R. Bishop.

Sophia Walstein, Miss FORDE. Liese, Miss E. TREE. Therèse, Miss P. Horton.
Widow Klaffen, Mrs GIBBS. Karoline Klaffen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Adolph, Count of Engleberg, Mr WILSON. General Kienwitz, Mr BARTLEY.
Colonel Francœur, Mr ABBOT. Nikel Unterhand, Mr G. PENSON.
Moritz, Mr BLANCHARD. Fritz Klaffen, Mr KEELEY.
Paul Richter, Miss TAYLOR. Hubert, Mr Irwin.

After the Operatic Drama, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.

After which, a New Petite Comedy, to be called

MARRIED LOVERS.

The Songs, composed by Mr Barnett.

Duchess D'Orleans, Miss FORDE. Marchioness de Meneville, Miss TAYLOR.
Lady Ascot, Mrs CHATTERLEY. Annette, Miss PHILLIPS.
Duc D'Orleans, Mr ABBOTT. Marquis de Meneville, Mr BARTLEY.
Sir John Ascot, Mr WARDE. Colonel O'Dillon, Mr POWER.
Pierre, Mr Irwin. Francis, Mr Mears.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, Cinderella; and the Pantomime.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,

TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

The Theatre will open this Evening, with an Occasional Address, written by J. LUNN, Esq. To be Spoken by Mrs GLOVER.
After which will be presented a New Operatic Piece, entitled

GALATEA.

From GAY'S Serenata. With HANDEL'S Music, arranged by Mr C. POTTER.
Principal Characters by Miss VERNON, Mrs GARRICK, and Mrs HUMBY.
Mr BENNETT. Mr J. RUSSELL. Mr SPENCER. Mr G. SMITH.
Mr MUNROE. Mr G. LEJEUNE. And Mr E. SEGUIN.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.

The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Maria.

After which, a New Musical Comedietta, in One Act, entitled

THREE TO ONE.

The Music, by Mr G. Cooke.
The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss WELLS. Miss AYRES.
And Mr FORRESTER.

Previous to which, a New MS. Overture, by a Student of the Royal Academy of Music. And previous to the Entertainment, Rossini's Overture to 'Tancredi.'

To conclude with a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called

EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.

The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss Stohwasser. Miss Wells. Miss Garrick.
Miss Sinclair. Mr Smith. Mr Tilbury. Mr Munroe. Mr Roberts.
And Mr GREEN.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Grizzle Glowworm, Mrs Beaumont. Susan, Miss Barnett. Amoret, Miss M. Glover.
Attendant Spirits, Misses Stallard, Gallot, Angellina, Rose, and S. Barnett.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
Linaro, Alpanor, and Spirit Hunters, Messrs Morris, Winning, Fry, Taylor, &c.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Sebastian, Gregory, and Adam, Messrs Sanders, Willson, and Paulo, Jun.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Andrew and Karl, (his Children) Masters Calkin and Barnett.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.
Fransel, Mr Charles. 1st Chamois Hunter, Mr S. Smith. 2nd do. Mr V. Webster
Spirits of the Alps, Chamois Hunters, Villagers, &c.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called

THE MARRIED BACHELOR.

Lady Courtall, Miss DALY. Grace Gaylove, Mrs FITZWILLIAM.
Sir Charles Courtall, Mr YATES. Sharp, Mr J. REEVE.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, called

THE CHASTE SALUTE.

[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]

The Music, by C. E. Horn.

The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,
Philippe, Mr Newcombe, Thibaut, Mr Collier.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called

THE GRENADIER.

[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]

Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

After which, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called

MIS-APPREHENSION.

[By Mr C. DANCE.]

Miss Clementina Bramble, Miss Stuart. Fanny, Miss Pincott. Ellen, Miss Kabrey.
Miss Bramble's Maid, Miss Berresford. Frank Hartley, Mr Raymond.
Thomas, Mr Cooper. Money, Mr W. VINING. Mr Williams, Mr Coates.
Police Officer, Mr Worrell. Shopmen, Messrs Young and Hutchinson.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young.
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,

SURREY THEATRE.

The Historical Drama, entitled

WILLIAM TELL.

Austrians.—Anneli, Miss VINCENT. Agnes, Miss SCOTT.
Gesler, Mr D. Pitt. Sarnam, Mr Almar. Struth, Mr Hobbs.
Braun, Mr Rogers. Rudolph, Mr Lee. Lutold, Mr Richards.
Swiss.—Emma, Madame SIMON. William Tell, Mr OSBALDISTON.
Albert, Miss Ellis. Waldman, Mr Webb. Michael, Mr C. Hill. Erni, Mr Tully.
Melctal, Mr Gough. Verner, Mr Young. Furst, Mr Nelson.
Jagheli, Mr Honner. Pierre, Mr Ransford. Theodore, Mr Asbury.
In Act II.—Savoyards' Glee, by Mesdames Rumens, Nicol, Rogers, Boden, &c.

After which, a Drama, entitled

THE DIAMOND ARROW.

[By W. T. MONCRIEF.]

Lucille, Miss SOMERVILLE. Dame Lodoline Fontaine, Mrs VALE.
Mons. Fontaine, Mr VALE. Mons. Anselm, Mr Young. Courier, Mr Lee.
Hilaire, Mr Edwin.

To conclude with the Melo-Drama of

FOREST OF BONDY! OR, THE DOG OF MONTARGIS.

Dame Gertrude, Madame Simon. Ursula, Miss Vincent.
The Seneschal, Mr Almar. General Gontran, Mr Gough. Landry, Mr Asbury.
Chevalier Macaire, Mr D. Pitt. Aubri di Mont Didier, Mr C. Hill.
Bertrand, Mr VALE. Eloi, (the Dumb Boy) Mlle. ROSIER.

COBURG THEATRE.—Bonaparte's Destiny—The Silver Knight—Jack Sheppard—And All Halow Seen.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck; or the Buccaneer's Bridal—Harlequin and Mother Goose—And Satisfied.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

No. 132.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

It is with great unwillingness that the Editor is obliged to postpone any remarks upon the new books from which the following extracts are made, but he has been prevented these two days, by indisposition, from attending to his duties. He has every reason to believe that he shall be able to resume them in a day or two. Meanwhile some kind friends have assisted him with the theatres.

Due notices will be made to correspondents the moment he takes his pen again in hand.

History of France. By Eyre Evans Crowe. Vol. II. (Being Vol. XV of Dr Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia). Longman.

Death of Richelieu.—Richelieu in the meantime had reached his palace in the capital. Roman despot was never more courted nor more feared; but death was coming fast to close his triumphant career. A mortal malady wasted him; yet the cardinal abated nothing of his pride, nor of his vindictiveness. He exiled some of the king's personal and cherished officers; he insulted Anne of Austria, the queen: remained seated during a visit that she paid him, and threatened to separate her from her children. Even his guards no longer lowered their arms in the presence of the monarch. His demeanour to Louis XIII, was that of one potentate to another. In December of 1642, the malady of the cardinal became inveterate, and every hope of life was denied him. He summoned the king to his dying bed, recapitulated the great and successful acts of his administration, and recommended Mazarin as the person to continue its spirit, and to be his successor. Louis promised obsequiousness. Richelieu then received the last consolations of religion, and went through these pious and touching ceremonies with an apparently firm and undisturbed conscience. The man of blood knew no remorse. His acts had all been, he asserted, for his country's good; and the same unbending pride and unshaken confidence that had commanded the respect of men, seemed to accompany him into the presence of his Maker. He died like the hero of the Stoics, though clad in the trappings of a prince of the church. Most of those present were edified by his firmness; but one bishop, calling to mind the life, the arrogance, and the crimes of the minister, observed, that "the confidence of the dying Richelieu filled him with terror."

Character of Richelieu.—The crime of having trodden out the last spark of his country's liberties, and of having converted its monarchic government into pure despotism, is that for which Richelieu is most generally condemned. But the state of anarchy which he removed was license, not liberty. The task of reconciling private independence with public peace, civil rights with the existence of justice,—and this without precedent or tradition, without that rooted stock on which freedom, in order to grow and bear fruit, must be grafted,—was a conception which, however familiar to our age, was utterly unknown, and impracticable to that of Richelieu. With the horrors of civil war fresh in the memory of all, the general desire was for tranquillity and peace, not liberty; to which, moreover, had it been contemplated, the first necessary step was that of humbling the aristocracy. It was impossible that constitutional freedom could ever grow out of the chaos of privileges, and anarchy, and organised rebellion, that the government had to contend with. In building up her social fabric France had in fact gone wrong, destroyed the old foundations, and rebuilt on others without solidity or system. To introduce order or add solidity to so ill-constructed a fabric, was impossible; Richelieu found it necessary to raze all at once to the ground, except the central donjon of despotism, which he left standing. Had Richelieu, with all his genius and sagacity, undertaken for liberty what he achieved for royalty, his age would have rejected or misunderstood him, as it did Bacon and Galileo. He might, indeed, as a man of letters, have consigned such a political dream to the volume of an Utopia, but from action or administration he would have been soon discarded as a dreamer. Liberty must come of the claim of the mass; of the general enlightenment, firmness, and probity. It is no great physical secret, which a single brain, finding, may announce and so establish: it is a moral truth, which, like a gem, hides its ray and its preciousness in obscurity, nor becomes refulgent till all around it is beaming with light.

Cardinal Mazarin.—The pecuniary wealth, the valuables and pictures of Mazarin, were immense. He was fond of hoarding,—a passion that seized him when he first found himself banished and destitute. His love of pictures was as strong as his love of power—stronger, since it survived. A fatal malady had seized on the cardinal, whilst engaged in the conferences of the treaty, and worn by mental fatigue. He brought it home with him to the Louvre. He consulted Guenaud, the great physician, who told him that he had two months to live. Some days after receiving this dread mandate, Brienne perceived the cardinal in a night-cap and dressing-gown tottering along his gallery, pointing to his pictures, and exclaiming, "Must I quit all these?" He saw Brienne, and seized him: "Look," exclaimed he, "look at that Correggio! this Venus of Titian! that incomparable Deluge of Caracci! Ah! my friend, I must quit all these. Farewell, dear pictures, that I loved so dearly, and that cost me so much!" His friend surprised him slumbering in his chair at another time, and murmuring, "Guenaud has said it! Guenaud has said it!" A few days before his death, he caused himself to be dressed, shaved, rouged, and painted, "so that he never looked so fresh and vermilion," in his life. In this state he was carried in his chair to the promenade, where the envious courtiers cruelly rallied, and paid him ironical compliments on his appearance. Cards were the amusement of his death-bed, his hand being held by others; and they were only interrupted by the visit of the papal nuncio, who came to give the cardinal that plenary indulgence to which the prelates of the sacred college are officially entitled. Mazarin expired on the 9th of March 1661.

Court Servility.—Etiquette required that the body of Louis XV should be embalmed, but, already in a state of putrefaction, no surgeon could be found to undertake the office; nor could a courtier be induced to oversee the last duties paid to the monarch. His remains were huddled into their last abode by the workmen of the château: spirits of wine were poured on them; and in this state they were abandoned, till conveyed to St Denis. The dauphin was with Marie Antoinette, awaiting tidings of his royal grandsire's fate. A noise, like thunder, was heard suddenly in their antechamber. "It was that of the courtiers," says Madame Campan, "who had deserted the apartments of the deceased monarch, to do homage to the new power of Louis XVI."

CHRONOLOGY OF THE PATENT THEATRES.

The question of the Patent Theatres having been lately discussed, and not being yet settled, we thought that our dramatic readers might not be unwilling to see the following memorandums, with which a correspondent has favoured us, presenting us with their several successive rises, falls, and other fortunes, from the period of their commencement in Drury Lane.

1659.—Rhodes, a bookseller at Charing Cross, formerly wardrobe keeper to the King's Company of Comedians, at the Black Friars, on General Monk's march to London in 1659, obtained a license from the ruling powers to set up a company of players at the Cockpit in Drury Lane.—Life of Betterton.

N.B. The Cockpit was an old playhouse.

1662.—The King granted a patent, &c. to Sir Wm. Davenant, dated 15th January, under the name of the Duke of York's Servants. On the 8th April he opened his house in the Tennis Court, Portugal Street.—Biog. Dict. Malone.

N.B. Davenant died in 1668.

1662, 1663.—Patent to Thomas Killegrew, 25th April 1662. He built a house in Drury Lane; opened it on 8th April 1663.

N.B. The house was burnt in January 1672.

1671.—A new house was built in Dorset Gardens, (Salisbury Square); opened under the management of Lady Davenant, widow of Sir Wm.—It did not pay.

1659.—There were three houses:—

1. At the Red Bull, St John Street.
2. Under Wm. Bastus, in Salisbury Court.
3. Rhodes's, at the Cockpit.

1660.—Sir Wm. Davenant's company commenced playing at the Theatre, Salisbury Court, on the 15th November 1660, and played there till April 1662.

Killegrew's company played during the years 1660, 1661, 1662, and part of 1663, in Gibbon's Tennis Court in Vere Street, whilst Drury Lane house was building.

1682.—The King's and the Duke of York's servants united.

It seems that the Duke's company built Drury Lane; the King's company took the house in Dorset Gardens, and remained there till Drury was ready, when both companies united and performed there.

Digitized by Google

1689.—Charles Davenant, eldest son of Sir William, assigned his patent (Duke's company) to Alexander Davenant.

1690.—Alexander sold the patent to Christopher Rich, a lawyer, on the 24th March. Rich afterwards took Sir Thomas Skipwith as a partner.—Steele's Theatre.

Killegrew's patent dormant: two houses—one on a licence, one on a patent.

Betterton and his company shut up the theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields, and joined Vanbrugh.

Colley Cibber, in his Apology, relates how the two companies fell off, and says, "The Patentees, by the King's advice, which perhaps amounted to a command, united their interests, and both companies into one, exclusive of all others, in the year 1684."

1695.—A new theatre was built in Lincoln's Inn fields; Mr Congreve, Mr Betterton, Mr Barry, and Mrs Bracegirdle obtained a license, and acted in it.—N.B. This was called Betterton's Company. This theatre was built by subscription.

1694.—On an attempt to reduce the salaries of the actors, they continued under Betterton. This was disregarded by the monopolists; their complaints were laid before the Duke of Dorset, Lord Chamberlain, who took the most effectual remedy for their relief. The learned in the law were of opinion that no patent for acting plays, &c. could tie up the hands of a succeeding Prince from granting the like authority; but while this affair was in progress, Queen Mary died (28th December 1694), which caused a suspension of public diversions.

The King granted a license to Betterton, &c.

1704.—Betterton conveyed his license to Vanbrugh, which remained at Drury Lane (Duke's company).

1705.—An immense theatre, built by Vanbrugh; opened by him and Congreve in the Haymarket.

1706.—April 9th; Swiny took the theatre at five pounds a day, not to exceed seven hundred pounds a year.

1707.—30th November; Company, the Queen's, at Dorset Gardens; unsuccessful.

1708.—10th January; the Queen's Company from Dorset Gardens joined Swiny.

1709.—Swiny sole director; some actors from Drury Lane, by permission of the Lord Chamberlain, joined him.

1707.—Drury Lane shut up by order of Lord Chamberlain.

1709.—Ditto, by command of the Queen, in consequence of the disputes of the proprietors, Rich and Sir Thomas Shipwith.

1708.—All the players who went to Swiney ordered to return to Drury Lane, and there remain, under the patentees, as his Majesty's only company of Comedians.

1710.—Collier obtained a license for Drury Lane, on the 22d of November; he broke into the house with a mob, expelled Rich, and took possession.

1711.—First Italian Opera, in the Haymarket.

Collier unsuccesful; Cibber, Collier, Wilks, Doggett, patentees and joint sharers in Drury Lane.

1713.—Swiney ran away in January.

1714.—Lincoln's Inn House rebuilt by Rich; opened by his son, John Rich. License expired by death of Queen.

George I. granted a license (patent) to Sir R. Steele; he joined Cibber and Co.

1720.—Little Theatre in the Haymarket built by Potter; opened on the 25th of January. Patent granted to Sir Richard Steele revoked.

1729.—Odell opened a theatre in Goodman's fields.

1732.—Giffard re-opened ditto.

1733.—Covent Garden foundation laid in 1729; opened by Rich.

1736.—Fleetwood purchased the remainder.

1737.—At this time—Patent Theatres—1. Covent Garden.
2. Drury Lane.
Without Patent or Licenses—1. Goodman's Fields.
2. Haymarket.
Operas at the Opera House.

1733.—Cibber and Booth sold their shares in the patent at Drury Lane to Mr Highmore; afterwards Giffard bought the other half.

The principal performers revolted and set up for themselves, without any license, at the Little Theatre, Haymarket.

1735.—Fleetwood purchased five-sixths of the patent at Drury Lane.

Fielding collected a company, and performed in the Little Theatre, without a license or any authority.

1737.—Licensing act passes—ostensibly in consequence of Fielding's Pasquin, more probably in consequence of a contrivance between Giffard and Walpole.

1747.—Drury Lane purchased by Garrick and Laws, of Fleetwood.

1766.—Foote obtained a license, and performed at the Little Theatre; licensed 15th May to 15th September.

1767.—Covent Garden opened under Colman, Harris, Powell, and Rutherford; they purchased the house, patent, &c. for 60,000*l.* of Rich.

1775.—Drury Lane opened by Sheridan, Lindley, and Bond; it was purchased from Garrick and Lacey.

1777.—Colman purchased the Little Theatre from Foote, and opened it.

1787.—Royalty Theatre opened April 20; and soon closed from want of license.

1788.—28 Geo. III. c. 30. To enable Justices of the Peace to license theatrical representations.

1790.—June 14, Colman, jun., manager, Haymarket.

1791.—New theatre, Covent Garden, opened.

1794.—New Drury opened.

1805.—June 8, Little Theatre opened, under Colman, Morris, and Winston.

All the rest is well known.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—The Brigand.—The Illustrious Stranger.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Romance of a Day.—Married Lovers.—And the Pantomime.

COVENT GARDEN.

MR BISHOP'S music is always welcome to us:—he is a graceful as well as a sound musician: if at times his melodies do not impress you with a sense of novelty, you are never offended by vulgar or crude phrases; and they are always redeemed by masterly and delicate scoring for the band; when his subject has not inspired him (and it has too frequently been his ill-fortune to be compelled to adapt melodies to uninviting lines) you can repose upon the ingenious and refined manner of filling up his accompaniments. This was in some measure the case last evening with a new operatic drama, called The Romance of a Day, which contains some pleasing melodies (though none we apprehend likely to become widely popular), and several concerted pieces both cleverly and gracefully constructed. The plot of the piece partakes of the character of the education of Tom, my Lord Foppington's brother,—it is "somewhat at large." The Count of Engleberg (Mr WILSON), having returned to his estates after drinking deeply of the gay cup of festivity in Paris and Vienna, is seized with a romantic resolution of taking a wife from among the plebeian damsels in his neighbourhood: for which purpose he commands his Seneschal, Nikel Unterhand (Mr PENSON), to make out a list of deserving young ladies of amiable qualifications, and to introduce them en masse at the castle, that his magnificence may throw his handkerchief to the favoured fair one. Previously to the election, the neat person of Karoline Klaffen (Miss H. CAWSE), the daughter of mine hostess of the Lamb, has caught his eye; and she, alas! too light of heart, with a coronet glittering before her, turns her heel upon a worthy farmer lad, Paul Richter (Miss TAYLOR). But lo! when the whole galaxy of bright competitors are assembled, a brighter and more particular star, Sophia, the Count's cousin (Miss FORDE) "swims into his ken," and poor Karoline "may go pipe in an ivy leafe." Sophia and her uncle, General Keinwitz (Mr BARTLEY), are disguised as a peasant girl and a village magistrate. When they assume their proper characters, and the uncle has succeeded in dissuading the Count from the folly of marrying a girl beneath him in rank, and a stranger to boot, and at the same recommends his own niece; the Count, who is aware of their plot to deceive him, startles both, by informing them that he has heard reports unfavourable to the character of his cousin, which must ever preclude his offering her his hand. At their vehement and anxious demand for an explanation, he states that he had been informed of the young lady's having endeavoured, under an assumed character, to entrap the affections of a nobleman. And thus good-humouredly turning the tables upon, and laughing at them, he offers his hand to the fair Sophia.

This is one third only of the plot; the remainder may be condensed into a very few words. Liese (Miss E. TREE) is the daughter of an old soldier (BLANCHARD), and is in love secretly with Colonel Francœur (Mr ABBOTT). Through a misunderstanding, the Colonel is induced to believe that she accepts the proposal of Fritz Klaffen (KEELEY), and though he is himself a secret admirer of Liese, he readily waives his claim, and even is induced to use his influence with the youth's mother to consent to their union. When the explanation however takes place, he is delighted to find that she had never even given his rival the slightest hint of an attachment; but that he had built all his hopes of preference on her part upon his having given her a portrait of herself, sketched four years before by the Colonel, and which she had ever since fondly cherished. The conclusion is obvious. This was the only portion of the acting worthy of consideration, and Miss TREE gave an interest to it by her simple and affectionate manner which moved the feelings of certain well-worn play-goers who shall be nameless. Her performance; some amusing nonsense of KEELEY's; one or two of the airs, and a quintet of peasants — "My father land! my father land!" which was twice encored,—are likely to prove attractive for a time. Mr WILSON was not in his best voice, but he sang his airs in good style, and with feeling. Miss TAYLOR felt the character of the music allotted to her, but her ear is defective. Miss FORDE also is frequently out of tune, and Miss H. CAWSE as rarely. The piece was received with approbation.

Digitized by Google

Mr POWER's one-act piece, The Married Lovers, which has been successful, has not been overlooked. It shall be noticed upon the next occasion. C.

QUEEN'S THEATRE, TOTTENHAM STREET.

The opening of this little theatre last night, under all the disadvantages of bad weather, attracted a full audience. An Address for the occasion was delivered by Mrs GLOVER, in which allusion was made to Her Majesty's patronage, and the patronage of the public solicited against oppression. It was well received; and the late proceedings in Chancery seemed to be in the minds of the hearers. The performances commenced by an opera, entitled Galatea, principally consisting of extracts from GAY's beautiful Serenata, which has so often delighted the frequenters of the oratorios, under the name of Acis and Galatea. Some interpolations of a comic kind were introduced, probably in deference to the supposed taste of the frequenters of this theatre, but we think with very questionable advantage. It was delightful, however, to hear so much of the inspiring strains of Handel, even though with diminished effect as compared with the performances of the great theatres. This qualification is hardly necessary with respect to one of the singers, Mr E. SEGUIN, whose fine base voice and judicious management of it would render him an acquisition anywhere. His acting also is distinguished by its spirit and energy. Nor must Mr J. RUSSELL be forgotten, whose transplantation here cannot fail to add considerably to the comic strength of the company. Towards the end of the piece, Ulysses and his followers are introduced on their way to Troy; but if those valiant Greeks had resembled their present representatives, we should certainly have lost an Iliad, and that famous city might have been still in existence. Galatea was given out for repetition amidst unanimous applause.

A one act comedietta (such is the new diminutive) followed, entitled Three to One, the humour of which arises from an old, a middle-aged, and a young lady, each attributing the attentions of a Colonel Faircourt to herself. The merit of the dialogue is slight, but the situations are contrived with considerable knowledge of stage effect, and the amusing misunderstandings which are the consequence, are provocative of much laughter. The acting of Mrs GLOVER, as the middle-aged lady (a widow) reminds one a little of her pleasant exuberance in the character of Mrs General Dartmouth, in KENNEY's pleasant comedy of Spring and Autumn. But here the phrases are naval, as in the other they are military. Mr FORRESTER, who played the Colonel, is not without talent, but his voice has an unpleasant sharpness, and his general style seems to have been formed on a bad model; so that his natural capabilities yield less gratification than they ought to do. This piece was also successful. A third, called Everybody's Husband, closed the evening's performances;—but of this we must defer a notice until another opportunity. F. F.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

A CONVINCING PROOF.—Miss D. had the misfortune to become what the language of our neighbours delicately expresses by the compound word fille-mère, and wished to bestow, or rather to force, the honours of paternity on the Prince. The subject of dispute having been brought into his presence, he glanced at the child's raven hair, and coolly observed, "To convince me that this girl is mine, you must prove that black is white."—Cabinet Library—Life and Reign of George IV.

A GREAT SLEEPER.—The Stadtholder, who had recently fled from Holland, was also the Prince's guest, and afforded amusement by the whimsical incongruity with which he chose his occasions for going to sleep. The Princess commanded a play for his entertainment: in spite of her vivacity and utmost efforts, he slept and snored in the box beside her, and was roused with some difficulty when the curtain fell. A ball having been given in compliment to him at the Castle tavern, he fell asleep whilst eating his supper, and snored so loud as to disturb the harmony of the orchestra and the decorum of the assembly. His Dutch Highness was also entertained, if the term in this instance be admissible, with a grand masquerade; and was perplexed by the difficulty of resolving in what dress or character he should attend it. The Prince of Wales said he might go as an old woman.—Dr Lardner's Cabinet Library—Life and Reign of George IV.

LORD THURLOW AND LAVATER.—Lavater, on being shown a picture of Lord Thurlow, examined it for a moment, and said, "Whether this man be on earth or in hell, I know not,—but wherever he is, he is a tyrant, and will rule if he can."—Dr Lardner's Cabinet Library—Life and Reign of George IV.

LA FAYETTE.—The loss of the French at the battle of Minden was severe; amongst their colonels slain was the Marquis de la Fayette, a noble of an ancient family. He left his marchioness, a lady of the house of Lusignan, pregnant. This posthumous child is the La Fayette of the Revolution, and of the present day.—Cabinet Library. History of France, Vol. II.

TURKISH MUSICAL GUSTO.—A modern traveller informs us, that the band of an English ambassador at Constantinople once performed a concert for the entertainment of the Sultan and his court. At the conclusion, it was asked which of the pieces he preferred. He replied, the first, which was accordingly recommenced, but stopped, as not being the right one. Others were tried with no better success, until at length the band, almost in despair of discovering the favourite air, began tuning their instruments, when his Highness instantly exclaimed, 'Inshallah, heaven be praised, that is it!' The Turkish Prince may be excused, when it is known, that at the commemoration of Handel in 1784, Dr Burney thought the mere tuning of that host of instruments more gratifying than the ordinary performances to which he had been accustomed.—Harmonicon for Feb. 1.

DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.—Horace Walpole dining with the Duchess on her birth-day (when she had just finished her eightieth year) soon after the cloth was removed, he very politely drank her health in a bumper, and added, "May you live my Lady Duchess, till you begin to grow ugly!" "Thank you, Mr Walpole," replied her Grace; "and may you long continue your taste for antiquities."

THE WITCHERY OF GENIUS.—Foote was an enthusiastic admirer of Shakspeare; and frequently in the course of dramatic conversation, would point out particular beauties which had escaped the research of the commentators. He one day asserted, "that it would not be difficult to find passages in Shakspeare, which are not strictly correct, either in sense or grammar, yet carry their meaning so warmly and obviously to everybody's mind, as no other words could convey it. This," added he, "was the witchery of the poet; who, by the inspiration of his muse, could snatch a grace beyond the reach of art."

EXCUSES FOR IMPROVIDENCE SET ASIDE.

(Montague approves the frankness of his page, Veramour, in reprehending his improvidence).

Montague. Why I love thee for't;
Mine own acknowledgment confirms thy words:
For once, I do remember coming from
The mercer's, where my purse had spent itself
On those unprofitable things thou speak'st of;
A man, half naked with his poverty,
Did meet me, and requested my relief:
I wanted whence to give it; yet his eyes
Spoke for him; those I could have satisfied
With some unfruitful sorrow (if my tears
Would not have added rather to his grief,
Than eas'd it), but the true compassion that
I should have given I had not: this began
To make me think how many such men's wants
The vain superfluous cost I wore upon
My outside would have cloth'd, and left myself
A habit as becoming. To increase
This new consideration, there came one
Clad in a garment plain and thrifty, yet
As decent as these fair dear follies, made
As if it were of purpose to despise
The vanity of show; his purse had still
The power to do a charitable deed,
And did it.
Dubois. Yet your inclination, Sir,
Deserv'd no less to be commended than
His action.
Mont. Prithee, do not flatter me!
He that intends well, yet deprives himself
Of means to put his good thoughts into deed,
Deceives his purpose of the due reward
That goodness merits.

Beaumont and Fletcher's 'Honest Man's Fortune.'

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A New Farce, in Two Acts, entitled
THE JENKINSES.
Mr Carraway, Mr FARREN.
In the course of the Evening, Winter's Overtures to "Mahomed;" and Weber's "Preciosa."
First time, a New Melo-Dramatic Opera, in Two Acts, called
THE DEVIL'S BROTHER.
[Adapted to the English Stage, by A. LEE.]
Lady Pamela Goslington, Mrs ORGER. Zulina, Mrs WAYLETT.
The Concerted Music, by Misses Byfeld, Bruce, S. Phillips, Russell, and Mrs Bedford
Fra Diavolo, Mr WALLACK.
Sir Gregory Goslington, Mr HARLEY. Lorenzo, Mr SINCLAIR.
Lucro, Mr Bedford.
Banditti—Beppo, Mr Latham. Giacomo, Mr Bedford. 1st Carabineer, Mr Bland.
Postilion, Mr Honner. Francisco, Mr Eaton.
To which will be added, a New Farce, called
TURNING THE TABLES.
Jack Humphries, Mr. LISTON.
To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called
DAVY JONES.
[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

To-morrow, The Iron Chest; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The New Grand Comic Opera, (in Three Acts) called
CINDERELLA.
The Music, by Rossini.
Cinderella, Miss INVERARITY. Clorinda, Miss CAWSE.
Thisbe, Miss HUGHES. Fairy Queen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Felix, Mr HUNT. Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. PENSON.
Alidoro, Mr G. STANSBURY. Dandini, Mr MORLEY.
Pedro, Mr KEELEY.
After which, a New Petite Comedy, to be called
MARRIED LOVERS.
The Songs, composed by Mr Barnett.
Duchess D'Orleans, Miss FORDE. Marchioness de Meneville, Miss TAYLOR.
Lady Ascot, Mrs CHATTERLEY. Annette, Miss PHILLIPS.
Duc D'Orleans, Mr ABBOTT. Marquis de Meneville, Mr BARTLEY.
Sir John Ascot, Mr WARDE. Colonel O'Dillon, Mr POWER.
Pierre, Mr Irwin. Francis, Mr Mears.
To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called
HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.
[By Mr FARLEY.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by
Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.
THE ORDER OF SCENERY.
Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, The Romance of a Day; Married Lovers; and the Pantomime.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

In the course of the Season, the following Performers will appear for the first time in London.
Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY, du Theâtre du Gymnase.
Madame ALBERT, du Theâtre des Nouveautés.
M. BRUNET, Artiste, du Theâtre des Variétés.
On commencera à Sept Heures et demie, par
FREDERIC, ROI DE PRUSSE.
Vaudeville en Un Acte.
Eugène, jeune Page du Roi, Mlle. Eliza. Madame Vandeck, Mme. Baudin.
Estelle, Mlle. HERMINIE.
Frèderic, Roi de Prusse, M. ST. AUBERT. Victor, Page du Roi, M. PAULIN.
Birmann, Maître d'Hotel. M. Guenée. Le Major, M. Granville.
Suivi de
LOUISE; OU, LA REPARATION.
Vaudeville en Deux Actes, de MM. SCRIBE et MELESVILLE.
Madame Barneck, Veuve d'un riche Négociant, Madame Prèval.
Louise, sa Nièce, Mlle. FLORVAL.
M. de Malsen, jeune Baron, M. Alfred. Sadler, son Ami, M. PAULIN.
Salsbach, Avecat, M. Laporte. Fritz, Domestique de Madame Barneck, M. Guenée.
On Finira par
JULIEN; OU, VINGT-CINQ ANS D'ENTR'ACTE.
Vaudeville en Deux Actes, de MM. DARTOIS et XAVIER.
1er. ACTE.
Il se passe au Chateau du Baron, avant la Révolution.
La Comtesse, Grand'maman d'Emilie, Madame Prèval.
Emilie, Fille du Baron, Mlle. St. Ange.
Fanchette, Villageoise, attachée a Emilie, Mlle. HERMINIE.
Le Comte d'Hercourt, M. ST. AUBERT.
Le Marquis de Mirval, Futur d'Emilie, M. Alfred.
Jacques, Fermier du Baron, Oncle de Julien, M. Laporte.
Julien, Neveu de Jacques, M. DERVAL.
Garou, Jardinier, amoureux de Fanchette, M. Gamard.
2me. ACTE.
Il se passe a Paris, chez le Baron de Stétin, après Vingt-cinq Ans d'entr'acte.
Camille, Fille du Baron, Mlle. FLORVAL.
Fanchette, Femme de Garou, Mademoiselle HERMINIE.
Madame Dufour de Mirval, Mlle. St. Ange.
Le Baron de Stetin, M. DERVAL. Jacques Sollié, son Oncle, M. Laporte.
Ernest, jeune Peintre, Fils de Madame de Mirval, M. PAULIN.
Garou, ancien Domestique de Madame Dufour, M. Gamard.
Laffeur, Comtois et Champagne, Valets du Baron, MM. Arnaud, Granville et Guenée.

QUEEN'S THEATRE, TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

An Occasional Address, written by J. LUNN, Esq. To be Spoken by Mrs GLOVER.
After which will be presented a New Operatic Piece, entitled
GALATEA.
From GAY'S Serenata. With HANDEL'S Music, arranged by Mr C. POTTER.
Principal Characters by Miss VERNON, Mrs GARRICK, and Mrs HUMBY.
Mr BENNETT. Mr J. RUSSELL. Mr SPENCER. Mr G. SMITH.
Mr MUNROE. Mr G. LEJEUNE. And Mr E. SEGUIN.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.
The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Maria.
After which, a New Musical Comedietta, in One Act, entitled
THREE TO ONE.
The Music, by Mr G. Cooke.
The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss WELLS. Miss AYRES.
And Mr FORRESTER.
Previous to which, a New MS. Overture, by a Student of the Royal Academy of Music. And previous to the Entertainment, Rossini's Overture to 'Tancredi.'
To conclude with a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called
EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.
The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss Stohwasser. Miss Wells. Miss Garrick.
Miss Sinclair. Mr Smith. Mr Tilbury. Mr Munroe. Mr Roberts.
And Mr GREEN.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called
THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.
Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elisabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Grizzle Glowworm, Mrs Beaumont. Susan, Miss Barnett. Amoret, Miss M. Glover.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
Linaro, Alpanor, and Spirit Hunters, Messrs Morris, Winning, Fry, Taylor, &c.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Sebastian, Gregory, and Adam, Messrs Sanders, Willson, and Paulo, Jun.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Andrew and Karl, (his Children) Masters Calkin and Barnett.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.
After which, a New Comic Burletta, called
THE MARRIED BACHELOR.
Lady Courtall, Miss DALY. Grace Gaylove, Mrs FITZWILLIAM.
Sir Charles Courtall, Mr YATES. Sharp, Mr J. REEVE.
To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called
GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.
[By Mr BUCKSTONE].
The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, called
THE CHASTE SALUTE
[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]
The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,
After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called
THE GRENADIER.
[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]
Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.
After which, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called
MIS-APPREHENSION.
[By Mr C. DANCE.]
Miss Clementina Bramble, Miss Stuart. Fanny, Miss Pincott. Ellen, Miss Kabrey.
Thomas, Mr Cooper. Money, Mr W. VINING. Mr Williams, Mr Coates.
To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled
OLYMPIC REVELS.
[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Drama, altered from MORTON'S Play of 'Town and Country', entitled
THE PASTOR'S FIRESIDE.
The Principal Characters by Miss SCOTT, Miss SOMERVILLE,
Miss Nicol, Madame Simon, Miss Rumens, Miss H. Boden, and Mrs Rogers.
Mr C. Hill, Mr Gough, Mr Honner, Mr D. Pitt,
Mr WILLIAMS, Mr OSBALDISTON, Mr VALE,
Mr Almar, Mr Hobbs, Mr Young, Mr Amherst, Mr Tully, and Mr Webb.
To conclude with, the Grand Serious Spoctacle, in Two Acts, entitled
OBI: OR, THREE-FINGER'D JACK!
With the original Music, by the late Dr Arnold.
Rosa, Madame Simon. Quashee's Wife, Mrs Vale. Sam's Wife, Miss Jordan.
Captain Orford, Mr Honner. Planter, Mr Almar.
Overseer, Mr Edwin. Three-Finger'd Jack, Mr C. Hill.
Quashee, Mr T. Hill. Sam, Mr Asbury. Jonkanoo, Mr Grammer.
Old Woman, Mr Webb. Officer, Mr Lee. Tucky, Mademoiselle Rosier.

COBURG THEATRE.—Bonaparte's Destiny—The Silver Knight—Jack Sheppard—And Ali Halow Seen.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck; or the Buccaneer's Bridal—Harlequin and Mother Goose—And Satisfied.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL.—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 133.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Thoughts on Man, his Nature, Productions, and Discoveries; interspersed with some particulars respecting the Author. By William Godwin. 8vo. Wilson. (Unpublished.)

Caprices of Fame.—It would be endless to adduce all the examples that might be found of the caprices of fame. It has been one of the arts of the envious to set up a contemptible rival to eclipse the splendour of sterling merit. Thus Crowne and Settle for a time disturbed the serenity of Dryden. Voltaire says, the Phœdra of Pradon has not less passion than that of Racine, but expressed in rugged verse and barbarous language. Pradon is now forgotten: and the whole French poetry of the Augustan age of Louis the Fourteenth is threatened with the same fate. Hayley for a few years was applauded as the genuine successor of Pope; and the poem of 'Sympathy,' by Pratt, went through twelve editions. For a brief period almost each successive age appears fraught with resplendent genius; but they go out one after another; they set "like stars that fall, to rise no more." Few indeed are endowed with that strength of construction that should enable them to ride triumphant on the tide of ages.—It is the same with conquerors. What tremendous battles have been fought, what oceans of blood have been spilled, by men who were resolved that their achievements should be remembered for ever! And now, even their names are scarcely preserved; and the very effects of the disasters they inflicted on mankind seem to be swept away, as of no more validity than things that never existed. Warriors and poets, the authors of systems and the lights of philosophy, men that astonished the earth, and were looked up to as Gods, even like an actor on the stage, have strutted their hour, and then been heard of no more.

Books have the advantage of all other productions of the human head or hand. Copies of them may be multiplied for ever, the last as good as the first, except so far as some slight inadvertent errors may have insinuated themselves. The Iliad flourishes as green now, as on the day that Pisistratus is said first to have stamped upon it its present order. The songs of the rhapsodists, the scolds, and the minstrels, which once seemed as fugitive as the breath of him who chaunted them, repose in libraries, and are embalmed in collections. The sportive sallies of eminent wits, and the Table Talk of Luther and Selden, may live as long as there shall be men to read, and judges to appreciate them.

The Lives of the most eminent British Painters, Sculptors, and Architects.—By Allan Cunningham. Vol. 4. (Being Vol. XIX. of the Family Library.)

Inigo Jones and Ben Jonson.—Though Ben, according to Dr Fuller, wrought at the building of Lincoln's Inn, with a trowel in his hand, and a book in his pocket, he did not hesitate to satirize Jones himself for having touched the hand-saw and the plane. It may be urged, that he did this without malicious meaning, but Drummond, a candid man, says 'that Jonson was a great lover and praiser of himself, and a despiser and contemner of others, given rather to lose a friend than a jest, and jealous of everyword and action of those about him.' It is true that the object of the dramatist was to give a living image of the looks and manners of the times in which he lived, and that such a character as a ready-witted joiner was necessary in those days of dramas in barns, and masques in country places. But it is perfectly well known, that In-and-In Medley, the Joiner of Islington, was meant for Inigo Jones; that the ridicule which it threw on his name and history caused him to complain, and that in consequence, the representation was forbidden. These are passages sufficiently personal.

> Medley.—Indeed there is a woundy luck in names, sirs,
> And a vain mystery, an a man knew where
> To find it. My godsire's name I tell you
> Was In-and-in Shuttle, and a weaver he was,
> And it did fit his craft; for so his shuttle
> Went-in-and-in still—this way and then that way.
> And he named me In-and-in Medley, which serves
> A joiner's craft, because that we do lay
> Things in-and-in, in our work. But I am truly
> Architectonicus Professor, rather;
> That is, as one would say, an architect.—P. 74.

Sir Christopher Wren.—Sir Christopher Wren was of low stature, his forehead broad and fair, his nose slightly aquiline, the eyes large and expressive, and the whole aspect stamped with intelligence and talent. He was light and active of body, walked with a certain stateliness of air, and his constitution, rather delicate than robust, was saved, it is said, from consumption, by habits of regularity and temperance. That he was a little man, a tradition preserved by Seward sufficiently shows. Charles II, on walking through his newly-erected hunting place at Newmarket, said, "These rooms are too low." Wren went up to the King and replied, "An please your Majesty, I think them high enough." Whereupon Charles, stooping down to Sir Christopher's stature, answered with a smile, "On second thoughts I think so too." He had that calm and philosophic temper which contradiction could not disturb; he heard his opinions questioned, and even saw his designs deformed by the envious or the ignorant, without change of mood or a snappish remark.

TO THE TATLER.

Wednesday Evening.

Mr. Tatler—It is generally considered as our duty to begin the sabbath-day with the best dispositions, at least, whatever our actions may be; and I believe nobody, of whatsoever faith or sect, inculcates that we should pass it less amiably than any other day. Now, sir, I do, and the fault is yours. I do not say it is a wilful one. It is my custom to take my breakfast alone, and, six days out of the seven, your paper is served up with it; but on the seventh,—its place is vacant. It is to little purpose that I take up any other paper, or a book. The breakfast itself I could dispense with patiently, but the Tatler, which should accompany it, is necessary to me, as a matter of habit, of —— I shall not, however, tell you all the reasons why it is so, but the fact is, that I do not recover the privation all day, and that I am inclined to quarrel with my companions from morning till night. They, perhaps, might use harsher language, were they to speak on the subject, and some of them are well known to you, however little you may be aware of it. I do not deny, Mr Tatler, that you may require a day's rest. It might, perhaps, be obtained, without subjecting your readers to this derangement of ——— temper; but I am of a kindly nature, and in consideration of the pleasure your paper affords me for six days in the week, I will, upon one condition, forgive you, It is a pleasure rather than a penance that I am about to impose on you. I have just met with a pleasant little work, called 'The Seasons.' It is full of trees, grass, flowers, streams, birds, and butterflies, and is well calculated to inspire those tranquil feelings which we poor Londoners cannot seek in the pure air of Heaven. It may compose the minds of your Sunday non-readers, and therefore it is but right that you should do your best to make it known to them. You may think I have some interest in the success of the book. I have, sir; I have an interest in the success of every book that treats of nature, and speaks in nature's voice. Further I have none; nor do I know any that have, with the exception of the world in general. This is not Sunday; and to this circumstance you are indebted for the happiness of the conditional pardon promised you by Philotatleria.

[Our fair correspondent knows how to punish like a proper woman; that is, by imposing an agreeable penalty. We shall take an early opportunity of doing what she desires.]

Lady Dowager T—— remarked, "That carelessness was little better than a half-way house between accident and design."

Musical Agitation!—A music-seller in Dublin has taken advantage of the present moment of party-feeling, by publishing some Orange and Green Quadrilles, respectfully dedicated to Mr O'Connell. Also, Mr O'Connell's Orange and Green Waltz; together with the Anti-Union Quadrilles, and Anti-Union Waltz, most respectfully dedicated to the King! Should the two parties in Ireland come to blows, the same publisher will doubtless print Lord Anglesey's black and blue Introduzione, and his red Finale. The anti-union waltz ought to conciliate those moralists who, with the late excellent Sir Henry Englefield once at their head, long complained of the close junction of the parties in the German waltz.—Harmonicon for Feb. 1.

Pope.—Sir J. Reynolds used to tell the following anecdote relative to Pope. When Reynolds was a young man, he was present at an auction of very scarce pictures, which attracted a great crowd of connoisseurs and others; when, in the moment of a very interesting piece being put up, Mr Pope entered the room. All was in an instant, from a scene of confusion and bustle, a dead calm. The auctioneer, as if by instinct, suspended his hammer. The audience, to an individual, as if by the same impulse, rose up to receive the poet; and did not resume their seats till he had reached the upper end of the room.

Digitized by Google

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

INTUITION AND SAGACITY.—Of the difference between these two qualities (the one being immediate in its effect, and the other requiring a circuitous process). Foote said, "the former was the eye, the latter the nose of the mind."

CONCLUSIVE ANSWERS.—Campistron, the French poet, the favorite and secretary of the duke de Vendome, was gay and volatile, and little fitted for all a secretary's duties. One day, the duke quaintly pointed him out to another nobleman, and observed "There sits my secretary, busy with his answers." Campistron was engaged in burning a quantity of letters, addressed to the duke, to save himself the trouble of acknowledging them. This was his practice with all epistles which were not of great importance: he called it despatching business.

MEN OF GENIUS.—It seems the fate of all originality of thinking to be immediately opposed. Bacon was not at all understood at home in his own day; his celebrity was confined to his history of Henry VII and to his Essays. In some unpublished letters, I find Sir Edward Coke writing very miserable, but very bitter verses, on a copy of the Instauratio, presented to him by Bacon; and even James I declaring that, like God's power, "it passeth beyond all understanding." When Kepler published his work on Comets, the first rational one, it was condemned even by the learned themselves as extravagant. We see the learned Selden signing his recantation, and long afterwards the propriety of his argument on tithes fully allowed; the aged Galileo on his knees, with his hands on the Gospels, abjuring as absurdities, errors, and heresies, the philosophical truths he had ascertained. Harvey, in his eightieth year, did not live to witness his great discovery established. Adam Smith was reproached by the economists for having borrowed his system from them, as if the mind of genius does not borrow little parts to create its own vast views. The great Sydenham, by the independence and force of his genius, so highly provoked the malignant emulation of his rivals, that they conspired to have him banished out of the College, as "guilty of medicinal heresy." Such is the fate of men of genius, who advance a century beyond their contemporaries!—The Literary Character Illustrated by the History of Men of Genius.—[Men who are beyond their own time, must console themselves with hoping that another will do them justice. They cannot write with the intellect of a future age, and expect that it will be duly appreciated by that of a present. Nor do they, if they are the men they take themselves for. Besides, there is a certain usefulness in the opposition made to them. It puts their notions to the test, tries the gold in the fire, and hinders the world from being blown about by every air of novelty. They must look upon this lot as an illustrious misfortune. All that they can demand is, that men shall honestly oppose them, and not in a spirit of heresy and hypocrisy.]

DIALOGUE BETWEEN ECHO AND A GLUTTON.

The following Lines, written in the year 1609, are said to have induced Butler to pursue the same idea in his 'Hudibras.'

DIALOGUE.

Glutton. My belly I do deify.
Echo. Fie!
Gl. Who curbs his appetite's a fool.
Echo. Ah! fool!
Gl. I do not like this abstinence.
Echo. Hence!
Gl. My joy's a feast, my wish is wine.
Echo. Swine!
Gl. We epicures are happy, truly.
Echo. You lie.
Gl. May I not, Echo, eat my fill?
Echo. Ill.
Gl. Will it hurt me if I drink too much?
Echo. Much.
Gl. Thou mock'st me, Nymph; I'll not believe it.
Echo. Believe it.
Gl. Dost thou condemn, then, what I do?
Echo. I do.
Gl. Is't that which brings infirmities?
Echo. It is.
Gl. Then, sweetest temperance, I'll love thee.
Echo. I love thee.
Gl. If all be true which thou dost tell,
To Gluttony I bid farewell.
Echo. Farewell.

TRUE COURAGE.

What more speaks
Greatness of man than valiant patience,
That shrinks not under his fate's strongest strokes!
These Roman deaths—as falling on a sword,
Opening of veins, with poison quenching thirst,
Which we erroneously do style the deeds
Of the heroic and magnanimous man,
Were dead-eyed Cowardice, and white-cheek'd Fear,
Who, doubting tyranny, and fainting under
Fortune's false lottery, desperately run
To death, for dread of death. That soul's most stout
That, bearing all mischance, dares last it out.

Beaumont and Fletcher's 'Honest Man's Fortune.'

POPE.—A mark of the greatest respect was shown to Pope by Frederick Prince of Wales, whilst dining with him at Twickenham. The poet fell fast asleep immediately after dinner: Lord Bolingbroke, confounded at this circumstance, wished to wake him, but the prince, with great condescension, prevented him, by saying: "No, no, my lord; we should accommodate ourselves to the infirmities of such a man as Mr Pope."

NEW STRINGED INSTRUMENT.—A new instrument, of the violin class, has been lately invented by a French amateur, which he proposes to name the contralto, because it will occupy the same place among the stringed instruments at present used in an orchestra, as the contralto or countratenor voice does in a choir. The name is, perhaps, a good one; but the inventor is, we think, unfortunate in the reason he gives for his selection. The new-invented instrument is a low alto; and, if called contralto, must derive its appellation from being, in respect to the common alto or viola of the orchestra, what the conter-basso or double bass is to the common bass or violoncello,—"In a quartet or sextet," says the inventor, "there is no objection to two violins." But then the contralto will be substituted with great advantage for the second viola, a part often inaudible; it will diminish the intensity of the low notes produced by using two violoncellos—an inconvenience which able composers have avoided most frequently only by depriving the violoncello of its true character, and which Mr Onslow has been so sensible of, that, in his last quintet, he has seemed to hint at the very instrument now proposed, by writing a principal part for a violoncello-alto.—Harmonicon for Feb. 1.

THE PRINCE OF WALES AND MRS FITZHERBERT.—He had now formed an attachment of no common kind to a lady, whose name at this period came frequently before the public associated with his. A veil of ambiguity or mystery covered, and still covers, the relations of the Prince of Wales with Mrs Fitzherbert. She received all the respect and exercised all the influence which could belong to rank, character, accomplishments and manners, in the highest class of society in this country, during her intimacy with the prince, and after their separation; and she is still living, surrounded, in her advanced years, with all the consideration which could do honour to the decline of a life the most estimable. Mrs Fitzherbert was the widow of two husbands, without children by either, and the daughter of a gentleman named Smyth, of reputable birth and fortune in Shropshire. Her first husband was Mr Weld, the proprietor of Lulworth castle in Dorsetshire; since become the property of a cardinal of that name and family, and the temporary asylum of the exiled king of France, Charles X. Some time after the death of Mr Weld, she married Colonel Fitzherbert, who also died within a year after their marriage. Mrs Fitzherbert was first married at sixteen, and had still all the graces of beauty and youth on the death of Colonel Fitzherbert. She was brought up abroad, with every advantage of a costly and consummate education. Her beauty had that soft and touching character, the result of fair complexion and blue eyes, which distinguishes Englishwomen abroad, and obtained her the appellation of the angelic English blonde. The cousin of Lord Sefton, and related to other distinguished families, she lived in a sphere of society in London which necessarily made her acquainted with the Prince of Wales. He became enamoured, declared his passion, and was the cause of her retiring to the continent to avoid his importunities. Having remained abroad about three years, she returned to England in 1784. The prince on her return declared the continuance and repeated the sincerity of his attachment, with, it would appear, more success. Their intimacy for some time was known only to the initiated in high life: they moved and met in the same society, apparently on terms rather of formal than familiar acquaintance. The secret was divulged shortly before the prince's quarrel with the king, and base advantage was taken of it to wound the private feelings of the prince, where manly feelings are the most vulnerable. She was of a catholic family, herself a catholic; and this was easily turned against the Prince of Wales, at a period of religious bigotry and political alarm,—especially in the mind of George III, who seems to have thought that protestant episcopacy was the sole object of the revolution of 1688, and that secret influence, prerogative, and parliamentary corruption, were sanctified by their accordance with the spirit and interests of the high church.—Dr Lardner's Cabinet Library. Vol. 2, Life and Reign of George IV.

RESOURCES AGAINST PASSION AND CONTINUED THINKING.—We are scarcely aware how we may govern our thoughts by means of our sensations. De Luc was subject to violent bursts of passion, but he calmed the interior tumult by the artifice of filling his mouth with sweets and comfits. When Goldoni found his sleep disturbed by the obtrusive ideas still floating from the studies of the day, he contrived to lull himself to rest by conning in his mind a vocabulary of the Venetian dialect, translating some word into Tuscan and French; which being a very uninteresting occupation, at the third or fourth version the recipe never failed. This was an art of withdrawing attention from the greater to the less emotion; where, as the interest weakened, the excitement ceased. Mendelsohn, whose feeble and too sensitive frame was often reduced to the last stage of suffering by intellectual exertion, when engaged in any point of difficulty, would in an instant contrive a perfect cessation from thinking, by mechanically going to the window, and counting the tiles upon the roof of his neighbour's house.—The Literary Character Illustrated by the History of Men of Genius.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—The Jenkinses.—The Devil's Brother.—Turning the Tables.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Cinderella.—Married Lovers.—And the Pantomime.

DRURY LANE.

"The Devil's Brother."—Italcé "Fra Diavolo," is altogether a poor creature compared with our gallant friend Massaroni—Sixteen-string-Jack to the gay Du Val. There is no romance in the fellow: he apes his predecessor, 'tis true, by turning Marquis, but like Jack aforesaid, he is an impertinent, mouth-making dandy. Moreover he goes sneaking like a rat about the bed-rooms of an hotel at midnight to pick gentlemen and ladies' pockets: and at the last, when he is entrapped in his own burrow, he shows "no more valour than a wild duck." He walks off to prison with the vulgar impudence of a pewter-pot-smasher. If we are to have repetitions of Brigandism—yet by the dulness of the audience last night we should conclude that the public are weary of them—by all means let us have a smack of poetry about the heroes.

Mr WALLACK makes as much of his plebeian Massaroni as might be expected from him, but he is allowed no occasions for surprise—the best bower-anchor of melodrama; and in short the whole piece hangs heavily, and we should conclude has "sailed to the north of public favour." The music by Mr A. LEE is pretty, betraying here and there in the concerted pieces, a flavouring of the Hofer vintage. Mrs WAYLETT sang an air in her bed-room while she is preparing to retire to rest, and a little hymn on her knees to the virgin, both simply and correctly in tune. Mr SINCLAIR should be recommended to take a few lessons in the art of expressing indignation and fury of his brother comedian, Mr DOWTON. At present his wrath is the meekest emanation, as implying a difference of opinion with an opponent that we are acquainted with. The "sucking dove" is an absolute Xantippe compared with him.

One of the choruses in the piece is an imitation of the prayer in Masaniello. While the whole company are at their devotion, two of the robbers, also on their knees, are nudging each other, and cutting jokes. To say nothing of the bad taste of such an action in every point of view, it is incorrect as regards the national character these men were representing; and as an authority for the strictness to the letter with which the greatest ruffians in the Catholic countries observe the ceremonies of mother church, we refer to the beautiful preface which precedes Mr SHELLEY's tragedy of the Cenci.

In justice to "the great theatres," we must inform our correspondent A. A. who complains of their late hours, and long bills of fare; that the pernicious innovation complained of, originated at the Haymarket theatre. We are much mistaken if Mr MORRIS was not the first manager who advertised four and even five pieces at one representation. The evil having taken root, what alternative had the other establishments but to follow the example? C.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.

THE smaller theatres, whatever may be their other merits, are fairly entitled to the praise of endeavouring to gratify the town by a perpetual round of novelties. The new burletta, called Mis-apprehension, is one of those light and unpretending trifles, which, by aiming at nothing more than to tickle the ear by a miscellaneous abundance of puns (always miscellaneous when they are numerous) and give a fillip to the spirits of the good-natured who may choose to devote half an hour to listen to it, fairly stops criticism at the threshold, and bids it bend its frown on graver objects. We shall attempt to give a sketch of the plot.

Miss Fanny (Miss PINCOTT), the niece of a worthy pawnbroker, Money (Mr W. VINING), while visiting the exhibition at Somerset House, has the misfortune to get separated from her country cousins, but providentially (as the old lady said when she unexpectedly found a trump in her hand) she soon found a companion and protector in Frank Hartley (Mr RAYMOND) a young barrister, who gallantly offers to escort her home. The young lady, whose confidence seems soon to have been acquired, suffers the gallant to hold her handkerchief while she ties her bonnet; and these indispensables being adjusted, they proceed on their way together. Miss Fanny, not wishing that her protector, now by course of time become her lover, should know that her home was a pawnbroker's, manages to quit him at the door of a neighbour, Miss Bramble (Miss STUART), a spinster on the serious side of fifty. Frank notices the house, intending to call there and return the handkerchief. It happened that Miss Bramble, not quite satisfied with her own condition, or commiserating that of the single of the other sex, had advertised in the newspapers for a congenial helpmate, and to secure as many chances in the lottery as possible, has directed her servant to admit any gentleman who may apply and ask to see her, even though he might not enquire for her by her selected initials of C. A. T. Frank Hartley is the first who calls; she receives him veiled, and with her head averted; but he has proceeded but a little way in his declaration of love, when Miss Fanny, to his surprise, enters. He finishes his declaration, of course, to Miss Fanny, Miss Bramble (her head still averted) supposing his words to be addressed to her. To avoid a discovery, he slips out of the room, and Miss Fanny takes his place on the sofa. The yielding Miss Bramble then extends her hand to her supposed admirer, and they rise from the sofa together. Charmed with her conquest, she turns round to become better acquainted with him, and behold—her friend Miss Fanny!—what a mis-apprehension! But Frank Hartley has some other adventures. He is rather a gay fellow, and stays at his club too late sometimes. The night in question was one of them, and not being over sober, he fancies he has lost his watch, to recover which, Thomas (Mr COOPER) his trusty servant (very much addicted to punning) has placards printed and sent round to the pawnbrokers. In the morning his master finds his watch, and an application being made to him for a loan by a Mr Williams (Mr COATES) he unthinkingly promises he shall have it to-morrow. On the morrow he is disappointed of resources, but rather than disappoint his friend he resolves to pawn his watch. He accordingly presents it at the shop of Money, when, in consequence of the placards, he is detained on suspicion of theft; and for a time his character is in jeopardy; but by the subsequent appearance of Miss Fanny, Mr Williams, and Thomas, explanation takes place; and nothing is then wanting but the consent of the proper authority to the union of the lovers, which without much demur is obtained. The reader will see that this piece is of a pleasant texture, and the audience by their laughter show that they are of the same opinion. The puns abound—superabound even—but the tolerant spirit of the present age no longer considers punning as bad as picking pockets; and therefore authors occasionally take advantage, and season their productions too highly with this spice, an extreme which requires more than the caution of a punster to avoid. We have but little space to remark on the acting, which if it be not so rich as it might be, is yet sufficiently spirited not to hinder the naturally agreeable effect of the incidents. F. F.

MISTAKING THE SHELLS FOR THE KERNELS.—Toplady, a celebrated Methodist preacher of the last age, somewhere relates a story of a coxcomb, who told him that he had read over Euclid's Elements of Geometry one afternoon at his tea, only leaving out the A's and B's and crooked lines, which seemed to be intruded merely to retard his progress.—Godwin's Thoughts on Man.

PRAISE OF PATRIOTISM.

"If Themistocles
Had liv'd obscur'd thus in th' Athenian state,
Xerxes had made both him and it his slaves.
If brave Camillus had lurk'd so in Rome,
He had not five times been Dictator there,
Nor four times triumph'd. If Epaminondas
(Who liv'd twice twenty years obscur'd in Thebes)
Had liv'd so still, he had been still unnam'd,
And paid his country nor himself their right;
But putting forth his strength, he rescued both
From imminent ruin: and like burnish'd steel,
After long use, he shin'd; for as the light
Not only serves to show, but render us
Mutually profitable; so our lives
In acts exemplary, not only win
Ourselves good names, but do to others give Matter for virtuous deeds by which we live."

Chapman's Bussy d'Ambois.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

M. LAPORTE respectfully begs leave to inform the NOBILITY, SUBSCRIBERS to the OPERA, and the PUBLIC, that this Theatre will open this Evening, with

A favorite Opera Buffa, in Two Acts, entitled

IL BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA.

[By ROSSINI.]

The Principal Characters by Madame SIGL VESPERMANN.
Madame CASTELLI. Signor LABLACHE. Signor CURIONI.
Signor DEVILLE. Signor DE ANGELI. and Signor DE BEGNIS.

Between the Acts,

A NEW DIVERTISEMENT.

Principal Dancers. Madame MONTESSU, Mademoiselle CLARA,
Mademoiselle PROCHE, and Mademoiselle BROCARD,
Monsieur PAUL, Monsieur EMILE, and Monsieur LEFEBVRE.

After which, the Favorite Ballet, in Two Acts, of

LA SOMNAMBULE.

The Principal Characters by Madame MONTESSU, Mademoiselle KANIEL,
Mlle. CLARA, Mlle. PROCHE, Mlle. DE VIS, and Mme. COPERE,
Mesdames J. Mersio, Coupotte, Beseko, Vedy, Griffiths, Pitt, Laura, Lydia, &c.
M. PAUL, M. EMILIE, M. SIMON, M. GOURIET, M. GEORGE,
M. D'ALBERT, and M. LEFEBVRE.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

THE IRON CHEST.

[By COLMAN, the Younger.]

Lady Helen, Miss PHILLIPS. Blanch, Mrs WAYLETT.
Barbara, Miss PEARSON, in which she will introduce a new Song, called "The Gascon Vespers."—(D. Lee.)
Judith, Mrs FAUCIT. Dame Rawbold, Mrs BROAD.
Sir Edward Mortimer, Mr KEAN.
Fitzharding, Mr YOUNGE. Wilford, Mr VINING.
Adam Winterton, Mr FARREN. Rawbold, Mr COOPER.
Rawbold's Boy, Miss CRAWFORD. Sampson, Mr HARLEY.
Armstrong, Mr SINCLAIR. Orson, Mr BEDFORD.
Robbers, Mr Yarnold, Mr S. Jones, Mr Price, Mr Eaton.
Peter, Mr HONNER. Robber's Boy, Miss POOLE.

Previous to the Play, Spontini's Overture to "Nurmahal."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands.

On Monday, Richard the Third; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Operatic Drama, to be called

THE ROMANCE OF A DAY.

The Music, by H. R. Bishop.

Sophia Walstein, Miss FORDE. Liese, Miss E. TREE. Therese, Miss P. Horton.
Widow Klaffen, Mrs GIBBS. Karoline Klaffen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Adolph, Count of Engleberg, Mr WILSON. General Kienwitz, Mr BARTLEY.
Colonel Francœur, Mr ABBOT. Nikel Unterhand, Mr G. PENSON.
Moritz, Mr BLANCHARD. Fritz Klaffen, Mr KEELEY.
Paul Richter, Miss TAYLOR. Hubert, Mr Irwin.

After the Drama, an Overture by J. N. Hummel.

After which, a New Petite Comedy, to be called

MARRIED LOVERS.

The Songs, composed by Mr Barnett.

Duchess D'Orleans, Miss FORDE. Marchioness de Meneville, Miss TAYLOR.
Lady Ascot, Mrs CHATTERLEY. Annette, Miss PHILLIPS.
Duc D'Orleans, Mr ABBOTT. Marquis de Meneville, Mr BARTLEY.
Sir John Ascot, Mr WARDE. Colonel O'Dillon, Mr POWER.
Pierre, Mr Irwin. Francis, Mr Mears.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by
Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight.—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumpnal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

On Monday, Fazio; Married Lovers; and the Pantomime.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,
TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

An Occasional Address, written by J. LUNN, Esq. To be Spoken by Mrs GLOVER.
After which will be presented a New Operatic Piece, entitled

GALATEA.

From GAY'S Serenata. With HANDEL'S Music, arranged by Mr C. POTTER.
Principal Characters by Miss VERNON, Mrs GARRICK, and Mrs HUMBY.
Mr BENNETT. Mr J. RUSSELL. Mr SPENCER. Mr G. SMITH.
Mr MUNROE. Mr G. LEJEUNE. And Mr E. SEGUIN.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.
The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Maria.

After which, a New Musical Comedietta, in One Act, entitled

THREE TO ONE.

The Music, by Mr G. Cooke.
The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss WELLS. Miss AYRES.
And Mr FORRESTER.

Previous to which, a New MS. Overture, by a Student of the Royal Academy of Music. And previous to the Entertainment, Rossini's Overture to 'Tancredi.'

To conclude with a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called

EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.

The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss Stohwasser. Miss Wells. Miss Garrick.
Miss Sinclair. Mr Smith. Mr Tilbury. Mr Munroe. Mr Roberts.
And Mr GREEN.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Grizzle Glowworm, Mrs Beaumont. Susan, Miss Barnett. Amoret, Miss M. Glover.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
Linaro, Alpanor, and Spirit Hunters, Messrs Morris, Winning, Fry, Taylor, &c.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Sebastian, Gregory, and Adam, Messrs Sanders, Willson, and Paulo, Jun.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Andrew and Karl, (his Children) Masters Calkin and Barnett.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called

THE MARRIED BACHELOR.

Lady Courtall, Miss DALY. Grace Gaylove, Mrs FITZWILLIAM.
Sir Charles Courtall, Mr YATES. Sharp, Mr J. REEVE.

To conclude with a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, called

THE CHASTE SALUTE.

[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]

The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Baroness de Blanchec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called

THE GRENADIER.

[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]

Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

After which, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called

MIS-APPREHENSION.

[By Mr C. DANCE.]

Miss Clementina Bramble, Miss Stuart. Fanny, Miss Pincott. Ellen, Miss Kabrey.
Thomas, Mr Cooper. Money, Mr W. VINING. Mr Williams, Mr Coates.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Drama, altered from MORTON'S Play of 'Town and Country', entitled

THE PASTOR'S FIRESIDE.

The Principal Characters by Miss SCOTT, Miss SOMERVILLE,
Miss Nicol, Madame Simon, Miss Rumens, Miss H. Boden, and Mrs Rogers.
Mr C. Hill, Mr Gough, Mr Honner, Mr D. Pitt,
Mr WILLIAMS, Mr OSBALDISTON, Mr VALE,
Mr Almar, Mr Hobbs, Mr Young, Mr Amherst, Mr Tully, and Mr Webb.

To conclude with the admired Melo-Drama, entitled

THE INCHCAPE BELL.

[By E. FITZBALL, Esq.]

The Dumb Sailor Boy, Miss Scott. Amelia, Miss Jordan.
Becky Butterfly, Mrs Vale. Mrs Tapps, Miss Rumens.
Sir John Trevanley, Mr Gough. Hans Hatzock, Mr Dibdin Pitt.
Guy Ruthven, Mr C. Hill. Captain Taffrail, Mr Honner.
Samson Sawdust, Mr VALE. Jupiter Seabreeze, Mr Rogers.

COBURG THEATRE.—Bonaparte's Destiny—The Silver Knight—Jack Sheppard—And Ali Halow Seen.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck; or the Buccaneer's Bridal—Harlequin and Mother Goose—And Satisfied.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL.—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 134.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

OWING to the protracted and severe indisposition of the Editor, several interesting new works have not yet received the notice they deserve, and which is intended for them. He hopes however, that he shall need the indulgence of the reader but for a day or two longer. In the middle of the week, it is trusted, he will be able to resume his duties in the paper, and continue them without further interruption. In the meantime, the extracts which follow, from works about to be reviewed, may enable the reader to judge both of the works themselves, and of the justness of the remarks which will subsequently appear.

Thoughts on Man, his Nature, Productions, and Discoveries; interspersed with some particulars respecting the Author. By William Gordon. 8vo. Wilson. (Unpublished.)

[Further Extracts.]

MILDNESS IN THE INSTRUCTOR MOST BENEFICIAL TO THE INSTRUCTED.—'An ingenuous youth, endowed with sufficient capacity for the business prescribed him, may be led on in the path of intellectual acquisition and improvement with a silken cord. It will demand a certain degree of patience on the part of the instructor. But Heaven knows, that this patience is sufficiently called into requisition when the instructor shall be the greatest disciplinarian that ever existed. Kind tones and encouragement will animate the learner amidst many a difficult pass. A grave remark may perhaps sometimes be called for. And, if the preceptor and the pupil have gone on like friends, a grave remark, a look expressive of rebuke, will be found a very powerful engine. The instructor should smooth the business of instruction to his pupil, by appealing to his understanding, developing his taste, and assisting him to remark the beauties of the composition on which he is occupied.

'I come now then to the consideration of the two engines mentioned in the commencement of this Essay, reprehension and chastisement. And here, as in what went before, I am reduced to the referring to my own experience, and looking back into the history of my own mind.

'I say then, that reprehension and reprimand can scarcely ever be necessary. The pupil should undoubtedly be informed when he is wrong. He should be told what it is that he ought to have omitted, and that he ought to have done. There should be no reserve in this. It will be worthy of the highest censure, if on these points the instructor should be mealy-mouthed, or hesitate to tell the pupil in the plainest terms, of his faults, his bad habits, and the dangers that beset his onward and honourable path.

'But this may be best, and most beneficially done, and in a way most suitable to the exigence, and to the party to be corrected, in a few words. The rest is all an unwholesome tumour, the disease of speech, and not the sound and healthful substance through which its circulation and life are conveyed.

'There is always danger of this excrescence of speech, where the speaker is the umpire, and feels himself at liberty, unreproved, to say what he pleases. He is charmed with the sound of his own voice. The periods flow numerous from his tongue, and he gets on at his ease. There is in all this an image of empire; and the human mind is ever prone to be delighted in the exercise of unrestricted authority. The pupil in this case stands before his instructor in an attitude humble, submissive, and bowing to the admonition that is communicated to him. The speaker says more than it was in his purpose to say; and he knows not how to arrest himself in his triumphant career. He believes that he is in no danger of excess, and recollects the old proverb that "words break no bones."

'But a syllable more than is necessary and justly measured, is materially of evil operation to ingenuous youth. The mind of such a youth is tender and flexible, and easily swayed one way or the other. He believes almost everything that he is bid to believe; and the admonition that is given him with all the symptoms of friendliness and sincerity he is prompt to subscribe to. If this is wantonly aggravated to him, he feels the oppression, and is galled with the injustice. He knows himself guiltless of premeditated wrong. He has not yet learned that his condition is that of a slave; and he feels a certain impatience at his being considered as such, though he probably does not venture to express it. He shuts up the sense of this despotism in his own bosom; and it is his first lesson of independence, and rebellion, and original sin.'—P. 264.

ON FRIENDSHIP BETWEEN UNEQUALS.—'The reciprocity which belongs to a friendship between unequals may well be expected to give a higher zest to their union. Each party is necessary to the other. The superior considers him towards whom he pours out his affection, as a part of himself.

'The head is not more native to the heart,
The hand more instrumental to the mouth.

He cannot separate himself from him, but at the cost of a fearful maim. When the world is shut out by him, when he retires into solitude, and falls back upon himself, then his unpretending friend is most of all necessary to him. He is his consolation and his pleasure, the safe coffer in which he reposits all his anxieties and sorrows. If the principal, instead of being a public man, is a man of science, this kind of unbending becomes certainly not the less welcome to him. He wishes occasionally to forget the severity of his investigations, neither to have his mind any longer wound up and stretched to the height of meditation, nor to feel that he needs to be any way on his guard, or not completely to give the rein to all his sallies and the sportiveness of his soul. Having been for a considerable time shut up in sequestered reflection, he wishes, it may be, to have the world, the busy impassioned world, brought to his ears, without his being obliged to enter into its formalities and mummeries. If he desires to speak of the topics which had so deeply engaged him, he can keep as near the edge as he pleases, and drop or resume them as his fancy may prompt. And it seems useless to say, how much his modest and unassuming friend will be gratified in being instrumental to relieve the labours of his principal, in feeling that he is necessary to him, and in meditating on the delight he receives in being made the chosen companion and confident of him whom he so ardently admires. It was precisely in this spirit, that Fulke Greville, two hundred years ago, directed that it should be inscribed on his tomb, "Here lies the friend of Sir Philip Sidney." Tenderness on the one part, and a deep feeling of honour and respect on the other, give a completeness to the union which it must otherwise for ever want. "There is no limit, none," to the fervour with which the stronger goes forward to protect the weak; while in return the less powerful would encounter a thousand deaths rather than injury should befall the being to whom in generosity and affection he owes so much.

'In the mean time, though inequality is necessary to give this completeness to friendship, the inequality must not be too great. The inferior party must be able to understand and appreciate the sense and the merits of him to whom he is thus bound. There must be no impediment to hinder the communications of the principal from being fully comprehended, and his sentiments entirely participated. There must be a boundless confidence, without apprehension that the power of the stronger party can, by the remotest possibility, be put forth ungenerously. "Perfect love casteth out fear." The Evangelist applies this aphorism even to the love of the creature to his Creator:—"The Lord spake unto Moses, face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend." In the union of which I am treating, the demonstrative and ordinary appearance will be that of entire equality, which is heightened by the inner, and for the greater part unexplained and undeveloped, impression of a contrary nature. There is in either party a perfect reliance, an idea of inequality, with the most entire assurance that it can never operate unworthily in the stronger party, or produce insincerity or servility in the weaker. There will in reality always be some reserve, some shadow of fear between equals, which in the friendship of unequals, if happily assorted, can find no place. There is a pouring out of the heart on the one side, and a cordial acceptance on the other, which words are inadequate to describe.'—P. 286.

The Lives of the most eminent British Painters, Sculptors, and Architects.—By Allan Cunningham. Vol. IV. (Being Vol. XIX of the Family Library.)

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.—'The king, (Charles II.) who, without any love of literature, had some skill in mechanics and taste in architecture, preferred looking at works which required little outlay of thought—his eye was nearly all that he had to gratify, and for this single polite taste Wren was the prime minister. I have already related how his original draught for St Paul's was rejected by the court and clergy: it may not be so fair, perhaps, to estimate his genius by what he merely planned as by that which he successfully executed; yet surely the former should not be altogether overlooked. In the rejected design there is an unbroken grandeur of outline and interior breadth and harmony of parts,

Digitized by Google

with solid majesty of elevation, to which the other cannot reach. The inward angles of the cross are judiciously exchanged for circles, avoiding those deep dark nooks, which, in the present structure, are fitted only for gathering all the dust and filth with which the breeze is laden; while in the interior the jutting angles, which at present impede the view and disunite the harmonious arrangement of the structure, are converted into circular lines, which give a wonderful elegance and simplicity to the whole plan. Yet excelled as the design of the actual Cathedral is by that which was unhappily rejected—it has merits which place it first in outward majesty, and second in internal grandeur amongst the churches of Christendom. Buried amidst a thick-piled city—hampered as its architect had felt himself in planning the western front to suit that narrow aperture called Ludgate hill—composed as it is of free-stone, and not of marble, and stained with all the impurities of sea-coal smoke—St Paul's never fails to fill the mind of the commonest beholder with admiration at its exquisite unity, and varied and boundless magnificence. To construct a small work, pleasing at once from its beauty and neatness, is something; but to conceive and unite the many distant and distinct parts of such an immense pile as this into one complete whole, tying them elegantly together with that magic band which is at once their ornament and security, like the sculptured key-stone of a triumphal arch, requires a master spirit. There is, perhaps, no one part of the existing Cathedral that equals the celebrated Corinthian portico of Inigo Jones; the merit of Wren lay in observing the proprieties of art—he has few bold, masterly hits—few unlooked-for beauties; there is no little space in the pile on which he has, as it were, condensed his strength—his glory lies in the entire structure—in his unrivalled skill in balancing and combining all the members of his edifice into one consistent and harmonious whole. This is to have in architecture a genius of the Epic order. "A variety of knowledge," says Walpole, "proclaims the universality, a multiplicity of works the abundance, St Paul's the greatness, of Sir Christopher's mind. Our noblest temple (St Paul's), our largest palace (Hampton Court), our most sumptuous hospital (Greenwich), are all works of the same hand."'

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

A Reason for Non-Belief.—"A lady once asked me," says Mr Coleridge, "if I believed in ghosts and apparitions?" I answered, with truth and simplicity, "No, madam; I have seen far too many myself."

A Gentleman.—The following is the negro's definition of a gentleman:—"Massa make de black man workee—make de horse workee—make de ox workee—make ebery ting workee, only de hog:—he no workee: he eat, he drink, he walk 'bout, he go to sleep when he please, he liff like a gentleman."—West India Paper.

A stranger having entered the apartment where the Emperor Napoleon was shaving himself, when in a little town in Italy, he said, "I want to see your great Emperor—what are you to him." The Emperor replied, "I shave him."

Rising and Falling.—Lord Lovat, who was beheaded for the part he took in the rebellion of 1745, had not risen from bed for the two preceding years. When the news of the Prince's landing was communicated to him, he started up and cried—"Lassie, bring me my brogues—I'll rise noo."

Force of Habit.—Dr Armstrong, in lecturing upon inflammation of the brain, remarked on the tendency, in some cases of delirium, of the patient to display in his ramblings the most predominant feeling, and quoted the case of a Justice's clerk, who, during the progress of the delirium, was constantly engaged in swearing in witnesses, one after another, very rapidly; and he invariably concluded by saying, "So help you God—kiss the book—a shilling."

Paste and Diamonds.—John Palmer, the celebrated actor, whose father was a bill-sticker, and who had occasionally followed the same humble occupation himself, being one evening in the green-room, strutting in a pair of glittering buckles, a by-stander remarked that they really resembled diamonds. "Sir," said Palmer with some warmth, "I would have you know I never wear anything but diamonds.". "I ask your pardon," replied the other, "I remember the time when you wore nothing but paste." The laugh was much heightened by Bannister exclaiming, "Jack, why don't you stick him against the wall?"

Talma was born in Paris about the year 1770. He was remarked as an intelligent and peculiarly sensitive child. It was customary in the French schools, as here, to perform a little theatrical piece on the breaking up of the holidays. Talma, then a child of eight years old, played in one of those plays on the story of Tamerlane. His part was that of a confidant, who closed the play by announcing to Tamerlane the death of his son, the bosom friend of the reciter. The child's story was told in a burst of real sorrow, which surprised the audience. However, the curtain fell; and the little actors had dispersed to get rid of their robes; when Talma was missed, and was not found till after some search in a corner, still wrapped in his robe of tragedy, and weeping bitterly at the misfortune of the imperial dynasty. He would scarcely receive comfort, and was for a week ill in consequence of his loyal sorrows.

It was lately observed by a wag, who had got over head and ears in debt, that so far from this having proved detrimental to his character, he had obtained great credit by so doing.

Self-Knowledge and the Knowledge of Others.—"What I have known with respect to myself," says Dr Priestley, "has tended much to lessen both my admiration and my contempt of others."

Love and Cruelty.—We are indebted to Brantome for the following anecdote of the devotedness of lovers in "the olden time." In the reign of Francis I, of France, a young woman having a talkative lover, ordered him to be dumb. His obedience for two long years made all the world believe that he was sunk in melancholy: One day, in a numerous assembly, the young woman, who was not known to be his mistress, undertook to cure him, and did it with a single word—"Speak!"

Characteristic Anecdote of Foote and Dr Johnson.—Shakspeare makes Falstaff not only witty, but the cause of wit in others; and Goldsmith said, that no man could be in Caleb Whiteford's company, without catching the itch of punning.—The English Aristophanes, as Foote was called, was one of these; and no greater proof can be given of his comic powers, than in the following anecdote, related by Dr Johnson:—"The first time," said he, "I was in company with Foote, was at Fitzherbert's. Having no good opinion of the fellow, I was resolved not to be pleased,—and it is very difficult to please a man against his will. I went on eating my dinner pretty sullenly, affecting not to mind him; but the dog became so irresistibly comic, that I was obliged to lay down my knife and fork, throw myself back in the chair, and fairly laugh it out. Sir, he was irresistible."

A Feeling Actress.—The celebrated Mademoiselle Lecouvreur, of the theatre Française, passing through the streets at a late hour, on a raw cold night, was accosted by a poor woman with four little children, who in a tone of bitter suffering, beseeched the actress to take pity on her destitute condition. Mademoiselle Lecouvreur searched in her pockets, and finding nothing, "Wait," said she, "my good woman, I will give you more than you could have hoped for;" and instantly throwing off her mantle, she began to recite the imprecations of Camilla, with a vehemence and superior talents, that soon collected a crowd around her, notwithstanding the inclemency of the season. She then made a collection among the audience, and with the fruits of her charitable exertion gave the poor woman a sufficient sum to provide lodgings and clothes for her infants.

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

Drury Lane.—The Iron Chest.—And the Pantomime.

Covent Garden.—Romance of a Day.—Married Lovers.—And the Pantomime.

Opera House.

The King's Theatre opened for the season on Saturday evening, with Il Barbiere di Siviglia; the first opera by Rossini that was performed in this country (if we are not deceived) and which at once caused his popularity to strike root. That it should do so might be expected, for it is calculated to please every class of persons who delight in dramatic music. The overture is far from being the worst of his compositions—which is saying little—for, with the exception of the principal movements in the Guillaume Tell, we cannot name one of his overtures that we should select for a concert performance. Some of them are mere trumpery and tappage; that to Tancredi, for instance, and which the nodding heads of the million conspire to glorify, is unworthy of any musician above the rank of the "Oscar and Malvina" school. Yet we acknowledge that, generally speaking, the introduzzioni to his overtures are the best and most musician-like movements of those compositions, and on which the lover of harmonious combination delights to repose, always excepting a finely constructed fugue upon a beautiful subject; that is the triumph of the science, but that glory unfortunately, Rossini has not yet achieved. He has been content to catch the clapping hands of a giddy multitude; and so long as they were pleased, to remain satisfied with himself. This is not true greatness—it has more the air of lucky cleverity. Rossini has always appeared to us like a superior man, constantly associated with his inferiors, and perfectly content with his own exertions so long as his company were so. He has been called the Walter Scott of music—the comparison holds good chiefly as regards the fecundity of his genius, and his regularly periodical procreation: and we believe that here the comparison must close.

Digitized by Google

In the first instance, Rossini has not the variety of the great novelist: it is notorious that an impassioned composition of his, may, like a theatrical dress, be put on to the most opposite characters, and appear equally consistent. He has been too indifferent with regard to adapting style to character; or, we should rather conclude, that in this respect his genius is confined, and that he has not a strong perception of the shades of character. This cannot be said of Sir Walter Scott; for not only has he almost faithfully maintained the integrity of his delineations, but he has originated more than our clever Opera composer. We know no musical heroes of his that can compare in strength of colouring, accuracy of discrimination, and variety of design with the favourites in the Waverley novels. We need not enumerate them. Suffice to say, that Rossini is a man of undoubted genius, but one who has preferred wealth to fame—and "verily he hath his reward."

The Barbiere is a delightful opera, and perhaps exhibits fewer of the writer's common-places than any he has written. It contains many charming melodies, as pleasant and well-contrasted concerted pieces, and constantly-repeated characteristic effects for the band. It is "champagne first, champagne last, champagne midst—and without end."

With one or two exceptions, and which will appear presently, we have seldom heard an opera upon the whole more crisply performed. Signor Lablache, and who was the chief attraction of the evening, performed the part of Figaro. He possesses the finest qualifications for an operatic performer: a gigantic voice, yet musical; a correct ear, a sound judgment, a good knowledge of music, a pure and finished style, and apparently a strong memory, for we have never yet detected him at fault, and upon more than one occasion have seen him (as on Saturday evening) give the cue to another in the midst of a quintett or sestett. Add to all this, he is a very fine actor, ever alive in filling in the minor touches of his part; a man of real humour, and, unless we are greatly deceived, of strong sensibility. It was perfectly delightful to see his Titanian figure come bounding on to the stage like a mad elephant in a fresh prairie—"wisest of brutes." "To make us mirth, he used all his might," and he succeeded. If the manager know the true value of this fine actor, he will this season confute the ill-natured sneer that he can perform but one character,—the writer of which surely did not witness his performance of Leporello—his perfect singing and acting in the "Madamina;" and the still finer scene in the cemetery, in which his countenance at last became quite horrific.

Signor De Begnis played the part of Dr Bartolo, not in his finest style, but very admirably. Signor Curioni too, in the part of the Count, gave us more pleasure than we have been accustomed to receive from him for several past seasons. What was unusual with him, he was perfect in his part; what was still more unusual, he sang in tune; and to complete the surprise he had prepared for us, he played with spirit. A new soprano (Madame Sigl Vespermann) made her debut in the part of Rosina. An apology having been made for her on account of indisposition from cold, it would be injudicious to decide upon the real quality of her voice; but we suspect that it will prove to be somewhat "declined into the vale of years;" many of her notes strongly reminded us of Madame Lalande. Moreover, she delights in the Arabesque of singing, appending uncouth tails and flourishes to her figures, and even repeating over and over again the hateful, and fortunately worn-out slur of semi-tones.

After the opera, the whole company came forward, and sang the national air of "God save the King." Miss Ayton sang one verse in solo, and all through out of tune, with so horrible a sturdiness of purpose, that it had all the effect of a joke. The countenances of La Blache and De Begnis upon the occasion, were amusingly edifying. What characters does M. Laporte propose for Miss Ayton?

The lovely ballet of La Somnambule concluded the performance of the evening. Madame Montessu, who is a charming dancer, played the chief character, and in a style of dumb pathos that we could with delight have dwelt upon at some length—but "the devil who comes for copy" insists upon our coming to a close. C.

Drury Lane.

The play of the Iron Chest, in which Mr Kean appeared on Saturday last, is founded, as most of our readers know, on Godwin's novel of Caleb Williams, a production, which is second to none in the intense interest which it preserves throughout, and powerful moreover in the vigour with which some of the characters are drawn. The play is decidedly inferior to the novel; but the dramatist has contrived to lighten the gloomy tenor of the story by the introduction of a sprinkling of the comic. Sir Edward Mortimer, (the Falkland of Godwin) has reversed the wise maxim of Addison, that "a man's first care should be to obtain the approbation of his own heart, his next, to escape the censure of the world;" and regarding the fleeting fame which the world can afford him if his conduct shall but seem to merit it, he becomes regardless of higher considerations; is contented to know himself a liar, a murderer, a false accuser, provided he can keep the reputation of a man of honour. Although the play is well known, a slight advertence to the plot may be acceptable. The reader will remember that Mortimer having been grossly insulted by a vulgar rival in provincial influence, waylays the latter and kills him; that an inquiry takes place, out of which Mortimer on the strength of his high character, comes out triumphant; he lives, however, but to be the victim of remorse and constant apprehension that his guilt will be discovered, and his good name be lost. A dagger and other proofs of his guilt he conceals in an Iron Chest; his secretary Wilford, induced by curiosity, opens the lid of this chest, during the temporary absence of Mortimer from the room; Mortimer, enters and surprises him, and apprehensive that his secret has been discovered, obliges Wilford to take an oath never to divulge it. He then relates to him the dreadful fact; Wilford is confounded with horror, and determines to quit the mansion instantly; he flies, is brought back and falsely accused of theft by Mortimer, who had placed in his box certain jewels and papers which had been in the iron chest. The guilt of Wilford appears incontestible, and he is about to be consigned to the officers of justice, when suddenly the baseness of Mortimer is made manifest. In removing the papers alleged to be stolen, he had unknowingly removed with them, a paper containing the fatal dagger; that dagger now falls on the ground before him; appalled and brain-stricken he seeks no longer to hide his crimes; he expresses contrition for his injuries to Wilford, and dies in a state of distraction.

There is considerable scope for the talents of a great tragic actor in the character of Mortimer, and it has always been regarded as a part calculated to elicit some of the finest powers of Mr Kean. He played it on Saturday with his usual judgment, but with some abatement as to physical power. Nothing could be finer than the manner of his disclosing his guilt to Wilford; when he told how his enemy after the fatal blow fell, his imagination seemed to conjure up the past before him, and as he stared on vacancy, he appeared to be following with his eye the falling man to the earth. His dying scene was also beautifully effective, exhibiting all the conflicting emotions of guilt, shame, contrition, and a distracted mind.

The applause was vehement; and on Mr Younge appearing to announce the performances for Monday, Kean was called for, most vociferously; he did not, however, appear; and, in consequence an incessant noise was kept up during the performance of the subsequent overture. Mr Vining played Wilford very respectably; and in some passages, with an energy and feeling which we hardly expected. Harley's Samson is one of his best characters. The mixed simplicity, roguishness (the word seems too hard), and kind-heartedness of the part were all fully brought out; and a humour blended with the whole which made the representation highly amusing. Miss Phillips in Blanch had not much to do. This lady always appears to take great pains. She would succeed better if she could avoid a certain formality of manner, which has very much the air of a person lecturing. F. F.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Tragedy of
KING RICHARD III.
[By SHAKSPEARE].

Elizabeth, Queen of Edward the Fourth, Mrs FAUCIT.
Lady Anne, Miss FAUCIT. Duchess of York, Mrs Webster.
King Henry, Mr Younge. Prince of Wales, Miss Chikini.
Duke of York, Miss Poole. Duke of Norfolk, Mr Thompson.
Duke of Glo'ster, Mr KEAN.
Earl of Oxford, Mr Howard. Lord Stanley, Mr Hammerton.
Duke of Buckingham, Mr COOPER. Earl of Richmond, Mr WALLACK.
Lord Mayor, Mr Andrews. Sir Robert Brackenbury, Mr Yarnold.
Sir William Catesby, Mr Cooke. Sir Richard Ratcliffe, Mr Cathie.
Sir Walter Blunt, Mr Eaton. Tressel, Mr J. Vining. Tyrrel, Mr Honner.

Previous to the Tragedy, (1st time in this Country) Freidrich Kuhlau's Overture to the Opera, called 'William Shakspeare.'

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called
DAVY JONES.
[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV, Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Billboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, William Tell; and the Devil's Brother.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Tragedy of
FAZIO.
[By Mr MILMAN.]

Marchesa Aldabella, Miss TAYLOR, Clara, Miss PHILLIPS,
Bianca, Miss F. KEMBLE. Giraldi Fazio, Mr WARDE,
Duke of Florence, Mr EGERTON, Bartolo, Mr BLANCHARD,
Philario, Mr Henry, Falsetto, Mr Parry, Gonsalvo, Mr Baker,
Theodore, Mr Mears, Keeper, Mr Fuller, Pietro, Mr Turnour,
Gentleman, Mr Irwin, Antonio, Mr Heath, Aurio, Mr Crumpton.

Previous to the Tragedy, a Grand MS. Overture by Friedrich Kuhlau.
After the Tragedy, an Overture by J. N. Hummel.

After which, a New Petite Comedy, to be called
MARRIED LOVERS.

The Songs, composed by Mr Barnett.

Duchess D'Orleans, Miss FORDE. Marchioness de Meneville, Miss TAYLOR.
Lady Ascot, Mrs CHATTERLEY. Annette, Miss PHILLIPS.
Duc D'Orleans, Mr ABBOTT. Marquis de Meneville, Mr BARTLEY.
Sir John Ascot, Mr WARDE. Colonel O'Dillon, Mr POWER.
Pierre, Mr Irwin. Francis, Mr Mears.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called
HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.
[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

To-morrow, Cinderella; and the Pantomime.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

In the course of the Season, the following Performers will appear for the first time
Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY, du Theâtre du Gymnase.
Madame ALBERT, du Theâtre des Nouveautés.
M. BRUNET, Artiste, du Theâtre des Varietés.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie, par
First appearance of Mons. BOUFFE, who is engaged for 12 nights only.
LE DUEL ET LE DEJEUNER.
Vaudeville en Un Acte, de Theâtre des Variétés.
Madame de St. Léon, Mademoiselle St. Ange.
Dugazon, Descessards, Comediens du Theâtre Français, M. Gamard et M. Préval.
Le Colonel St. Léon, M. Alfred. Lecoq, son Garde Chasse, M. Guenée.

Suivi de la Première Représentation de
LE MARCHAND DE LA RUE SAINT DENIS.
Vaudeville nouveau en Trois Actes, de MM. BRAZIER et de VILLENEUVE.
Madame Dumont, Mme. Préval. Henriette, sa Fille, Mlle. Florval.
Séraphine, Nièce de Madame Dumont, Mlle. St. Ange.
Octavie, Fille de Beaupré, Mlle. Eliza. Marguerite, Gouvernante, Mlle. Emma.
Jeannette, Nourrice, Mlle. Corra.
M. BOUFFE remplira le Rôle de Théophile, (his original Character)
M. Dumont, Marchand de Soiries, M. St. Aubert.
Dorvilliers, Magistrat, M. DERVAL. Edouard, son Fils, M. Alfred.
Le Baron Beaupré, M. Cloup. Le Maire, M. Paulin.
Jocard, Garçon de Bureau, M. Preval. Un Auvergnat, M. Granville.
Un Garçon de Caisse, M. Arnaud. Un Vétéran, M. Guenée.

On Finira par
LA MAISON EN LOTERIE.
Vaudeville en Un Acte de PICARD.
Mademoiselle Verneuil, Marchande de Mode, Mademoiselle Eliza.
Toinette, Servante de Jacquillard, Mlle. St Ange.
M. BOUFFE remplira le Rôle de Rigaudin.
M. Jacquillard, vieux Notaire, M. Préval. Charles, Valet de Chambre, M. Alfred.
Tapineau, Tambour de Village, M. Arnaud.

QUEEN'S THEATRE, TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

After which will be presented a New Operatic Piece, entitled
GALATEA.
From GAY'S Serenata. With HANDEL'S Music, arranged by Mr C. POTTER.
Principal Characters by Miss VERNON, Mrs GARRICK, and Mrs HUMBY.
Mr BENNETT. Mr J. RUSSELL. Mr SPENCER. Mr G. SMITH.
Mr MUNROE. Mr G. LEJEUNE. And Mr E. SEGUIN.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.
The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Maria.

At the end of the Opera, a Fantasia on the Oboe, by Mr Grattan Cooke.

After which, a New Musical Comedietta, in One Act, entitled
THREE TO ONE.
The Music, by Mr G. Cooke.
The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss WELLS. Miss AYRES.
And Mr FORRESTER.

In the course of the Evening, Winter's Overture to 'Zaira,' and Mozart's Overture to 'Il Don Giovanni.'

To conclude with a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called
EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.
The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss Stohwasser. Miss Wells. Miss Garrick.
Miss Sinclair. Mr Smith. Mr Tilbury. Mr Munroe. Mr Roberts.
And Mr GREEN.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called
THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.
Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Grizzle Glowworm, Mrs Beaumont. Susan, Miss Barnett. Amoret, Miss M. Glover.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
Linaro, Alpanor, and Spirit Hunters, Messrs Morris, Winning, Fry, Taylor, &c.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Sebastian, Gregory, and Adam, Messrs Sanders, Willson, and Paulo, Jun.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Andrew and Karl, (his Children) Masters Calkin and Barnett.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

After which, a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called
GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.
[By Mr BUCKSTONE].

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.

To conclude with the Burlesque Burletta, called
THE QUADRUPEDS.
The Characters by Miss Daly, Mr O. Smith, and Mr J. Reeve.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, called
THE CHASTE SALUTE
[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]

The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called
THE GRENADIER.
[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]

Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

After which, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called
MIS-APPREHENSION.
[By Mr C. DANCE.]

Miss Clementina Bramble, Miss Stuart. Fanny, Miss Pincott. Ellen, Miss Kabrey.
Thomas, Mr Cooper. Money, Mr W. VINING. Mr Williams, Mr Coates.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled
OLYMPIC REVELS.
[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.

SURREY THEATRE.

Will be revived the celebrated Drama, entitled
THE ITALIAN WIFE.
Bianca, Miss M. C. POOLE,
Marchesa Aldabella, Miss Scott, Clara, Miss Jordan.
Duke of Venice, Mr Dibdin Pitt, Gonsalvo, Mr Gough, Falsetto, Mr Honner,
Giraldi Fazio, Mr OSBALDISTON,
Bartolo, Mr Williams, Philario, Mr Almar, Antonio, Mr Young,
Theodore, Mr Webb, Piero, Mr Lee, Gentleman, Mr Tully, Keeper, Mr Hobbs

After which, the favourite Drama of
A HUSBAND AT SIGHT.
The Characters by Miss Somerville, Miss Vincent, Madame Simon,
Mr C. Hill, Mr Vale, Mr Williams, Mr Lee, Mr Boulanger, and Mr Grammer.

To conclude with, the Grand Serious Spectacle, in Two Acts, entitled
OBI: OR, THREE-FINGER'D JACK!
With the original Music, by the late Dr Arnold.
Rosa, Madame Simon. Quashee's Wife, Mrs Vale. Sam's Wife, Miss Jordan.
Captain Orford, Mr Honner. Planter, Mr Almar.
Overseer, Mr Edwin. Three-Finger'd Jack, Mr C. Hill.

COBURG THEATRE.—The Spectre of the Castle—The Night Hag—And Elizabeth.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck; or the Buccaneer's Bridal—Harlequin and Mother Goose.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 135.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Book of the Seasons; or the Calendar of Nature. By William Howitt. 12mo. pp. 404. Colburn and Bentley.

FEBRUARY.

As I have already observed, I regard this as the most cheerless month in the year. There may be pleasant varieties of it; the latter end may, and frequently is, much more agreeable than the commencement; but, as a whole, it is as I have characterised it. It is at once damp and foggy. Besides the earth being saturated with a whole winter's moisture, there is generally abundance of rain during this month, so much so as to have acquired for it the cognomen of "February fill-dike." The frosts and snows which have been locking up and burying the earth for weeks and months, are now giving way, and what is so cheerless and chilly as A GREAT THAW? There is a lack of comfort felt everywhere. In real winter weather, the clear frosty air sharply saluted the face by day, and revealed to the eye at night a scene of pure and sublime splendour in the lofty and intensely blue sky, glittering with congregated stars, or irradiated with the placid moon. There was a sense of vigour, of elasticity, of freshness about you, which made it welcome; but now, most commonly, by day or by night, the sky is hidden in impenetrable vapour; the earth is sodden and splashy with wet; and even the very fireside does not escape the comfortless sense of humidity. Everything presents to the eye, accustomed so long to the brightness of clear frosts, and the pure whiteness of snow, a dingy and soiled aspect. All things are dripping with wet; it hangs upon the walls like a heavy dew; it penetrates into the drawers and wardrobes of our warmest chambers; and you are surprised at the unusual dampness of your clothes, linen, books, and papers; and, in short, almost everything you have occasion to examine. Brick and stone floors are now dangerous things for delicate and thinly-shod people to stand upon. To this source, and in fact to the damps of this month, operating in various ways, may be attributed not a few of the colds, coughs, and consumptions so prevalent in England. Pavements are frequently so much elevated by the expansion of the moisture beneath, as to obstruct the opening and shutting of doors and gates, and your gravel walks resemble saturated sponges. Abroad, the streets are flooded with muddy water, and slippery with patches of half-thawed ice and snow, which strike through your shoes in a moment. The houses, and all objects whatever, have a dirty and disconsolate aspect; and clouds of dim and smoky haze hover over the whole dispiriting scene. In the country, the prospect is not much better; the roads are full of mire. Instead of the enchantments of hoar-frost, you have naked hedges, sallow and decaying meads beneath them, brown and wet pastures, and sheets of ice, but recently affording so much fine exercise to skaiters and sliders, half submersed in water, full of great cracks, scattered with straws and dirty patches, and stones half liberated by the thaw:—such are the miserable features of the time.

Let us felicitate ourselves that such joyless period is seldom of long duration. The winds of March speedily come piping their jovial strains; clearing the face of the blessed heavens from their sullen veil of clouds, and sweeping away the superabundant moisture from earth and air. Oh! blithe and animating is the breath of March! It is like a cool but spirit-stirring draught of some ancient vintage; elating but not enervating the heart; deadening the memory of past evil, and expanding it to the delicious hope of future delights. So precious a boon, however, is not exclusively permitted to March: February is often allowed to be a liberal partaker ere its close, and we have known the winds lift up their voices this month with all their triumphant and sonorous energy. Nothing can perhaps illustrate so livingly our idea of a spirit as a mighty wind—present in its amazing power and sublimity, yet seen only in its effects. We are whirled along with its careering torrent with irresistible power; we are driven before it, as Miss Mitford says, as by a steam-engine. How it comes rushing and roaring over the house, like the billows of a mighty ocean! Then for the banging of doors, the screaming and creaking of signs, the down toppling of crazy gables, the showering of tiles upon the pavement, as if the bomb-shells of a besieging army were demolishing the roofs, and rendering it even death to walk the streets! Then for a scene of awful grandeur upon the glorious ocean. That which, but an hour before, was calm and sun-bright, a variety of vessels lying at anchor, or sailing to and fro in serene beauty, then is a scene of sublime and chaotic uproar!—the waves rolling and foaming, and dashing their spray over rocks, pier-heads, houses, and even over the loftiest towers and churches too, as I have seen it, to an amazing extent, till the water ran down the walls like rain, and the windows, at a great distance from the beach, were covered with a salt incrustation—the vessels, meanwhile, labouring amidst the riotous billows as for life, and tugging at their cables as if mad for their escape. Many a beautiful, many a wild, many an animating spectacle is to be witnessed on the shore of our happy isle in such moments. What anxious groups are collected on the quays of populous ports! What lonely peril is encountered on distant strands, where the solitary fisherman picks up a troubled and precarious livelihood!

Then, too, for the most animated scene which the inland country can exhibit in all the twelve months, a scene mixed with no slight touches of the grotesque. Wherever you go, the people, perhaps suddenly aroused from the tranquil fireside of a Sunday afternoon, are swarming upon the roofs of their houses like bees startled from their cells by the unexpected appearance of some formidable intruder, toiling to resist the outrageous attack of the storm upon the thatch; which is, here and there, torn clean from the rafters, and in other places heaves and pants as if impatient to try a flight into the next field or garden. There is an universal erection of ladders, a bustling, anxious laying on of logs, rails, harrows, or whatever may come to hand, to keep down the mutinous roof. Old wives, with spectacled noses and kerchiefs incontinently tied over their mob caps, are seen reconnoitring pig-sties, hen-roosts, &c. lest they be blown down, or something be blown down upon them. What a solemn and sublime roar too, there is in the woods—a sound as if of tempestuous seas! Whatever poetical spirit can hear it without being influenced by incommunicable ideas of power, majesty, and the stupendous energies of the elements!

"Oh storm and darkness, ye are wondrous strong!"

What picturesque ruin is there scattered around you! Trees overwhelmed, immense branches torn down, small boughs broken, and dry leaves whirled along, or quivering in the air like birds. What a harvest of decayed sticks for the Goody Blakes, who, with their checked aprons held up, will not fail to discover it! What a harvest, too, for the newspapers, which will be filled for a season with calamitous accounts of accidents and deaths by falling of chimneys, shipwrecks, and so forth!

Towards the end of the month, we are gladdened with symptoms of approaching spring. On warm banks the commencement of vegetation is perceptible, the sap is stirring in the trees, swelling and feeding the buds; in gardens a variety of green things are peeping from the earth, and snow-drops, hepaticas, &c. are actually in bloom.

In towns it is a cheering sight, even when all without is frosty and wintry, to see, as we pass, in cottage-windows, tufts of crocuses and snow-drops flowering in pots; and in those of wealthier dwellings hyacinths, narcissi, &c. in glasses, displaying their bulbs and long fibrous roots in the clear water below, and the verdure and flowery freshness of summer above. It is a sight truly English. It is in accordance with our ideas of home-comfort and elegance. If we are to believe travellers, in no country is the domestic culture of flowers so much attended to as in this. I trust this will always be a prevailing taste with us. There is something pure and refreshing in the appearance of plants in a room, and watched and waited on, as they are generally, by the gentler sex, they are links in many pleasant associations. They are the cherished favourites of our mothers, wives, sisters, and friends not less dear, and connect themselves in our minds with their feminine delicacy, loveliness, and affectionate habits and sentiments.'

"THEY SAY," A SUSPICIOUS AUTHORITY.—"They say" tells that which is not true at least three quarters of the time. He is about the worst authority you can produce to support the credibility of your statement. Scarcely was there ever a suspicious report put in circulation but this Mr They Say was the author of it; and he always escapes responsibility and detection, because, living nowhere, he can never be found. Who said that Mr E., the merchant, was supposed to be in a falling condition?—Why, "They say" so. On what authority do you affirm that neighbour Tomkins has been in bad company?—Why, "They say" so. Is it a fact that Miss —— is not so circumspect and chaste as she should be?—Why, "They say" so. Plague on this Mr They Say—he is a half-brother to Mr Nobody, who does all the mischief, and lives nowhere but in the inventive brain of those who, undeserving respect themselves, are desirous to pull down others to their own level.—We always suspect the truth of a report which comes from the authority—"They say."

Digitized by Google

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

WHY AND BECAUSE.—A rich man making his will, left handsome legacies to all his domestics except his steward. On being asked the reason for this exception: "I leave him out," said he, "because he has been in my service for more than twenty years."

GRASPING AT TOO MUCH.—A celebrated Irish Judge, in passing sentence on a thief who had been convicted of stealing a time-piece in a dwelling-house, said "that in grasping at time, he had reached eternity."

A NATURAL MISTAKE.—A black servant, being examined in the Church Catechism, by the minister of the parish, was asked, "What are you made of?" Cato answered, "Of mud, massa." On being told he should say, "of dust," he replied, "No, massa, it no do—no stick togedder."

FORCE OF HABIT.—It is said of a celebrated Bath physician, that he could not prescribe even for himself without a fee, and therefore when unwell, he took a guinea out of one pocket, and put it in the other.

DELICATE FLATTERY.—In the Bristol market, a lady laying her hand on a joint of veal, said, "I think, Mr B., this veal is not quite so white as usual."—"Put on your glove, madam," replied the dealer, "and you will think differently."

A THIN HOUSE ACCOUNTED FOR.—The author of a play, at its second representation, which happened soon after war was declared between France and England,—seeing the house was very thin, observed to Morton the dramatist, who sat near him in the pit, "The thinness of the house is owing, I suppose, to the war." "No, sir," said Morton—"to the piece."

CASTLES IN THE AIR.—Dr John Wilkins, Bishop of Chester in the reign of Charles II, had attempted to show the possibility of a voyage to the moon. The Duchess of Newcastle, who had written thirteen volumes upon speculative subjects, meeting the Bishop one evening at a concert, accosted him thus:—"My Lord, suppose you were able to carry me to the moon, where am I to abide in my way thither?"—"Madam," said he, "of all the people in the world, I should not have expected that question from you, who have built so many castles in the air, that you might sleep every night in one of them."

INTERJECTIONS.—These, which have been called brute sounds, and supposed to be destitute of meaning, may often be traced to significant words. Few exclamations are, at first hearing, less intelligible than those used by huntsmen—Tally ho! and Halloo! But the former of these has been clearly traced to the French, au taillí! "to cover!" and the latter has been conjectured to originate in the cry still used by wolf-hunters in France, au loup! "To the wolf!"

"THE RULING PASSION STRONG IN DEATH."—M. de Lagny, of the Academy of Sciences, who was a clever mathematician, having become insensible in his last illness, M. Maupertuis approached his bed, and endeavoured to rouse him by calling aloud several times. At last he exclaimed, "Monsieur de Lagny, what is the square of twelve?"—"One hundred and forty-four," answered the other; and in a few minutes after, expired.

SLEEPING IN THE RIGHT PLACE.—Doddington was very lethargic. Falling asleep one day after dinner with Sir Richard Temple, Lord Cobham, and others, one of the party reproached him with his drowsiness. He denied having been asleep; and to prove he had not, offered to repeat all Lord Cobham had been saying. Cobham challenged him to do so. Doddington repeated a story, and Lord Cobham owned he had been telling it. "Well," said Doddington, "and yet I did not hear a word of it; but I went to sleep, because I knew that about this time of day you would tell that story."

MEMORABLE ANECDOTE CONNECTED WITH THE DEATH OF SIR PHILIP SIDNEY.—Sir Philip Sidney died at thirty-two years of age, on the 17th of October 1586, in consequence of a wound he received in a desperate engagement near Zutphen, upon which occasion he manifested a noble sympathy towards a humble fellow-sufferer in the conflict. As Sidney was returning from the field of battle, pale, languid, and thirsty with excess of bleeding, he asked for water. It was brought, and had approached his lips, when he instantly resigned it to a dying soldier, whose ghastly countenance attracted notice, speaking these ever memorable words, "This man's necessity is still greater than mine."—Mr Hone's Year Book: Number for February.—[An extract from this work, in our Chat of Saturday, entitled "Conclusive Answers," by mistake had not the source acknowledged.]

FREE TRANSLATION.—In a French publication entitled the "Journey of General Lafayette in the United States of America in 1824," there is an entire translation of Mr Ingersoll's discourse before the American Philosophical Society on the occasion of the General's attendance, in which the following ludicrous version occurs. The lines of Shakspeare,

> "Man is a creature holding large discourse, > Looking before and after,"

are thus done into French:—

> "Man is a creature who makes long speeches,
> Who looks to the future and the past."

"AN IT PLEASE THE PIGS,"—is, with a small change, the old Roman Catholic ejaculation, "An it please the Pix," which is the box in which the Host is carried.—Gentleman's Magazine.

NAMES AND FACES.—The master of a charity-school in Lincolnshire, was lecturing a dull boy, whom he could not make learn the letters of the alphabet, when the lad, overwhelmed with the reproaches he received, blubbered out, "I does'nt know 'em, master, by their neams, but I knows 'em by their feaces."

DISLOYAL PUNCTUATION.—A dealer in earthenware arriving at a country town, and wishing to give notice that he would make a sale of his goods for one day only, gave directions to the town-crier to notify his intention the preceding afternoon. The worthy stentor, for the greater accuracy, committed the notice to writing, and afterwards proclaimed it thus: "The said goods will continue on sale to-morrow. And for that day only, God save the King!"

CURIOUS CLOCK.—1655. Feb. 24.—Mr Evelyn notes his having seen a curious mechanical contrivance. "I was shewed a table clock, whose balance was only a chrystal ball sliding on parallel irons without being at all fixed, but rolling from stage to stage till falling on a spring concealed from sight, it was thrown up to the utmost channel again, made with an imperceptible declivity; in this continual vicissitude of motion prettily entertaining the eye every half minute, and the next half giving progress to the hand that showed the hour, and giving notice by a small bell, so as in 120 half minutes, or periods of the bullets falling on the ejaculatory spring, the clock-part struck. This very extraordinary piece (richly adorned) had been presented by some German prince to our late king [Charles I.], and was now in the possession of the usurper [Oliver Cromwell], valued at 200*l*."—Hone's Year Book.

THE ART OF WAR.—Extract of a conversation between Fabre the painter, the Countess of Albany, and Paul Louis Courier.—These personages were discussing the age of Louis XIV, which the painter was extolling above the present, in respect, principally, of its pre-eminence in the arts. Madame d'Albany retorted, however, that the art of war was brought to far greater perfection in the present times; this gives Paul Louis an opportunity of delivering his sentiments, as an old artillery officer, on the subject, through the mouth of Fabre. Paul: "But, madam," said I, "you must remark, that there is considerable doubt whether there is any art in war."—"What! ask him," said I; and, seeing him smile, she said, "But there are so many books upon it."—"Oh!" replied he, "there are books upon theology, and upon magic, too; still, I believe one just as much as the other."—"But what do you mean, then, by tactics, fortification, castrametation?"—"May I die if I know."—"Oh, but I know; and I will tell you," said the Countess. "Tactics are the art of arranging soldiers, according to certain rules, in order of battle. In one word, it is the art of fighting."—"And without this art," says he, "there would be no fighting! Oh, the grand, the indispensable science! For what, I pray, should we do to kill one another, if great men did not show us the method?"—"Whatever you choose: but still you can't deny that this method, this science, exists."—"Hear me," says he; "I wish to believe, since all the world tells me so, that war is an art: but you must own that it is the only one which requires no apprenticeship. It is the only one that a man may know without having learnt. In all others, study and time are required; one begins by being a pupil; but in this one, is a master at once; and whatever little disposition one may bring to it, the first attempt is constantly the chef-d'œuvre."—"Explain yourself," said the Countess, "for your idea is strange, or I do'nt understand you."—"Well, then," says he, "I, for instance, when I wished to become a painter, I did not sit down to paint all at once. It was necessary, first of all, to learn drawing; I drew from statues; I drew from nature. But, before I got so far, how much time do you think I spent in drawing eyes, and ears, feet, hands, half-lengths, then whole-lengths? And then, renewed labour, new studies from live models. How much application, patience, and difficulty; and still I had not yet begun to paint! At last I did paint—very badly at first, then not quite so ill, and afterwards a little better. At last, at the end of thirty years, I am a painter, such as I am; and if I should study my art for thirty years longer, I should never know as much as there would be left for me to learn. Now, see what I want to say; in this great art of commanding men in battle, the science does not come in the same mode, little by little, but all at once. Directly it is applied to, all is learnt in an instant that there is to learn. A young prince, eighteen years old, arrives in his carriage and four from Court, gives battle, and gains it, and he is a great general for the rest of his life—the greatest general in the world!"—"Who then," asked the Countess, "who ever did this?"—"The great Condé."—"Ah! that was a genius."—"Undoubtedly," said he; "and Gaston de Foix! History is full of similar examples. But you don't find these things in the other arts. Whatever genius a prince may have received from heaven, he can't get off his horse and produce in his boots and spurs the Stabat of Pergolesi, or the Holy Family of Raphael. But do you wish," said I, "that a prince should be a painter or a chapel-master?"—"No," said he; "God forbid I should have such a thought! Moliere has said, I recollect—'custom, with us, does not require a gentleman to know anything'—much less a prince. But these people, who know nothing, know how to make war, eh?"—"Certainly; and better than any one else."—"Oh! better is another affair."

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Richard III.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Fazio.—Married Lovers.—And the Pantomime.

OPERA HOUSE.

THAT incubus of the daily writer—the printer's messenger—vulgo, the "Devil," alluded to at the close of the last article on the Opera, prevented our enlarging upon two or three circumstances in the evening's entertainment which deserved notice. Had the inconsiderate and rapacious rogue given one breath, he would have received a more ample supply for his craving appetite; and we should have gone on to the amount of half a column of more matter; but thus it is, and thus it should be, with the greedy and exacting—their eagerness, like "vaulting ambition, o'erleaps itself, and falls on the other side."

It may not, we should hope, be deemed impertinent to hint to the lovers of music, in the abstract (for the remark is not addressed to the scientific) that an abundance of pleasure may be added to their gratification when listening to the combined effects, by also devoting their faculties to the comprehending of the composer's apprehension of his subject, not only in his adaptations for the voice,—there the most superficial observer can frequently discover his intention with tolerable accuracy;—but in the orchestral accompaniments. In the broad and more palpable appeals to the senses these will always be apparent; but in the more remote and refined descriptions of character or of adventitious occurrence during the progress of the story, they will never fail to perceive that the great musician is equally alive to his subject, and accurate in his description, as in the former. And the tracing of his mind upon these occasions is another pleasure added to that of listening to the general effect of voice and instrument combined. This is musical painting; and the more imaginative the composer, the more vividly does he by sounds convey his intention to the "mind's ear" of his audience. In the "Barbiere" for instance, how ingeniously has ROSSINI, by the instruments alone, contrived to describe the fantastic motion of a drunkard, when the Count, pretending to be intoxicated, comes reeling in:—what a capital lurch there is in the first phrase, and which every now and then occurs during the scene! There is a catch up in the passage as if he stumbled. This appears to us very clever. So again in the general drawl of the accompaniment when in the disguise of the music-master, he repeats over and over again his "cuckoo-song" of salutation to old Bartolo. And, not to multiply instances, in the little tremulous flutter of the violins, when Figaro feels Basilio's pulse, whom he pronounces to be attacked with scarlet fever. Similar examples in MOZART'S operas might be multiplied without end.

We omitted also in the last article, to notice the style in which Signor SPAGNOLETTI played the solo obligato on the violin which precedes Rosina's song with her tutor-lover. It was performed with such exquisite taste, feeling, and purity of tone, as to produce an animated applause from all parts of the house.

In the divertissement, M. PAUL, who afterwards played the lover in the Ballet of "La Somnambule," introduced a novel action, (at least it was so to us) among the usual evolutions intended to pourtray the amorous advances of a young Faun to his favoured Nymph. In bounding before her, he contrived to throw his body forward in a graceful curve, and at the same time extending his arms, he conveyed the idea of an aerial form suspended and hovering with delight over the object of its attraction. The group was exceedingly picturesque, almost as perfect as one of the Grecian medallions.

As the writer of the present article has no other interest in the paper than an anxiety for its welfare, he may be allowed to express his gratification upon observing it among the audience in the pit on Saturday evening. C.

COVENT GARDEN.

To describe the plot of The Married Lovers, as it should be told to make it apparent to the reader, would occupy the time of an Arabian Night's entertainment. And when he had heard it, if, like ourselves, he love a surprise, he would wish the writer at old Scratch for doing so. Grateful were we that we had been kept in primitive ignorance till the scene itself opened upon us. Thus much we will discover, that it comprises a scheme of three married ladies in Paris, two French and one English, the Duchess d'Orleans, the Marchioness de Meneville, and Lady Ascot, to entrap and expose their husbands, who are each in love with the others' wife. And this they do in the most admirable and humorous manner. There is also an amusing common friend of the gentlemen, one Colonel O'Dillon, who, with native mis-apprehension, by keeping each off helps him on, and by helping each on keeps him off:—in short, the piece, which we hear is written by Mr POWER, is by many degrees the most entertaining novelty we have witnessed for many a month. It is true farce, with ample humour to stamp it such, and no common-place buffoonery. If the plot as well as the writing proceed from Mr POWER'S own brain, we heartily compliment him upon his talent; we thank him for a hearty laugh, and strongly urge him to follow up his well-placed hit. His "Etiquette run mad," which he introduced at the Tottenham Street Theatre, was amusing, and contained some sparkling dialogue; but this piece is consistently written; and the humour, with the blunders, thicken to the very close. Do not take our word, reader; but go and judge for yourself; and if you are what we assume every reader of the TATLER to be, you will not say we have too highly raised your expectations. For our own parts, we can only say that theatrical criticism would be a sinecure if we had no meaner compositions to discuss than The Married Lovers. C.

UNDER THE ROSE.—It is reported, that when roses were first brought from Italy to England, they were consecrated as presents from the Pope, and placed over the gates of confessionals as the symbols of secresy. Hence the meaning of the phraise—"under the rose."

CONSOLATION UNDER CALUMNY.—Any person who is zealous for promoting the interest of his country, must conquer all that tenderness and delicacy which may make him afraid of being spoken ill of, or his endeavours will often produce no less uneasiness to himself than benefit to the public. Among a people who indulge themselves in the utmost freedoms of thought and speech, a man must either be insignificant, or able to bear an undeserved reproach. —Addison.

ACROSTIC.—The initial letters of the names of the Kings of the Buonaparte family form the Latin word Nihil.

N udovicus.
I osephus.
H ieronymus.
I oachim.
L apoleon.

TOM D'URFEY.—D'Urfey, and Bello, a musician, had high words once at Epsom, and swords were resorted to, but with great caution. A brother wit maliciously compared this rencontre with that mentioned in Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia, between Clinias and Dametas.

"I sing of a duel in Epsom befel,
'Twixt Fa sol la D'Urfey, and Sol la mi Bell:
But why do I mention the scribbling brother?
For, naming the one, you may guess at the other.
Betwixt them there happen'd a terrible clutter;
Bell set up the loud pipes, and D'Urfey did sputter—
'Draw, Bell, wert thou dragon, I'll spoil thy soft note:'
'For thy squalling,' said t'other, 'I'll cut thy throat.'
With a scratch on the finger the duel's dispatch'd;
Thy Clinias, O Sidney, was never so match'd."

TREATMENT OF NEW COMPETITORS BY THE MEAN AMONG AUTHORS.—How often do we see a person whose intentions are visibly to do good by the works which he publishes, treated in as scurrilous a manner as if he were an enemy to mankind? All the little scramblers after fame fall upon him, publish every blot in his life, depend upon hearsay to defame him, and have recourse to their own invention, rather than suffer him to erect himself into an author with impunity. Not only the dull and the malicious, which make a formidable party in our island, but the whole fraternity of writers, rise up in arms against every new intruder into the world of fame: and a thousand to one, before they have done, prove him not only to be a fool, but a knave. Successful authors do what they can to exclude a competitor, while the unsuccessful with as much eagerness lay in their claim to him as a brother.—Addison.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

A favorite Opera Buffa, in Two Acts, entitled

IL BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA.

[By ROSSINI.]

The Principal Characters by Madame SIGL VESPERMANN. Madame CASTELLI. Signor LABLACHE. Signor CURIONI. Signor DEVILLE. Signor DE ANGELI. and Signor DE BEGNIS.

Between the Acts,

A NEW DIVERTISEMENT.

Principal Dancers. Madame MONTESSU, Mademoiselle CLARA, Mademoiselle PROCHE, and Mademoiselle BROCARD, Monsieur PAUL, Monsieur EMILE, and Monsieur LEFEBVRE.

After which, the Favorite Ballet, in Two Acts, of

LA SOMNAMBULE.

The Principal Characters by Madame MONTESSU, Mademoiselle KANIEL, Mlle. CLARA, Mlle. PROCHE, Mlle. DE VIS, and Mme. COPERE, Mesdames J. Mersic, Coupotte, Beseke, Vedy, Griffiths, Pitt, Laura, Lydia, &c. M. PAUL, M. EMILIE, M. SIMON, M. GOURIET, M. GEORGE, M. D'ALBERT, and M. LEFEBVRE.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Play of

WILLIAM TELL.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]

Emma, Miss HUDDART. Anneli, Miss RUSSELL. Agnes, Miss FAUCIT. Gesler, Mr H. Wallack. Sarnem, Mr Thompson. Struth, Mr W. Bennett. Rodolph, Mr Howard. Lufold, Mr Howell. Braun, Mr Ross. William Tell, Mr MACREADY. Albert, Miss Poole. Melchtal, Mr Younge. Erni, Mr Cathie. Furst, Mr Fenton. Verner, Mr Cooke. Waldman, Mr Hughes. Michael, Mr COOPER. Jagheli, Mr J. VINING. Pierre, Mr Eaton. Theodore, Mr Honner. Savoyards—Miss Crawford. Mr Price, and Mr S. Jones.

In the course of the Evening, Rossini's Overture to "Guillaume Tell," and Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz."

After which will be exhibited the new and splendid DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To conclude with a New Melo-Dramatic Opera, in Two Acts, called

THE DEVIL'S BROTHER.

[Adapted to the English Stage, by A. LEE.]

Lady Pamela Goslington, Mrs ORGER. Zerlina, Mrs WAYLETT.
The Concerted Music, by Misses Byfeld, Bruce, S. Phillips, Russell, and Mrs Bedford
Fra Diavolo, Mr WALLACK.
Sir Gregory Goslington, Mr HARLEY. Lorenzo, Mr SINCLAIR.
Lucro, Mr Webster.
Banditti—Beppo, Mr Latham. Giacomo, Mr Bedford. 1st Carabineer, Mr Bland.
Postilion, Mr Honner. Francisco, Mr Eaton.

To-morrow, Werner; No Song no Supper, and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The New Grand Comic Opera, (in Three Acts) called

CINDERELLA.

The Music, by Rossini.

Cinderella, Miss INVERARITY. Clorinda, Miss CAWSE.
Thisbe, Miss HUGHES. Fairy Queen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Felix, Mr HUNT. Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. PENSON.
Alidoro, Mr G. STANSBURY. Dandini, Mr MORLEY.
Pedro, Mr KEELEY.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.

With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.

Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.

Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Rourk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. McMurragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Cutler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, Fazio; Married Lovers; and the Pantomime.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,
TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

After which will be presented a New Operatic Piece, entitled

GALATEA.

From GAY'S Serenata. With HANDEL'S Music, arranged by Mr C. POTTER.
Principal Characters by Miss VERNON, Mrs GARRICK, and Mrs HUMBY.
Mr BENNETT. Mr J. RUSSELL. Mr SPENCER. Mr G. SMITH.
Mr MUNROE. Mr G. LEJEUNE. And Mr E. SEGUIN.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.
The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Maria.

At the end of the Opera, a Fantasia on the Oboe, by Mr Grattan Cooke.

After which, a New Musical Comedietta, in One Act, entitled

THREE TO ONE.

The Music, by Mr G. Cooke.
The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss WELLS. Miss AYRES.
And Mr FORRESTER.

In the course of the Evening, Winter's Overture to 'Zaira,' and Mozart's Overture to 'Il Don Giovanni.'

To conclude with a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called

EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.

The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss Stohwasser. Miss Wells. Miss Garrick.
Miss Sinclair. Mr Smith. Mr Tilbury. Mr Munroe. Mr Roberts.
And Mr GREEN.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Grizzle Glowworm, Mrs Beaumont. Susan, Miss Barnett. Amoret, Miss M. Glover.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
Linaro, Alpanor, and Spirit Hunters, Messrs Morris, Winning, Pry, Taylor, &c.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Sebastian, Gregory, and Adam, Messrs Sanders, Willson, and Paulo, Jun.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Andrew and Karl, (his Children) Masters Calkin and Barnett.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

After which, a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].
The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING.
Antico, Mr BROWN.

To conclude with the Burlesque Burletta, called

THE QUADRUPEDS.

The Characters by Miss Daly, Mr O. Smith, and Mr J. Reeve.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, called

THE CHASTE SALUTE

[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]
The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Baroness de Blanchec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called

THE GRENADIER.

[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]
Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

After which, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called

MIS-APPREHENSION.

[By Mr C. DANCE.]
Miss Clementina Bramble, Miss Stuart. Fanny, Miss Pincott. Ellen, Miss Kabrey.
Frank Hartley, Mr RAYMOND.
Thomas, Mr Cooper. Mouey, Mr W. VINING. Mr Williams, Mr Coates.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Drama, altered from MORTON'S Play of 'Town and Country', entitled

THE PASTOR'S FIRESIDE.

The Principal Characters by Miss SCOTT, Miss SOMERVILLE,
Miss Nicol, Madame Simon, Miss Rumens, Miss H. Boden, and Mrs Rogers.
Mr C. Hill, Mr Gough, Mr Honner, Mr D. Pitt,
Mr WILLIAMS, Mr OSBALDISTON, Mr VALE,
Mr Almar, Mr Hobbs, Mr Young, Mr Amherst, Mr Tully, and Mr Webb.

After which, the laughable Burletta, entitled

THE SPOILED CHILD.

The Principal Characters by Miss Vincent, Mme. Simon. Mr D. Pitt, and Mr Vale.

To conclude with a New splendid Comic Christmas Pantomime, entitled,

THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE].
The Overture and Music by Mr Blewitt.
Columbine, Mademoiselle ROSIER.
Harlequin, Mr HONOR, Clown, Mr T. HILL,
Pantaloon, Mr ASBURY, Zany, Mr GRAMMER.

COBURG THEATRE.—The Spectre of the Castle—The Night Hag—And Elizabeth.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck; or the Buccaneer's Bridal—Harlequin and Mother Goose.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPELL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden Square.

Digitized by Google

No. 136.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

History of the Life and Reign of George the Fourth. 3 vols. 12mo. volume the first. (Being the second volume of Dr Lardner's Cabinet Library). Longman.

The public will find in this work the zest of a book of scandal, without its being one. If it were, it would not meet with the approbation of this paper; nor is it likely that Messrs Longman would have published it. But princes in general so little resemble the one who is now seated on the British throne, and take such care to padlock the doors and the mouths around them, that the least anecdote respecting them acquires the interest of a secret. Nay, in transpiring long after they are dead, it entertains us almost as much as if they were living. To know something about them in this way (setting aside the higher reasons that mankind have for knowing the people that govern them) seems also to adjust the proper balance of acquaintance between princes and people; for no people are so curious as princes, or busy themselves so much with the affairs of those from whom they would fain conceal every tittle of their own. George the Third was the most notorious gossip in his dominions, and made it a point to know as much about everybody as he possibly could. He had from nature one of those memories which are enabled to store up a vast quantity of common facts, because they have few ideas to interfere with them; and yet by way of refresher, he kept a book in which he noted down the characters of those with whom he came in contact; nor was it ever known, we believe, that he forgot an offence, whatever might have been the case with an obligation. George the Fourth was gayer and more careless, and could afford to be less spiteful; but we have reason to believe that gossip could be very welcome to him, and that he could keep a sharp sidelong eye, not only upon offenders, but upon those who did not think fit to participate in his resentments against them. It is said of the Chinese, that they call, or used to call, their Sovereigns to account after their decease. It was a good custom, and quite reconcileable with charity, because the Monarchs could not answer the call: for it was not likely that they would be under-rated in their life-time. The newspapers of late years have instituted something of this custom in England; and the work before us has an effect to the same purpose, as indeed must be the case from its very nature. We have not the least suspicion who the author is; and shall perhaps excite a smile by guessing, in the faces of those who do. Our guess, however, does not point at an individual, but a class. But from a certain easy precision in the style; a sufficient love of gossipping for his task; an obvious fitness for it, both historical and biographical; a tendency to say more of the late King's father than most biographers would have thought necessary; a good deal of insight into character; and as much philosophy as a man can acquire from a long acquaintance with what is called the world (and it is no mean portion when carried to its utmost) we should guess him to be some old gentleman not altogether personally unconversant with much that he talks of; one who has interchanged ideas both on small and great subjects with many men of his time; who knows the cogitative amenities of the intervals of a pinch of snuff, and has perhaps taken delight in the borders of diplomacy. But this is nothing to the purpose, except as helping perhaps to give the reader an idea of the manner in which the book is written, uniting as it does the gossip of a court with the shrewdness of the government office, and the conscious and not unpleasing precision of a parliamentary critic. It is right to add, that the author is a Foxite, and evidently a strong one; too strong, in our opinion; though we have no mean respect for the powers and genial nature of that eminent statesman.

We are far from objecting to this writer for having said so much of George the Third; as we shall proceed to show by extracting the greater part of it, which is very curious. No prince, perhaps nobody else, can be thoroughly known, unless we know something of his progenitors: at least sufficient justice cannot be done him: and for this reason we would fain have had something more said of Queen Charlotte; though there is curious matter respecting her too. We think it a pity, for the sake of George the Third, that our author has not said something more, even of his progenitors; though to be sure there would be no end of mounting up in this manner from father to father. However, as we are going to lay before the reader accounts not very favourable to the character of that prince (and which will greatly serve to put an end to any lingering delusions on the matter) it may be as well to take this opportunity of stating that his father was a foolish debauchee, and that his mother is understood to have brought from Germany the disease which afflicted, we believe, both her and her descendants,—the king's evil. There is a portrait of the father (Frederick, Prince of Wales) in the quarto Supplement to Mr Bowles's edition of Pope, which has all the appearance of a characteristic likeness, and would show the reader at once what sort of an intellect he had. The lower part of the face is good-natured, but silly, and there is no brain. The face of the mother (of whom there is a portrait likewise) is much more intelligent, though not remarkably so. But we shall have more to say in reference to this point when we close our extracts.

George the Third, says our author, succeeded his grandfather, "on the 26th October 1760, with the prepossessions of his youth, his comely, if not engaging person, and his English birth."

We pause here a moment to say that the words "comely, if not engaging person" are expressed with a happy precision, characteristic of the author's attentive style in general. By "comely," we are to understand a fair complexion with colour, and a sufficing plumpness and height. Otherwise, George the Third certainly was not handsome, even in the bloom of youth and with regular features. Portraits of him remain to testify to what we say. Like his father, he had no forehead. The forehead and nose ran in a line, which might have been thought Grecian had it been perpendicular, but unfortunately it was oblique like the side of a pyramid; or rather it lay on the top of his face, like the side of a dice set up on one of its points. His eyes were staring, his mouth full and burly, and he had knock-knees.

'The young King had no court mistress, and was not even suspected of any transient court gallantries; but he must have been more or less than man if, in the bright assemblage of English beauty around, he wholly escaped its influence. Lady Sarah Lenox, sister of the Duke of Richmond, was distinguished by him. She has been described as a person then arrayed in all the graces of beauty and extreme youth, and there were rumours and speculations of her being raised to a throne which she was calculated to adorn; but the German pride of the King, and his mother, with Lord Bute's fear of the influence which would be thus gained by the first Lord Holland, whose niece Lady Sarah Lenox was by marriage, prevented any approach to such a triumph of her charms. To those causes should be added, the want of ardour in the royal admirer, and of sympathy in the lady. The passion of love was never felt, and for that reason, among others, never inspired, by George III.'—P. 5.

The causes here enumerated why George III was not beloved are certainly ample enough! In this passion for Lady Sarah Lenox, it seems there was no love on either side; which throws an air of simplicity upon our biographer's reasoning.

'On the 8th of June 1761, George III announced to the Privy Council that he had chosen for his consort the Princess Charlotte of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, "a princess distinguished by every eminent virtue and amiable endowment."

'There are two versions of the manner in which the choice fell upon this Princess. According to one party, the King was captivated by the perusal of a letter addressed by her, when only sixteen, to the King of Prussia, in favour of the peasantry of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz, who suffered greatly from friends and enemies in the war. This would argue in him more simplicity than imagination. Such letters are seldom composed by the personages whose names they bear; and the composition in question is more like that of an expert rhetorician than of a young lady. According to others, with more probability, a Colonel Græme, born in Scotland, but who had passed the greater part of his life, and acquired his military rank, in the service of Holland, was dispatched to Germany by the Princess Dowager and Lord Bute, with specific instructions to search the Protestant Courts there for a royal consort. His knowledge of the German language, and the blended prudence of two discreet nations, recommended him for this delicate mission. He saw the young Princess of Strelitz, living in the plainest style, with her mother, at Pyrmont; had opportunities of observing her; and decided in her favour as coming nearest to the intentions of those who employed him. It was not thus royal marriages were made in the days of the gallant Buckingham, and the accomplished and unfortunate Charles.

Digitized by Google

'The instructions of Colonel Græme were, "that the bride should be of physically pure blood, perfect form, obliging disposition, and skilled in music." The Princess-Dowager and Lord Bute, designing to continue their dominion over the King, and adopting the policy which induced the Duke of Bourbon to negociate the marriage of Louis XV with the daughter of the helpless King of Poland,—further charged their envoy, it was said, to look only to the minor Courts, in order that the person selected should, from gratitude and the want of protection, feel herself wholly dependent on those who had raised her,—and to avoid selecting a Princess whose personal charms were likely to give her an ascendant over her husband's mind.*

'The hand of the Princess Charlotte of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz was solicited and obtained in due form. She reached Harwich on the 6th, and St James's on the 8th of September 1761. It was arranged that the Royal pair should behold each other for the first time in the garden of the palace. The Princess, with every "eminent virtue and amiable endowment," was not handsome. It is recorded, that the bridegroom, at the first glance, was shocked, and started back; but that recovering himself, he raised her from her kneeling posture and embraced her. The disappointment of the public was still greater than that of the King, though, of course, much less keenly felt. He must have seen her portrait, and was thus somewhat prepared; but the public had been misled by a printseller, who, taking an engraved portrait of a celebrated beauty, removed her name from the plate, and substituted that of the Princess of Mecklenburgh. The marriage was solemnized with great pomp by the Archbishop of Canterbury the same evening. Ten unmarried daughters of Peers (Dukes or Earls) bore the bride's train in the procession; and the first name in the list is that of Lady Sarah Lenox,† whose presence, under the circumstances, would have been a severe trial to any other bridegroom than George III.'

At p. 11 the young king is described as being 'moral, religious, and regular, with an education not only imperfect, but misdirected. He had capacity enough to become, with due cultivation, an enlightened prince; but not enough to break through his bad training, which fixed the limits, instead of favouring the development, of his faculties. The motive assigned for the state of seclusion in which he was kept by his mother, is her fear for his morals, from the prevailing corruption of the young nobility and the court. But this would imply a weakness of judgment, and an excess of moral scruple, little according with the public and private life of that princess.'

The confined sense in which the word "moral" is here understood, savours strongly of the old regime, and of one of its most pernicious common-places. By moral we are to understand that the king had no amours; and it was mainly on the strength of his having none throughout his life, and of his reputation for fidelity to Queen Charlotte, that his morals were held up to perpetual admiration. There was much artifice in this, more cant, and a great deal of shallowness. Above all, there was a gross mistake. The exaltation of a morality of this kind, to the forgetfulness of every other, is the mistake of a gross and narrow-minded age. Morals concern the behaviour of mankind to one another in every possible respect; and how can that man be called moral, or how will the present more enlightened age consent to think him so, who while he was free from the irregularities of sympathy, abounded in some of the worst vices arising from the want of sympathy, and thereby forced us to conclude that his very freedom from the irregularity might (in such a man) have been quite as much owing to his defects as his good qualities? George III appears to have practised no virtues of Christianity that were inconvenient to him,—that stood in the way of his real propensities and his will. He was not charitable, either to the poor or to those that differed with him. He did not forgive his enemies. He was not slow to shed blood. He was not single-minded: he was not candid: he did not speak the truth: he loved money and worldly power, both probably to excess, the latter certainly. The nobler morals of these times demand that a man should have a more enlarged heart, and a greater love of truth and his species: and it will be lucky for the character of George III, if in a spirit of charity which he did not possess, because he could not understand it, the world shall pronounce that he is only saved from the reputation of having been a bad man, by the melancholy fact of his having been foolish to a pitch of disease.

But we must take care how we make remarks, or we shall not be able to get in our quotations. We shall extract, therefore, at once, a series of passages relative to this prince, and content ourselves with a further remark or two at the conclusion.

'The King and Queen lived in great privacy, especially after the birth of a second prince: courts were rarely held; and the few evening parties were described as dull, economical and thinly attended. Horace Walpole, the chief chronicler of anecdotes of that period in high life and politics, says, in 1763, "There has been a very private ball at court:—they danced till one, and then parted without a supper."

'The royal taste for privacy was represented as arising from avarice; and the Queen's parsimony was injuriously contrasted with her supposed accumulation of wealth already, and the passion she shewed for the possession and display of diamonds. She would appear resplendent with precious stones on a court-day, and live in a style of degrading economy at Richmond for the next three months. "The reclusive life led here" (Richmond) says the same chronicler, "which is carried to such an excess of privacy and economy that the Queen's friseur waits on them at table, and that four pounds of beef only are allowed for their soup, disgusts all sorts of people. The drawing-rooms are abandoned.

'These sordid details may have been overcharged, but were certainly not unfounded.'—P. 21.

'Speaking of the unfortunate marriage of Caroline Matilda, sister of George III, with the King of Denmark, the author says, "it is not the only instance of the unfortunate control which George III loved to exercise of the hearts and happiness of the members of his family. Persons of limited capacity are prone to this species of private despotism. They reconcile it to themselves by the goodness of their intentions."—P. 26.

'George III did not know, or knowing, did not act upon, that axiom, which is no less true in morals than in mathematics, that the right line is the shortest way from any given point to another. Instead of frankly expressing to Lord Rockingham, in the first instance, his disapprobation of the repeal, he acquiesced in the measure, and then conspired against his own minister. Lord Bute, in the House of Peers, insinuated that the Stamp Act was disagreeable to the King. Lord Rockingham asserted the King's declared approbation. That which was insinuated by Lord Bute was, notwithstanding Lord Rockingham's denial, repeated by Lord Strange next day. Upon this Lord Rockingham had an audience, and requested the King's approbation of his expression in writing. This was refused; and Lord Rockingham saw he was no longer minister, though the King still continued to treat him with the utmost gracious cajolery. "Lord Rockingham," says the late Mr Nicholls, "told me that the King never showed him such distinguished marks of kindness, as after he had secretly determined to get rid of him."'—P. 37.

'George the Third had an obstinacy of opinion which would not be enlightened, and an absoluteness of will which would not be opposed. He adhered to his tactics of using his Ministers as mere tools, in spite of public odium and mischief; and he met the remonstrances of the metropolis, in particular, with indignity. The Lord Mayor and two Aldermen went with a petition to St James's, in 1769. After being kept waiting, and treated with contumely in the ante-chamber, they were admitted to the presence of the King. He took the petition, handed it to the Lord in waiting, without deigning to give an answer, and turned his back upon them, to laugh and talk with the Danish Minister. A similar address was presented in 1770, which the King answered with a harsh rebuke. Beckford, Lord Mayor this year, a man of strong sense, nerve, and democratic independence, presented a third address, was replied to by the King in terms of disapprobation, and asked leave to rejoin. In the novelty and confusion of this request, leave was given or assumed; and Beckford improvised an admirable reply.' * * * * * * * * "The Lord Mayor," says the Annual Register, "waited near a minute for a reply, but none was given" The fact was, that the King stood mute with anger; and the whole Court with astonishment.'—P. 43.

This is the famous speech which is inscribed on Mr Beckford's statue in Guildhall; but instead of being "improvised," we always understood that Horne Tooke wrote it.

'"Qui nescit dissimulare nescit regnare" (Can't feign—Can't reign), was, according to Dr Watson, Bishop of Llandaff, the great maxim of George III.' * * *

'When George the Third's life was attempted by Margaret Nicholson, the Prince of Wales, who was on ill terms with his father, took the opportunity of hastening to congratulate him on his safety. The Prince was received at Windsor by the Queen and the Princesses; whilst the King, who was in the very next room, had the unenviable fortitude to deprive himself at such a moment of the presence of his son. The obstinacy of his resentment was too odious for defence or palliation; and those whose service it was to lie for him, denied it altogether. The affectionate meeting of the father and son, and the family dinner which followed, were blazoned with effrontery in the court newspapers.'

[To be continued to-morrow.]

* Le Montagnard Parvenu.

† 'She married a dissipated Baronet; and from being the ornament, became the victim of what is called "fashionable life" in the capitals of England and France.'

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—William Tell.—And the Devil's Brother.
COVENT GARDEN.—Cinderella.—And the Pantomime.

DRURY LANE.

OUR late illness does not allow us to do justice to the beautiful play we saw here last night,—Mr KNOWLES's William Tell. It is not so complete a production as Virginius; the incidents are not so thoroughly interweaved; nor the language so well sustained: though perhaps, as a play rather than a tragedy, the inferiority in this last respect is more seeming than real, and with reference to the distinction between a Swiss and a Roman subject, may even be construed into a beauty. There is the cottage and the village gambol in it, as well as the mountain. What is most beautiful, however, in Virginius, still forms the main beauty of William Tell, —a body of manliness containing a heart of sympathy. We can say nothing better of the piece at present, than that we found ourselves absorbed in the story; which Mr KNOWLES has enlarged with several new yet most characteristic incidents; and that we were sometimes reminded of what Dr JOHNSON said to Mrs SHERIDAN, on her novel of 'Sidney Biddulph,' and inclined to doubt whether he had a right to put us to so much pain. But the objection was not a healthy one, nor unmixed with other thoughts than dramatic. The critics may say of Mr KNOWLES what BEN JONSON said with far less justice of a poet of his time, —that he "hath writ all like a man." Next to the character of Tell, (not excepting his little son, who is his true son nevertheless, and not a bit too premature in his manner and his responses for the child of so noble an enthusiast) we like that of Michel, the lively laughing fellow, who is apt to be misconstrued by those who see no farther than the surface, but who is the man that steps forward and hazards the rage of the tyrant, when Tell, in the agony of his coming trial, asks whether he has "a friend here." The introduction of the poor old man whom Gesler has deprived of his eyes, is imagined with the highest dramatic skill, and deeply affecting. But Mr KNOWLES, with his greatest sorrows, contrives to mingle the sweetness and the relief arising from the perception of moral beauty. We feel this even in Virginius, when the urn is brought in; and blind men are so worshipped and served by all about them, that however affecting the sight of their calamity at first, we feel that their end is peace. Melchtal's loss of his eyes is also the immediate cause of his country's freedom; for it is this that finally rouses Tell to vengeance.

We shall indulge ourselves, in a future paper, with giving some specimens of passages from this most interesting play.

To criticise Mr MACREADY in the part of Tell, would be to repeat what we have said so often of the merits of his acting in general. We did not always perceive the exact reason of his fortes and pianos; but his apprehension of the pervading sentiment is perfect. The author and he reaped a plentiful harvest of tears from a good house.

Miss POOLE, who acts the child, is a nice little girl, and promises great things if she advance in proportion. In this piece she personates to admiration the firm little son of the firm father. Her forehead looks as if it would present the "motionless mark."*

* 'On whose forehead, firm and good,
Motionless mark! the apple stood.'—CHARLES LAMB.

It is not easy to say how much a clever child can be taught, so as to make a show of it without substance; but we confess we have strong hopes of this little girl. There is less stage cant in her manner, than we have seen in any other child. A short time since, we saw her in a mock Irish part, in the pantomime. It has been since judiciously omitted. As much good comedy might be taught her, as any one chose, if she has a faculty for it; but there should be no slang,—nothing to teach her to make a mockery of the coming bloom of her own fine thoughts,—should she have the luck to possess them; which she will, if she has genius. If she has genius, too, the applause which she now receives will do her good; perilous as it is under a different supposition.

Mr COOPER makes a pleasant Michel; and we must have a good word for Miss FAUCITT in his mistress.

VOLTAIRE somewhere makes a curious old regime observation respecting the names of the Swiss heroes. He says they are so rough (Furst, Melchtal, and others) that they would never do for epic poetry. Poor delicate epic poetry! not to be able to endure the roughness of a hero's appellation! He might have been assured, that HOMER would have made no objection, had the names of the Greek heroes been as rough as their beards: (which by the way they very probably were, if we were to judge by the modern Greek pronunciation.) PRIOR has some happy lines in answer to a similar objection of BOILEAU, who could not "abide" the harsh names of the towns in Flanders, which he pronounced impossible to get into a panegyric upon his victorious master LOUIS. LOUIS ceased to be victorious; and PRIOR thus assails his poet, in a strain of mingled banter and dignity.

'When the young Muse invok'd the tuneful Nine,
To say how Louis did not pass the Rhine;
What work had we with Wageninghen, Arnheim,
Places that could not be reduc'd to rhyme!
And, though the poet made his last efforts,
Wurts—who could mention in heroic—Wurts?
But, tell me, hadst thou reason to complain
Of the rough triumphs of the last campaign?
The Danube rescued, and the empire sav'd,
Say, is the majesty of verse retriev'd?
And would it prejudice thy softer vein,
To sing the princes, Louis and Eugene?
Is it too hard in happy verse to place
The Vans and Vanders of the Rhine and Maese?
Her warriors Anna sends from Tweed and Thames,
That France may fall by more harmonious names.
Canst thou not Hamilton or Lumley bear?
Would Ingoldsby or Palmes offend thy ear?
And is there not a sound in Marlborough's name,
Which thou and all thy brethren ought to claim,
Sacred to verse, and sure of endless fame?'

A NICE MORALITY, "STAP MY VITALS."—Some time since, a gentleman-farmer was bargaining with a pig-driver in Dorchester market, for two pigs, when the latter, to bestow a good character on the animals, observed, "You'll find them 'ere a couple of as good moral pigs as ever you clapped eyes on."—"What do you mean, my good friend?" asked the gentleman. "Why, your honour, you'll find 'em as good moral pigs as ever was, go where you will for the next."—"But what do you mean by moral?"—"Why, moral pigs, your honour—pigs as 'll eat their allowance any day, and do credit to their keep."

THE LEAST PLEASING EFFECTS OF NATURE VIEWED THROUGH AN AGREEABLE MEDIUM.—'Tis worth one's while to observe that the least designed, and almost unbespoken effects of nature, are not without their beauty: thus, to use a similitude, there are cracks and little breaks on the surface of a loaf, which though never intended by the baker, have a sort of agreeableness in them, which invite the appetite. Thus figs, when they are most ripe, open and gape: and olives, when they fall of themselves and are near decaying, are particularly pretty to look at: to go on, the bending of an ear of corn, the brow of a lion, the foam of a boar, and many other things, if you take them singly, are far enough from being handsome but when they are looked at as parts of something else, and considered with reference and connexion, are both ornamental and affecting. Thus, if a man has but inclination and thought enough to examine the product of the universe, he'll find the most unpromising appearances not unaccountable; and that the more remote appendages have somewhat to recommend them. One thus prepared will perceive the beauty of life, as well as that of imitation, and be no less pleased to see a tiger grin in the Tower, than in a painter's shop. Such a one will find something agreeable in the decays of age, as well as the blossom of youth. I grant many of these things won't charm us at the first blush: to pronounce rightly, a man must be well affected in the case, and thoroughly acquainted with the methods and harmony of nature.—Marcus Antoninus.

ERRATUM.—"Thoughts on Man, his Nature, Productions, and Discoveries; interspersed with some particulars respecting the Author, by William Godwin," was erroneously printed, "Thoughts, &c. by William Gordon."

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

Lord BYRON's Tragedy of

WERNER, OR THE INHERITANCE.

[Adapted by Mr MACREADY.]

Josephine, Mrs FAUCIT, Ida Stralenheim, Miss FAUCIT.
Werner, Mr MACREADY, Ulric, Mr WALLACK, Gabor, Mr COOPER,
Baron Stralenheim, Mr H. Wallack, Frits, Mr Younge, Otto, Mr Cohen,
Henric, Mr Salter, Eric, Mr C. Jones, Idenstein, Mr W. Bennett,
Rodolph, Mr Cooke, Arnheim, Mr Fenton, Meister, Mr Eaton,
Ludwig, Mr Cathie, Herman, Mr S. Jones.

In the course of the Evening, Spohr's Overture to "Jessonda," and Cherubini's Overture to "Les Deux Journees."

After which,

NO SONG NO SUPPER!

Margaretta, Miss PEARSON, in which she will introduce, "Yes; I will meet thee alone."
Dorothy, Miss Bruce, Louisa, Miss Crawford, Nelly, Mrs C. Jones.
Frederick, Mr HORN, with a New Song, "God Bless our Noble Sovereign."
Crop, Mr BEDFORD, Endless, Mr HARLEY,
Robin, Mr Webster, William, Mr Downing, Thomas, Mr Salter.

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

To-morrow, The Brigand; the Illustrious Stranger; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Tragedy of

FAZIO.

[By Mr MILMAN.]

Marchesa Aldabella, Miss TAYLOR, Clara, Miss PHILLIPS,
Bianca, Miss F. KEMBLE. Giraldi Fazio, Mr WARDE,
Duke of Florence, Mr EGERTON, Bartolo, Mr BLANCHARD,
Philario, Mr Henry, Falsetto, Mr Parry, Gonsalvo, Mr Baker,
Theodore, Mr Mears, Keeper, Mr Fuller, Pietro, Mr Turnour,
Gentleman, Mr Irwin, Antonio, Mr Heath, Aurio, Mr Crumpton

Previous to the Tragedy, a Grand MS. Overture by Friedrich Kuhlau.
After the Tragedy, an Overture by J. N. Hummel.

After which, a New Petite Comedy, to be called

MARRIED LOVERS.

[By Mr POWER.]

The Songs, composed by Mr Barnett.
Duchess D'Orleans, Miss FORDE. Marchioness de Meneville, Miss TAYLOR.
Lady Ascot, Mrs CHATTERLEY. Annette, Miss PHILLIPS.
Duc D'Orleans, Mr ABBOTT. Marquis de Meneville, Mr BARTLEY.
Sir John Ascot, Mr WARDE. Colonel O'Dillon, Mr POWER.
Pierre, Mr Irwin. Francis, Mr Mears.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.

With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.

Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.

Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

To-morrow, Romance of a Day; Married Lovers; and the Pantomime.

SURREY THEATRE.

Will be revived the celebrated Drama, entitled

THE ITALIAN WIFE.

Bianca, Miss M. C. POOLE,
Marchesa Aldabella, Miss Scott, Clara, Miss Jordan.
Duke of Venice, Mr Dibdin Pitt, Gonsalvo, Mr Gough, Falsetto, Mr Honner,
Giraldi Fazio, Mr OSBALDISTON,
Bartolo, Mr Williams, Philario, Mr Almar, Antonio, Mr Young,
Theodore, Mr Webb, Piero, Mr Lee, Gentleman, Mr Tully, Keeper, Mr Hobbs.

After which, (first time at this Theatre)

PAST TEN O'CLOCK, AND A RAINY NIGHT.

Nancy, Miss VINCENT. Lucy, Miss SOMERVILLE. Silence, Miss Nicol
Sir Peter Punctual, Mr Gough. Old Snaps, Mr D. Pitt.
Young Snaps, Mr Lee. Henry Punctual, Mr C. Hill. Charles, Mr Honner.
Bantam, Mr ROGERS. Dozey, Mr WILLIAMS. Sam Squib, Mr VALE.

To conclude with the admired Melo-Drama, entitled

THE INCHCAPE BELL.

[By E. FITZBALL, Esq.]

The Dumb Sailor Boy, Miss Scott. Amelia, Miss Jordan.
Becky Butterfly, Mrs Vale. Mrs Tapps, Miss Rumens.
Sir John Trevanley, Mr Gough. Hans Hattock, Mr Dibdin Pitt.
Guy Ruthven, Mr C. Hill. Captain Taffrail, Mr Honner.
Samson Sawdust, Mr VALE. Jupiter Seabreeze, Mr Rogers.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Grizzle Glowworm, Mrs Beaumont. Susan, Miss Barnett. Amoret, Miss M. Glover.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
Linaro, Alpanor, and Spirit Hunters, Messrs Morris, Winning, Fry, Taylor, &c.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Sebastian, Gregory, and Adam, Messrs Sanders, Willson, and Paulo, Jun.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Andrew and Karl, (his Children) Masters Calkin and Barnett.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

After which, a New Grand and Comic Christmas Pantomime, called

GRIMALKIN THE GREAT.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE].

The Overture and Music by G. H. Rodwell.
Columbine, Miss STALLARD.
Harlequin, Mr GIBSON. Clown, Mr SANDERS, Pantaloon, Mr KING
Antico, Mr BROWN.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—Interior of Dwelling of the Mouse-trap Maker, Nosey Jack (Night).—II. Exterior of Cats' Castle (Sunrise).—III. Fairy Retreat, near the Enchanted Spring.—IV. Enchanted Spring.—V. Cats' Coridor. VI. Palace of Grimalkin.—VII. Temple of Silver-rain.—VIII. The King's Mews.—IX. Fishmongers' and Oil Shops.—X. Doctor Surekill's Dissecting Room.—XI. View in Westmoreland.—XII. Eating House and Cage.—XIII. View on the Wye.—XIV. Interior of the Old Ship Inn, Wapping.—XV. Brush Hall, in Chancery.—XVI. The same, out of Chancery.—XVII. Grocer's and China Shops.—XVIII. Catacombs.—XIX. and last. Temple of the Spirit of the Spring.

To conclude with the Burlesque Burletta, called

THE QUADRUPEDS.

The Characters by Miss Daly, Mr O. Smith, and Mr J. Reeve.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, called

THE CHASTE SALUTE.

[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]

The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called

THE GRENADIER.

[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]

Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

After which, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called

MIS-APPREHENSION.

[By Mr C. DANCE.]

Miss Clementina Bramble, Miss Stuart. Fanny, Miss Pincott. Ellen, Miss Kabrey.
Frank Hartley, Mr RAYMOND.
Thomas, Mr Cooper. Money, Mr W. VINING. Mr Williams, Mr Coates.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN's, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]

Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Man-ufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young.
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith,

QUEEN'S THEATRE,

TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

A New Operatic Piece, entitled

GALATEA.

From GAY's Serenata. With HANDEL's Music, arranged by Mr C. POTTER.
Principal Characters by Miss VERNON, Mrs GARRICK, and Mrs HUMBY.
Mr BENNETT. Mr J. RUSSELL. Mr SPENCER. Mr G. SMITH.
Mr MUNROE. Mr G. LEJEUNE. And Mr E. SEGUIN.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.
The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Maria

At the end of the Opera, a Fantasia on the Oboe, by Mr Grattan Cooke.

After which, a New Musical Comedietta, in One Act, entitled

THREE TO ONE.

The Music, by Mr G. Cooke.
The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss WELLS. Miss AYRES.
And Mr FORRESTER.

In the course of the Evening, Winter's Overture to 'Zaira,' and Mozart's Overture to 'Il Don Giovanni.'

To conclude with a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called

EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.

The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss Stohwasser. Miss Wells. Miss Garrick.
Miss Sinclair. Mr Smith. Mr Tilbury. Mr Munroe. Mr Roberts.
And Mr GREEN.

COBURG THEATRE.—The Spectre of the Castle—The Night Hag—And Elizabeth.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck; or the Buccaneer's Bridal—Harlequin and Mother Goose.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 115 Oxford street, next door to Pladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

No. 137.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

History of the Life and Reign of George the Fourth. 3 vols. 12mo. volume the first. (Being the second volume of Dr Lardner's Cabinet Library). Longman.

[Second Notice.]

At page 260 the author vindicates his understanding with regard to the use of the word morals. Speaking of the marriage-ceremony between the Prince of Wales and his ill-starred consort, he says, 'It has been stated in a variety of publications, that "the good old King," as George III has been styled from the imposing regularities of his private life, by canting sycophants and the common herd, shook his son's hand with a force which brought tears into his eyes.' The Prince had shown great symptoms of uneasiness during the performance of this ceremony. The excess of the King's shake was, perhaps, a morbid movement of resentment, intruding itself in spite of other feelings.

Now let us see the melancholy excuse for all these infirmities:—The author is speaking of the King's insanity in the year 1788:—'The sufferer himself was sensible of the approach of his melancholy visitation. After riding for five hours in a state of violent excitement, he burst into tears on meeting the Duke of York, and said "he hoped he should die, for he was going to be mad." For several days after the 5th of November, he was suffering the double violence of frenzy and bilious fever, to such a degree as to leave but slight hopes not only of his reason but of his life. The strength of his physical constitution preserved the latter.' When his Majesty went to return thanks for his recovery next year, at St Paul's Cathedral, he made an affecting observation to the Dean (afterwards Bishop of Winchester.) '"A martial band," says the Bishop, "stationed near the door, played appropriate music till his Majesty reached the area under the great dome, when it ceased; and instantly the organ, accompanied by the voices of above five thousand children of the city charity schools, who were placed upon circular seats, gradually rising between the pillars on both sides, began the 100th Psalm. The simple melody, joined to the spectacle, evidently affected the King; and as he was walking between the Bishop of London and myself, he turned to me, and said with great emotion, 'I now feel that I have been ill;' he then stopped, but recovering himself, proceeded to the choir." This expression of the King may suggest a question, how far the mind from which it proceeded was adequate to bear the weight of empire, and its awful responsibilities. The King, however, was no doubt in a state of mental competency to assume the powers and responsibilities of the executive branch of the legislature, or the wisdom of the nation in both houses [?] would not have sanctioned and submitted to it: but this only proves, that a state of mind, which would not be trusted with any of the great offices of the realm, administrative or judicial, may be an adequate repository for the powers of the Crown.'

Yes: here lies a great question which we trust will never need to be roused again.—If it shall, we hope it will be discussed upon much broader grounds than before. We are sure it ought. If George III generally speaking, had a right to execute the office of king, the presumption is that he had a right to be considered a sane person; in which case, his character is not to be considered a good one in any point of view, either as that of a sovereign or a man, unless everybody else be allowed to set up the plea of good intentions who pursues a system of self-will, avarice, violence, vindictiveness and duplicity. If he is not to be considered as a sane man (and in addition to the illnesses which he is known to have had, he is believed to have had others that were concealed,) then what are we to think of the extraordinary spectacle of a great nation like ours, ruled for so many years by a man not in his right senses, and subjected by the want of them to the most frightful mischances? Take all the campaigns with all the bloodshed that follows them, all the deaths, the widowhoods, the orphan-making, the broken hearts, the broken constitutions and the sickly offspring resulting from them,—take these calamities, caused as these were by the American war alone, which it is notorious he persisted in out of his sole passionate obstinacy (to say nothing of the ardour with which he joined in the crusade against France) and what ought the countrymen of Milton and Hampden to think of themselves, for suffering such a frightful absurdity? Imagine for a moment the impossibility of an American President of this sort. Imagine the director of a common counting-house, or the father of a family, permitted to retain the management of his affairs under these circumstances! No, the law will not allow it: it is too wise: it will not allow the interests and happiness of twenty men to be at the mercy of such a calamitous temperament: then are we to suppose that twenty millions are to be at the mercy of it, purely because the absurdity is so great that it out-faces objection, and makes it appear rather like a visitation of fate, than a thing to be remedied? We doubt if the French would think so to-morrow, should a similar prince make his appearance in the family of Orleans.

[We shall notice the main subject of the book to-morrow.]

INTERESTING ACCOUNT OF THE HABITS OF THE BEAVER.

So little is known of the manners of the beaver in a domesticated state, that we feel a peculiar gratification in having it in our power to give the extremely interesting history of an individual which belonged to Mr Broderip, to whose kindness we are indebted for the following statement:—'The animal arrived in this country in the winter of 1825, very young, being small and woolly, and without the covering of long hair which makes the adult beaver. It was the sole survivor of five or six which were shipped at the same time, and it was in a very pitiable condition. Good treatment quickly restored it to health, and kindness soon made it familiar. When called by the name 'Binny,' it generally answered with a little cry, and came to its owner. The hearth-rug was its favourite haunt, and thereon it would lie stretched out, sometimes on its back, sometimes on its side, and sometimes flat on its belly, but always near its master. The building instinct showed itself immediately it was let out of its cage, and materials were placed in its way; and this before it had been a week in its new quarters. Its strength, even before its was half-grown, was great. It would drag along a large sweeping-brush or a warming-pan, grasping the handle with its teeth, so that the load came over its shoulder, and advancing in an oblique direction till it arrived at the point where it wished to place it. The long and large materials were always taken first, and two of the longest were generally laid cross-wise, with one of the ends of each touching the wall, and the other ends projecting out into the room. The area formed by the cross brushes and the wall, he would fill up with hand-brushes, rush baskets, books, boots, sticks, cloths, dried turf, or anything portable. As the work grew high, he supported himself on his tail, which propped him up admirably; and he would often, after laying on one of his building materials, sit up over against it, appearing to consider his work, or, as the country people say, 'judge it.' This pause was sometimes followed by changing the position of the material 'judged,' and sometimes it was left in its place. After he had piled up his materials in one part of the room (for he generally chose the same place), he proceeded to wall up the space between the feet of a chest of drawers, which stood, at a little distance from it, high enough on its legs to make the bottom a roof for him, using for this purpose dried turf and sticks, which he laid very even, and filling up the interstices with bits of coal, hay, cloth, or anything he could pick up. This last place he seemed to appropriate for his dwelling; the former work seem to be intended for a dam. When he had walled up the space between the feet of the chest of drawers, he proceeded to carry in sticks, cloths, hay, cotton, and to make a nest; and when he had done, he would sit up under the drawers and comb himself with the nails of his hind feet. In this operation, that which appeared at first to be a malformation, was shown to be a beautiful adaptation to the necessities of the animal. The huge webbed hind feet of the beaver turn in so as to give the appearance of deformity; but if the toes were straight instead of being incurved, the animal could not use them for the purpose of keeping its fur in order, and cleansing it from dirt and moisture.—Binny generally carried small and light articles between his right fore leg and his chin, walking on the other three legs; and large masses, which he could not grasp readily with his teeth, he pushed forwards, leaning against them with his right fore paw and his chin. He never carried anything on his tail, which he liked to dip in water; but he was not fond of plunging in the whole of his body. If his tail was kept moist, he never cared to drink; but if it was kept dry, it became hot, and the animal appeared distressed, and would drink a great deal. It is not impossible that the tail may have the power of absorbing water, like the skin of frogs, though it must be owned that the scaly integument which invests that member has not much of the character which generally belongs to absorbing surfaces. Bread, and bread and milk, and sugar, formed the principal part of Binny's food; but he was very fond of succulent fruits and roots. He was a most entertaining creature, and some highly comic scenes occurred between the worthy, but slow, beaver, and a light and airy macauco, that was kept in the same apartment. An animal so sociable in his habits ought to be affectionate; and very affectionate the beaver is said to be. Drage mentions two young ones which were taken alive, and brought to a neighbouring factory in Hudson's Bay, where they throve very fast until one of them was killed accidentally. The survivor instantly felt the loss, began to moan, and abstained from food till it died. Mr Bullock mentioned to the narrator a similar instance which fell under his notice in North America. A male and female were kept together in a room, where they lived happily till the male was deprived of his partner by death. For a day or two, he appeared to be hardly aware of his loss, and brought food and laid it before her: at last, finding that she did not stir, he covered her body with twigs and leaves, and was in a pining state when Mr Bullock lost sight of him."—The Gardens and Menagerie of the Zoological Society delineated.

Digitized by Google

THEATRICAL CHAT.

TO THE TATLER.

MR TATLER,—I design to have some chat with you; it rests with yourself whether or not to tattle what I say, to others. Perhaps you will think it too much like the tattle of the tea-table, if I venture to remark that Mr Liston now and then sits too long at the dinner-table. This would be no business of mine, nor of your's, if the occasions were well chosen; but it might be well, Sir, if you were to remind him, that people who have tolerable memories, and have seen one piece several times, are apt to be too well acquainted with the dialogue, for frequent blunders, omissions, and interpolations to pass without discovery. It is true, that porter is brown, and therefore his using the name of Brown, for Porter, might have been overlooked, more especially if he had added the word Stout; but Jack Humphries was last night played so—ad libitum, throughout, that the author of the piece might have been sometimes puzzled to recognise the character. Mr Liston is a favourite with the public, and therefore these occasional lapses are tolerated. It is but the more incumbent on him, not to abuse their indulgence.

Your representative, C., remarks upon the meekness of Mr Sinclair's rage, that the "sucking-dove" is a Xantippe in comparison; this reminds me of an observation made by a gentleman, last night, who saw so little difference between the Brigadier's resentment and tenderness, that, forgetting he was under the influence of the former, he said, "Sinclair is but a cold lover." I reminded my companion that he was then intending to be jealous and indignant; but really there was very little difference in his manner, before the quarrel, during its continuance, or after the reconciliation. He should wear round his neck a label of the passion he means to represent; as little boys write under their drawings, the names of the animals they are intended for.

As to your other representative, F. F.—what can he mean, Mr Tatler? He says, that the public tolerate punning because it is no longer considered as bad as picking pockets. This, to say the least of it, displays a want of acquaintance with his subject, really lamentable; since the pocket-picking faculty, whether on a great or small scale, is now particularly fashionable on the stage:—witness, not only Mr Paulo and his brethren (in whom it is so admired, that Drury Lane has thought fit to have two clowns instead of one) but the Brigand, the Devil's Brother, and that most tiresome of all dull tragedies, Werner. By the bye, to return, for a moment, to the Devil's Brother,—what seemed to me, and indeed to the audience in general, the best things in it, were some shrewd hits at the eating, grumbling, and spending propensities of English travellers. A word more, Sir, and I have done. So late as Monday last, M. Le Peintre, was one of three actors announced as about to perform at the Haymarket Theatre:—Yesterday, the name was displaced by that of M. Brunet. Is it that M. Le Peintre is not coming?—If so, it is a serious matter. M. Brunet may please, when he does come, and may be an excellent actor; but, to use the phrase of Mr Gingham, in the farce of the Jenkinses, "we have been led to imagine that"—we should see M. Le Peintre; and Mr Hazlitt tells us that he is "very clever." He saw him at Paris, and says, "I saw three very clever comic actors at the Theatre des Varietés on the Boulevards, all quite different from each other, but quite French. One was Le Peintre, who acted a master-printer; and he was a master-printer, so bare, so dingy, and so wan, that he might be supposed to have lived on printer's ink, and on a crust of bread cut with an oniony knife. The resemblance to familiar life was so complete and so habitual, as to take away the sense of imitation, or the pleasure of the deception." I cannot, indeed, recognize a master-printer in this picture, but then I have never been in Paris; and Mr Hazlitt's criticisms are to be received; not questioned. A little too much nature, is a good fault, and I would willingly have seen this actor;—a little too much prosing, however, is not a good fault, so—Farewell, Mr Tatler.

Your's truly,
B. S.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

FAST DAYS.—A manufacturer in England proposed to his workpeople, that if they would attend church on fast-day, their wages should go on the same as if they worked, upon which they sent a deputation to inform him that they would also attend the Methodist chapel in the evening, if he would pay them for over hours.—American Paper.

ONE SWALLOW DOES NOT MAKE A SUMMER.—One sharp frosty day the late King, when Prince of Wales, went into the Thatched House Tavern, and ordered a beef-steak; but, observing that it was excessively cold, desired the waiter to bring him first a glass of brandy and water. He emptied that in a twinkling, then a second, then a third. "Now," said the Prince, "I am warm and comfortable: bring my steak." On this, Mr Sheridan, who was present, wrote the following impromptu:—

"The Prince came in, and said 'twas cold,
Then put to his head the rummer;
'Till swallow after swallow came,
When he pronounced it summer."

KOSCIUSKO.—The following anecdote is related of this celebrated Polish patriot:—He wished to send some bottles of good wine to a clergyman of Solothurn; and as he hesitated to send them by his servant, lest he should smuggle a part, he gave the commission to a young man of the name of Zeltner, and desired him to take the horse which he himself usually rode. On his return, young Zeltner said that he would never ride his horse again, unless he gave him his purse at the same time. Kosciusko asking what he meant, he answered, "As soon as a poor man on the road takes off his hat, and asks for charity, the horse immediately stands still, and wont stir till something is given to the petitioner; and as I had no money about me, I was obliged to make believe to give something in order to satisfy the horse."

"UNDER THE ROSE,"—That is, privately, or secretly. The rose was, it is said, sacred to Harpocrates, the God of Silence; and therefore frequently placed on the ceilings of rooms destined for the reception of guests; and implying, that whatever was transacted there should not be made public.—Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue, 1788.

Which is the deepest, the longest, the broadest, and the smallest grave in Esher churchyard?—That in which Miles Button lies buried, for it contains Miles below the sod, Miles in length, and Miles in breadth—and yet it is only a Button-hole.—Scrap-book.

DUTCH SALE,—That is, bidding downwards; which is the invariable practice throughout Holland. An article is set up at any price the auctioneer pleases; if nobody bids, he lowers the price, and so continues lowering until some person cries "Mine," and the person who so claims it is then entitled to it;—a practice congenial to Dutch taciturnity.—Legal Recreations.

AN ABSENT LADY.—Lady Gordon (says the Duchess of Orleans in her Memoirs) the grand-aunt of Lord Huntley, was my dame d'atour for a considerable period. She was a singular person, and always plunged into reveries. When she was speaking with a man, she had a habit of playing with the buttons of his waistcoat: having one day occasion to talk to the Chevalier Buveon, a Captain of the Guard, and he being a very tall man, she could only reach the lower buttons, which she began to unbutton. The poor gentleman was quite horror-struck, and started back, crying, "For heaven's sake, madam, what are you going to do?"

A PROFESSIONAL OBJECTION.—A clergyman in Scotland desired his hearers never to call one another "liars," but when any one said "the thing that was not," they ought to whistle. On Sunday he preached a sermon on the parable of the loaves and fishes; and being at a loss how to explain it, he said the loaves were not like those now-a-days—they were as big as some of the hills in Scotland. He had scarcely pronounced these words when he heard a loud whistle. "Wha's that," said he, "ca's me a liar?"—"It is I, Willy M'Donald the baker."—"Well, Willy, what objection have ye to what I ha' told ye?"—"None, Mass John—only I want to know what sort of ovens they had to bake those loaves in."—Scotch paper.

EPIGRAM FROM THE FRENCH.

I yawn when you read!—Am I wrong then?—Oh no!
That I listen what proof more complete can I show?

FROM THE FRENCH OF LE BRUN.

In prose and in metre will Tom still compose;
But in writing he seems to lie under a curse;
For he constantly puts too much verse in his prose,
And as constantly puts too much prose in his verse.

Digitized by Google

CONVERSATION.—The first ingredient in conversation is truth; the next, good sense; the third, good humour; and the fourth, wit. —Sir William Temple.

APOLOGY FOR ABSENCE.—A conceited young man asked a friend what apology he should make for not being one of the party the day before, to which he had a card of invitation. "Oh, my dear sir," replied the wit, "say nothing about it—you were never missed."

HOW WILL YOU BE TRIED.—The question in courts of law, "How will thou be tried?" is an old form, anciently very significant, when there were several forms of trial; as by battle, ordeal, and jury. The criminal answering, "by God and my country," was his election to be tried by a jury.—Spelman, &c.—Fortescue's Monarchy, 1719.

CLEVER DOUBLE-ENTENDRE.—The French word jouer signifies to play, to represent, to ridicule, to make game of, &c. One day The Tartuffe had been announced, but the representation was forbidden by the first President of the Parliament. When the curtain rose, Moliere came forward and said, "We had hoped to give you the Tartuffe this evening, but Monsieur the first President ne veut pas qu'on le joue,"—which might be understood, will not allow us to play it, or, will not allow us to ridicule him.—French Homonymes.

PAIR OF FRENCH GLOVES.—In the time of Charles the Fifth, when Paris was limited by the Boulevards, it was less considerable than the city of Ghent; which gave the monarch occasion to say that he could put all Paris in his gant (Ghent) meaning either his glove, or his city of Ghent. When Buonaparte returned from Elba, in 1815, Louis XVIII took refuge in Ghent, and when he came back to Paris, after the battle of Waterloo, the Parisians said, "At last we have got back our paire des gants" (pair of gloves) meaning our père de Gand, our father from Ghent.—French Homonymes.

ADAM'S FALL.—A Scotch clergyman, a strict catechist, in examining one of his flock a short time since, thus addressed her:—"Janet, can you tell me how Adam fell?"—Janet fell a laughing, and answered, "Oh, my bonnie dear Dochtor, you're na serious!"—"Very serious indeed," said the Doctor. Janet (whose husband's name happened to be Adam) then said, "Weel, weel, sin ye will ha't, Dochtor, you see Adam just gaed o'er the tither night to Lucky Liston's for half a muchkin o'whiskey, when an oar lying on the road took his foot, o'er Adam fell—and that's the hale truth o'the matter."—Scotch paper.

AN ARGUMENT FOR BURNING.—To be knaved out of our graves, to have our skulls made drinking bowls, and our bones turned into pipes, to delight and sport our enemies, are tragical abominations escaped in burning burials.—Sir Thomas Browne.

IGNORANCE OF THE FUTURE.—The particulars of future beings must needs be dark unto ancient theories, which Christian philosophy yet determines but in a cloud of opinions. A dialogue between two infants in the womb, concerning the state of this world, might handsomely illustrate our ignorance of the next, whereof methinks we yet discourse in Plato's den, and are but embryo philosophers. —Sir Thomas Browne.

EXPERIENCE VERSUS NATURE.—Never suspect any one's sincerity until you have had reason for doing so. This is the dictate of Nature and Reason. What a pity that experience should so often prevent the pleasure of unlimited confidence, by whispering,—Know the character of a man before you put a value on his declarations. F. F.

SYMPATHY AN AFFAIR OF PROXIMITY.—Few persons could sit at a table and enjoy a repast, if at the same table there sat some famished persons who were precluded from partaking of the viands before them. The difference of condition thus visibly presented would disturb complacency, and be felt as an evil that required removal. Yet how many know that while they are regaling on the choicest luxuries, there are fellow-creatures but a few yards off, without a sufficiency of even the necessaries of existence. Is it dullness of apprehension, absence of imagination, or callousness to the welfare of their species, that can make men act so differently under circumstances essentially the same? Surely if right reflections were to penetrate into certain quarters, the effect on the condition of the poor, and even on the gross part of the pension-list, would be marvellous. F. F.

MORAL AFFINITIES.—Chemists inform us that the union of the particles of which matter is composed, is owing entirely to what, in that science, is called affinity. For instance, in dyeing, without an affinity between the substance to be dyed, and the colouring material, the dye will not take. There is an analogy to this theory in the moral world. "Evil communications," says Euripides (quoted by St Paul), "corrupt good manners." They do so, because a latent principle of evil is often drawn out by the presence of a kindred quality in another. If this be correct, the maxim is susceptible of some qualification; for where the supposed affinities are not found, there will be repulsion instead of cohesion, and the virtuous will escape contamination. It is pleasant also to reflect that this theory includes the converse maxim, viz.: "That good communications purify evil manners:" and coupled with the belief that there is no nature wholly destitute of some redeeming qualities, which favourable circumstances may draw out and strengthen, hope may be entertained for all; and they who really believe in the attracting beauty, as well as in the varied and inherent excellence of the goodness they commend, may find great encouragement to continue their efforts to extend the possession of the qualities they reverence. F. F.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Werner.—No Song No Supper.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Fazio.—Married Lovers.—And the Pantomime.

WE found, the night before last, that we had been in a little too much hurry in resuming our theatrical duties, after the illness that attacked us; which must be our excuse to-day for the non-appearance of a criticism on the operatic piece at the Queen's Theatre. If it be repeated to-night (for we write this at home, before we can see the play-bills) we shall make a point of attending: if not, we shall find occasion for criticism somewhere else: for we do not mean to let ourselves be kept at home again soon. A worthy clergyman who had the interest of his species at heart, is said to have closed an epitaph on his wife with the following admonition:

"My grief, alas! is so sore,
That I can write but two lines more:
For hers, and every other good woman's sake,
Never let a blister be applied to a lying-in woman's back."

We say in like manner, to the rising critical generation, never go to the theatre for months together, and take nothing to eat from five in the afternoon to one, two, or three in the morning. For this is what we have been in the habit of doing; and this it is that made us ill. O ye gods and little buttered fishes! That the divine soul of man should be rendered incapable of performing its duties, because a piece of ox, or a penny bun, has not been thrust between one's teeth at the due interval!—No disrespect nevertheless to divine soul; which, like the gods in Ovid's cottages, may inhabit tenements in strange need of repair.

What shall we then write upon, having nothing to write upon? Shall we express the pleasure we feel at seeing the number of theatres increase? or the desire we have to hear again the divine songs of HANDEL? or the rejoicing of our hearts to think that PASTA is re-engaged? or the disgust with which we see those shabby criminals, Werner and Fazio, still playing off against one another their "attractions of repulsion?" Covent Garden seems to have said to Drury Lane, "Oh, you are on that tack, are you? You must have a good disgusting subject, to attract all the flies that delight in the sore places of humanity? Well: we will be as disagreeable as you. Here's Fazio." ☞

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

Dr Johnson once said to a lady who was harassing him with eulogies—"Madam, consider what your praise is worth, before you bestow it so liberally."

Piety practised in solitude, like the flower that blooms in the desert, may give its fragrance to the winds of heaven, and delight those unbodied spirits that survey the works of God and man; but it bestows no assistance upon earthly beings, and however free from the taints of impurity, yet wants the sacred splendour of Beneficence.

Life is but short: no time can be afforded but for the indulgence of real sorrow, or contests upon questions seriously momentous. Let us not throw away any of our days upon useless resentment, or contend who shall hold out longest in stubborn malignity. It is best not to be angry, and best in the next place to be quickly reconciled.—Dr Johnson.

EPITAPH ON A MISER.—Here lies one who lived unloved and died unlamented; who denied plenty to himself, assistance to his friends, and relief to the poor; who starved his family, oppressed his neighbours, and plagued himself to gain what he could not enjoy: at last Death, more merciful to him than he was to himself, released him from care and his family from want; and here he lies with the muck-worm he imitated, and with the dirt he loved, in fear of a resurrection, lest his heirs should have spent the money he left behind; having laid up no treasure where moth and rust do not corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal.

Hannah More expressing her wonder to Dr Johnson, that the poet who could write "Paradise Lost," should write such poor "Sonnets,"—he replied—"Milton, Madam, was a genius who could cut a Colossus from a rock, but could not carve heads upon cherry-stones. [I cannot agree with the Doctor—Milton did carve heads upon cherry-stones.]

Covetousness is the only sin that grows young as men grow old.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Drama, (in Two Acts) called,

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]

Maria Grazia, Mrs W. BARRYMORE, Ottavia, Miss FAUCIT.
Prince Bianchi, Mr Younge, Nicolo, Mr Webster, Fabio, Mr Hughes,
Albert and Theodore, Mr H. WALLACK and Mr J. VINING,
Alessandro Massaroni, Mr WALLACK,
Rubaldo, Mr Bedford,
Spoletto, Mr Bland, Uberto, Mr Robinson, Carlotti. Mr Yarnold.

After which, a Musical Piece, (in Two Acts) called

THE ILLUSTRIOUS STRANGER.

[By Mr KENNEY.]

Irza, Miss FAUCIT, Fatima, Mrs WAYLETT,
Aboulifar, Mr Thompson, Aman, Mr Bland. Alibajou, Mr Webster,
Bowbell, Mr LISTON, Gimbo, Mr HARLEY.

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

To-morrow, A New Way to Pay Old Debts; the Happiest Day of My Life; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Operatic Drama, to be called

THE ROMANCE OF A DAY.

The Music, by H. R. Bishop.

Sophia Walstein, Miss FORDE. Liese, Miss E. TREE. Therese, Miss P. Horton.
Widow Klaffen, Mrs GIBBS. Karoline Klaffen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Adolph, Count of Engleberg, Mr HUNT. General Kienwitz, Mr BARTLEY.
Colonel Francoeur, Mr ABBOT. Nikel Unterhand; Mr G. PENSON.
Moritz, Mr BLANCHARD. Fritz Klaffen, Mr KEELEY.
Paul Richter, Miss TAYLOR. Hubert, Mr Irwin.

After the Drama, an Overture by J. N. Hummel.

After which, a New Petite Comedy, to be called

MARRIED LOVERS.

[By Mr POWER.]

The Songs, composed by Mr Barnett.

Duchess D'Orleans, Miss FORDE. Marchioness de Meneville, Miss TAYLOR.
Lady Ascot, Mrs CHATTERLEY. Annette, Miss PHILLIPS.
Duc D'Orleans, Mr ABBOTT. Marquis de Meneville, Mr BARTLEY.
Sir John Ascot, Mr WARDE. Colonel O'Dillon, Mr POWER.
Pierre, Mr Irwin. Francis, Mr Mears.

To conclude with the New Grand and Comic Pantomime, called

HARLEQUIN FAT, AND HARLEQUIN BAT.

[By Mr FARLEY.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr G. Stansbury.
With a Speaking Opening. [By Mr PEAKE.] Characters by Mr BAKER and Mr KEELEY.
Columbine, Miss LOUISA JOHNSTONE.
Harlequin, Mr ELLAR, Clown, Mr PAULO, Pantaloon, Mr BARNES.

THE ORDER OF SCENERY.

Scene I.—The Giant's Causeway, by Moonlight—II. The Boyne Water.—III. Exterior of King O'Roirk's Castle.—IV. The Grand Banqueting Hall.—V. The Banshee's Ravine.—VI. M'Murragh's Keep.—VII. Extensive View of the Lake of Killarney.—VIII. The Custom-House and Quay, (Dublin).—IX. The New Bridge over the Menai.—X. The Pool—Tower—and St Katharine's Docks.—XI. The Globe Hotel and Catler's Shop.—XII. A Market.—XIII. Windsor Park and Castle.—XIV. Portsmouth Harbour. The Royal Yacht passing along the Coast, till she arrives off Brighton, and the Illumination.—XV. The Triumphal Arch, Erected in honor of the Arrival of their Majesties at the Royal Pavilion, on August 30, 1830.—XVI. Frog Farm and Kitchen.—XVII. Ludgate Hill and St Paul's, as it was intended to be on the 9th of November, 1830.—XVIII. Lost in a Log.—XIX. Guildhall as fitted up for the Lord Mayor's Festival.—XX and last. The Fairy Grove and Magic Palace.

To-morrow, Cinderella; Comrades and Friends; or Life for Life.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Drama, altered from MORTON'S Play of 'Town and Country', entitled

THE PASTOR'S FIRESIDE.

The Principal Characters by Miss SCOTT, Miss SOMERVILLE,
Miss Nicol, Madame Simon, Miss Rumens, Miss H. Boden, and Mrs Rogers.
Mr C. Hill, Mr Gough, Mr Hosmer, Mr D. Pitt,
Mr WILLIAMS, Mr OSBALDISTON, Mr VALE,
Mr Almar, Mr Hobbs, Mr Young, Mr Amherst, Mr Tully, and Mr Webb.

After which, a new Comic Drama, entitled

"PS. COME TO DINNER."

Charlotte, Miss Vincent. Fanny, Miss Ellis, Mrs Pickwick, Madame Simon.
Mrs Bobbin, Miss Rummens. Betty, Mrs Rogers.
Sir Gregory Gander, Mr D. PITT. Capt. Cour('em, Mr Honor. Scapin, Mr C. Hill.
Lackbrain, Mr Rogers. Peter Pickwick, Mr VALE. Tim Bobbin, Mr WILLIAMS.
Hob, Mr Emded. Haory, Mr Hicks. Snooz'em, Mr Gough.

To conclude with, the Grand Serious Spectacle, in Two Acts, entitled

OBI: OR, THREE-FINGER'D JACK!

With the original Music, by the late Dr Arnold.

Rosa, Madame Simon. Quashee's Wife, Mrs Vale. Sam's Wife, Miss Jordan.
Captain Orford, Mr Honner. Planter, Mr Almar.
Overseer, Mr Edwin. Three-Finger'd Jack, Mr C. Hill.
Quashee, Mr T. Hill. Sam, Mr Asbury. Jonkanoo, Mr Grammer.
Old Woman, Mr Webb. Officer, Mr Lee. Tucky, Mademoiselle Rosier.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Grizzle Glowworm, Mrs Beaumont. Susan, Miss Barnett. Amoret, Miss M. Glover.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
Linaro, Alpaner, and Spirit Hunters, Messrs Morris, Winning, Fry, Taylor, &c.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Sebastian, Gregory, and Adam, Messrs Sanders, Willson, and Paule, Jun.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Andrew and Karl, (his Children) Masters Calkin and Barnett.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

To conclude with a Domestic Burletta, in two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.

Act I.—WINTER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mrs DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS.
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act II.—SUMMER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Miles Bertram, Mr YATES, Blackadder, Mr S. SMITH.
Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE,
Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE, Walter, Mr HEMMINGS.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A new Burletta, entitled

THE LOST SON.

[From the French of M. SCRIBE, by Mr AINSWORTH.]

Madame de Sainville, Mrs Knight. Henriette, Miss Nursey.
Leontine, Miss Sidney. Baron Von Neirstein, Mr Cooper.
M. La-Roche, Mr W. VINING. Eugène de Nerseuil, Mr Raymond.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called

THE GRENADIER.

[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]

Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

After which, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called

MIS-APPREHENSION.

[By Mr C. DANCE.]

Miss Clementina Bramble, Miss Stuart. Fanny, Miss Pincott. Ellen, Miss Kabrey.
Frank Hartley, Mr RAYMOND.
Thomas, Mr Cooper. Money, Mr W. VINING. Mr Williams, Mr Coates.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]

Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
Prometheus, (an eminent Manufacturer) Mr J. Cooper,
Swiss Boy, (a great Anachronism) Mr Beckwith.
IMMORTALS—OLYMPIC REVELLERS.
Ganymede, Miss Greener, Minerva, Mrs Thomas, Juno, Miss Stuart,
Hope, Miss Langley. Jupiter, Mr J. Knight, Neptune, Mr W. Young,
Apollo, Miss Melbourne, Bacchus, Mr W. VINING, Momus, Mr D. Smith.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,

TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

A New Operatic Piece, entitled

GALATEA.

From GAY'S Serenata. With HANDEL'S Music, arranged by Mr C. POTTER.
Principal Characters by Miss VERNON, Mrs GARRICK, and Mrs HUMBY.
Mr BENNETT. Mr J. RUSSELL. Mr SPENCER. Mr G. SMITH.
Mr MUNROE. Mr G. LEJEUNE. And Mr E. SEGUIN.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.

The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Maria

At the end of the Opera, a Solo on the Violin, by Mr Dando.

After which, a New Musical Comedietta, in One Act, entitled

THREE TO ONE.

The Music, by Mr G. Cooke.
The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss WELLS. Miss AYRES.
And Mr FORRESTER.

A DIVERTISEMENT,

By Mr EDGAR, and the Corps de Ballet.

Previous to the Comedietta, Rossini's Overture to "Cenerentola."
And previous to the Entertainment, Mozart's Overture to "Zauberflote."

To conclude with a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called

EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.

The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss Stohwasser. Miss Wells. Miss Garrick.
Miss Sinclair. Mr Smith. Mr Tilbury. Mr Munroe. Mr Roberts.
And Mr GREEN.

COBURG THEATRE.—The Spectre of the Castle—The Night Hag—And Elizabeth.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck; or the Buccaneer's Bridal—Popping the Question—And the Pantomime.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed): sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 115 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 138.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

History of the Life and Reign of George the Fourth. 3 vols. 12mo. volume the first. (Being the second volume of Dr Lardner's Cabinet Library). Longman.

[Concluding Notice.]

Before we speak of George the Fourth, it will be as well to remind the reader of the account we have already quoted, of his mother,—a lady whose virtues, like those of her husband, were of a negative order, and who had the defects of narrowness of mind and a love of money.

Queen Charlotte, notwithstanding her reputation for propriety, was not popular; which circumstance alone, in any person so highly situated, so long in that situation, and with so many opportunities of doing good, we hold to be utter condemnation. Little is known of her, except that she was plain, loved money and sermons, and took snuff. She was said to have laid up her treasures "where moths do not corrupt;" but it is believed that she thought she might as well have some treasure also, in places where they do. An account was circulated at her decease, of the discovery of a wardrobe full of shawls, dropping to pieces for want of having had somebody to wear them; and whether it was true or not, the public believed it.

George the Fourth inherited from his father a large and robust person, but finelier turned. His features were cast rather in the maternal mould, but to much greater advantage. He did not inherit from either any great portion of intellect, but probably he surpassed them both in natural goodness, however it was subsequently injured by his rank and education.

This Prince was born on the 12th of August 1762, and the moment he appeared in the world was, by the fact of so appearing, "Duke of Cornwall and Rothsay, Earl of Carrick, Baron of Renfrew, Lord of the Isles, and Great Steward of Scotland:" that is to say, he was leader of the armies of Cornwall and Rothsay, elderly gentleman of Carrick, man of Renfrew, loaf-giver of the Isles, and high manager of the affairs of Scotland.

'Opportunities of seeing the infant Prince were liberally allowed. Ladies were admitted on certain days, in successive parties, to a sight of him in the drawing-room of St James's. The descriptions given in the publications and private letters of the day may seem trifling, but they are curious and picturesque. A cradle containing the infant was placed beneath a splendid canopy, on a slight elevated platform, with an ornament of carved work, having a royal coronet in the middle of its head; the child lay beneath an embroidered velvet quilt, bordered with Brussels lace; two fair mutes on either side rocked him to sleep; and the nurse sat in her dignity beside him. The visitors were desired to tread softly; and a slight Chinese railing, which enclosed the platform, prevented the over curious from too near an approach.'—P. 10.

It is thus that princes, from the first moment of their existence, are dandled into a notion that they are gods, and become less than men. Little Napoleon used to sit playing with a ball and sceptre, while Marshals of France stood round and played the courtier. The imagination blushes to think how such puerilities must be regarded by the Washingtons and Jeffersons of a great republic.

George the Fourth is said by his biographer to have profited 'by the labours of his instructors and his own, in the ancient classics; in the abstract sciences, at least as far as their application to those arts which a prince may be called upon to employ, and should always be competent to judge; in modern languages and literature; and in the fine arts. He has been represented, by those who approached him, as remembering the ancient classics with a discerning taste. He spoke French, Italian, and German, with facility; and though his familiar letters were somewhat deficient in grace, and even propriety of expression, he wrote and spoke, when he chose, and thought the occasion required it, with ease and dignity.'—P. 57.

We cannot believe it. It has always struck us as a singular contradiction in the most intelligent recorders of this prince's life and conversation, that they have given him credit for talents and accomplishments, which their own accounts of him, and not seldom their own expressed opinions, directly refute. The volume before us is not an exception to this remark. The author, who is by far the best writer that has handled the subject, speaks of "brilliant endowments and accomplishments," and has presented us with the above passage, while almost everything else in his book that concerns the prince, goes to show him a man of weak intellect and little acquirement, and leaves an impression upon the mind that his biographer so regards him. A knowledge of spoken languages argues little, especially when we consider the facilities which a prince has for learning them. The "discerning taste" in the classics, attributed to him by those "who approached him," makes us desire to know who the approachers were, what was the amount of their own discernment, and whether they did not listen with the overweening ears of servility. We all know how gratuitous people are in these matters with regard to princes; and what a something in a royal mouth become the nothings of other men. A man's familiar letters may be "deficient in grace," and sometimes in "propriety of expression," without arguing anything against his general power of doing better: but we cannot believe, that they can be so deficient in common sense and grammar as the prince's were (we allude to those which have been lately before the world), and yet warrant us in drawing a conclusion favourable to his amount of common talent. His taste in the fine arts may be seen by all the world in Buckingham Palace! Sir Philip Francis described him as a tiresome companion, whose conversation it was desirable to evade. An Italian gentleman, who went over the Opera House with him, upon one of the occasions of its being refitted up, told a friend of ours, than nothing could be more silly than his remarks. We have a distinct and strong recollection, that the only time we ever met with an extempore speech of his recorded in the newspapers, it was quite as futile as his letter-writing. It was on occasion of his taking leave of his regiment, when the latter went abroad.

There is nothing which has more served to convince us of the truth of our author's unfavourable opinion of the prince's first mistress, Mrs Robinson, than this fact of his Royal Highness's want of common literature. This lady speaks of his delightful conversation and his "eloquent letters." Much may be conceded to the vanity of such an intercourse as her's, and to its willing credulities; but unfortunately, a letter of his Royal Highness's to Mrs Robinson transpired on his decease, among the others above alluded to, and it was as bad as the best of them. His Royal Highness evidently did not understand the meaning of some of the commonest words in the language; nor could his memory tax itself with a nominative case, if two or three shambling sentences took it into their heads to come between it and the verb.

Our author, we think, has well summed up the spirit of this affair between the Prince and Mrs Robinson:—

'The Prince of Wales was assuredly warranted in discarding Mrs Robinson. She could not plead any sacrifice of innocence or good fame; and as to the supposed "ruin of her peace," her Memoirs are at issue on that point, with the evidence of her notorious and uninterrupted gaieties after the separation took place. A connection begun in artifice could hardly have ended in an attachment of passion and the heart. But the gallantry of a gentleman, and the common feelings of a man, should have taught the Prince of Wales to secure her from distress. Her settlement of 400l. a year, besides being irregularly paid, was, for the most part, intercepted by creditors, whose claims remained unsatisfied; and he who decked her in all the luxury and splendour which wealth could bestow, whilst she possessed youth and charms, left her to struggle with poverty, when she no longer had youth, beauty, or health. This was not generous, but it was natural and consistent. His liberalities, essentially selfish, were conferred for the gratification of his own caprice, and ceased, of course, with the motive which produced them.'

The following is a real piece of the biography of George the Fourth; for there was nothing more serious to him, from first to last, than the cut and colour of his habiliments:—

'The Prince of Wales appeared at Court on the Queen's birthday, in the winter of 1781, in his new character of manhood. The most remarkable, at least the most remarked, circumstance in his appearance on the occasion, was a complete change in the fashion of his dress. His new costume, then admired and imitated, would appear not a little grotesque at a subsequent period in his own court. The curious in those matters may be pleased with the description:—"His coat was of pink silk, with white cuffs; his waistcoat of white silk, embroidered with various coloured foil, but adorned with a profusion of French paste; and his hat was ornamented with two rows of steel beads, 5,000 in number, with a button and loop of the same metal, and cocked in a military style." '—P. 80.

Digitized by Google

Speaking of the Whig friends of the Prince of Wales, and of the way in which they united pleasure with business, the author observes,—

'It should be said of the men of that day, that they were prodigal of life, rather than wasteful of time. They concentrated and expended in a brief compass the mental and vital energies, which they might have economised through a longer period. Those who would look back upon their lives in the spirit of reprobation, may be consoled with the reflection that the race is extinct. But the influence of their society and example upon the habits of the Prince has been grossly overcharged by servility, which would throw the odium of his errors upon others; and by party spirit, which would throw any odium on political opponents. He would have contracted debts, and found companions in debauchery, had his Whig friends never existed,—as in truth he did beyond and beneath their sphere,—whilst, at the same time, he owed to the converse of those accomplished persons much useful instruction, the exercise of his faculties and fancy, and the cultivation of his tastes.'—P. 86.

We believe much of this to be true; but we think it would have been as well had our author drawn a distinction between the irregularities of such a man as Mr Fox, and the heartless vices of many, perhaps most of the other persons about the Prince. If the Prince's Whig friends were not the creators of what was ill in him, they certainly were not the founders of anything that was good. They inoculated him with no salutary principle. At least they gave him no strength to retain it. He waived them off as soon as it was convenient to him, and withdrew into the Toryism natural to Kings. Of the public good, we believe he had never any idea, but as something which enabled him to lead a flashy life when young, to have a luxurious retirement when old, and to divide the honours of success with a victorious General, by fashioning the caps of his soldiers.

At page 105 is a parliamentary anecdote of Mr Fox, in the relation of which we cannot help thinking that our author's usual tact, as well as memory, must have forsaken him. He is speaking of the famous coalition of Lord North:—

'Mr Fox,' he observes, 'defended the coalition and himself with all the energy and adroitness of his dialectics and the happy turns of his wit. A member of the House of Commons (Mr Martin) said he wished a starling were perched on the right hand of the Speaker, to cry "Disgraceful, cursed coalition!" The retort of Mr Fox does not appear in the published reports of his speeches. He said he saw no necessity for the starling, when the honourable gentleman himself was so ready and so qualified to perform the duty.'—P. 105.

Surely Mr Fox's retort must have contained a play upon the word Martin. The omission resembles the story of Archbishop Herring and his fall in the gutter.

The following summary sketch of "life, character, and behaviour," will give the reader a good idea of the lower part of the Prince's society, and the "way in which they went on:"—

'Lord Barrymore made amends for his economy of wit, by the prodigality with which he hastened his own ruin in dinners, balls, suppers, and assemblages of three hundred people, at Wargrave.

'This noted spendthrift had commenced his career so early, and squandered so profusely, that he found himself nearly ruined on coming of age. Of all the Prince of Wales's dissolute companions, he seems to have been the most abandoned. On attaining his majority, he entertained the Prince at the cost of 10,000 pounds, and was obliged to sell his horses and carriages soon after he had thus signalized his attainment of the age of discretion. He had an extraordinary fund of animal spirits, with some eccentricity. The Prince one night, at his instigation, rushed out with a party from the orgies of the pavilion, fantastically dressed in table-cloths, with napkins round their heads, and making strange noises to fright the old women of Brighton out of their senses or their sleep. He played Harlequin in a pantomime at the Brighton theatre,—jumping with grotesque activity through a blazing hoop, and "setting the audience in a roar," by a ridiculous disruption of his motley dress. He exhibited himself, if possible, still more incongruously to the fashionable world of London, dancing a mock minuet in Saville row with the clown Delpini. But Lord Barrymore's animal spirits were no longer enlivening—his eccentricities no longer whimsical—when his ruin became apparent. His reception at Carlton House, from being reserved and infrequent, ceased altogether. It was very common to shift the blame of the Prince of Wales's irregularities from himself to his associates. The ruin of those among them who had fortunes to lose, might, with more propriety, be charged to their foolish ambition of associating with him. The facility with which he both encouraged and discarded them was a natural consequence, a just punishment(!) and a useful example. Lord Barrymore's career was soon and fatally terminated. His private theatricals at Wargrave were closed, as it was expressed at Carlton House, "with a finale song by John Doe and Richard Roe;" his assaults and batteries which he committed indiscriminately on Sir John Lade, Mr T. C. and his other compeers of the Jockey Club, at Newmarket, and on those whom he met in street brawls, and the low haunts of profligacy, made him avoided by persons of his own condition, and brought him under the notice of the Court of King's Bench. He appeared twice before Lord Kenyon, the Chief Justice,—as a party prosecuted for an assault, and as defendant in an action for debt. The action was brought by the architect who built his private theatre at Wargrave: he pleaded his minority, was answered by proof of a promise to pay after he became of age, and lost both his honour and his cause. Lord Barrymore was an officer in the Berkshire militia. Whilst escorting a party of French prisoners from Rye to Dover, 1793, he was shot in the head by the accidental discharge of a carbine, which he had with him in his carriage, died in a few minutes, and thus finished at the early age of twenty-three, his short, dissolute, and foolish life.'—P. 216.

In giving an account of another of the Prince's friends, the Duke of Orleans, the biographer hazards his reputation for authenticity a little too far, when he quotes a reply of his Serene Highness to "the consolations of his confidential valet-de-chambre." This Prince was supposed by some to have been 'actuated by the vengeance of a slighted passion for the unfortunate Marie Antoinette. She treated him with disdain; the jealous eye of a scorned lover upon her actions become troublesome, and she twice procured his exile from Paris and Versailles. Whilst overwhelmed with disappointment and ennui, in the solitude of one of his country houses, he vented his feelings in the following reply to the consolations of his confidential valet-de-chambre,—"They shall pay for this dearly, though I were to perish for it: yes; I could die content if I involved the King, and above all the Queen, in my ruin; and I will do it, though it cost me my fortune and my life." '—P. 219.

Where did the biographer find this discourse with the confidential valet-de-chambre? or what value can be attached to the disclosures of such a personage? With still less warrant he speaks of Lafayette as desirous to be rid of a "rival in popularity." To be rid of the Duke of Orleans was to be rid of a bad man; and there is nothing in the noble and undeviating career of Lafayette to subject him at any time to the suspicion of less worthy motives than those of the most generous goodness.

This volume contains good accounts of the distressing states of debt which perplexed the Prince of Wales, and enabled the King and Mr Pitt to assume such imposing advantages over him,—of the sensation created by the supposed and we believe indisputable marriage of his Royal Highness with Mrs Fitzherbert,—of the falsehood into which the trusting superiority of Mr Fox's nature was beguiled for the purpose of contradicting the marriage,—and of the unfortunate union with poor Caroline of Brunswick, whose natural candour and open-heartedness, though accompanied perhaps by no great refinement, and not undeformed by violence, deserved a better fate, than to become the victim of mercenary convenience, and the unequal privileges of the stronger.

We shall look with interest for the author's two other volumes. The present one has led us into a longer succession of extracts than usual; but the reader, we trust, will have found reason to excuse it.

Silence is the judicious ornament of those who have nothing to say.

Poverty and sorrow are the strongest securities against the intrusions of mankind. Let Adversity guard your threshold, and you may linger through an uninterrupted life and mournful seclusion.

A capacity to do good not only gives a title to it, but also makes the doing of it a duty.

He who has got the name for early rising, may lie in bed till breakfast-time.

ACTION.

Birds, beasts, air, fire, the heavens and rolling worlds,
All live by action: nothing lies at rest
But death and ruin.

JOHNSON'S STYLE ANTICIPATED.—Sir Thomas Browne, in his Essay on Urn-Burial, says,—Gold once out of the earth is no more due unto it; what was unreasonably committed to the ground is reasonably removed from it. Let monuments and rich fabrics, not riches, adorn men's ashes. The commerce of the living is not to be transferred unto the dead. It is not injustice to take that which none complains to lose, and no man is wronged where no man is possessor.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—The Brigand.—The Illustrious Stranger.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Romance of a Day.—Married Lovers.—And the Pantomime.

COVENT-GARDEN.

We looked in here last night, and saw an act of the Romance of a Day, which has already been criticised in this paper. We have nothing to add to the judgment delivered upon it; but would merely express our pleasure at seeing Mr KEELEY again, and finding Miss H. CAWSE in a more prominent part than is usually assigned her. There is a turn for unaffected truth in this young lady's manner, a simplicity in her style of singing, and a rich delicacy in her voice, which always interest us, and give us a kind of personal wish for her success. She ought to take confidence, and say everything she does with double boldness. KEELEY has opened a mine for the play-wrights, in his union of a self-satisfied dumpiness with the sentimental and the agile. In the piece before us he is a conceited lover, who thinks he has made a desperate impression upon a village beauty, and finds himself deceived. The reader may imagine him! He has little thick legs in white, little thick thighs in slate colour, a jacket and shirt to match, and a Spanish hat adorned with ribands. This well-fed little phenomenon, with a face of natural judgment, complexional doubt, and acquired complacency, goes sighing and dying about the stage, with alternate airs of pity for the heart-struck maiden, and congratulation for himself. When about to receive (as he thinks) her hand, he turns aside with a bashful acquiescence. When he would be pathetic, he talks of the remote calamity of "dying by inches." When he finds himself really at fault, and rejected, he thinks he is bound to tear a few hairs off his head in going away, and appeases his mortified vanity by stamping several times with all the might of his shoes. Mr KEELEY apprehends this character to perfection. When he runs out on a supposed triumphant errand, and comes back to enjoy the result of it in the reception of the lady's hand, nothing can be more truly vain and self-satisfied than the heavy, loitering leaps into which he slackens his haste, and finally comes to the à plomb. It is heavy with the sense of his merits. He seems to say, "Thine end is attained, Fritz-Klaffen! It is the solidity of thy deserts that has brought thee to this consummation! Repose upon thy graces and thy judiciousness! Oppress not the lady with too swift a sense of her happiness! Be easy, and perfect."

We were sorry to find, by the book of the songs, that much of the singing has been latterly omitted. The Court Journal has given just praise to the song about the Nightingale and the Rose, and the pretty conceit at the end of the first stanza. As it is not common to meet with song-books of modern operas, in which there is anything worth extracting, we will lay it before the reader:—

BALLAD.—Karoline (Miss H. CAWSE).

"I dream'd the rose was married to the bird it loves so well;
They had built a leafy bow'r in a deep romantic dell;
To the nuptial-banquet hurried ev'ry warbler wild and gay,
And bud and blossom crowded round in beautiful array;
The vale-born lily prank'd herself in all her bridal snows,
And rang her silver bells to hail the marriage of the rose!

But scarcely o'er the wedded pair a summer moon had pass'd,
When the nightingale had vanish'd, and the rose was fading fast!
And whisper'd ev'ry busy leaf, and twitter'd ev'ry bird:
'What could the silly flow'r have hop'd from union so absurd?
She scorn'd the fondest woodbine that ever breath'd a sigh,
And link'd her fate to a winged mate, that leaves her now to die!'"

There is a stanza in a song in the first act, the two concluding lines of which please us better than these:—

"Laden with diamonds
Let dames seek the hall,
To yawn at a concert,
Or faint at a ball:
I'll sing and dance
At my own village fair;
Joy in heart,
And a rose in my hair."

This is as much superior to the pretty conceit, as pure nature is to something not very natural, however pretty.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

PUBLIC MONEY.—Public money ought to be touched with the most scrupulous consciousness of honour. It is not the produce of riches only, but of the hard earnings of labour and poverty. It is drawn even from the bitterness of want and misery. Not a beggar passes, or perishes in the streets, whose mite is not in that mass.

AUSTERITY.—The simplicity of the dove is to be guided by the prudence of the serpent. Too much austerity of doctrine savours more of affectation than discretion, and drives oftener at libertinism than true reform, every one inclining to shake off the yoke when rendered too heavy. Excess of rigour is a kind of usury, in that it extorts upon conscience to the oppression of a weak brother. The way to heaven is narrow: we ought not to straighten it more, nor to lay stumbling blocks in the paths.—Yellow Dwarf.

COMMUNICATION WITH POSTERITY.—How much valuable and useful information of the actual existing state of arts and knowledge at any period might be transmitted to posterity in a distinct, tangible, and imperishable form, if, instead of the absurd and useless disposition of a few coins and medals under the foundations of buildings, specimens of ingenious implements, or condensed statements of scientific truths, or processes in arts and manufactures were substituted. Will books infallibly preserve to a remote posterity all that we may desire should be hereafter known of ourselves and our discoveries, or all that posterity would wish to know? And may not a useless ceremony be thus transformed into an act of enrolment in a perpetual archive of what we most prize, and acknowledge to be most valuable?—Herschel's Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy.

A SPARE DIET.—Dr Tronchin, Physician to a former Duke of Orleans, was celebrated for having studied the influence of the moral upon the physical man, the necessity of managing the strength, of proportioning the resources to the means, and the advantage of combating the principle of the disease, by removing out of the way whatever might contribute to cherishing and irritating it. Spare diet was almost always one of the first of his prescriptions. "'Tis the best way," he said, "to cut off the enemy's provisions: that is already a great point gained."—What Plutarch said of a physician of his time, was applied to Tronchin:—"He was among physicians what Socrates was among philosophers."

ENGLAND AND AMERICA.—The American President is elected every four years, and his salary is about 6,000*l.*;—our Royal Family costs us about one hundred and sixty times that sum. The whole of the expense of the civil government in America, and for their army and navy, is about three millions sterling, taking the dollar at five shillings;—our expense for these is said by Ministers to be eighteen millions and a half.] The interest of their debt, including the sinking fund, is two millions and a half;—ours is forty-eight millions. Their excess of revenue beyond the expenditure (the only real sinking fund), is one million and a half;—our excess of expenditure beyond our revenue is nineteen millions; and therefore our sinking fund is one that will soon sink us in the gulf of bankruptcy—it is worse than nonsense. Everything here is taxed, even the very light of heaven, and the bread we eat;—there nothing is taxed, except foreign productions. Those who call themselves our Representatives are chosen once in seven years; the people have hardly anything to say in the choice of them; and a majority of them are appointed by a few Peers and rich commoners, whose interest is very different from that of the rest of the people;—in America, the Representatives of the people are elected every year; Peers are unknown; and the qualification to entitle them to a vote is so low, that almost every man has a voice in the election. With annual elections, and almost universal suffrage, America is abolishing all internal taxes and rapidly extinguishing her debt;—here, with septennial elections, in which the great bulk of the nation have nothing to say, we are ground to the earth with taxes, while we are adding at least nineteen millions a year to our debt! And yet there are many people still so blind or so infatuated as to say, that annual elections and universal suffrage are to be deprecated as impracticable theories, and which would do no good here, suppose they were practicable! We can only apply to these people the adage, "Quem Deus vult perdere, prius dementat;" and we heartily wish their eyes may be opened ere it be too late.—Dundee Advertiser, 1818.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have not forgotten a letter which reached us from Cambridge, and which was very welcome. The books it speaks of will be noticed in the course of a few days.

The error pointed out by J. J. W. in a contemporary publication, is, we think, hardly worth comment.

We shall take an opportunity of noticing the spirit of PHILO-DRAMATICUS's communication.

J. K. will have seen that we were obliged to him. So will our friend T. A, whose document shall be returned to him speedily.

J. H.'s "Religious Sign of the Times" is hardly so good as his Military.

Many thanks to F. G., not omitting a due sense of the interest taken in our pages by his fair friend. The little volume he was good enough to send us, was made use of in the earlier numbers of the TATLER. It will be returned him with the larger one, when we have indecently kept it a little longer.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Play of
A NEW WAY TO PAY OLD DEBTS.
[By Mr MASSINGER.]
Lady Allworth, Mrs FAUCIT, Margaret, Miss FAUCIT,
Froth, Mrs Broad, Tabitha, Mrs Webster, Abigail, Mrs East.
Sir Giles Overreach, Mr KEAN,
Wellborn, Mr COOPER, Marrall, Mr FARREN,
Lovel, Mr H. WALLACK, Allworth, Mr J. VINING, Tapwell, Mr HUGHES,
Justice Greedy, Mr WEBSTER, Amble, Mr TAYLEURE,
Order, Mr Cathie, Furnace, Mr Salter, Watchall, Mr Honner,
Tailor, Mr Eaton, Vintner, Mr Lee.

In the course of the Evening, Spontini's Overture to "Nurmahal," and Rossini's Overture to "La Gazza Ladra."

After which will be exhibited the new and splendid
DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD,
The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 500 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Pariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To conclude with a New Melo-Dramatic Opera, in Two Acts, called
THE DEVIL'S BROTHER.
[Adapted to the English Stage, by A. LEE.]
Lady Pamela Goslington, Mrs ORGER. Zerlina, Mrs WAYLETT.
The Concerted Music, by Misses Byfeld, Bruce, S. Phillips, Russell, and Mrs Bedford
Fra Diavolo, Mr WALLACK.
Sir Gregory Goslington, Mr HARLEY. Lorenzo, Mr SINCLAIR.
Lucro, Mr Webster.
Banditti—Beppo, Mr Latham. Giacomo, Mr Bedford. 1st Carabineer, Mr Bland.
Postilion, Mr Honner. Francisco, Mr Eaton.

To-morrow, Rob Roy; Turning the Tables; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The New Grand Comic Opera, (in Three Acts) called
CINDERELLA.
The Music, by Rossini.
Cinderella, Miss INVERARITY. Clorinda, Miss CAWSE.
Thisbe, Miss HUGHES. Fairy Queen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Felix, Mr HUNT. Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. PENSON.
Alidoro, Mr G. STANSBURY. Dandini, Mr MORLEY.
Pedro, Mr KEELEY.

After which, a New Drama, in Two Acts, to be called
COMRADES AND FRIENDS; OR, LIFE FOR LIFE.
[The Music selected and arranged by Mr G. Stansbury.]
Madame Derville, Mrs CHATTERLEY,
Madame Bertrand, Mrs VINING, Nina, Miss KENDALL,
Elisa, Miss E. KENDALL, Laurette, Miss TAYLOR.
Roland Duroc, Charles Valcour, } Sergeants of a French Regiment, } Mr WARDE, Mr ABBOTT,
Morazzi (the Adjutant), Mr G. BENNETT,
Henry (Commander of the Packet), Mr DURUSET, La Mouche, Mr TURNOUR,
Dumont (Lieutenant of the Regiment), Mr HENRY,
Adolphus (Son of Madame Derville), Miss Hunt, Joseph, Mr Fuller,
Valentine (an old Domestic) Mr Barnes, Paul, Mr Addison.

In Act II. A Dance of Peasantry.
[Composed by Mr D'Albert.
By Mesdames Blaire, Fairbrother, Griffiths, Payne, Reed, Thomassin,
Vials, Wells,
Messrs Addison, J. Cooper, Collett, Grant, Heath, King, F. Sutton.

To-morrow, The Romance of a Day; and Married Lovers.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

In the course of the Season, the following Performers will appear for the first time
Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY, du Theâtre du Gymnase.
Madame ALBERT, du Theâtre des Nouveautés.
M. BRUNET, Artiste, du Theâtre des Variétés.

Second appearance of Mons. BOUFFE, who is engaged for 12 nights only.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par
LES FRERES A L'EPREUVE.
Comédie en Trois Actes, de M. VOLMERANGES.
Pauline, épouse de Gerval, Mlle. St. Ange. Madame de la Janker, Mme. Baudin.
Deux Femmes de Chambre, Mlles. Corra et Emma.
M. de Monval, M. Cloup. M. D'Hermonville, son Ami, M. Alfred.
Gerval, M. de la Janker, Neveux de M. Monval, M. Pelissié, M. Gamard.
Le Roc, viel Usurier, M. Prêval. Français, vieux Domestique, M. Guenée.
Deux Valets, MM. Arnaud et Granville.

Suivie de
C A L E B.
Vaudeville en Un Acte, de MM. DARTOIS et E. SCRIBE.
Clara, Sœur d'Edouard, Mlle. Florval.
Emmy, jeune Fille gardant les troupeaux du village, Mlle. St. Ange.
M. BOUFFE remplira le Rôle de Caleb, (his original character).
Henri, Comte de Douglas, M. Derval. Edouard, son ami, M. Paulin.
Jaket, Charpentier du Village, M. Prêval. Kirk Aubergiste, M. Guenée.
Le Greffier, du Juge de Paix, M. Granville.

On Finira par la Première Représentation de
LE MARCHAND DE LA RUE SAINT DENIS.
Vaudeville nouveau en Trois Actes, de MM. BRAZIER et de VILLENEUVE.
Madame Dumont, Mme. Prêval. Henriette, sa Fille, Mlle. Florval.
Séraphine, Nièce de Madame Dumont, Mlle. St. Ange.
Octavie, Fille de Beaupré, Mlle. Eliza. Marguerite, Gouvernante, Mlle. Emma.
Jeannette, Nourrice, Mlle. Corra.
M. BOUFFE remplira le Rôle de Théophile, (his original character).
D. Dumont, Marchand de Soiries, M. St. Aubert. Durvilliers, Magistrat, M. Derval.
Edouard, son Fils, M. Alfred. Le Baron Beaupré, M. Cloup.
Le Maire, M. Paulin. Jocard, Garçon de Bureau, M. Prêval.
Un Auvergnat, M. Granville. Un Garçon de Caisse, M. Arnaud.
Un Vétéran, M. Guenée.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called
THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.
Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

To conclude with a Domestic Burletta, in Two Acts, called
THE WRECK ASHORE.
[By Mr BUCKSTONE.]
The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.
Act I.—WINTER.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mrs DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]
Act. II.—SUMMER.
The Characters as in Act I.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A new Burletta, entitled
THE LOST SON.
[From the French of M. SCRIBE, by Mr AINSWORTH.]
Madame de Sainville, Mrs Knight. Henriette, Miss Nursey.
Leontine, Miss Sidney. Baron Von Neirstein, Mr Cooper.
M. La-Roche, Mr W. VINING. Eugène de Nerseuil, Mr Raymond.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called
THE GRENADIER.
[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]
Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

After which, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called
MIS-APPREHENSION.
[By Mr C. DANCE.]
The Characters as before.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled
OLYMPIC REVELS.
[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.

SURREY THEATRE.

Will be revived the celebrated Drama, entitled
THE ITALIAN WIFE.
Bianca, Miss M. C. POOLE,
Marchesa Aldabella, Miss Scott, Clara, Miss Jordan.
Duke of Venice, Mr Dibdin Pitt, Gonsalvo, Mr Gough, Falsetto, Mr Honner,
Giraldi Fazio, Mr OSBALDISTON,
Bartolo, Mr Williams, Philario, Mr Almar, Antonio, Mr Young,

After which, (2nd time at this Theatre)
PAST TEN O'CLOCK, AND A RAINY NIGHT.
Nancy, Miss VINCENT. Lucy, Miss SOMERVILLE. Silence, Miss Nicol.
Bantam, Mr ROGERS. Dozey, Mr WILLIAMS. Sam Squib, Mr VALE.

The Nautico-Domestic Drama, entitled
THE ROVER'S BRIDE.
[By Mr G. ALMAR.]
The Principal Characters by Miss SCOTT, Miss SOMERVILLE, Mr D. PITT, Mr C. HILL, Mr VALE, and Mr ROGERS.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,
TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

A New Operatic Piece, entitled
GALATEA.
From GAY'S Serenata. With HANDEL'S Music, arranged by Mr C. POTTER.
Principal Characters by Miss VERNON, Mrs GARRICK, and Mrs HUMBY.
Mr BENNETT. Mr J. RUSSELL. Mr SPENCER. Mr G. SMITH.
Mr MUNROE. Mr G. LEJEUNE. And Mr E. SEGUIN.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.
The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Maria,
At the end of the Opera, a Solo on the Violin, by Mr Dando.

After which, a New Musical Comedietta, in One Act, entitled
THREE TO ONE.
The Music, by Mr G. Cooke.
The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss WELLS. Miss AYRES.
And Mr FORRESTER.

A DIVERTISEMENT,
By Mr EDGAR, and the Corps de Ballet.

Previous to the Comedietta, Rossini's Overture to "Cenerentola."
And previous to the Entertainment, Mozart's Overture to "Zauberflote."

To conclude with a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called
EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.
The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss Stohwasser. Miss Wells. Miss Garrick.
Miss Sinclair. Mr Smith. Mr Tilbury. Mr Munroe. Mr Roberts.
And Mr GREEN.

COBURG THEATRE.—The Spectre of the Castle—The Night Hag—And Elizabeth.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck; or the Buccaneer's Bridal—Popping the Question—And the Pantomime.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Pladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 139.]

[Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The History of France. By Eyre Evans Crowe. 12mo. Vol. II. pp. 341. (Being the fifteenth volume of Dr Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia). Longman.

[For notices of Vol. I., see Tatler, Nos. 54, 55, 56, and 57.]

We are still of opinion that this is the best history of France that has yet appeared in English; but either we have looked at the second volume with more attention, or it is hardly so well written as the first. We have again to complain of the neglect of anecdotes. The same authorities which furnished the author with his narrative in general, would have supplied him with these. The Memoires pour servir abound with them, beyond any other materials for history; and anecdotes are the life of narration. They are bits of the men themselves. All the rest we take more or less upon trust: it is the author speaking and thinking for us: anecdotes bring us into direct company with the parties, and enable us to judge for ourselves. The excuse ordinarily alleged for their omission is, that they take too much room in works that have little to spare: but we have never yet encountered any work of the sort, which might not have spared to advantage for their sake. A great deal of the spirit of ordinary narrative may be compressed into very brief compass. It is not a spirit likely to burst the vial. Anecdotes do the rest better than the author could. In short, we are, in this respect, for having a pudding made almost all of plums, not a piece of dough with a plumb stuck here and there. Why did Mr Crowe omit the anecdote of the pleasing medal which Louis the Thirteenth used to carry about his neck; to wit, a little basket of puppies? He speaks of Mazarin's personal interference between the French and Spanish armies, but does not give the particulars, which are picturesque, and might have been told in almost as few words. His friend De Retz, whom with all his talents we think he overrates, might have furnished him with a variety of characteristic passages; Madame de Motteville also, Brantome, and a hundred others. Mr Crowe's style is, in general, ambitiously attentive and exact; for which we are far from blaming him: it is a credit to himself, and to the series of publications in which he is a coadjutor; and for the most part the style is successful. But an ambition of this kind challenges criticism, and makes us object to the formal and forced passages we sometimes meet with; as at the beginning, for instance, of page 167; and why does Mr Crowe, at page 13, speak of the "Goddess Pecune," instead of Pecunia? The original French has here been retained with singular impropriety. "Savaron, an orator of eloquence in the tiers, exclaimed against the mercenary spirit of the noblesse, which, he said, had forsaken the pursuit of honour for the worship of the Goddess Pecune."—Prince Eugene put the charge in its most classical shape against the Duke of Marlborough, whom somebody was praising for his devotedness to "his queen." "His queen?" exclaimed the Prince; "His queen is Regina Pecunia."

Before we proceed with our extracts, we will notice one or two other mistakes, that we may dismiss the disagreeable part of criticism first; being of the little children's mind, who like to keep the best bit of their cake for the last. Our author says, "that great military talent must necessarily be wanting at the commencement of a war; and that it requires half a score of years campaigning for the age and the nation to form its military system anew,—the old never sufficing; and to find for that system a head and an arm capable of directing it."—P. 45. On the contrary, it may be asserted, that on great occasions great soldiers have never been wanting, and that too on the sudden. Witness alone the genius of Cromwell, and the appearance of the young and victorious Bonaparte, conquering Italy against the old soldiers of Austria.

Speaking of the nobles and the mob in the time of the wars of the Fronde, he says,

'The reader will not fail to remark how distinct these several classes kept from each other, even when in alliance and fighting the same battles; a state of society that has not ceased at the present day to characterize France: whilst in England, the blending of the lower ranks of the nobly born, with the higher ranks of the industrious and unennobled, effected by the habits and institutions of the country, have rendered the pernicious line of demarcation betwixt castes and classes almost invisible to the historian.'—P. 84.

We know not what it may be to the historian in his closet, but to the observer out in the world, nothing is more notorious, or a more common subject of remark, than the painful distinctness of this line of demarcation in England, compared with that of the continental nations. And the reasons are as notorious; namely, the existence of that very law of primogeniture, which renders the younger brothers of the nobility a set of dependents; and the dread entertained by the old families, of the encroachments of commercial wealth. In no country, as in England, is the line of demarcation so strongly marked between the "great vulgar and the small;" and in no country, for that reason, are the two classes so very vulgar after their respective fashions; that is to say, so vain of their corporate slang and peculiarities.

The following blunder amazes us:—'Darker and more singular traits are to be added to the character of the Duke of Orleans (the Regent): he disbelieved all religion, was a deist or atheist.' A deist or atheist! Why, no two men can be more different as regards belief and religion. Surely we have not to tell Mr Crowe this, or to ask him whether he understands the very meaning of the words; yet we must either suppose that he does not understand them, or has condescended to a cant. A deist may be a very religious man after his fashion; nay, so may an atheist be, as far as regards natural piety, or an affectionate regard for what is moral and beautiful: for religion means any tie upon our consciences, in addition to the common restraints of society; and men have been known to become atheists out of the very haste and impatience of their moral feelings revolting against the vulgar misrepresentations of deity. Besides, according to Bacon and other profound observers, Atheism is not calculated to produce such dark and singular crimes as Superstition. It was not Atheism or Deism that perpetrated the massacre of St Bartholomew, or that would have cannonaded the French people the other day, for not obeying the ordinances. If Robespiere was a deistical or atheistical fanatic, it was not irreligion that had set him the example of his slaughters up to that period of history.

The literature of the reign of Louis XIV, according to our author, was 'but the gilding, the precious ornament, of the stately edifice. Its tragedies and odes, its satires, sermons, fables, were written for the perusal or the audience of court. They were not born of popular feeling, and neither propagated nor influenced opinions deeper than taste. They are the domain of criticism, not of history.'—P. 190. But Molière's 'Tartuffe' is matter of history: religious hypocrisy is a matter of history. The Marquises and petits maîtres, whom he ridiculed, are matters of history; and so is the literature of every age, because it belongs to manners and to the state of the human mind.

There are several other points in Mr Crowe's second volume, which we should feel ourselves called upon to dispute with him, had we time and room. But now to pleasanter matter. In the following pithy sentences, we are struck with a lively sense of the difference between old and new France:—

'The yearly taille, (land-tax) on the poorer classes ONLY, amounted to fifty millions of livres, equal to double the sum in our day. The present land-tax in France, paid by all, does not exceed that amount by one and one half, and NOW THERE ARE NEITHER TITHES NOR FEUDAL EXACTIONS.'—P. 76.

In the next page, the author says, 'I cannot refrain from here remarking, how similar scenes are reproduced in French history. This has been noticed in relating the barricades of the League. The barricades of the Fronde we now enter on, and they too had their points of resemblance with the last. It was the capture of Algiers that raised the confidence of Charles X to resist. We saw him proceeding to the Te Deum amidst the silence of his people, and in a few days the barricades of 1830 had driven him from his capital. The reader will find that the Fronde had also its garde bourgeois or national guard, its mobs, its moderate royalists astonished to find themselves revolutionary.'

Digitized by Google

Ah, but there was no Lafayette in those days; no great and universal principle, the result of the diffusion of knowledge; men were of the parties of men, and not of the party of mankind; and therefore despotism resumed its ascendancy.

The following is alarming! We confess we dislike the reflexions which it forces us to entertain, with reference both to France and to this country; though, at the same time, we have no fears for the final result of what is now taking place in the world. Mankind will never go back, knowing what they do. But we lament to think it possible, that they may still have to struggle for a time against false friends, and false notions of corporate interests.

'It has been the fate,' says Mr Crowe, 'of all attempts to establish liberty in France to be frustrated, not by the opposition of the aristocracy, but by their affecting to abet and to adopt its principles. Having under this pretext obtained the lead, they have ever perverted the force of the cause to their own selfish or frivolous interests, thus proving equally fatal in their friendship as their enmity. The nobles and princes of the blood, taking the lead of the popular party, destroyed all its efforts for freedom under Charles IV. The struggle of the Huguenots for religious liberty was perverted in the same way. To what end was all the blood of the French Protestants spilled, and their victories achieved? To the establishment of the house of Bourbon, and to the oppression and ruin of themselves. In the Fronde the magistracy of Paris, supported by the citizens, endeavoured to supply the want of a national assembly. They found a constitution; forced it on the court without effusion of blood; and might have succeeded in upholding, and perhaps ameliorating it, when the young noblesse interfered, drove the citizens to insurrection first, then to submission, and, for the sake of their selfish quarrels, which all their light-heartedness and valour cannot redeem, they sacrificed the last hope that the French had of even a degree of liberty; they pierced the last plank that shut out the overwhelming ocean of despotism.'—P. 79.

Our author has given us an anecdote and a new trait of Mazarin (new at least to us), for which we are grateful. It is a right and triumphant piece of Italianism, surviving all the French part of his history.

'His love of pictures,' we are told, 'was as strong as his love of power—stronger, since it survived. A fatal malady had seized on the Cardinal, whilst engaged in the conferences of the treaty, and worn by mental fatigue, he brought it home with him to the Louvre. He consulted Guenaud, the great physician, who told him that he had two months to live. Some days after receiving this dread mandate, Brienne perceived the Cardinal in night-cap and dressing-gown, tottering along his gallery, pointing to his pictures, and exclaiming, "Must I quit all these?" He saw Brienne, and seized him: "Look!" exclaimed he, "Look at that Corregio! this Venus of Titian! that incomparable Deluge of Caracci! Ah, my friend, I must quit all these. Farewell, dear pictures, that I loved so dearly, and that cost me so much!"'—P. 104.

"Louis le Grand" beats his valet. 'When Louis learned the pusillanimous conduct of his hopeful son (the Duc de Maine, in battle) which he did through other means than Villeroi's despatches, nothing could equal his chagrin. So great was his irritation, that he lost sight even of his dignity, which he forgot so far, as to beat with his hands a valet, for pocketing a biscuit at dinner. Whilst flustered with this feat, the Monarch met his Confessor, Père la Chaise, and cried, "I have beaten the rascal well, my father, and broke my cane on his back, but I hope I have not offended God in the act." Poor Louis le Grand!

The first approaches of mutual regard between France and England, which have come so much closer in our time, and will, we believe, never be truly again divorced—(all humanity hopes not)—are well touched upon in the following passage:—

'Britain had previously acted but as an auxiliary, and not always a successful auxiliary either; the parts she played were secondary, but now she took the lead. Her armies were those of a great empire; and Marlborough's glory filled Europe with a splendour more dazzling because unexpected. England became the mode, the cynosure, and, on a closer examination, showed perfections that equally startled the inhabitant of the continent. Her constitution, her liberties, her senatorial eloquence, the boldness and independence of the national character, were qualities hitherto vaguely heard of, but now seen and studied. Montesquieu and Voltaire both visited London at this time; and such voyagers were alone sufficient to convert an unknown into a known and admired region. The man of the continent, the Frenchman, hitherto confined to his own classic and elegant models in literature, and not dreaming of finding in this department any rival near his throne, stumbled upon our more original and robust, yet scarcely less refined writers; and his amazement at our literary genius was even still more great. He became familiar with the names of Locke and Newton, and with their discoveries. Such glories as these in intellect, united with the more popular ones of Marlborough in the battle-field, might well command the admiration, and captivate the attentions of a stranger nation. It did so: France, conscious of her own grandeur and eminence, was above all mean jealousy; her applause was loud and sincere.'—P. 180.

We should here close our notice of this (upon the whole) interesting volume, but as the author carries it down to the year 92, which includes one of the most interesting periods of the First French Revolution, and as the concluding chapter contains a passage deeply worthy of attention to us all at the present moment, we shall give one more article on the subject.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

THE SWALLOW.—"One does not make a summer."—It is remarkable, that most countries have a similar proverb, relating to the swallow's accidental appearance before its usual time. The Greeks have Μία χελιδὼν ἔαρ οὐ ποιεῖ; the Latins, "Una hirundo non facit ver;" the French, "Une hirondelle ne fait pas le printems;" the Germans, "Eine schwalbe macht keinen früling;" the Dutch, "Een swaluw maakt geen zomer;" the Swedes, "En svala gör ingen sommar;" the Spanish, "Una golondrina no pace verano;" the Italians, "Una rondine non fa primavera;" and the English, "One swallow doth not make a summer."—Perennial Calendar. February.

LAW OF DIVORCE IN CHINA.—In the Chinese laws, one of the grounds on which a husband may divorce his wife is, her being given too much to talking!

INNOCENT OLD WOMAN!—A clergyman, residing not ten miles from Beverley, was addressing his congregation, when, in the course of an address in which he was recommending the reading of the Scriptures, he took occasion to quote the interrogatory of Philip to the Eunuch—"Understandest thou what thou readest?"—when an old woman, who had listened with unusual attention to the sermon, conceiving that this personal appeal was "levelled at her," with great simplicity replied, "No, sir, for my Bible is Black Print, and I never learned that."—York Herald.

HOBBES.—The philosopher of Malmsbury is said to have been a remarkably timid man; and it is supposed that this horror of revolutions made him so earnest a supporter of despotic power. Bayle says, that "his mother, frightened with the reports that were current of the approach of the naval force of the Spaniards, lay-in with him before her time; therefore it is a wonder he lived so long."—Was this the cause of his extreme timidity?

SLANDER.—It does not depend upon me, said the Grecian, to prevent being spoken ill of; it is only in my power that it be not done deservedly.

CONSOLATORY VIEW OF HUMAN VICISSITUDES.—Darkness and light divide the course of time, and oblivion shares with memory a great part even of our living beings; we slightly remember our felicities, and the smartest strokes of affliction leave but short smart upon us. Sense endureth no extremities, and sorrows destroy us or themselves. To weep into stones are fables. Afflictions induce callosities; miseries are slippery, or fall like snow upon us, which, notwithstanding, is no unhappy stupidity. To be ignorant of evils to come, and forgetful of evils past, is a merciful provision of nature, whereby we digest the mixture of our few and evil days, and our delivered senses not relapsing into cutting remembrances, our sorrows are not kept raw by the edge of repetition.—Sir Thomas Browne.

ERROR OF PARTIZANS.—Difference of opinion frequently interrupts cordiality very improperly; for as no man should forego his opinion out of mere deference, persistence in it, where no doubt of sincerity can be entertained, is rather a title to esteem than to disapprobation. F. F.

WHY MEN OF GENIUS ARE IMPERFECTLY APPRECIATED.—It is in strict accordance with the nature of things, that men of original genius should be always inadequately appreciated by the generality of their contemporaries. The reason is, that such men contribute not only an addition to existing stores, but an addition, varying in kind as well as in degree, from that of previous contributors. Of these originalities all may perceive the novelty, but the peculiar excellence lies hidden, except to persons possessing some congeniality of mind; and of these the number in each generation is necessarily limited. F. F.

TRUTH, REAL AND SEEMING.—Truth, considered abstractedly, is the object of universal admiration, and all men would fain persuade themselves that, in the investigations they pursue, they are mainly anxious to discover her features, and to award her the supremacy which is her due. But so much does human frailty interfere with the best-directed efforts; so much do private feeling and unconscious prejudice alloy the purest suggestions of the heart, that if we were to scrutinise our wishes rigidly, we should often be constrained to admit that we are more desirous to exact homage for an idol of our own creation, invested by our partiality with every possible attraction, than calmly bent on surrendering our undivided and willing allegiance to the true divinity whose name and praise is for ever on our lips. F. F.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—A New Way to Pay Old Debts.—The Devil's Brother.
COVENT GARDEN.—Cinderella.—Comrades and Friends.

COVENT-GARDEN.

We regret to say that we have no praise to bestow on the new afterpiece that was produced here last night, entitled Comrades and Friends. The plot is one of the numerous military variations of the old story of Damon and Pythias, but is conducted with so many gratuitous improbabilities, and such a cruel perversity, in order to harrow up the feelings, that it loses its aim, and enables us to care nothing about the matter. Two subaltern friends (ABBOTT and WARD) are found guilty of violating the laws of a cordon sanitaire, in allowing a mother to pass the line in search of her husband. They are permitted, in consideration of their humanity, to draw lots in order to see which of them shall die; or rather to throw dice for that purpose; and this is done, not in open court, or before any other sufficient quantity of witnesses, but in a private room, in the sole presence of the adjutant (Mr G. BENNETT), and to the mystification of the unsuspecting mistress of one of them (Miss TAYLOR), who comes playfully in, and rallies them on looking so grave while they are gambling! With this lady the adjutant is in love. He sees in the criminal she loves (ABBOTT) a hated rival; finds, with despair, that he wins the dreadful game; and seizes with avidity a new chance for destroying him, in a request made by his friend that he will stand in his place, while the latter goes to a neighbouring island to embrace once more his wife and child, on the promise of returning to die. This the adjutant permits, on his responsibility; giving at the same time directions to a young soldier, who has been obliged by the loser, to follow him to the island, and burn the vessel that is to bring him back. Roland (the said loser) goes accordingly to the island, to refresh himself by embracing the wife and children whom he has not seen for five years, and then to tell them that he must go back to die! The reason he has not seen them so long is, that he had his character taken away by a villain in some money affair, and so quitted the place where he had been a commissioned officer, to enter another regiment as a subaltern. He gets his refreshment and inflicts his agony; and learns, in the process, that his character has been cleared, and that his Sovereign has made him a colonel. Meanwhile, the man who was sent after him, burns the vessel, excusing himself to his afflicted remonstrances, by saying that the adjutant told him to do it, in order to secure his life, purposing also to save his comrade by a disclosure of his gallant friendship.

Meanwhile the young lady comes in and out, knowing not a word of all this, not even up to the moment when her lover is about to be executed, in default of his friend's arrival! The colonel has even permitted him to marry her before he dies; they enter the chapel of the garrison for that purpose; and she thinks that the guard, who have come to kill him, have turned out to do her honour! Can anything be more preposterous? Well: after the marriage, his sad looks and the tears of all present begin to let some dreadful suspicion in upon her mind: she wonders, and stares, and enquires, and is agonized, and is answered mysteriously, and is gratuitously led off: the lover spreads open his breast to the executioners: they present, and are about to fire, when the friend rushes in (of course!) and all ends happily, except for the adjutant. How the friend got off from the island, we do not remember: probably in a vessel sent with his new appointment.

We really must say that we are sick and tired upon these dead sets at the feelings of an audience, without probability and without mercy, and with nothing to relieve their tortures but their nonsense. One or two of the situations are interesting, but are spoiled by the gross want of likelihood in the circumstances: and the violent contrast of the playfulness and the anguish, the marriage on the tapis and the death in prospect, is too constantly kept up, too revolting, and too foolish. But we need not dwell upon the absurdities of such a piece, after what we have related. In fact, it has made us too tired to do it. We feel as dull as the dialogue.

Miss TAYLOR gave one or two passages with so much prettiness and nature, that we became vexed as usual to see how artificial she had been made in the rest. ☞

INDIANS AT A PLAY.

[FROM THE NEW YORK STATESMAN.]

THE WINNEBAGOES.—The savage visitors attended the Park theatre last evening. Seats had been reserved for them in one of the centre boxes, so as to give them a good opportunity to witness the scenery with undiminished effect. It was really an interesting sight to observe the sensations produced in the untutored children of the wild, by the first sight of one of the great amusements of civilization. They stared about previous to the rising of the curtain, with ignorant wonder at the crowds in the pit and boxes around them. The music of the orchestra did not seem to affect them; but when the curtain rose to a bright scene of a distant city, with a nearer view of rocks and trees, their delight could not be restrained, and a simultaneous pow wow expressed their surprise and gratification. In the midst of this approbation, Wallack as Rolla entered and a dialogue ensued, to which they seemed very attentive, the eloquent gesticulation of the actor supplying the place of a comprehension of the words. They seemed immediately to have discovered that he was an Indian warrior, and to comprehend that he was an hero. Hilson's humourous performance of Diego, was very effective upon them, and their loud laughter testified that the nature of his part was not mistaken.

In the scene, where Alonzo and Cora first meet, the embracing of the two lovers so delighted the Indians, that they burst into loud shouts of laughter, which seemed infectious, as the whole audience joined them. In one of the spirited speeches of Rolla, they joined the applause of the house with a pow wow—and indeed throughout the piece, they seemed peculiarly interested in the manly bearing and noble character of the Peruvian hero, who was represented in a masterly manner by Mr Wallack.

The singing, so different from that of their war songs, seemed more to surprise and perplex them, than to give them pleasure. The old head man of the tribe appeared during the performance deeply interested, leaning his chin upon the front of the box, and gazing intently upon the performers. We should not forget that the earthquake seemed to effect them very forcibly. With thunder and lightning they were doubtless sufficiently conversant—but the stench of the sulphur which ensued, gave them evident annoyance, causing them to utter many exclamations of dissatisfaction, and to cover their faces with their blankets. The eldest of the party left the theatre at the close of the play, and two only sat out the farce, and seemed to enjoy the humour and spirit with which Wallack played the honest fisherman in the Adopted Child.

"THE SCHOOLMASTER" IN EDINBURGH.—A gentleman the other day, visiting Mr ———'s school in Edinburgh, had a book put into his hand for the purpose of examining a class. The word inheritance occurring in the verse, the querist interrogated the youngster as follows:—"What is inheritance?"—A. "Patrimony."—"What is patrimony?"—A. "Something left by a father."—"What would you call it if left by a mother?"—A. "Matrimony."

A JUDICIOUS FOREIGNER.—Although much has been written on the Royal Society and the Society of Antiquaries, perhaps nothing is so just, in reference to what takes place at their weekly meetings, as the remark made on them by a Danish gentleman. He was admitted, as a visitor, on the same evening to both; and being asked, on leaving the room of the Society of Antiquaries, what he thought of the proceedings, replied, "I do think it one great humbug." The same question being put to him at the close of the sitting of the Royal Society, he observed, "By Gar, I do think this one greater humbug still."—Nicolas's Observations on the State of Historical Literature.

REVERENCE FOR TRUTH AMONG THE ATHENIANS.—The virtue of the ancient Athenians is very remarkable in the case of Euripides. This great tragic poet, though famous for the morality of his plays, had introduced a person, who, being reminded of an oath he had taken, replied, I swore with my mouth, but not with my heart. The impiety of this sentiment set the audience in an uproar; made Socrates (though an intimate friend of the Poet) go out of the theatre with indignation, and gave so great offence, that he was publicly accused, and brought upon his trial, as one who had suggested an evasion of what they thought the most holy and indissoluble bond of human society. So jealous were these virtuous heathens of any the smallest hint that might open a way to perjury. —Addison.

ERRATUM IN THE VERSES QUOTED IN YESTERDAY'S THEATRICAL.—For "Joy in heart," read "Joy in my heart."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Editor is not acquainted with the subject on which Mr V. D. writes to him, nor has he received any former communication upon it. He would have answered Mr D.'s letter privately; but it contains no address.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

A favorite Opera Seria, in Two Acts, entitled
RICCIARDO E ZORAIDE.
[By M. Rossini.]
[Principal Characters by Miss FANNY AYTON, Madame CASTELLI, Mademoiselle BECK, Signor CURIONI, Signor DEVILLE, Signor DE ANGELI, and Signor DAVID.
Between the Acts,
A NEW DIVERTISEMENT.
Principal Dancers. Madame MONTESSU, Mademoiselle CLARA, Mademoiselle PROCHE, and Mademoiselle BROCARD, Monsieur PAUL, Monsieur EMILE, and Monsieur LEFEBVRE.
After which, the Favorite Ballet, in Two Acts, of
LA SOMNAMBULE.
The Principal Characters by Madame MONTESSU, Mademoiselle KANIEL, Mlle. CLARA, Mlle. PROCHE, Mlle. DE VIS, and Mme. COPERE, Mesdames J. Mersie, Coupotte, Buseke, Vedy, Griffiths, Pitt, Laura, Lydia, &c. M. PAUL, M. EMILE, M. SIMON, M. EDOUARD, M. GEORGE, M. D'ALBERT, and M. LEFEBVRE.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Opera of
ROB ROY MACGREGOR.
[Adapted by Mr Pocock.]
Diana Vernon, Miss PEARSON, in which she will introduce, "He's what they ca' a Bonnie Lad."
Katty, Miss BRUCE. Mattie, Mrs CRAWFORD. Helen Macgregor, Mrs FAUCIT.
Sir Frederick Vernon, Mr Younge. Rasleigh Osbaldistone, Mr W. H. Wallack.
Francis Osbaldistone, Mr SINCLAIR, who will sing, "My Love is like the red red Rose;" "Auld Lang Syne;" "Hey! the Bonnie breast Knots;" and the Duet, "Tho' I leave thee now in sorrow," with Miss Pearson.
Owen, Mr W. Bennett. Captain Thornton, Mr Thompson.
Rob Roy Macgregor Campbell, Mr MACREADY.
Dougal, Mr WEBSTER. Major Galbraith, Mr BEDFORD.
M'Stuart, Mr Yarnold. Johson, Mr Salter. Andrew, Mr Hughes.
Bailie Nicol Jarvie, Mr LISTON.
Previous to the Opera, the Overture to "The Heart of Mid Lothian."
(Chiefly adapted from Scottish Airs.)
TURNING THE TABLES.
[Partly from the French, by Mr Poole.]
Miss Knibbs, Miss FAUCIT. Mrs Humphries, Mrs C. JONES.
Patty Larkins, Mrs ORGER. Mr Knibbs, Mr HUGHES.
Mr Jeremiah Bumps, Mr COOPER. Mr Edgar de Courcy, Mr VINING.
Mr Thornton, Mr J. VINING. Jack Humphries, Mr LISTON.
To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called
DAVY JONES.
[By Mr W. Barrymore.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.
Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Billows.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.
DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr Stanfield.
The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.
Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands.

On Monday, King Richard III; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

A New Operatic Drama, to be called
THE ROMANCE OF A DAY.
The Music, by H. R. Bishop.
Sophia Walstein, Miss PORDE. Liese, Miss E. TREE. Therese, Miss P. Horton.
Widow Klaffen, Mrs GIBBS. Karoline Klaffen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Adolph, Count of Engleberg, Mr HUNT. General Kienwitz, Mr BARTLEY.
Colonel Francoeur, Mr ABBOT. Nikel Unterhand, Mr G. PENSON.
Moritz, Mr BLANCHARD. Fritz Klaffen, Mr KEELEY.
Paul Richter, Miss TAYLOR. Hubert, Mr Irwin.
Previous to 'Comrades and Friends,' Nicolo's Overture to the Opera of "La Ruse Inutile."
Previous to 'Married Lovers,' an Overture by J. N. Hummel.
After which, a New Drama, in Two Acts, to be called
COMRADES AND FRIENDS; OR, LIFE FOR LIFE.
[The Music selected and arranged by Mr G. Stansbury.]
Madame Derville, Mrs CHATTERLEY,
Madame Bertrand, Mrs VINING, Nina, Miss KENDALL,
Eliza, Miss E. KENDALL, Laurette, Miss TAYLOR.
Roland Duroc, Charles Valcour, } Sergeants of a French Regiment, { Mr WARDE, Mr ABBOTT,
Morazzi (the Adjutant), Mr G. BENNETT,
Henry (Commander of the Packet), Mr DURUSET, La Mouche, Mr TURNOUR,
Dumont (Lieutenant of the Regiment), Mr HENRY,
Adolphus (Son of Madame Derville), Miss Hunt, Joseph, Mr Fuller,
Valentine (an old Domestic) Mr Barnes, Paul, Mr Addison.
In Act II. A Dance of Peasantry.
Composed by M. D'Albert.
By Mesdames Blaire, Fairbrother, Griffiths, Payne, Reed, Thomassin, Vials, Wells,
Messrs Addison, J. Cooper, Collett, Grant, Heath, King, F. Sutton.
After which, a New Petite Comedy, to be called
MARRIED LOVERS.
[By Mr Power.]
The Songs, composed by Mr Barnett.
Duchess D'Orleans, Miss PORDE. Marchioness de Meneville, Miss TAYLOR.
Lady Ascot, Mrs CHATTERLEY. Annette, Miss PHILLIPS.
Duc D'Orleans, Mr ABBOTT. Marquis de Meneville, Mr BARTLEY.
Sir John Ascot, Mr WARDE. Colonel O'Dillon, Mr POWER.
Pierre, Mr Irwin. Francis, Mr Mears.

On Monday; Fazio; Married Lovers; and Comrades and Friends.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called
THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.
Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elisabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.
To conclude with a Domestic Burletta, in Two Acts, called
THE WRECK ASHORE.
[By Mr Buckstone.]
The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.
Act I.—Winter.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mrs DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS.
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.
[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]
Act II.—Summer.
The Characters as in Act I.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A new Burletta, entitled
THE LOST SON.
[From the French of M. Scribe, by Mr Ainsworth.]
Madame de Sainville, Mrs Knight. Henriette, Miss Nursey.
Leontine, Miss Sidney. Baron Von Neirstein, Mr Cooper.
M. La Roche, Mr W. VINING. Eugène de Nerseuil, Mr Raymond.
After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called
THE GRENADIER.
[By H. Bayly, Esq.]
Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.
After which, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called
MIS-APPREHENSION.
[By Mr C. Dance.]
The Characters as before.
To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled
OLYMPIC REVELS.
[Adapted from a burlesque of Colman's, by Mr Planche and Mr C. Dance.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Play of
THE IRON CHEST.
[By Colman, the Younger.]
The Principal Characters by Miss SCOTT, Mrs VALE, Miss SOMERVILLE.
Mr OSBALDISTON, Mr D. PITT, Mr C. HILL, Mr WILLIAMS, and Mr VALE.
After which, a new Comic Melo-Dramatic Entertainment, (in Two Acts) entitled
THE FEMALE MASSARONI.
Principal Characters by Miss M. C. POOLE, Miss VINCENT, Miss SOMERVILLE, and Mlle. ROSIER.
Mr C. HILL, Mr D. PITT, Mr GOUGH, Mr VALE, and Mr ROGERS.
To conclude with
PAST TEN O'CLOCK, AND A RAINY NIGHT.
Nancy, Miss VINCENT. Lucy, Miss SOMERVILLE. Silence, Miss Nicol.
Bantam, Mr ROGERS. Dozey, Mr WILLIAMS. Sam Squib, Mr VALE.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,
TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

A New Operatic Piece, entitled
GALATEA.
From Gay's Serenata. With Handel's Music, arranged by Mr C. Potter.
Principal Characters by Miss VERNON, Mrs GARRICK, and Mrs HUMBY.
Mr BENNETT. Mr J. RUSSELL. Mr SPENCER. Mr G. SMITH.
Mr MUNROE. Mr G. LEJEUNE. And Mr E. SEGUIN.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.
The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Marin,
At the end of the Opera, a Solo on the Violin, by Mr Dando.
After which, a New Musical Comedietta, in One Act, entitled
THREE TO ONE.
The Music, by Mr G. Cooke.
The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss WELLS. Miss AYRES.
And Mr FORRESTER.
A DIVERTISEMENT,
By Mr EDGAR, and the Corps de Ballet.
Previous to the Comedietta, Rossini's Overture to "Cenerentola."
And previous to the Entertainment, Mozart's Overture to "Zauberflote."
To conclude with a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called
EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.
The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss Stohwasser. Miss Wells. Miss Garrick.
Miss Sinclair. Mr Smith. Mr Tilbury. Mr Munroe. Mr Roberts.
And Mr GREEN.

Coburg Theatre.—The Spectre of the Castle—The Night Hag—And Elizabeth.

Sadler's Wells Theatre.—The Wreck; or the Buccaneer's Bridal—Popping the Question—And the Pantomime.

Published by J. Onwhyn, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. Chappel,—Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange; A. Hays, 165 Regent street; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at Ebers's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. Reynell, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 140.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The History of France. By Eyre Evans Crowe. 12mo. Vol. II. pp. 341. (Being the fifteenth volume of Dr Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopædia). Longman.

THE following are the passages respecting the commencement of the First French Revolution alluded to at the close of our last article. We repeat them as a warning to some, and seasonable matter of reflection for all. We do not think that a revolution could happen in England, at all similar in wholesale violence to that of the first French Revolution; precisely because that first revolution has happened, and because the glorious second revolution has taught all the people of Europe how to conquer nobly. But we do think that certain kinds of opposition to the inevitable progress of freedom and equity might still produce a deplorable amount of convulsion; and we are anxious that no helps to thought and retrospection should be lost, which it is in our power to further.

'We have hitherto sailed down the stream of French history, from the obscure wilderness of its rise, through the rugged and picturesque gorges, the breaks and rapids of its middle course, to the wide majestic flow of the monarchy in its later days. Embarked upon its tide, with calm around and before, we now begin to perceive that the current grows suddenly more rapid, and that, without any apparent or external cause, we are hurried along with a swiftness at once menacing and unaccountable. Although not within hearing, we are yet within the influence of the distant cataract.

'The very men who lived in those days began to perceive the movement; not only the philosopher and reflecting man, but Louis XV himself. "The monarchy is very old," said he, "but it will last my time:" a selfish remark, no doubt. But could he have stopped the current of its decline? and was not his conscious powerlessness, more than his selfishness, the prompter of his thought? His subjects, his compatriots, took precisely the same view: nor class nor individual knew whither they tended; but all were dissatisfied, and ill at ease. A change was necessary, it was inevitable: the acts of every one—of king, of priest, of minister, of noble, of parliament, of writer—all henceforth worked to bring about and hasten this change. The King degraded royalty by his dissoluteness, and weakened it by his profusion. The minister, turning away from the task of internal administration in disgust, directed his views abroad, and sought to gild his day of triumph by the trophies of a war, undertaken under some idle pretext of supporting the balance of power. The noble, like the monarch, degraded his order, and shewed himself pressing on the lower classes, not for any public end, but for his own private gratification. The legists defended the cause of religious liberty and their own independence, indeed, but did so selfishly and blindly. The writer flattered royalty and aristocracy, and at this price was allowed to attack religion, the court finding itself in opposition to the priesthood. The priesthood itself increased its odium as a privileged class, by its intemperance, its ignorance, its absurdity, and its scandal.

'In such a general abandonment of the ancient system, such a despair of supporting it, it is absurd to ascribe to any particular class the catastrophe in which the epoch ended. None set about revolutionizing intentionally; but each stirred when it found its place irksome; each, where and how it had the power. As the noblesse had proved malcontent at one time, the magistracy at another, so now a new combination of society, the lettered class, rebelled with bitter success, for universal sympathy supported them; and step the first was taken in revolution.'—P. 219.

'France was now governed by Madame de Pompadour. She was certainly a woman of talent. The empire which she held over Louis XV, long after her charms had ceased to fascinate him, proves this. She bound him, as she says herself, "in the chains of habit." Her boudoir became the council-chamber, the ministers her creatures. The King was present at each determination, but was spared the trouble of either thinking or speaking. It was Pompadour who appointed generals and bishops, proposed laws and plans of campaigns. After a glorious victory, it is a complimentary letter from the mistress that we find coming to reward the triumph of the hero. This paramount influence the Duchess of Pompadour had the art to wield, taking from the monarch merely that power which was irksome, and leaving him all the liberty that he could desire. Thus she had no womanish jealousy, and cared little to monopolize his heart. She permitted him even to form the disgraceful parc-aux-cerfs, as an establishment containing a royal seraglio was called. From the base and ineffable debauch of such a haunt, Louis would recur to the chamber of La Pompadour, for the more refined entertainments of conversation. The mistress was not a stranger to the intellectual movement, the new ideas of the day. Voltaire was amongst those who paid court to her. His muse was oft invoked to celebrate her wit as well as beauty, and even a paragraph of grave history is devoted by him to her adulation. Montesquieu presented her with his 'Esprit des Lois;' and Diderot begged her interference when the printing of the 'Encyclopédie' was stopped. It is well known that she protected Quesnay, the founder of the sect of Political Economists. She introduced him even to the monarch, and contributed not a little to bring into notice these at once abstruse and practical studies. To the last she protected Quesnel, and was to him a faster friend than Madame de Maintenon had proved to poor Racine.'—P. 222.

'The whole policy of the new government (on the accession of Louis XVI) seemed to be that of conciliating public opinion; but, unfortunately, this opinion was not sufficiently general, enlightened, or united, to lead the monarch into the path of his own and the nation's safety. Turgot announced his financial plans and projects of reform. The principal of these were to do away with corvées, and such taxes as weighed exclusively on the people, establishing a territorial impost, that would be borne equally by all classes of society, nobility and clergy not excluded. But these privileged orders, instead of deeming themselves called on to make sacrifices to the state, thought, on the contrary, that they were unjustly oppressed. Unfortunately, the traditions of royalty, of aristocracy, and of the church, showed each possessed of paramount and almost sovereign authority. Each cherished the past, and looked there for its right and rule of conduct, rather than in reason and the present nature and condition of things. Neither could thus be induced to make sacrifices. Noblesse, and clergy, the parties of Choiseul and d'Aiguillon, united against the audacious innovator Turgot, who pretended that the privileged classes should support, according to their means, the burdens of the state. What is more astonishing, the parliament or legists united with these orders; they, too, saw danger in innovation: and thus the monarch's ministry, in its attempt to relieve the people and middling class, and in its attempt to introduce a necessary reform in government, was marred and checked, and flung aback into the ancient and pernicious courses of absolute monarchy. Who were to blame in this? The aristocracy, the clergy, the parliament. Never did blindness and selfishness combine more grossly, or more deservedly merit the ruin and the punishment which they afterwards incurred.'—P. 257.

'There is no scene, no portion of history, that can be regarded under so many different views as the revolution upon which we now enter. To some it is all crime; to others, all glory. In England, the prevailing sentiment has been, to regard the French nation as if it were an individual actuated by one perverse will, and flinging itself, from pure love of mischief, into the agonies of suffering and the depths of crime. We have had hitherto nought but a wide anathema to bestow upon our hapless neighbour. In this, it is to be feared, we treated her with similar humanity to that with which men used to treat the leprous,—excluded them at once from society, sympathy, charity, and goodwill; regarding their malady as a crime and a sin, and looking with eyes of hate on what had better merited our pity.

'Revolution is one of the maladies of kingdoms, or rather the crisis of a malady. It may proceed from some latent vice in the constitution, from dissipation, from mismanagement. To avert such is often no more in the power of the nation or of the individual, than it is to be all-sound and all-wise. From early times there was something wrong in the frame-work of French society. These defects have been noted; above all, that marked division of classes, which refused amalgamation. Their mutual and oft-renewed struggles have been seen. The people, the great mass, not of the poor and ignorant, but often of the wealthy and enlightened, were conquered and borne down in the combat. Their defeat they could have forgiven; but the extravagant use which the upper classes had made of their victory revolted the fallen. The clergy grasped one third of the lands of the kingdom, the noblesse another; yet the remaining third was burdened with all the expense of government. This was reversing the social pyramid, and placing it upon its apex.

'To reform this state of things was necessary. Flesh and blood could not bear it. Intellect, more powerful still, rebelled against it. Owing to the great exertions of the latter in print and orally, all men were agreed as to the necessity of this change. Louis XVI., however uneducated, felt and owned the need; but he was at first young, weak because ignorant, and dared not to break through the trammels of a court. The monarch, nevertheless, made every effort to bring about the desired reform peaceably. He intrusted the task first to Turgot, whose schemes were repulsed by the magistracy. Necker made no political attempt. Calonne next tried. He was defeated and overthrown by the clergy and noblesse. Brienne then was driven to repeat the attempt, and the magistracy tripped up him. What resource was left? To recur to the people. But this was revolution. True! but who rendered it indispensable? Not the people, who were all the time tranquil; not the monarch, who did his utmost; not the queen, despite the accusation that even respectable writers echo—we find her supporting Necker, and approving the double representation of the commons—no. It was the resistance, the false, the blind resistance, of the privileged orders,—noblesse, clergy, magistracy,—that precipitated the revolution, and flung all power at last into the hands of the commons.'

Digitized by Google

THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

From a Pamphlet just published by Messrs Longman, entitled, "Historical Sketch of the Bank of England:—with an Examination of the Question as to the Prolongation of the Exclusive Privileges of that Establishment."

'The Bank of England conducts the whole banking business of the British government. "It acts not only," says Dr Smith, "as an ordinary bank, but as a great engine of state. It receives and pays the greater part of the annuities, which are due to the creditors of the public; it circulates Exchequer bills; and it advances to government the annual amount of the land and malt taxes, which are frequently not paid till some years afterwards." * * * * *

'This great establishment, which has long been the principal bank of deposit and circulation, not in this country only, but in Europe, was founded in 1694. Its principal projector was Mr William Paterson, an enterprising and intelligent Scotch gentleman, who was afterwards engaged in the ill-fated colony at Darien. Government being at the time much distressed for want of money, partly from the defects and abuses in the system of taxation, and partly from the difficulty of borrowing, because of the supposed instability of the revolutionary establishment, the Bank grew out of a loan of 1,200,000l. for the public service. The subscribers, besides receiving eight per cent. on the sum advanced as interest, and 4,000l. a year as the expense of management, in all 100,000l. a year, were incorporated into a Society denominated the Governor and Company of the Bank of England. The charter is dated the 27th of July 1694.

'The Bank of England has been frequently affected by panics amongst the holders of its notes. In 1745 the alarm occasioned by the advance of the Highlanders under the Pretender as far as Derby, led to a run upon the Bank: and in order to gain time to concert measures for averting the run, the Directors adopted the device of paying in shillings and sixpences! But they derived a more effectual relief from the retreat of the Highlanders; and from a resolution agreed to at a meeting of the principal merchants and traders of the city, and very numerously signed, declaring the willingness of the subscribers to receive Bank notes in payment of any sum that might be due to them, aud pledging themselves to use their utmost endeavours to make all their payments in the same medium.

'During the tremendous riots in June 1780, the Bank incurred considerable danger. Had the mob attacked the establishment at the commencement of the riots, the consequences might have proved fatal. Luckily, however, they delayed their attack till time had been afforded for providing a force sufficient to ensure its safety. Since that period a considerable military force is nightly placed in the interior of the Bank, as a protection in any emergency that may occur.

'In the latter part of 1792 and beginning of 1793, there was, in consequence of a previous over-issue on their part, a general run on most of the private banks; and about one-third of these establishments were forced to stop payment. This led to a considerable demand for coin from the Bank.

'The year 1797 is, however, the most important epoch in the recent history of the Bank. Owing partly to events connected with the war in which we were then engaged—to loans to the Emperor of Germany—to bills drawn on the Treasury at home by the British agent s abroad—and partly, and chiefly, perhaps, to the advances most un willingly made by the Bank to Government, which prevented the Directors from having a sufficient control over their issues, the exchanges became unfavourable in 1795, and in that and the following year large sums in specie were drawn from the Bank. In the latter end of 1796 and the beginning of 1797, considerable apprehensions were entertained of invasion, and rumours were propagated of descents having been actually made on the coast. In consequence of the fears that were thus excited, runs were made on the provincial banks in different parts of the country; and some of them having failed, the panic became general, and extended itself to London. Demands for cash poured in upon the Bank from all quarters; and on Saturday the 25th February 1797, she had only 1,272,000l. of cash and bullion in her coffers, with every prospect of a violent run taking place on the following Monday. In this emergency an Order in Council was issued on Sunday the 26th, prohibiting the Directors from paying their notes in cash until the sense of Parliament had been taken on the subject. And after Parliament met, and the measure had been much discussed, it was agreed to continue the restriction till six months after the signature of a definitive treaty of peace.

'As soon as the Order in Council prohibiting payments in cash appeared, a meeting of the principal bankers, merchants, traders, &c. of the metropolis, was held at the Mansion-house, when a resolution was agreed to, and very numerously signed, pledging, as had been done in 1745, those present to accept, and to use every means in their power to cause Bank notes to be accepted as cash in all transactions. This resolution tended to allay the apprehensions that the restriction had excited.'

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Falsehood appropriately Branded.—We are told, that in Turkey, when any man is the author of notorious falsehoods, it is usual to blacken the whole front of his house. Were such a method put in practice in this metropolis, it would be strongly chequered; some entire parishes would be in mourning, and several streets darkened, from one end to the other.—Addison.

Novel Effect of Glory.—Some time after the battle of Fontenoy, Louis XV. congratulating Marshal Saxe upon this event, said, "Indeed, Marshal, you have gained more than any of us by this battle: you were before swelled in all your limbs, but now you appear in the best health possible."—Marshal Noailles immediately replied: "Yes, Sire; Marshal Saxe is the first man in the world whose swellings have been reduced by glory."

Romantic Story of Milton's Youth.—The personal beauty of Milton has given occasion to a little romantic story, which is pleasing to the imagination. As the youthful bard was asleep under a tree, an Italian lady, acidentally passing near the place, was struck with his charms, and alighted from her carriage to contemplate them. After gratifying her curiosity, and feeding her love with the spectacle, she dropped a paper intimating the occurrence, and professing her passion; and then, without awakening him, she proceeded on her journey. This event, as the story further relates, determined him to cross the Alps, for the purpose of discovering the fugitive fair one among the beauties of Italy. It is unnecessary to say that his search was unsuccessful. But in the voice and the charms of Leonora Baroni (a lady of whom he became enamoured and to whom he wrote some Latin and Italian verses), he found an ample compensation for the loss of his imaginary mistress.—Symmons's Life of Milton.

Linnæus, during his travels, visited the gardens of Oxford, and was introduced there to Sherard and Dillenius. The German Professor remarked to Sherard, "that this was the young dog who would cast the science of Botany into confusion;" Linnæus, who was not very conversant with English, still understood the word confusion, but took no notice of it; Sherard immediately formed a strict intimacy with the young naturalist, and after a short time Dillenius became attached to him. When Linnæus was about to leave Oxford, after having made great alteration in the gardens; he begged the German to excuse him if he had been so unfortunate as to introduce nothing but confusion into the Oxford gardens. Dillenius had nothing to reply to this raillery but blushes and excuses. —Revue Encyclopédique.

Personal Description of Milton.—The concurring voices of all his early biographers, who were personally acquainted with him, will not allow us to doubt that the harmony of Milton's features and form seemed to make his body a suitable residence for his superior soul. At Cambridge, the fineness of his complexion occasioned him to be called "the Lady of Christ's College;" and the ruddiness which lingered on his cheek till the middle of life gave to him at that period an appearance of remarkable juvenility. His eyes were dark grey, and their lustre, which was peculiarly vivid, did not fade even when their vision was extinguished. His hair, which was light brown, he wore parted at the top, and "clustering," as he describes that of Adam, upon his shoulders. His person was of the middle height; not fat or corpulent; but muscular and compact. His deportment (says Wood) was affable, and his gait erect and manly, bespeaking courage and undauntedness., —Symmons's Life of Milton.

The Number Five.—This number in China is highly regarded. The elements, according to the Chinese, are five in number: water, fire, wood, metal, and earth. The relations among human beings are five, viz. a prince and minister, a father and son, elder and younger brothers, husband and wife, friends. The constant virtues are five; benevolence, justice, propriety, knowledge, and truth. There are five ranks of nobility, denominated kung, bow, pik, tze, and nan. The compass has five divisions; east, south, west, north, and centre. The tastes are five; sour, sweet, bitter, acid, salt. The colours are five; azure, yellow, carnation, white, black. The human viscera consists of five; liver, heart, lungs, kidneys, and stomach. The organs of sense are five; namely, the ears, the eyes, the mouth, the nose, and the eyebrows (!)—A Chinese writer has given a humorous dialogue between these organs: The mouth complains of the nose being placed too near it, and above it; the nose defends its right by alleging, that but for it the mouth might eat ordure; the nose complains of the eyes being placed over it; the eyes reply, that but for them, the nose might be broken against unseen objects.—Asiatic Journal.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Rob Roy Macgregor.—Turning the Tables.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Romance of a Day.—Comrades and Friends.—And Married Lovers.

NOT having been able to see Mr KEAN in Sir Giles Overreach, we take occasion, till we can speak for ourselves, of presenting the reader with the observations on his first appearance in that character, from the pen of Mr HAZLITT. They are not of a nature to grow stale.

'JAN. 13, 1816.

'MASSINGER'S play of A New Way to Pay Old Debts, which has been brought out at Drury Lane Theatre to introduce Mr KEAN in the part of Sir Giles Overreach, must have afforded a rich treat to theatrical amateurs. There is something in a good play well acted, a peculiar charm, that makes us forget ourselves and all the world.

'It has been considered as the misfortune of great talents for the stage, that they leave no record behind them except that of vague rumour, and that the genius of a great actor perishes with him, "leaving the world no copy." This is a misfortune, or at least a mortifying reflection, to actors; but it is, we conceive, an advantage to the stage. It leaves an opening to originality. The stage is always beginning anew; the candidates for theatrical reputation are always setting out afresh, unincumbered by the affectation of the faults or excellences of their predecessors. In this respect, we conceive that the average quantity of dramatic talent remains more nearly the same than that in any other walk of art. In the other arts (as painting and poetry), it may be supposed that what has been well done already, by giving rise to endless vapid imitations, is an obstacle to what might be done hereafter: that the models or chef d'œuvres of art, where they are accumulated, choke up the path to excellence; and that the works of genius, where they can be rendered permanent, and transmitted from age to age, not only prevent, but render superfluous, future productions of the same kind. We have not, neither do we want, two SHAKSPEARES, two MILTONS, two RAPHAELS, two POPES, any more than we require two suns in the same sphere. Even Miss O'NEILL stands a little in the way (and it is paying her a great compliment to say so) of our recollections of Mrs SIDDONS. But Mr KEAN is an excellent substitute for the memory of GARRICK, whom we never saw! When an author dies, it is no matter, for his works remain. When a great actor dies, there is a void produced in society, a gap which requires to be filled up. Who does not go to see KEAN? Who, if GARRICK were alive, would go to see him? At least, either one or the other must have quitted the stage; "For two at a time there's no mortal could bear." Again, we know that Mr KEAN cannot have been spoiled by GARRICK. He might indeed have been spoiled by Mr KEMBLE or Mr COOKE, but he fortunately has not. The stage is a place where genius is sure to come upon its legs in a generation or two. We cannot conceive of better actors than some of those we now have. In Comedy, LISTON is as good as EDWIN was when we were school-boys. We grant that we are deficient in genteel comedy; we have no fine gentlemen or ladies on the stage—nor off it. That which is merely artificial and local is a matter of mimicry, and must exist, to be well copied. Players, however, have little reason to complain of their hard-earned, short-lived popularity. One thunder of applause from pit, boxes, and galleries, is equal to a whole immortality of posthumous fame; and when we hear an actor whose modesty is equal to his merit, declare that he would like to see a dog wag his tail in approbation, what must he feel when he sets the whole house in a roar? Besides, Fame, as if their reputation had been entrusted to her alone, has been particularly careful of the renown of her theatrical favourites; she forgets one by one, and year by year, those who have been great lawyers, great statesmen, and great warriors in their day; but the name of GARRICK still survives, with the works of REYNOLDS and of JOHNSON.

'We do not know any one now-a-days, who could write MASSINGER'S Comedy of A New Way to pay Old Debts, though we do not believe that it was better acted at the time it was first brought out, than it is at present. We cannot conceive of any one's doing Mr KEAN'S part of Sir Giles Overreach so well as himself. We have seen others in the part, superior in the look and costume, in hardened, clownish, rustic insensibility; but in the soul and spirit, no one equal to him. He is a truly great actor. This is one of his very best parts. He was not at a single fault. The passages which we remarked as particularly striking and original, were those where he expresses his surprise at his nephew's answers, "His fortune swells him;—'Tis rank, he's married!" and again, where, after the exposure of his villanies, he calls to his accomplice Marall in a half-wheedling, half-terrific tone, "Come hither, Marall, come hither." Though the speech itself is absurd and out of character, his manner of stopping when he is running at his foes,—"I'm feeble, some widow's curse hangs on my sword,"—was exactly as if his arm had been suddenly withered, and his powers shrivelled up on the instant. The conclusion was quite overwhelming. Mr KEAN looked the part well, and his voice does not fail as it used to do.'

REASON FOR MAKING A CHANCELLOR.—The Count D'Artois, seeing M. de Monthion leaning out at the window in the Queen's antichamber, took him for the taylor, and snatched off his wig. Some time after, M. de Monthion was made Chancellor to the Count, when he was reminded of the anecdote. "Yes," said he: "the Prince has appointed me his Chancellor, because he knows more of my head than anybody else."

BENEVOLENCE.—Madame Geoffrin had ordered two marble vases from the celebrated Bouchardon. They were brought to her by two of his workmen, when she observed that the cover of one was broken. "Alas! yes, madam," said the workman, "and our comrade, to whom this misfortune happened, is so grieved about it, that he dared not appear before you. He is much to be pitied, for if our master were to know it, he would be sent away, and he has a wife and four children."—"Well, well," said Madame Geoffrin, "he may make himself easy, I shall not say a word about it." When the workmen were gone, she reflected within herself, this poor man has suffered exceedingly from vexation; he must be comforted. Then calling one of her servants, she said, "Go to M. Bouchardon's, and enquire for such a one: give him twelve livres, and give three to his comrades who spoke in his behalf."

RELIGION.—If we suppose a large family of children (says an eminent writer), who, on any particular day, or particular circumstance, made it a custom to present to their parent some token of their affection and gratitude, each of them would make a different offering, and most probably in a different manner. Some would pay their congratulations in themes of verse or prose, by some little devices, as their genius dictated, according to what they thought would please; and, perhaps, the least of all, not able to do any of those things, would ramble into the garden or the field, and gather what it thought the prettiest flower it could find, though perhaps it might be but a simple weed. The parent would be more gratified by such variety, that if the whole of them had acted on a concerted plan, and each had made exactly the same offering. This would have the cold appearance of contrivance, or the harsh one of control. But of all unwelcome things, nothing could more afflict the parent than to know, that the whole of them had afterwards gotten together by the ears, boys and girls, fighting, scratching, reviling, and abusing each other, about which was the best or the worst present.—Why may we not suppose, that the great Father of All is pleased with variety of devotion; and that the greatest offence we can act, is that by which we seek to torment and render each other miserable?—Yellow Dwarf.

NECESSITY OF REFORM.—Lord Hilsborough, a peer of the realm, and certainly no Jacobin, fifty years ago thus forcibly urged the necessity of a reform:—"It has been advanced (said he), that Parliament have a power and right to prolong their duration, and that the salus populi frequently requires it. But as I absolutely deny that a Parliament has any legal power to prolong the time limited by law, without the consent of the electors or people who sent them to Parliament, and whose representatives they are: and I do say, and I do insist upon it, that whenever Parliaments do take upon themselves to prolong the term of their duration, such prolongation is an infringement of the liberty of the electors in a most essential part, and tends to destroy that freedom which they were chosen to defend. 'For liberty never was, nor ever will be, preserved, unless those who have the powers of the people delegated to them be frequently removed.'—It was by the frequent rotation and change of magistracy, in all countries of the world, that freedom and independency hath been preserved. It is upon this principle we find the people of England at all times crying out for frequent Parliaments. And I am sure, if ever frequent Parliaments were necessary, they are essentially so in the present times."

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Tragedy of
" KING RICHARD III.
[By Shakspeare].
Elizabeth, Queen of Edward the Fourth, Mrs FAUCIT.
Lady Anne, Miss FAUCIT. Duchess of York, Mrs Webster.
King Henry. Mr Younge. Prince of Wales, Miss Chikini.
Duke of York, Miss Poole. Duke of Norfolk, Mr Thompson.
Duke of Glo'ster, Mr KEAN.
Earl of Oxford, Mr Howard. Lord Stanley, Mr Hammerton.
Duke of Buckingham, Mr COOPER. Earl of Richmond, Mr WALLACK.
Lord Mayor, Mr Andrews. Sir Robert Brackenbury, Mr Yarnold.
Sir William Catesby, Mr Cooke, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, Mr Cathie.
Sir Walter Blunt, Mr Eaton. Tressel, Mr J. Vining. Tyrrel, Mr Honner.

Previous to this Tragedy, (First time in this Country) G. A. Schneider's Overture to " Richard the Third."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called
DAVY JONES.
[By Mr W. Barrymore.]
The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.
THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.
DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr Stanfield.
The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, William Tell; the Diorama; the Devil's Brother.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Tragedy of
FAZIO.
[By Mr Milman.]
Marchesa Aldabella, Miss TAYLOR, Clara, Miss PHILLIPS,
Bianca, Miss F. KEMBLE. Giraldi Fazio, Mr WARDE,
Duke of Florence, Mr EGERTON, Bartolo, Mr BLANCHARD,
Philario, Mr Henry, Falsetto, Mr Parry, Gonsalvo, Mr Baker,

Previous to the Tragedy, a Grand MS. Overture by Friedrich Kuhlau.
Previous to 'Married Lovers,' an Overture by J. N. Hummel.
Previous to 'Comrades and Friends,' Nicolo's Overture to the Opera of " La Russe Inutile."

After which, a New Potite Comedy, to be called
MARRIED LOVERS.
[By Mr Power.]
The Songs, composed by Mr Barnett.
Duchess D'Orleans, Miss FORDE. Marchioness de Meneville, Miss TAYLOR.
Lady Ascot, Mrs CHATTERLEY. Annette, Miss PHILLIPS.
Duc D'Orleans, Mr ABBOTT. Marquis de Meneville, Mr BARTLEY.
Sir John Ascot, Mr WARDE. Colonel O'Dillon, Mr POWER.

To conclude with a New Drama, in Two Acts, to be called
COMRADES AND FRIENDS; OR, LIFE FOR LIFE.
[The Music selected and arranged by Mr G. Stansbury.]
Madame Derville, Mrs CHATTERLEY,
Madame Bertrand, Mrs VINING, Nina, Miss KENDALL,
Eliza, Miss E. KENDALL, Laurette, Miss TAYLOR.
Roland Duroc, } Sergeants of a French Regiment, { Mr WARDE,
Charles Valcour, } { Mr ABBOTT,
Morazzi (the Adjutant), Mr G. BENNETT,
Henry (Commander of the Packet), Mr DURUSET, La Mouche, Mr TURNOUR,
Dumont (Lieutenant of the Regiment), Mr HENRY,
Adolphus (Son of Madame Derville), Miss Hunt, Joseph, Mr Fuller,
Valentine (an old Domestic) Mr Barnes, Paul, Mr Addison.
In Act II. A Dance of Peasantry.

To-morrow, Cinderella; Comrades and Friends.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

In the course of the Season, the following Performers will appear for the first time
Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY, du Theâtre du Gymnase.
Madame ALBERT, du Theâtre des Nouveautés.
M. BRUNET, Artiste, du Theâtre des Variétés.
Third appearance of Mons. BOUFFE, who is engaged for 12 nights only.
On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par
LE MENTEUR VERIDIQUE.
Vaudeville en Un Acte, de M. Scribe.
Lucie, Fille de Franville, Mlle St. Ange. Rose, sa Suivante, Mme. Gamard.
Le Comte de St. Marcel, M. Cloup. Franval, M. Préval.
Edouard de Sainville, M. Pelissié. Lolive, Valet du Comte, M. Leporte.
Suivi de la Première Représentation de
PIERRE; OU, LE COUVREUR.
Vaudeville en Un Acte, en Cinq Tableaux, par MM. Brazier et Carmouche.
Jasmin, Jokey, Mlle. Eliza. La Comtesse de Beanford, Mme. Préval.
Herminie, sa Nièce, Mlle. Corra. Josephine, Bouquetière, Mme. Gamard.
Madame Loquet, Portière, Madame Baudin.
M. BOUFFE remplira le Rôle de Pierre, (his original character).
Le Duc de Beanford, M. St. Aubert. Octave, amoureux d'Herminie, M. Paulin
Bermont, Notaire, M. Préval. Bombardini, Chef d'Orchestre, M. Guenée.
Giraud, ami de Pierre, compagnon Couvreur, M. Gamard.
Un Clerc de Notaire, M. Arnaud. Un Gendarme, M. Granville.
Lafleur, Valet, M. Cloup.
On Finira par la Première Représentation de
QUONIAM.
Vaudeville Nouveau, en Deux Actes, de MM. Jadin et Laurent.
Helène, Femme de Quoniam, Mlle. Florval. Ursule, sa Cousine, Mlle. St. Ange.
M. BOUFFE remplira le Rôle de Quoniam, Cuisinier, (his original character).
Lambert, son Intendant, M. Préval.
Le Duc de Richelieu, sous le nom de François au Premier Acte, M. Alfred.
Le Marquis, le Chevalier, Amis du Duc, MM. Paulin et Cloup.
Laroche, Valet de Chamber, M. Guenée. Un Cuisinier, M. Arnaud.
Un Sergent du Gué, M. Granville.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called
THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.
Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

To conclude with a Domestic Burletta, in Two Acts, called
THE WRECK ASHORE.
[By Mr Buckstone.]
The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.
Act I.—Winter.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mrs DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS.
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.
[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]
Act. II.—Summer.
The Characters as in Act I.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A new Burletta, entitled
THE LOST SON.
[From the French of M. Scribe, by Mr Ainsworth.]
Madame de Sainville, Mrs Knight. Henriette, Miss Nursey.
Leontine, Miss Sidney. Baron Von Neirstein, Mr Cooper.
M. La-Roche, Mr W. VINING. Eugène de Nerseuil, Mr Raymond.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called
THE GRENADIER.
[By H. Bayly, Esq.]
Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, " O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and " Listen Dear Fanny."
Della, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

After which, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called
MIS-APPREHENSION.
[By Mr C. Dance.]
The Characters as before.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled
OLYMPIC REVELS.
[Adapted from a burlesque of Colman's, by Mr Planche and Mr C. Dance.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.

SURREY THEATRE.

The celebrated Drama, entitled
THE ITALIAN WIFE.
Bianca, Miss M. C. POOLE,
Marchesa Aldabella, Miss Scott, Clara, Miss Jordan.
Duke of Venice, Mr Dibdin Pitt, Gonsalvo, Mr Gough, Falsetto, Mr Honner,
Giraldi Fazio, Mr OSBALDISTON,
Bartolo, Mr Williams, Philario, Mr Almar, Antonio, Mr Young,
After which, M. LOUIS VALLI, will go through the whole of this surpsising Gymnastic Exercises.

To be succeeded by an entirely New Broad Farcical One Act Drama, entitled
" S W I N G."
Principal Characters by Miss VINCENT, Miss RUMENS, Mr VALE,
Mr C. HILL, Mr HONNER, Mr WILLIAMS, Mr ROGERS, Mr GOUGH.

To conclude with, a Comic Melo-Dramatic Entertainment, (in Two Acts) entitled
THE FEMALE MASSARONI.
Principal Characters by Miss M. C. POOLE, Miss VINCENT,
Miss SOMERVILLE, and Mlle. ROSIER.
Mr C. HILL, Mr D. PITT, Mr GOUGH, Mr VALE, and Mr ROGERS.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,
TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

A New Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called
T A C T.
The Music, by J. A. Barnett.
The Characters by Miss STOHWASSER, Mrs HUMBY, Mr J. RUSSELL,
Mr Smith. Mr Munroe, Mr Tilbury, Mr Taylor, Mr J. Conquest,
Mr FORRESTER, and Mr GREEN.

After which, a New Operatic Piece, entitled
GALATEA.
From Gay's Serenata. With Handel's Music, arranged by Mr C. Potter.
Principal Characters by Miss VERNON, Mrs GARRICK, and Mrs HUMBY.
Mr BENNETT. Mr J. RUSSELL. Mr SPENCER. Mr G. SMITH.
Mr MUNROE. Mr G. LEJEUNE. And Mr E. SEGUIN.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.
The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Maria,
In the course of the Evening, Mozart's Overture to " Figaro," and Winter's Overture to " Il Ratto di Proserpina."

To conclude with a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called
EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.
The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss Stohwasser. Miss Wells. Miss Garrick.
Miss Sinclair. Mr Smith. Mr Tilbury. Mr Munroe. Mr Roberts.
And Mr GREEN.

Coburg Theatre.—De L'Orme—The Village Phantom—Neil Jagger's Cave.

Sadler's Wells Theatre.—The Wreck—The Gossip—The Robber of Epping Forest.

Published by J. Onwhyn, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. Chappel,—Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange; A. Hays, 165 Regent street; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at Ebers's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. Reynell, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

N.º 141.] [PRICE TWOPENCE

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Thoughts on Man, his Nature, Productions, and Discoveries; interspersed with some particulars respecting the Author. By William Godwin. 8vo. Effingham Wilson. (Unpublished.)

We have not yet given any general opinion of this volume, because we have hitherto obtained but an imperfect number of sheets from the bookseller; portions of which we deal out, from time to time, like Sybils' leaves. We are glad to find Mr Godwin's philosophy lifting up its voice in the new moral and intellectual atmosphere (if we may so speak) which has been produced for us by the late convulsion in Paris. No man has a greater right to be heard, for what he himself did long ago, towards the production of these very times. Men in their closets, after all, rule the world. It is they that set active spirits thinking, and so put them in motion. Bacon effected what he did, not as Lord Bacon, and a lawyer, but as Francis Bacon, author of the 'Novum Organum' and the 'Advancement of Learning.' Mr Bentham has been the father of the best active lawyers of his time. To Mr Godwin the present generation are not aware of the extent of their obligations, because he has possessed worldly power in no shape to keep himself personally prominent, and his name, as a philosopher, has been unhandsomely withheld by many who are indebted to his suggestions.

The following extract is from one of the essays which he himself looks upon as the best in his volume. It is on a subject which has been always interesting to those who are zealous for the advancement of their species, and which, most fortunately, the world are now prepared to consider with less misgiving, because our illustrious neighbours in Paris have shewn, that the lesson of disinterestedness can be acted as well as preached upon.

'The principal circumstance that divides our feelings for others from our feelings for ourselves, and that gives, to satirical observers, and superficial thinkers, an air of exclusive selfishness to the human mind, lies in this, that we can fly from others, but cannot fly from ourselves. While I am sitting by the bedside of the sufferer, while I am listening to the tale of his woes, there is comparatively but a slight line of demarcation, whether they are his sorrows or my own. My sympathy is vehemently excited towards him, and I feel his twinges and anguish in a most painful degree. But I can quit his apartment and the house in which he dwells, can go out in the fields, and feel the fresh air of heaven fanning my hair, and playing upon my cheeks. This is at first but a very imperfect relief. His image follows me; I cannot forget what I have heard and seen; I even reproach myself for the mitigation I involuntarily experience. But man is the creature of his senses. I am every moment further removed, both in time and place, from the object that distressed me. There he still lies upon the bed of agony: but the sound of his complaint, and the sight of all that expresses his suffering, are no longer before me. A short experience of human life convinces us that we have this remedy always at hand ["I am unhappy, only while I please"]; and we soon come therefore to anticipate the cure, and so, even while we are in the presence of the sufferer, to feel that he and ourselves are not perfectly one.

'But with our own distempers and adversities it is altogether different. It is this that barbs the arrow. We may change the place of our local existence; but we cannot go away from ourselves. With chariots, and embarking ourselves on board of ships, we may seek to escape from the enemy. But grief and apprehension enter the vessel along with us; and, when we mount on horseback, the discontent that specially annoyed us, gets up behind, and clings to our sides with a hold never to be loosened.

'Is it then indeed a proof of selfishness, that we are in a greater or less degree relieved from the anguish we endured for our friend, when other objects occupy us, and we are no longer the witnesses of his sufferings? If this were true, the same argument would irresistibly prove, that we are the most generous of imaginable beings, the most disregardful of whatever relates to ourselves. Is it not the first ejaculation of the miserable, "Oh, that I could fly from myself? Oh, for a thick, substantial sleep!" What the desperate man hates is his own identity. But he knows that, if for a few moments he loses himself in forgetfulness, he will presently awake to all that distracted him. He knows that he must act his part to the end, and drink the bitter cup to the dregs. He can do none of these things by proxy. It is the consciousness of the indubitable future, from which we can never be divorced, that gives to our present calamity its most fearful empire. Were it not for this great line of distinction, there are many that would feel not less for their friend than for themselves. But they are aware, that his ruin will not make them beggars, his mortal disease will not bring them to the tomb, and that, when he is dead, they may yet be reserved for many years of health, of consciousness, and vigour.

'The language of the hypothesis of self-love was well adapted to the courtiers of the reign of Louis the Fourteenth. The language of disinterestedness was adapted to the ancient republicans in the purest times of Sparta and Rome.

'But these ancients were not always disinterested; and the moderns are not always narrow, self-centred, and cold. The ancients paid, though with comparative infrequency, the tax imposed upon mortals, and thought of their own gratification and ease; and the moderns are not utterly disqualified for acts of heroic affection.

'It is of great consequence that men should come to think correctly on this subject. The most snail-blooded man that exists, is not so selfish as he pretends to be. In spite of all the indifference he professes towards the good of others, he will sometimes be detected in a very heretical state of sensibility towards his wife, his child, or his friend; he will shed tears at a tale of distress, and make considerable sacrifices of his own gratification for the relief of others.

'But his creed is a pernicious one. He who for ever thinks, that his "charity must begin at home," is in great danger of becoming an indifferent citizen, and of withering those feelings of philanthropy, which in all sound estimation constitute the crowning glory of man. He will perhaps have a reasonable affection towards what he calls his own flesh and blood, and may assist even a stranger in a case of urgent distress.—But it is dangerous to trifle with the first principles and sentiments of morality. And this man will scarcely in any case have his mind prepared to hail the first dawnings of human improvement, and to regard all that belongs to the welfare of his kind as parcel of his own particular estate.

'The creed of self-love will always have a tendency to make us Frenchmen in the frivolous part of that character, and Dutchmen in the plodding and shopkeeping spirit of barter and sale.* There is no need that we should beat down the impulse of heroism in the human character, and be upon our guard against the effervescences and excess of a generous sentiment. One of the instructors of my youth was accustomed to say to his pupils, "Do not be afraid to commit your thoughts to paper in all the fervour and glow of your first conception: when you come to look at them the next day, you will find this gone off to a surprising degree." As this was no ill precept for literary composition, even so in our actions and moral conduct we shall be in small danger of being too warm-hearted and too generous.

'Modern improvements in education are earnest in recommending to us the study of facts, and that we should not waste the time of young persons upon the flights of imagination. But it is to imagination that we are indebted for our highest enjoyments; it tames the ruggedness of uncivilised nature, and is the never-failing associate of all the considerable advances of social man, whether in throwing down the strong fences of intellectual slavery, or in giving firmness and duration to the edifice of political freedom.

'And who does not feel that everything depends upon the creed we embrace, and the discipline we exercise over our own souls?

'The disciple of the theory of self-love, if of a liberal disposition, will perpetually whip himself forward "with loose reins," upon a spiritless Pegasus, and say, "I will do generous things; I will not bring into contempt the master I serve—though I am conscious all the while that this is but a delusion, and that, however I brag of generosity, I do not set a step forward, but singly for my own ends, and my own gratification." Meanwhile, this is all a forced condition of thought; and the man who cherishes it, will be perpetually falling back into the cold, heartless convictions he inwardly retains. Self-love is the unwholesome, infectious atmosphere in which he dwells; and, however he may seek to rise, the wings of his soul will eternally be drawn downwards, and he cannot be pervaded, as he might have been, with the free spirit of genuine philanthropy.

* It might be added,—and Englishmen in a sullen spirit of Pharisaical assumption, vain but not pleasant;—"Lord, I thank thee that I am not as this Frenchman." It is surely not worthy of a philosopher like Mr Godwin to pay these indirect compliments to his countrymen at the expense of other nations, especially after what has lately happened in France. —Ed. Tat.

Digitized by Google

To be consistent, he ought continually to grow colder and colder; and the romance, which fired his youth, and made him forget the venomous potion he had swallowed, will fade away in age, rendering him careless of all but himself, and indifferent to the adversity and sufferings of all of whom he is connected.

'On the other hand, the man who has embraced the creed of disinterested benevolence will know that it is not his fitting element, to "live for himself, or to die for himself." Whether he is under the dominion of family-affection, friendship, patriotism, or a zeal for his brethren of mankind, he will feel that he is at home. The generous man therefore looks forward to the time when the chilling and wretched philosophy of the reign of Louis the Fourteenth shall be forgotten, and a fervent desire for the happiness and improvement of the human species shall reign in all hearts.

'I am not especially desirous of sheltering my opinions under the authority of great names: but, in a question of such vital importance to the true welfare of men in society, no fair advantage should be neglected. The author of the system of "self-love the source of all our actions" was La Rochefoucault; and the whole herd of the French philosophers have not been ashamed to follow in the train of their vaunted master. I am grieved to say, that, as I think, the majority of my refining and subtilising countrymen of the present day have enlisted under his banner. But the more noble and generous view of the subject has been powerfully supported by Shaftesbury, Butler, Hutchinson and Hume. On the last of these I particularly pique myself; inasmuch as, though he became naturalised as a Frenchman in a vast variety of topics, the greatness of his intellectual powers exempted him from degradation in this.

'That however which I would chiefly urge in the way of authority, is the thing mentioned in the beginning of this Essay, I mean the sentiments that have animated the authors of religion, that characterise the best ages of Greece and Rome, and that in all cases display themselves when the loftiest and most generous sentiments of the heart are called into action. The opposite creed could only have been engendered in the dregs of a corrupt and emasculated court; and human nature will never shew itself what it is capable of being, till the last remains of a doctrine, invented in the latter part of the seventeenth century, shall have been consigned to the execration they deserve.'

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

Conversation.—I would establish but one great general rule in conversation, which is this, that men should not talk to please themselves, but those that hear them. This would make them consider whether what they speak be worth hearing; whether there be either wit or sense in what they are about to say; and whether it be adapted to the time when, the place where, and the person to whom, it is spoken.—Steele.

Graceful Philosophy.—The true greatness of mind consists in valuing men apart from their circumstances, or according to their behaviour in them. Wealth is a distinction only in traffic, but it must not be allowed as a recommendation in any other particular, but only just as it is applied. It was very prettily said, that we may learn the little value of fortune, by the persons on whom heaven is pleased to bestow it. However, there is not a harder part in human life than becoming wealth and greatness. He must be very well stocked with merit, who is not willing to draw some superiority over his friends from his fortune; for it is not every man that can entertain with the air of a guest, and do good offices with the mien of one who receives them.—Steele.

Family Antiquity.—We are very fond of some families because they can be traced beyond the Conquest, whereas indeed the farther back, the worse, as being the nearer allied to a race of robbers and thieves.—De Foe.

"Our Saxon Ancestors."—The Saxons were a most bloody, cruel, and barbarous race, as may be made out by innumerable examples, particularly by their sacrificing their captives to their idol Woden.—De Foe.

Titles by Prescription.—If length of time were an argument for the legality of a thing, or could be pleaded to justify a practice, the devil might plead prescription for idolatry, which has been as ancient as Belus, and has had an uninterrupted series of consent, in all natives of some parts, to this day.—De Foe.

Conquest.—The Romans lost by conquest nothing but what they first gained by conquest; and the sword took from them nothing but what they had taken by the sword from the innocent and rightful possessors.—De Foe.

The Least-Happiness Principle.—In the discovery of Bermoodas, it is very remarkable that there were but three men left upon the island; they were masters of the place, it was then all their own, but these three kings fell out about property, and never could decide the difference. Two of them quarrelled to that degree, that they often fought, and had not the third secured their swords they had certainly murdered one another. Afterwards, the third man dying, they found a large piece of ambergris, enough to have enriched them both for this world, could they have been true to one another; but they quarrelled so violently that when the ships returned from England they betrayed one another, and so lost the prize to both.—De Foe.

Precedence Vindicated.—Piron being once at the house of a nobleman, who was about to usher his guests into another room, a peer stepped aside to make way for Piron. "Pass on, my lord," said the noble host; "he is only a poet."—"If we are to go by precedence," replied the poet, "I must take my place," and he walked before his lordship.

An Agreeable Paradox.—Good-nature is an essential quality in a satirist. All the sentiments which are beautiful in this way of writing, must proceed from that quality in the author. Good-nature produces a disdain of all baseness, vice and folly; which prompts them to express themselves smartly against the errors of men, without bitterness towards their persons. This quality keeps the mind in equanimity, and never lets an offence unseasonably throw a man out of his character. * * * "The best good man with the worst atnured muse," was the character among us of a gentleman as famous for his humanity as his wit. * * * The men of the greatest character in this kind were Horace and Juvenal. There is not, that I remember, one ill-natured expression in all their writings, nor one instance of severity which does not apparently proceed from the contrary disposition. * * * This accidental talk of these two great men runs me from my design, which was to tell some coxcombs that run about this town with the name of smart satirical fellows, that they are by no means qualified for the characters they pretend to, of being severe upon other men: for they want good-nature. There is no foundation in them for arriving at what they aim at; and they may as well pretend to flatter as rail agreeably, without being good-natured.—Steele.

The Abstraction of Meditation.—This (meditation) is the first state of existence in genius. In Cicero, on Old Age, we find Cato admiring that Caius Sulpitius Gallus, who, when he sat down to write in the morning, was surprised by the evening, and when he took up his pen in the evening, was surprised by the appearance of the morning. Socrates has remained a whole day in immovable meditation, his eyes and countenance directed to one spot, as if in the stillness of death. La Fontaine, when writing his comic tales, has been observed early in the morning and late in the evening, in the same recumbent posture under the same tree. This quiescent state is a sort of enthusiasm, and renders everything that surrounds us as distant as if an immense interval separated us from the scene. Poggius has told us of Dante, that he indulged his meditations more strongly than he knew; and when once deeply engaged in reading, he seemed to live only in his ideas. The poet went to view a public procession, and having entered a bookseller's shop, took up a book, and sunk into a reverie; on his return, he declared that he had neither seen nor heard a single occurrence in the public exhibition which had passed before him. It has been told of a modern astronomer that, one summer night when he was withdrawing to his chamber, the brightness of the heavens showed a phœnomenon. He passed the whole night in observing it; and when they came to him early in the morning, and found him in the same attitude, he said, like he who had been recollecting his thoughts for a few moments, "It must be so; but I'll go to bed, before it grows late." He had gazed the entire night in meditation, and was not aware of it. —The Literary Character Illustrated by the History of Men of Genius.

Living Rudders and Ferry-boats.—Setting out early the next morning, we reached a river at Chowhaut, and crossed a ferry, where I had the pleasure to see a boy, fourteen or fifteen years old, row a boat across the river with one of his feet, while sitting on the stern, and actually make it move, with several people in it, as fast as the one on which I was standing. Here was a resource of unsophisticated nature displayed to advantage; and it recalls to my mind a feat somewhat similar, which I once witnessed when out snipe-shooting at Pallamcottah; a nullah was full from bank to bank, and I observed a naked native child, five or six years old, go up to a buffalo, and with a small switch drive it into the stream, and no sooner had the tractable animal taken to the water, than the infant driver laying hold of his tail, kept himself above water till they reached the opposite bank, when they parted company. I have even my doubts whether they were not perfect strangers before this sociable rencontre.—Major Welsh's Military Reminiscences.

Summary of Reasons in Honour of Poetry.—Since, then, poetry is, of all human learning, the most ancient, and of most fatherly antiquity, as from whence other learnings have taken their beginnings; since it is so universal, that no learned nation doth despise it, nor barbarous nation is without it: since both Roman and Greek gave such divine names unto it, the one of prophesying, the other of making, and that, indeed, that name of making is fit for him, considering that, when all other arts retain themselves within their subject, and receive, as it were, their being from it, the Poet only bringeth his own stuff, and doth not learn a conceit out of the matter, but making matter for a conceit. Since neither his description nor end containing any evil, the thing described cannot be evil; since his efforts be so good as to teach goodness, and delight the learners of it; since therein (namely, in moral doctrine, the chief of all knowledges) he doth not only far pass the historian, but for instructing is well nigh comparable to the philosopher; for moving, leaveth him behind him. Since the holy scripture (wherein there is no uncleanness) hath whole parts in it poetical, and that even our Saviour Christ vouchsafed to use the flowers of it: since all his kinds are not only in their united forms, but in their severed dissections fully commendable, I think (and think I think rightly) the laurel crown appointed for triumphant captains, doth worthily, of all other learnings, honour the poet's triumph.—Sir Philip Sydney.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—King Richard III.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Fazio.—Married Lovers.—And Comrades and Friends.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

We like the name of this theatre, and its new look. It seems natural, that a place of lively and elegant amusement should take its title from a woman. In the time of the Stuarts, it was the custom to name one of the play-houses the Queen's; and though we are for reviving few of the customs of that period, especially i sovereign matters, yet as long as such matters endure, we are as little for withholding praise, or acknowledging a satisfaction, in connexion with those who render them endurable: and the present Queen has such a reputation for sense, and amiableness, and the cultivation of elegant pleasure, as renders her name peculiarly fitting for any new extension of a rational entertainment.

We know not whether it is in compliment to her Majesty, or in good imitation of the example set by the gallant printer of this paper, or in both, that in the play-bills of the Queen's Theatre, the names of the ladies are put first;—an urbanity, which we understand has taken place in another instance that has not yet come under our eye.

The interior of the house is greatly improved from what we recollect it. We differ from those of our brother-critics who object to the names of the Muses, with which the boxes are adorned. They are set very prettily in their arabesques; and if they mystify the galleries, they at least furnish a pleasing mystery, and one that will do them no harm to enquire into. We only wish the busts could be of marble instead of bronze. There is one great improvement in the boxes; at least we remember no such thing before Instead of having to displace the occupiers of four or five seats in going down to the one in front, or in leaving it, (treading upon their gowns, or flaps of their coats, if the seats be not thrown back, and forcing a general insurrection of sulkiness if they are) a portion of the upper half of the box is partitioned off into an avenue leading to the lower half; so that, comparatively speaking, nobody is disturbed. It might seem that this convenience would cut off some profitable slices from the boxes: but when a house is very full, people are grateful for standing-room; and these little allies would doubtless be well occupied.

The new farce of Tact, which was produced here last night, takes its name from a cant-phrase used by an old gentleman in the piece, Sir Paul Mainchance (Mr SMITH), who is always boasting of his "tact and foresight," which, he says, "never forsake him." He is accordingly taken in by everybody he has to do with.

Captain Lightfoot (Mr FORRESTER) son of Sir William Lightfoot (Mr MUNROE) has had his debts paid so often by his father, that the latter will pay them no longer; and the Captain is obliged to fly from the bailiffs. He comes with his valet (Mr GREEN) into a house in the father's neighbourhood, which he thinks occupied as usual by a jolly friend, but to his consternation finds himself in the very jaws of the lion; to wit, the holder of a bill out against him, Sir Paul Mainchance above-mentioned, who has lately purchased the estate, and whose daughter (Miss STOHWASSER), he is secretly in love with. Sir Paul, in the hope of improving the estate after the only fashion he is acquainted with, wishes to sell it again to advantage: he expects grand purchasers to come and look after it; and John Fax, the Captain's valet, takes occasion from a wrong trunk which they have brought with them from the coach and which contains the wardrobe of a strolling player, to advise his master to sustain the part of a prince; the old gentleman having looked for no less a personage among the inspectors of his house. It is accordingly contrived, that the Captain should be addressed as his Highness, and that he should agree to receive the title: and in this quality he is allowed both to inspect the grounds and make love to the daughter as he pleases, in the hope that he will make the bargain a double one.

Meanwhile the real possessor of the trunk comes to look after it, and turning out to be a player, the valet shifts his politics in consequence of having discovered that Sir Paul is going to treat with his neighbour Sir William for the purchase of part of his estate, in order to complete the merits of his own. He accordingly persuades the player to appear as the Prince; Sir Paul is told that he had only mistaken the Prince's Chamberlain for his Highness; and he himself, the valet, is one of his Highness's lords in waiting. He then contrives to encounter Sir William in his way to the treaty with Sir Paul, tells him whose service he has entered, and pretends that for the love of his old master, he wishes Sir William would take up the cursed bill;—"only once,"—the "very last time,"—he will never ask it again. Sir William is inexorable, till he is told that a good turn will be done him for his kindness;—that as the Prince will buy the estate at any price, but insists upon the portion of Sir William's to be added to it, Sir Paul will give any price also for the latter, so that the seller has but to name what he pleases. The two knights come to their agreement; the bargain is made; and we suppose the paternal mercy extended: but it does not appear that there was any necessity for all this: for the player, the great Dulcimer Star (Mr J. RUSSELL), who has been in the meanwhile dining and getting royally drunk, and signed the purchase of the estate, and the marriage contract of his chamberlain, suddenly throws off his princeliness on hearing himself called for by the stage-coachman! The bubble, of course, bursts; Sir Paul is in a horror; but Sir William reconciles all, by telling him that his son has become heir to an uncle! and so the piece concludes.

The conclusion is but a lame one; and much of the plot is unnecessary. The most amusing part, and the main object of it, is to show off the strolling player, who gives his employers various tastes of his quality, and asks them which character they will chuse him to appear in, all being "equally cheap." Mr J. RUSSELL did this part very well. He is not an actor of very great nicety or gusto; but he is sensible, clever, and has a strong general sense of what is true and reasonable, and a taste for such nature as lies on the surface. He has also one great merit; he does not let a part flag for want of filling up. He has a good adroit amount of bye-play, and can fill up the pauses of talk with gesticulations and shakes of the head. He is therefore a very useful performer, and is, we should think, very well situate here as stage-manager. In the part before us, he gave a good imitation of BRAHAM, with his short, minced accents (in speaking) and the little jerking approaches with which he steps forward, half holding out and half dropping his arms. His mock-opera singing was not so well: but his dancing was good.

We must not forget our Haymarket acquaintance, Mrs HUMBY, whom we were glad to see again. She is just the same; clear and sparkling as a piece of cut-glass, and sometimes as hard. If ever she altered, we should not expect to see her fade, or grow lax, or change in any of the usual modes. We should look for a piece to be chipped out of her.

We saw for the first time a Mr GREEN, as the valet. He is a lively, effective actor, very fit, we should think, for such parts, and not without the graces and importance that become them. We should rank him in the same class with Mr BALLS of Drury Lane. But we must see him again before we speak further.

☞

SAILORS AT A PLAY.

One of the most ludicrous scenes described in Saints and Sailors, is that of the crew of the Flora treated to see Othello at the Portsmouth Theatre. When "the Moor" arrived at the passage—

'"And this—and this—the greatest discords be [Kissing the fair Desdemona.
'"That e'er our hearts shall make!"—

'"I'll bet a week's grog," said a clamorous topman, "the young 'un 'll be a creole." "Ay, sink 'em," said another, "there's the luck of your black fellows:—why 'twas only 'tother day I twigs the captain's steward in tow with one of the freshiest, rosy-cheeked craft you'd see from North-corner to Castle." * * * *

'Cassio's silly speech proved an exquisite relish to the audience, where he apostrophizes heaven—"Forgive us our sins, and endeavours to persuade his companion that he is sober. "Do not think, gentlemen, that I am drunk; this is my Ancient; this is my right hand, and this is my left hand; I am not drunk now." ("No, not you," roared a Jack, who no doubt would have been a willing witness in Cassio's defence, had he been brought to the gangway for inebriety.) "I can stand well enough," continued the representative of Cassio. "Then, hang it! why don't you walk the plank at once, and prove yourself sober?" vociferated a long-tailed wag, determined not to let slip this opportunity of having a shot on the sly at his first lieutenans, who had only a night or two before put his perpendicularity to a similar test. In this sort of saturnalia of the lower order, those whose lives are spent in a dutiful obsequiousness, and obedient awe of their superiors, delight to avenge themselves for the privations and taciturnity inflicted on board in this respect, by telling their officers sometimes a bit of their minds from some snug corner of the house, or mesked battery in the gallery. * * * But whatever excitation these honest susceptible souls had previously suffered, was merely as dust in the balence compared with the tumult of grief and paroxysm of rage which filled every beating bosom when the jealous Moor, now more savage by the remaining effects of liquor, unfolded, in the deep, impressive language of the poet, the deadly purpose with which he approached his sleeping bride. The shouts became alarmin; volleys of imprecations were hurled at his heafl, his limbs, his life.—"What!" said one of the loudest of the crew, "can the black brute cut her life lines? She's a reg'lar built angel, and as like my Bet as two peas." —"Ay," said a messmaie, "it all comes of being jealous, and that's all one as mad; but you know, if he's as good as his word, he's sure to be hanged; that's one comfort!" When the Moor seized her in bed by the throat, Desdemona shrieking for permission to repeat but one short prayer, and he rancorously exclaims, in attempting to strangle her, "It is too late!"—thh house (as it is said a French audience has done ere now), could endure no more, and the sailors rose in their places, giving the most alarming indications of angry excitement, and of a determination to mingle in the murderous scene below. "I'm hanged, Dick, if I can stand it any longer," said the spokesman of the gallery. "You are no man if you can sit and look on quietly—hands off, you blood-thirsty nigger!" he vociferated, and threw himself over the side of the gallery in a twinkling; clambering down by a pillar into the boxes, and scrambling across the pit, over every person in his way, till he reached the noisy boatswain's mate. Him he "challenged to the rescue," and exclaimed, "Now's your time, Ned—Pipe the boarders away—all hands—if you're a man as loves a woman—Now, go it!" said he and dashed furiously over all obstacles—fiddles, flutes, and fiddlers. Smash went the foot-lights. Cæsar had passed the Rubicon. The contagion of feeling became general; and his trusty legions, fired with the ambition that inspired their leader, followed, sweeping all before them, till the whole male population of the theatre crowded the stage en masse, amid shouts of encouragement or shrieks of terror—outraging, by their mistaken humanity, all the propriety of this touching drama; and, for once, rescuing the gentle Desdemona from the deadly grasp of the murderous Moor, who fled in full costume, dagger in hand, from the house, and through the dark streets of Dock, until he reached his home in a state of inconceivable affright. The scene of confusion which followed it would be fruitless to attempt to describe. All was riot and uproar. * * * * And the captain in the end remarked, "This affray should be a lesson to him hereafter;" adding, with a laugh, "that the Flora's crew were too much of amateurs to be trusted in a theatre, lest they should abandon the service, and take to the stage."

Digitized by Google

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Editor will do what E. W. desires, the first opportunity. It has been done however before, more than once, in the first volume of the 'Tatler.'

We shall have much pleasure in publishing the letter of Dyspeps.

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

A favorite Opera Seria, in Two Acts, entitled
RICCIARDO E ZORAIDE.
[By M. Rossini.]
Principal Characters by Miss FANNY AYTON, Madame CASTELLI, Mademoiselle BECK, Signor CURIONI, Signor DEVILLE, Signor DE ANGELI, and Signor DAVID.
Between the Acts,
A NEW DIVERTISEMENT.
Principal Dancers. Madame MONTESSU, Mademoiselle CLARA, Mademoiselle PROCHE, and Mademoiselle BROCARD, Monsieur PAUL, Monsieur EMILE, and Monsieur LEFEBVRE.
After which, the Favorite Ballet, in Two Acts, of
LA SOMNAMBULE.
The Principal Characters by Madame MONTESSU, Mademoiselle KANIEL, Mlle. CLARA, Mlle. PROCHE, Mlle. DE VIS, and Mme. COPERE, Mesdames J. Mersie, Coupotte, Beseke, Vedy, Griffiths, Pitt, Laura, Lydia, &c. M. PAUL, M. EMILIE, M. SIMON, M. EDOUARD, M. GEORGE, M. D'ALBERT, and M. LEFEBVRE.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Play of
WILLIAM TELL.
[By Mr Knowles.]
Emma, Miss HUDDART. Anneli, Miss RUSSELL. Agnes, Miss FAUCIT.
Gesler, Mr H. Wallack. Sarnem, Mr Thompson. Struth, Mr W. Bennett.
Rodolph, Mr Howard. Lufold, Mr Howell. Braun, Mr Ross.
William Tell, Mr MACREADY.
Albert, Miss Poole. Melchtal, Mr Younge. Erni, Mr Cathie.
Furst, Mr Fenton. Verner, Mr Cooke. Waldman, Mr Hughes.
Michael, Mr COOPER. Jagheli, Mr J. VINING.
Pierre, Mr Eaton. Theodore, Mr Honner.
Savoyards—Miss Crawford, Mr Price, and Mr S. Jones.

In the course of the Evening, Rossini's Overture to "Guillaume Tell," and Weber's Overture to "Der Freischuts."

After which will be Exhibited the New and Splendid
DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr Stanfield.
The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.
Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To conclude with a New Melo-Dramatic Opera, in Two Acts, called
THE DEVIL'S BROTHER.
[Adapted to the English Stage, by A. Lee.]
Lady Pamela Goslington, Mrs ORGER. Zerlina, Mrs WAYLETT.
The Concerted Music, by Misses Byfeld, Bruce, S. Phillips, Russell, and Mrs Bedford
Fra Diavolo, Mr WALLACK.
Sir Gregory Goslington, Mr HARLEY. Lorenzo, Mr SINCLAIR.
Lucro, Mr Webster.
Banditti—Beppo, Mr Latham. Giacomo, Mr Bedford. 1st Carabineer, Mr Bland
Postilion, Mr Honner. Francisco, Mr Eaton.

Tomorrow, there will be no Performance.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Opera of
CINDERELLA.
The Music, by Rossini.
Cinderella, Miss INVERARITY. Clorinda, Miss CAWSE.
Thisbe, Miss HUGHES. Fairy Queen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Felix, Mr HUNT. Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. PENSON.
Alidoro, Mr G. STANSBURY. Dandini, Mr MORLEY.
Pedro, Mr KEELEY.

Previous to the 'Married Lovers,' an Overture by J. N. Hummel.
After which, a New Petite Comedy, called
MARRIED LOVERS.
[By Mr Power.]
The Songs composed by Mr Barnett.
Duchess D'Orleans, Miss PORDE. Marchioness de Meneville, Miss TAYLOR.
Lady Ascot, Mrs CHATTERLEY. Annette, Miss PHILLIPS.
Duc D'Orleans, Mr ABBOTT. Marquis de Meneville, Mr BARTLEY.
Sir John Ascot, Mr WARDE. Colonel O'Dillon, Mr POWER.

Tomorrow, there will be no Performance.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called
THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.
Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elisabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

To conclude with a Domestic Burletta, in Two Acts, called
THE WRECK ASHORE.
[By Mr Buckstone.]
The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.
Act I.—Winter.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mrs DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS.
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]
Act. II.—Summer.
The Characters as in Act I.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A new Burletta, entitled
THE LOST SON.
[From the French of M. Scribe, by Mr Ainsworth.]
Madame de Sainville, Mrs Knight. Henriette, Miss Nursey.
Leontine, Miss Sidney. Baron Von Neirstein, Mr Cooper.
M. La-Roche, Mr W. VINING. Eugène de Nerscuil, Mr Raymond.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called
THE GRENADIER.
[By H. Bayly, Esq.]
Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

After which, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called
MIS-APPREHENSION.
[By Mr C. Dance.]
The Characters as before.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled
OLYMPIC REVELS.
[Adapted from a burlesque of Colman's, by Mr Planché and Mr C. Dance.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.

SURREY THEATRE.

The celebrated Drama, entitled
THE ITALIAN WIFE.
Bianca, Miss M. C. POOLE,
Marchesa Aldabella, Miss Scott, Clara, Miss Jordan.
Duke of Venice, Mr Dibdin Pitt, Gonsalvo, Mr Gough, Falsetto, Mr Honner,
Giraldi Fazio, Mr OSBALDISTON,
Bartolo, Mr Williams, Philario, Mr Almar, Antonio, Mr Young,
After which, M. LOUIS VALLI, will go through the whole of this surprising Gymnastic Exercises.

To be succeeded by an entirely New Broad Farcical One Act Drama, entitled
"SWING."
Principal Characters by Miss VINCENT, Miss RUMENS, Mr VALE, Mr C. HILL, Mr HONNER, Mr WILLIAMS, Mr ROGERS, Mr GOUGH.

To conclude with, a Comic Melo-Dramatic Entertainment, (in Two Acts) entitled
THE FEMALE MASSARONI.
Principal Characters by Miss M. C. POOLE, Miss VINCENT, Miss SOMERVILLE, and Mlle. ROSIER.
Mr C. HILL, Mr D. PITT, Mr GOUGH, Mr VALE, and Mr ROGERS.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,
TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

A New Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called
TACT.
The Music, by J. A. Barnett.
The Characters by Miss STOHWASSER, Mrs HUMBY, Mr J. RUSSELL, Mr Smith. Mr Munroe, Mr Tilbury, Mr Taylor, Mr J. Conquest, Mr FORRESTER, and Mr GREEN.

After which, a New Operatic Piece, entitled
GALATEA.
From Gay's Serenata. With Handel's Music, arranged by Mr C. Potter.
Principal Characters by Miss VERNON, Mrs GARRICK, and Mrs HUMBY.
Mr BENNETT. Mr J. RUSSELL. Mr SPENCER. Mr G. SMITH.
Mr MUNROE. Mr G. LEJEUNE. And Mr E. SEGUIN.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.
The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Maria,
In the course of the Evening, Mozart's Overture to "Figaro," and Winter's Overture to "Il Ratto di Proserpina."

To conclude with a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called
EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.
The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss Stohwasser. Miss Wells. Miss Garrick.
Miss Sinclair. Mr Smith. Mr Tilbury. Mr Munroe. Mr Roberts.
And Mr GREEN.

Coburg Theatre.—De L'Orme—The Village Phantom—Neil Jagger's Cave.

Sadler's Wells Theatre.—The Wreck—The Gossip—The Robber of Epping Forest.

Published by J. Onwhyn, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. Chappel.—Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange; A. Hays, 165 Regent street; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at Ebers's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C, and W. Reynell, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 142.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Edinburgh Review for January 1831. No. CIV.
The Quarterly Review: published in January 1831, No. 87.

We notice these two current Numbers of the leading Whig and Tory Reviews, for the purpose of saying a word on one or two particular points, and of expressing our satisfaction at the singular and characteristic difference they exhibit in connexion with the events of the times. The 'Edinburgh,' going upon the ground of liberal opinion, and not being slavishly devoted to Whiggism, can afford to advance with the world, and to keep, in many instances, a-head of it. It is therefore in a state equally profitable to itself and to others. There is now a generous, as well as a filthy lucre to be obtained: power (it cannot be too often repeated) goes for the first time along with the unworldly; and liberal men can have the extraordinary satisfaction of at once pursuing their duty, advancing their species, and reaping a golden harvest by the way. The 'Quarterly,' on the other hand, fast bound to old Church and State, is forced to be as stationary as they, and sits raving by the way-side, like old Pope in the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' while all the world are moving forward to those better days, which it said could never come, and did its best to hinder. The Whigs have their faults of party; and the Tories, discerning these, can occasionally make a show of liberal opinion in opposing them: but this affords but a small contrast to the main and monstrous spirit of their corruptions, and leaves them justly suspected of being unable to be in the right, except out of spite and opposition. If the present Ministry, for instance, were to do anything flagrantly hostile to liberty, the Quarterly Reviewers would cry out against it, just as the Tories used to cry out against the measures of William III: but who would not know for what they cried? Meantime they are in a state of despair and frenzy. They abuse the French: they abuse the Americans: they abuse the new ministers: they abuse the Utilitarians: they abuse the people: they abuse Lafayette: they abuse Beccaria: they laugh hysterically at Mr Bentham, whom they designate by the sensible and dignified appellation of the "Jerry of Jeremies;" and that no point of their rage may be left untouched, they describe the Editor of this Paper as one, whose characteristic it is never to handle a subject which he does not deprive of its graces. "Thankye, John!" (whatever footman thou art, that comest under that corporate appellation, for the knot on the shoulder of thy soul is apparent). The Spectator has sufficiently described the article alluded to in this last instance, as one, the writer of which was to do anything he pleased with his subject ('Moore's Life of Byron'), except hurt the book for Mr Murray's pocket. The writer intimates that Lord Byron blasphemed in the hour of death; but adds the usual excuse for a lord:—"there are not a few palliative considerations, &c." Imagine how he would have dealt with such a point in a plebeian enemy! As to further personalities on ourselves, written in a certain spirit (for we have no objection to such accusations as the one above-mentioned), we shall only observe, that if they are repeated, we shall make it our business to find out who the individual is that assaults us with "crape over his face," and in default of being able to do this, we shall attack the name that we can get at; that is to say, make the bookseller responsible. This alternative, we confess, is not one that we should willingly resort to; though booksellers perhaps have too often escaped on such occasions, like the trumpeter in the fable. We have never shown ourselves hostile to the ordinary publications that issue from Mr Murray's house. We cannot even wish to do so, being too sincere friends of literature in general, and of whatever tends to advance and adorn it. Furthermore, we owe truth to our readers, as well as ourselves. We shall, therefore, continue to speak as we have done, of the publications alluded to, (supposing them to be as good as usual), let Mr Murray suffer his reviewers to say what he may. We have particular reasons for saying this, and commit it into the hands of our reputation for sincerity, secure that it will attain its proper end. But personally speaking, we must have fair play. Those who attack names, or allow them to be attacked, must prepare to have retributive justice exercised upon their own. There is the Editor too. We forgot him. He must be responsible also. Anonymous writing has some claims for indulgence, which we think in reason ought to be conceded, as long the writer does not become personal; but no longer. Fair play is so obviously at an end, when one man can fire from behind a wall, and his antagonist is opposed to all the disadvantages of the fight in his own person, that the only wonder is, how it has been borne so long, or how individuals or the public could vindicate themselves for so bearing it. At all events, for very good reasons, it will be borne no longer by us.

It is not when times look more prosperous for our cause, that we wish to begin, or to renew, a quarrel, where we can help it; but it will not be the less incumbent upon us to repel aggression, which may be injurious to more than ourselves.

As to poor Southey, we pity him. He ought to have been, consistently with his set-out in life, one of the leaders of the new times; instead of which, he must needs wreak his spite against his mistake, by abusing them, and endeavour to muster a little lingering importance by digging up intelligent butlers, and poets in "humble life!" There is an article in the review on these poets, in which the panegyrical changes are rung upon the humilities; and it is plainly enough intimated, that the high road to poetical success in "humble life" is proportioned to the lowliness of demeanour, to the satisfaction with Church and State, and to a due sense of the merits of their "superiors." How Burns would have laughed at all this! and how Mr Southey would have taken care to keep out of the way of his laugh!

One of the articles in this number of the Quarterly is upon the late admirable events in Paris. Its object, as the Globe observes, is to gild that "bitter pill" for its old readers. A remark or two in the same paper upon another Tory publication, affords a complete and overwhelming answer to a good half of the number, and most likely to three or four of the numbers forthcoming:—

'It appears never to occur to a certain class of politicians, that there is often a tide in human affairs to which all unqualified opposition is utterly absurd, which mocks the petty distinctions of party, and derides all supposition of—how different things would have been had the Duke of Newcastle assumed the helm, and Mr Sadler the direction of home affairs. Has it, by the way, been the will, or the power, which has been wanting in the Tory, to maintain the Conventicle and Test acts, Catholic disabilities, and a variety of other links and ligatures he affects to hold essential to British well-being? This question may be answered by the fact, that since the accession of George III the country has been governed almost sans intermission by Tories. If affairs have gone amiss, therefore, who is to blame? During the same period, and much longer, have we ever been deprived of the usual maternal clucking of mother church? Consequently, if a greater diversity of opinion and practice prevail, to what is it attributable? In point of fact, our politicians of the magazines lack the informing spirit of a more robust philosophy to enable them to perceive the mighty march of mind and circumstance which is shivering their puny theories to pieces. One single point in the said march—the quick communication of mind and opinion from one end of the civilized world to the other, is decisive against the lasting retention of government by monopoly, which must obviously gradually give way throughout the entire pale of cultivated society. No sober mind will object to a due share of the conservative spirit, but a fond looking back to some fancied stage of perfection long gone by, or vain attempt to stay the waves of a mighty progression, by affecting the language of King Canute, however set off by smartness and talent, is next door to sheer puerility.'
—Globe of Wednesday, Feb. 2.

Another mistake or pretence of the Quarterly Review is, that Christianity and their "orthodoxy" are the same thing, whereas Christianity does not wish to stop at a church, and a tithed clergy, and doctrines of the most painful inconsistency. It has far-nobler views; and no more intends to stop there, than it stopped at Popery or the Inquisition. The most Christian act of modern times is the forbearance of the Parisians after their conquest. These are the acts by which Christianity gets on, and Quarterly Reviewers are left behind.

Digitized by Google

We conclude with an admirable passage out of the Edinburgh Review :—

'It is somewhat remarkable, that that power of ridicule so generally cultivated as a science in France, has scarcely exercised over the tone of feeling in that country so repressing an influence as it has among ourselves. It never destroyed in the French, the love of theatrical effect; and even in the prevalence of those heartless manners formed under the old régime, it never deterred them from avowing romantic feeling, if uttered in courtly language. Nay, it was never quite out of fashion to affect a gallant sentiment, or a generous emotion, and the lofty verse of Corneille was echoed with enthusiasm by the courtiers of a Bourbon and the friends of a Pompadour. But here, a certain measured and cold demeanour has been too often coupled with the disposition to sneer not only at expressions that are exaggerated, but at sentiments that are noble. Profligacy in action surprises, shocks, less than the profession of exalted motives, uttered in conversation, when, as a witty orator observed, the reporters are shut out, and there is no occasion "to humbug." We confess we think it a bad sign when lofty notions are readily condemned as bombast, and when a nation not much addicted to levity, or even liveliness, is, above all others, inclined to ridicule the bias to magnify and exalt. A shoe-black of twelve years old, plying his trade by the Champs Elyées, was struck by a shoe-black foul years younger. He was about to return the blow—an old fruit-woman arrested his arm, exclaiming—"Have you no greatness of soul!" Nothing could be more bombastic than the reproof. Granted. But who shall say how far such bombast influenced the magnanimity of the labouring classes, in that late event, which was no less a revolution in France, than the triumph of the human species? Exaggeration of sentiment can rarely, as a national trait, be dangerous. With men of sense it unavoidably settles into greatness of mind; but moral debasement—a sneer for what is high,—a disbelief of what is good, is the very worst symptom a people can display.'—P. 380.

HINTS TO THE DYSPEPTIC.

TO THE TATLER.

SIR,—I heartily congratulate you and my fellow-readers on your return to your pleasurable labours:—I say pleasurable, because, as a man of reflection, as well as of observation, you would perform the greater portion of your toils, even if you were not induced to give the fruits of it to your daily readers; and because the knowledge that you are instructing and delighting hundreds of minds every day, must be as gratifying to yourself, as the enjoyment is to them. This is rather too elaborate a salutation for Cheapside, and too obvious for the Tatler: but let it pass. The mention so pleasantly made of the cause of your indisposition, went home to the stomach of many a dyspeptic; as it did to mine;—"Omne tulit punctum qui biscuit utile dulci," exclaimed I on reading it, as I thought of the "Abernethy biscuit," which I masticate after play-hours. "It is a stay to the stomach," said I to a friend, an older stager than myself. "Yes," he replied; "but I prefer a pair of stays," and he disclosed a paper bag with two of Le Mann's best. Your precepts on the advantages of light feeding have, I venture to say, effected an extensive digestive reform, and have proved better stomachics than the apothecary's tinctures. I, Sir, owe you thanks for many absences of head-aches and avoidances of irritability and morbid sensations, which the observance of your rational suggestions have saved me from. Not even Mr Abernethy's vivid illustration of the effects of imperfect biliary secretion, and his explanation of the term "Melancholy"—(from "melan" and "kolas") signifying black bile, have done me so much service as your hints on the subject of eating: your counsel has proved a sovereign remedy; the physicians was only a sovereign warning. Were people generally to be made aware how much the mind is influenced by the body, and of how physical a character are many of the evils which afflict the "mind diseased," there would be fewer suicides, fewer patients in mad-houses, fewer mad-doctors, and less eating. Some of our gloomy bards, also, would moult the feathers of their black imaginings, and no longer soar above the sulphureous depths of Acheron, or indite metrical night-mare fancies, as Fuseli painted his pictorial horrors, on the inspiration of a debauch of pork-chops. Bile would not be the livery of the student's visage, and its colour would be known only in the Dowager's lace tucker. Your pages, Sir, go far to redeem health and good spirits from the imputation of vulgarity or unintellectuality; and some future Pope may write, that "Want of cheerfulness is want of health." Independently of bilious fashions, and indigestion, and its train of miseries, consequent on huge feeding and gastronomical indulgencies, the class of studious and sedentary persons with whom a solitary chop is a meal, and a roasted apple a refection, are equally exposed to attacks of dyspepsia, from irregularity merely; witness your own case. They suffer as acutely from the accidental omission of "a piece of ox, or a bun," as others do from repletion, who pile a dinner of three courses on a sub-structure of lunch raised on the foundation of a dejeuner à la fourchette, cemented with condiments, and coffee, and wines, and liqueurs; and who "cannot account" for the languor and oppression they feel, since they ate but a light supper after the opera, and partook very moderately of Roman punch. "Little and often" is the only rule for weak stomachs; little and seldom where there is a lack of exercise. For instance, at breakfast; we drink too much coffee or tea; those who drink chocolate, add tea to it; and many who cannot take the former, scruple not to drink two large cups of the latter. "The cups which cheer, but not inebriate," are not to be emptied with impunity; and Dr Johnson with his fifteen cups, was morally only another kind of a sot than the fox-hunting squire with his three bottles. "Let your moderation be known unto all men," by your clear eye, fresh breath, and good spirits; whether you drink tea or wine. Bacon for breakfast is proverbial for its good qualities. If an early dinner; that is, four or five hours after breakfast, there needs no lunch, certainly beyond a biscuit. Coffee (without milk) and of that, one cup after dinner, is good. Tea is so refreshing that it can hardly be dispensed with: and if at dinner the appetite has been quelled, not smothered, tea may be followed by a light supper, a couple of hours before bed-time; or in the case of a play-goer, after the first piece; if it is after the entertainment, moderation and good digestion only can prevent night-mare.—Did any one not visit Mathews at home?—Then they have but an imperfect idea of the horrors of a dyspepsia through pie-crust. How the patient clung to his disease fondly, as it clung heavily to him: repeating in an ecstacy of indigestion, the ejaculation, "Oh that pie-crust;" thumping his pillow as a methodist preacher beats his cushion, and wondering audibly (secretly he need not) how it was he could not sleep. How often have I fancied the dishes on a table appearing in ghostly array to the heated and overburdened sense of the gourmand at night, like the phantoms to Richard in his tent, exclaiming, "We will sit heavy on thy soul to-morrow." It seems to me that the "divine soul" is somewhat in a similar predicament, as regards the body, with the infant, in the "Comic Annual" of last year, delineated by Mr Hood, which is crushed to death under the ponderous session of the unconscious nurse. Fungi, we are told, heave up great stones by the force of their very growth; but the soul can hardly bear up against the continual weight and pressure of this gross body of ours. Will you give a lift to help the "poor soul?"

Your admiring Reader, and grateful Patient,

DYSPEPS.

[We fear we "committed" ourselves a little, as the phrase is, when we spoke personally of these matters the other day; but if anybody shall be the better for it, we are content. The truth is, we have as much disdain, and no more, for the weaknesses that flesh is heir to, as we can make compatible with our general regard for human nature: so we merge it into such an attention to them, as we hope is mid-way between too much care and too little. We agree, for the most part, with our intelligent correspondent; but we should say, as general maxims, that uneasiness of sensation is the only rule for checking a hearty meal, and that a good round of manly exercise will render most other attention to the subject unnecessary, unless the patient be far gone indeed in meditation and manuscript. Meanwhile it is too true, that a full half of the evils and sad thoughts which people complain of growing upon them as they advance in life, are owing to no grander a cause than a childish excess in the most vulgar of their appetites: yet even this has very strange and melancholy excuses in the present condition of society. The comfort is, that every evil will mend, in proportion as the evils of ignorance and inequality are done away.]

CHINESE JESTS.—A faggot-man, carrying a load, by accident brushed against a doctor. The doctor was very angry, and was going to beat him with his fist. "Pray don't use your precious hand, good sir;—kick me, and welcome." The standers-by asked what he meant. Says the woodman, "Kick me with his foot, and I shall recover: once come under his hands, and its all over with me."

A miserly man would not go to the expense of musquito curtains. In the summer the gnats were very troublesome. He borrowed an old mask of a neighbour, and clapt it on his face at night. The gnats coming could not get their suckers in. Ho! quoth one of them, he has got a new face! Ay, says another, he may well be ashamed of his meanness! I don't wonder at his changing countenance!

A military officer, after long exercising his troops, led them into action, and was on the point of being routed, when one of the war spirits descended with a celestial squadron, and turning the fortune of the field, insured him a splendid victory. The officer, prostrating himself to return thanks, begged to know how he was to address the Genius. The Genius replied, "I am the Spirit of the Bull's-eye—I preside over the archer's mark." The officer, in humble astonishment, requested to know what action of his had merited him this good fortune, as he should never have dared to think himself worthy of troubling so sacred a spirit to interfere in his behalf. "Why," says the Genius, "during all the time you were in the exercise-ground, practising at the mark, I was sitting in the centre of it watching you; and you did not once put me in danger of being struck by your arrows—you shot them all wide of me. For this tender care of my person I feel grateful."

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—William Tell.—The Diorama.—The Devil's Brother.
COVENT GARDEN.—Cinderella.—Married Lovers.

QUEEN'S THEATRE.

THE new operatic piece which has been produced here, under the title of Galatea, is an alteration and extension of GAY's Acis and Galatea, with the original music by HANDEL, and "additional accompaniments by MR CIPRIANI POTTER." What these additional accompaniments are, we cannot say; nor we fear does the orchestra give such an account of them as can be very pleasing to MR POTTER's friends. They went thinly, when we heard them, and not in very good tune. The bassoon, in particular, seemed to anticipate the discordant passions of Polyphemus without his melodious power of expressing them.

The story, in the original serenata, is as simple as it is in Ovid. Galatea, a nymph, and Acis, a shepherd, are in love. Polyphemus, the great Cyclops, becomes the shepherd's rival, is rejected with horror, and, in a transport of grief and jealousy, kills Acis by throwing upon him the fragment of a rock. Galatea exercises the privilege of her divinity, and changes him into a stream.

In the piece, as now performed, these two lovers are both mortal, and villagers (Mr BENNETT and Miss VERNON). Galatea has a sister, Eudora (Mrs HUMBY), who is a village coquette; and the coquette has a humorous inamorato (Mr J. RUSSELL), so that there is a pair of comic lovers to set off against the tragic. Polyphemus (Mr E. SEGUIN), instead of being a giant, is a "fiend:" and he is put to flight, though in vain, by a set of Greek rovers, who undertake, out of a sailorly love of justice and a frolic, to assist Acis, and beard the monster in his den. The poor shepherd is killed, in spite of them, by the crag of the rock; and he and Galatea are turned into divinities, and take their apotheosis in a cloud.

We must say, that for our "private eating," we should have preferred the story in its simplicity. We would have rejected the artificial basket and mock fruit, and had the old paternal fare served up to us, neat as imported. And we think the town would have preferred it too. Managers, and getters-up of plays, will be against us in this opinion, and they will be correct as to the notion in general, though not, we think, in the particular instance. The piece is at present too long: the appearance of the military adventurers, in their helmets and shields, jars against the seclusion of the scene, and the remote air of the fable: and even the divine music of HANDEL, though nothing can be finer than some of the compositions of this piece, either for grandeur or sweetness, has sometimes a weight in it, and a want of flow, which may not serve to do away the effect of lengthiness in a drama too much protracted. In a word, even a selection from GAY's Serenata might not have been amiss, considering that the performers have yet to secure their reputations. The town may like sophistication in general, and as much for their money as they can get; but a pure pastoral, provided it had all been good, would have been welcome to them, as a novelty. The piece might have been very short, compared with what it is; might have contained the essence of all the good music; and might have been clapped, like a leaf of sage, between two as well buttered or peppered slices of farce as need be; and depend upon it, all parties would have enjoyed it still more than they do.

The three principal singers in this piece are, we believe, all new to the stage, and so young as hardly to have completed their studies, or at least done little more. The lady, Miss VERNON, has a face and manner far from destitute of intelligence or promise; though she seems to think it necessary to be a little too English in her mode of receiving her lover's addresses, considering that she is a Sicilian nymph, and innocent withal. Her voice appears not to have attained its ripeness; and altogether there is a crudeness and incompleteness about her style, owing probably to youth and inexperience. We thought she improved with the latter scenes; which is a good symptom.

MR BENNETT, the Acis, reminded us now and then of BRAHAM. Is he a pupil of that gentleman's? There was the little cut and dry manner, and effeminate tipping of his syllables, which sometimes mark MR BRAHAM's speaking, contrasted with a similar superiority in the vocal part. We do not mean that MR BENNETT has the other's power or skill, but that he is a much better singer than speaker, and has no mean flow of notes either. We augur very well of him.

From MR SEGUIN's Polyphemus we experienced nothing but gratification. He disbursed the bass notes in good, easy, masculine style; and they were of the right iron quality, fit for a vocal Cyclops. Also, he handled his club well, was very grim in the tresses; and even contrived, to our eyes, to look something gigantic, compared with his fellow performers; so that wherever he made his appearance, we seemed to behold a right bit of the old story. MR SEGUIN, besides rolling his notes well, softens them with a touching propriety when he speaks of his mistress's sweetness. It would be a refinement still better, if, in comparing her cruelty to fire and storm, he contrived to mingle a tenderness even with the fierce images he makes use of, and did not give himself up so entirely to a sense of them: for he feels his misery and desolation more than his similitudes. We can never think of this beautiful fable, without feeling pity for the poor "monster;" and our old sensation did not forsake us, when we saw him in this piece. The moment we heard his voice, it sounded to us, not frightful, but one of the most pathetic things in the world.

What a divine composition is "The flocks shall leave the mountains!" And who is to wonder, that Polyphemus cannot bear the unequal destiny, which condemns him to hear such Elysian sweetness, only to feel himself deprived of a share in it? The passage on the third and fourth lines ("The nymphs forsake, &c.") is the completest endearment ever put into the shape of sound.

We are informed by a correspondent, (from whom we shall be happy to hear again) that the operatic drama, called The Romance of a Day, now performing at Covent Garden Theatre, is an adaptation from a French piece, called Kettly, ou le Retour en Suisse; and that Comrades and Friends, also performing at Covent Garden Theatre, is from another French piece, entitled Les Deux Sergens. Further, that the Burletta at the Olympic, The Chaste Salute, is taken from one of LA FONTAINE's Tales.

[We seldom think it proper, in so small a paper as ours, to help ourselves to passages out of other journals; but we felt so much pleasure in seeing our old dramatic acquaintance, Sir Lumley Skeffington, taking occasion to vent the cordial goodnature and right gentlemanly kindness for which he has always been distinguished, that we could not help indulging ourselves with extracting the pretty lines he has written upon Madame Vestris, from the Times.]

ON MADAME VESTRIS'S HAVING ESTABLISHED A THEATRE OF HER OWN.

BY SIR LUMLEY SKEFFINGTON.

Now, VESTRIS, the tenth of the Muses,
To mirth rears a fanciful dome;
We mark, while delight she infuses,
The Graces find Beauty at home.
In her eye such vivacity glitters,
To her voice such perfections belong,
That care and the life it embitters,
Find balm in the sweets of her song.

When monarchs o'er valleys are ranging,
A court is transferred to the green,
And flowers transplanted are changing
Not fragrance, but merely the scene.
'Tis circumstance dignifies places,
A desert is charming with spring;
And pleasure finds twenty new graces
Wherever the VESTRIS may sing.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR TO-MORROW EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Drama, (in Two Acts) called,

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]

Maria Grazie, Mrs W. BARRYMORE, Ottavia, Miss FAUCIT.
Prince Bianchi, Mr Younge, Nicolo, Mr Webster, Fabio, Mr Hughes,
Albert and Theodore, Mr H. WALLACK and Mr J. VINING,
Alessandro Massaroni, Mr WALLACK,
Rubaldo, Mr Bedford,
Spoletto, Mr Bland, Uberto, Mr Robinson, Carlotti. Mr Yarnold.

After which, a Musical Piece, (in Two Acts) called

THE ILLUSTRIOUS STRANGER.

[By Mr KENNEY.]

Irza, Miss FAUCIT, Fatima, Mrs WAYLETT,
Aboulifar, Mr Thompson, Aman, Mr Bland. Alibajou, Mr Webster,
Bowbell, Mr LISTON, Gimbo, Mr HARLEY.

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

Will be revived, the Comedy of

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.

[By W. SHAKSPEARE.]

Hero, Miss TAYLOR. Beatrice, Miss FANNY KEMBLE.
Benedick, Mr C. KEMBLE. Leonato, Mr WARDE.
Don Pedro, Mr G. BENNETT. Don John, Mr DIDDEAR.
Antonio, Mr BARTLEY. Count Claudio, Mr ABBOTT.
Dogberry, Mr BLANCHARD. Friar, Mr EVANS. Vergos, Mr KEELEY.

To conclude with a New Operatic Drama, called

THE ROMANCE OF A DAY.

The Music, by H. R. Bishop.

Sophia Walstein, Miss FORDE. Liese, Miss E. TREE. Therèse, Miss P. Horton.
Widow Klaffen, Mrs GIBBS. Karoline Klaffen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Adolph, Count of Engleberg, Mr HUNT. General Kienwitz, Mr BARTLEY.
Colonel Francœur, Mr ABBOT. Nikel Unterhand, Mr G. PENSON.
Moritz, Mr BLANCHARD. Fritz Klaffen, Mr KEELEY.
Paul Richter, Miss TAYLOR. Hubert, Mr Irwin.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

In the course of the Season, the following Performers will appear for the first time.
Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY, du Theâtre du Gymnase.
Madame ALBERT, du Theâtre des Nouveautés.
M. BRUNET, Artiste, du Theâtre des Variétés.
Fourth appearance of Mons. BOUFFE, who is engaged for 12 nights only.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

LE PAYSAN PICARD.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de M. BRAZIER.

Eliza, Fille de Gercour, Mlle Cora. Matron, sa Femme de Chambre, Mlle. Eliza.
M. Gercour, ancien Négociant, M. Cloup. Ernest, son Neveu, M. Gamard.
St. Léon, Capitain de Hussards, amant d'Eliza, M. Paulin.
Frontin, Valet d'Ernest, M. Arnaud.

Suivi, a la Demande Général de MM. les Souscripteurs, de la 2de Représentation de

LE MARCHAND DE LA RUE SAINT DENIS.

Vaudeville nouveau en Trois Actes, de MM. BRAZIER et de VILLENEUVE.

Madame Dumont, Mme. Préval. Henriette, sa Fille, Mlle. Florval.
Séraphine, Nièce de Madame Dumont, Mlle. St. Ange.
Octavie, Fille de Beaupré, Mlle. Eliza. Marguerite, Gouvernante, Mlle. Emma
Jeannette, Nourrice, Mlle. Corra.
M. BOUFFE remplira le Rôle de Théophile, (his original character).
D. Dumont, Marchand de Soiries, M. St. Aubert. Dorvilliers, Magistrat, M. Derval
Edouard, son Fils, M. Alfred. Le Baron Beaupré, M. Cloup.
Le Maire, M. Paulin. Jocard, Garçon de Bureau, M. Préval.
Un Auvegnat, M. Granville. Un Garçon de Caisse, M. Arnaud.
Un Vétéan, M. Guenée.

Suivi de la Première Représentation de

PIERRE; OU, LE COUVREUR.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, en Cinq Tableaux, par MM. BRAZIER et Carmouche.

Jasmin, Jokey, Mlle. Eliza. La Comtesse de Beauford, Mme. Préval.
Herminie, sa Nièce, Mlle. Corra. Josephine, Bouquetière, Mme. Gamard.
Madame Loquet, Portière, Madame Baudin.
M. BOUFFE remplira le Rôle de Pierre, (his original character).
Le Duc de Beauford, M. St. Aubert. Octave, amoureux d'Herminie, M. Paulin
Bermont, Notaire, M. Préval. Bombardini, Chef d'Orchestre, M. Guenée.
Giraud, ami de Pierre, compagnon Couvreur, M. Gamard.
Un Clerc de Nétaire, M. Arnaud. Un Gendarme, M. Granville.
Lafleur, Valet, M. Cloup.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

To conclude with a Domestic Burletta, in Two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.

Act I.—WINTER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mrs DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Giles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS.
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—SUMMER.

The Characters as in Act I.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A new Burletta, entitled

THE LOST SON.

[From the French of M. SCRIBE, by Mr AINSWORTH.]

Madame de Sainville, Mrs Knight. Henriette, Miss Nursey.
Leontine, Miss Sidney. Baron Von Neirstein, Mr Cooper.
M. La Roche, Mr W. VINING. Eugène de Nerseuil, Mr Raymond.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called

THE GRENADIER.

[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]

Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

After which, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called

MIS-APPREHENSION.

[By Mr C. DANCE.]

The Characters as before.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]

Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.

SURREY THEATRE.

A Comic Melo-Dramatic Entertainment, (in Two Acts) entitled

THE FEMALE MASSARONI.

Principal Characters by Miss M. C. POOLE, Miss VINCENT, Miss SOMERVILLE, and Mlle. ROSIER.
Mr C. HILL, Mr D. PITT, Mr GOUGH, Mr VALE, and Mr ROGERS.

After which, M. LOUIS VALLI, will go through the whole of this surpising Gymnastic Exercises.

To be succeeded by an entirely New Broad Farcical One Act Drama, entitled

"SWING."

Principal Characters by Miss VINCENT, Miss RUMENS, Mr VALE, Mr C. HILL, Mr HONNER, Mr WILLIAMS, Mr ROGERS, Mr GOUGH.

And other ENTERTAINMENTS.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,

TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

A New Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called

TACT.

The Music, by J. A. Barnett.

The Characters by Miss STOWASSER, Mrs HUMBY, Mr J. RUSSELL, Mr Smith. Mr Munroe, Mr Tilbury, Mr Taylor, Mr J. Conquest, Mr FORRESTER, and Mr GREEN.

After which, a New Operatic Piece, entitled

GALATEA.

From GAY'S Serenata. With HANDEL'S Music, arranged by Mr C. POTTER.

Principal Characters by Miss VERNON, Mrs GARRICK, and Mrs HUMBY.
Mr BENNETT. Mr J. RUSSELL. Mr SPENCER. Mr G. SMITH.
Mr MUNROE. Mr G. LEJEUNE. And Mr E. SEGUIN.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.

The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Maria,

In the course of the Evening, Mozart's Overture to "Figaro," and Winter's Overture to "Il Ratto di Proserpina."

To conclude with a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called

EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.

The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss Stohwasser. Miss Wells. Miss Garrick.
Miss Sinclair. Mr Smith. Mr Tilbury. Mr Munroe. Mr Roberts.
And Mr GREEN.

COBURG THEATRE.—De L'Orme—The Village Phantom—Neil Jagger's Cave.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck—The Gossip—The Robber of Epping Forest.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL.—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

N° 143.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Lives of the most eminent British Painters, Sculptors, and Architects. By Allan Cunningham. Vol. IV. (Containing the Lives of the Architects; and being the nineteenth volume of the Family Library). 12mo. pp. 352. Murray.

THE contributions of Mr Cunningham to the 'Family Library' are upon the whole welcome and amusing. He is a conscientious workman, and takes pains to do justice to himself and his employer. He is not content with mere compilation, or with repeating the dates and opinions of others. It would be as well, at the same time, if he thought it less necessary to speak so often in the first person: his manner is a little too important for his materials; and he ought to take care how he brings charges of conceit and false taste. Clever and shrewd as he is, he is far from seeing to the end of any subject, even a professional one, and there are more schools to be described, both in prose and poetry, should people see occasion to take the trouble.

The present volume contains the Lives of William of Wykeham, Inigo Jones, Wren, Vanbrugh, Gibbs, Kent, the Earl of Burlington, and Chambers; of all of whom there are portraits by Edwards, after the originals of Vandyke, Lely, Kneller, Hogarth, and others; especially a fine one of Inigo Jones for the frontispiene, which would adorn any publication, and has almost the effect of a painting. We cannot say much for William of Wykeham, taken from a painting in Winchester College. Wren's aspect is both weak and conceited, probably by the help of Leiy; for sitters oftener suffer from those who paint them than the world suppose. Vanbrugh has a liberal, good-humoured countenance, analogous to his character: Gibbs, a petty and irritable one: Kent, a profile of a common order (from a drawing by himself): the Earl of Burlington, a face like a fastidious footman: Chambers has more of the "nobleman-look" than he. Why did Mr Cunningham omit Aldrich, Dean of Christchurch? He has surely as much right to a place as Burlington and Kent. He built several well-known, and we believe admired structures at Oxford; and was one of those accomplished men, whose biography, like that of Vanbrugh, it is desirable to meet with in all the places into which it can be introduced. He was a musician as well as architect, wrote the famous Smoking Catch (being accomplished in the smoking art also); was the author of "Hark! the bonny Christchurch Bells," a composition of great sprightliness and originality; and has the reputation of being an elegant Latin poet. His Latin verses are to be met with in the 'Musæ Anglicanæ;' but we do not remember them, unless the following hexameters be among the number:—

Si bene quid memini, causæ sunt quinque bibendi;—
Hospitis adventus, presens sitis, atque futura,
Aut vini bonitas, aut quælibet altera causa.

Which has been thus translated, perhaps by the author, for the version is on a par with the original:—

If on my theme I rightly think,
There are five reasons why men drink;—
Good wine, a friend, or being dry,
Or lest we should be by and bye,
Or any other reason why.

A great deal more is said of the origin and connexions of William of Wykeham than is necessary, and Mr Cunningham defends him against the imputation of bastardy. Who cares whether he was a bastard or not; or would consider it an imputation if he had been?

'Of John, the father,' says Mr Cunningham, 'and Sybil, the mother of this great man, nothing more is with certainty known, than that they lived in wedlock in Wykeham, and, according to the unimpeachable testimony of their son's will, had several children." [A fact which hardly requires so conscientious an attestation; but this is one of the superfluous verdicts, into which our author's solemnity over his task sometimes betrays him.] 'That Wykeham,' he continues, 'was the family name, there have been some doubts. At the time of the Bishop's birth, surnames were not settled by descent as they are now; they were unknown in England till the conquest. By little and little the better sort took surnames, but by the common people they were not generally adopted till the reign of Edward the Second; we are not, therefore, to considers it to the reproach of the Bishop that there should be some uncertainly on this point.' —P. 5.

It is understood that in some parts of England, surnames are not even yet fully established. The editor of an edition of Chaucer published in 1825, says that there are few of the miners of Staffordshire who bear the names of their fathers; and he mentions the case of a publican in that county, whose father's name was Johnson; but the people having called him Pigman, from dealing in pigs, "Pigman he called himself," and put the name over his door, where it was to be seen at the time of the editor's writing.

There is a mystery after all, about the life and character of William of Wykeham. He was accused of parsimony, and the number and value of his preferments astonished the Pope. But we are bound to think well of the man who endowed schools and colleges, and who raised the architectural character of his country.

'He was one,' says Mr Cunningham, 'of a band of consummate architects, whose genius adorned our land with those cathedrals which are yet unrivalled for beauty and splendour in any country. His practice, indeed, in ecclesiastical structures, was confined a little too much to repairs and alterations, in which the character of the original work in a great measure directed him what to do: yet it is extraordinary how much peculiar beauty and stateliness he has engrafted and raised upon the common and the mean, and how he has got over the difficulties of working with the old in the spirit of the new.'—P. 64. * * * * * * *

'It is truly wonderful to see with what taste and profusion Wykeham has scattered his ornaments over the nave, the cloisters, and the chantries of his church, nor is the grave strength and solid stateliness of the lofty structure impaired, but rather improved by these embellishments. It is to be regretted, that one who could so readily unite beauty and strength, and communicate so much becoming elegance to all the manifold combinations of the Gothic, had not been employed to build a new cathedral. His colleges are rather for worth than show: plain accommodation was all that was necessary; yet in the chapels, particularly in that of New College, there is no ordinary beauty.'—P. 65.

The following account of the way in which these venerable structures were built, will be found amusing:—

'From our old historians, our public records, and a few brief instructions, of the days of Wykeham, concerning the royal buildings, we gather some curious information about the mode of erecting cathedrals. The site of the church was selected, not in a barren spot, but in a pleasant place, where the soil was naturally fruitful, and lakes or streams containing fish were near. The foundations of the structure were marked out, and around this a camp of huts was established, to afford shelter to the workmen: a warden was appointed to every ten men, and over the whole a clerk of the works presided, whose duty was to see the building executed according to the plans of the chief architect. Those workmen, if the need of the church required great diligence, had many indulgences: and if they were refractory, there were modes of bringing them to reason, spiritual as well as temporal. The masonry was the work of Englishmen; and much of the carving, as our memorandums sufficiently show, was cut by native hands. The caprice or taste of the workmen seems sometimes to have directed the accessorial ornaments; for many of our cathedrals are deformed by figures of indecent demons and other grotesque and impure representations, which mingle indifferently with things holy. To save the purse of the state, or the hoards of the clergy, the noble families of the district, from a love of religion, or as a commutation of penance, permitted their forests to be felled, their quarries to be wrought, their vassals to be pressed, and their horses too, in order to facilitate the good work. Wren, who was no admirer of their architecture, speaks with knowledge and with justice of their way of going to work. "Those who have seen the exact amounts in records," says he, "of the charge of the fabrics of some of our cathedrals, near four hundred years old, cannot but have a great esteem for their economy, and admire how soon they erected such lofty structures. Indeed, great height they thought the greatest magnificence. Few stones were used but what a man might carry up a ladder on his back from scaffold to scaffold, though they had pullies and spoked wheels upon occasion; but having rejected cornices, they had no need of great engines: stone upon stone was easily piled up to great heights; therefore the pride of their work was in pinnacles and steeples. In this they essentially differed from the Roman way, who laid all their mouldings horizontally, which made the best perspective: the Gothic way, on the contrary, carried all their mouldings perpendicular, so that the ground-work being settled, they had nothing else to do but to spire all up as they could. Thus they made their pillars of a bundle of little Toruses, which they divided into more when they came to the roof; and these Toruses split into many small ones, and traversing one another, gave occasion to the tracery work of which the Freemasons were the inventors. They used the sharp-headed arch which would rise with little centreing, required lighter key-stones and less butment, and yet would bear another row of doubled arches rising from the key-stone, by the diversifying of which they erected eminent structures. It must be confessed that this was an ingenious compendium of work, suited to those northern climates; and I must also own, that works of the same height and magnificence, in the Roman way, would be much more expensive." The facility with which those edifices were reared was aided much by the command which a feudal prince had over his people; but more by the power of the Church over hordes of illiterate workmen, who had at once before their eyes the fear of hell, the hope of heaven, and the impulse of good wages.' —P. 66.

Digitized by Google

The contempt of Gothic architecture implied in the above passage from Wren, argues a defect in his understanding, and not the superiority of his own style of architecture. St Paul's cathedral is a solid, a scientific, and an imposing structure; but the effect of it is but cold on the imagination, compared with that of a great Gothic cathedral. It suggests the idea of durability in prospect for a good round number of ages; but the other reminds us of all time past, and of eternity. The effect of the one is material and palpable; the other of the spiritual and mysterious. The eye comparatively slides over the one, and with all its admiration can find many things greater. The other is a house of thought; and to thought there is no limit.

[To be concluded to-morrow.]

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

The Abbé de la Riviere went to Rome in hopes of being made a Cardinal, but he was disappointed. As he returned with a very bad cold, Bautru said, "It is because he came back without a hat."

An Abbé thought to pay his court to the great Condé, by presenting to him an epitaph which he had made on Molière: "Ah!" said the Prince, "that be on whom thou hast made this epitaph were here to make thine."

"To Rule the Roast,"—is to govern, manage, or preside over. Johnson observes that it was originally written "roist," which signifies a tumult, and then implied to direct the rabble.—Rider's Dictionary.

A Liberal Bookseller.—When Fielding had finished his Tom Jones, being much distressed, he sold it to an obscure bookseller for 25*l.* on condition of being paid on a certain given day. In the mean time he showed the MS. to Thomson the poet, who was immediately struck with its great merit, and advised Fielding by all means to get free from the bargain, which he did without much difficulty, as the bookseller was not capable of estimating the value of his purchase. Thomson recommended the work to Andrew Miller, and the parties met at a tavern over a beef-steak and a bottle. Miller began with saying—"Mr Fielding, I always determine on affairs of this sort at once, and never change my offer: I will not give one farthing more than two hundred pounds."—"Two hundred pounds!" cries Fielding. "Yes," says the other, "and not one farthing more." Fielding, whose surprise arose from joy, and not disappointment, shook him by the hand, sealed the bargain, and ordered in two bottles of wine. Miller got a very large sum by the sale of the book. He, at different times during his life, assisted Fielding with 2,500*l.*, which debt he cancelled in his will.

Bautru used to say, that a tavern was a place where they sold folly by the bottle.

Inequality.—Boileau being one day visited by an indolent person of rank, who reproached him with not having returned his first visit, "You and I," said the satirist, "are upon equal terms: I lose my time when I pay a visit; you only get rid of yours when you do so."

Very Natural Query.—An old man was advised by one of his friends to marry. "I don't like old women," he replied. "Well then, take a young one." "Very good," answered he; "but if I, who am old, don't like old women, how can I expect that a young girl should like me?"

Bruce and the Spider.—After receiving the last unpleasing intelligence from Scotland, Bruce was lying one morning on his wretched bed, and deliberating with himself whether he had better not resign all thoughts of again attempting to make good his right to the Scottish crown, and, dismissing his followers, transport himself and his brother to the Holy Land, and spend the rest of his life in fighting against the Saracens; by which he thought, perhaps, he might deserve the forgiveness of heaven for the great sin of stabbing Comyn in the church of Dumfries. But then, on the other hand, he thought it would be both criminal and cowardly to give up his attempt to restore freedom to Scotland, while there yet remained the least chance of his being successful in an undertaking which, rightly considered, was much more his duty than to drive the Infidels out of Palestine, though the superstition of the age might think otherwise. While he was divided betwixt these reflexions, and doubtful of what he should do, Bruce was looking upward to the roof of the cabin in which he lay, and his eye was attracted by a spider, which, hanging at the end of a long thread of his own spinning, was endeavouring, as is the fashion of that creature, to swing himself from one beam in the roof to another, for the purpose of fixing the line on which he meant to stretch his web. The insect made the attempt again and again without success; and at length Bruce counted that it had tried to carry its point six times, and been as often unable to do it. It came into his head that he had fought just six battles against the English and their allies, and that the poor persevering spider was exactly in the same situation with himself, having made as many trials, and been as often disappointed in what it aimed at. "Now," thought Bruce, "as I have no means of knowing what is best to be done, I will be guided by the luck which attends this spider. If the insect shall make another effort to fix its thread, and be successful, I will venture a seventh time to try my fortune in Scotland; but if the spider shall fail, I will go to the wars in Palestine, and never return to my native country again." While Bruce was forming this resolution, the spider made another exertion with all the force it could muster, and fairly succeeded in fastening its thread to the beam which it had so often in vain attempted to reach. Bruce, seeing the success of the spider, resolved to try his own fortune; and as he never before gained a victory, so he never afterwards sustained any considerable check or defeat. I have often met people of the name of Bruce, so completely persuaded of the truth of this story, that they would not on any account kill a spider, because it was such an insect which had shown the example of perseverance, and given a signal of good luck to their great namesake.—Tales of a Grandfather.

Another Spider Story.—A lady went to Mr A——, (a gentleman more celebrated for his skill than his courtesy) and in great distress of mind, stated to him that, by a strange accident, she had swallowed a live spider. At first his only reply was, "Whew! whew! whew!"—a sort of internal whistling sound, intended to be indicative of extreme contempt. But his anxious patient was not to be so easily repulsed. She became every moment more and more urgent for some means of relief from the dreaded effect of the strange accident she had consulted him about; when at last looking upon the wall, he put up his hand and caught a fly. "There, ma'am," said he, "I've got a remedy for you. Open your mouth, and as soon as I've put this fly into it, shut it again; and the moment the spider hears the fly buzzing about, up he'll come; and then you can spit them both out together."—London Weekly Review.

The Last Illness and Funeral of Burns.—When it was known that Burns was dying, Dumfries was like a place besieged. The anxiety, not of the rich and the learned only, but of the mechanics and peasants, exceeded all belief. Wherever two or three people stood together, their talk was of Burns, and of him alone; they spoke of his history, of his person, his works, his family, his fame, and of his untimely and approaching fate, with a warmth and enthusiasm which will ever endear Dumfries to my remembrance. All that he said or was saying, the opinions of the physicians (and Maxwell was a kind and a skilful one) were eagerly caught up and reported from street to street, and from house to house. * * * * The multitude who accompanied Burns to the grave went step by step with the chief mourners; they might amount to ten or twelve thousand. Not a word was heard; and though all could not be near, and many could not see, there was no rude impatience shown, no fierce disappointment expressed. It was an impressive and mournful sight to see men of all ranks and persuasions and opinions mingling as brothers, and stepping side by side down the streets of Dumfries, with the remains of him who had sang of their loves and joys and domestic endearments, with a truth and a tenderness which none perhaps have since equalled.—Mornings in Spring.

Digitized by Google

FEMALE ADVANCEMENT.—When errors and prejudices are spread among the female sex, it is the hardest thing in the world to root them out. Arguments, which are the only proper means for it, are of little use; they have a short answer to all reasonings that turn against them,—Make us believe that if you can.—Addison. [The above passage is curious as illustrative of the habits of a former age. In our more favoured days, ladies are found who can not only reason but even listen to the reason of others.—F. F.]

FLINT SOUP.—The four mendicant orders of the church of Rome carried the art of beggary to the highest perfection. One of these holy beggars was accustomed, in traversing Normandy, to demand a dinner of a poor farmer; but upon one occasion had the mortification to arrive when the farmer and his wife were occupied in their grounds; and having carried their dinner with them, had left the cupboard bare. The friar was hungry, and hunger is ingenious. Addressing the eldest of the three children, a girl of eight years, he asked her if she had ever seen flint soup?—"No, father," replied she, with a gaping mouth of great curiosity.—"Bring me a good round fat pebble." Soon found. "And the small soup kettle, full of water." Placed on the fire, and the pebble amidst. "Our pot begins to boil: perhaps you have a cabbage in the garden."—"Yes, father, and carrots."—"A good child; bring some. No bread?"—"No; but there is a little flour."—"Good, good."—After a long pause, "Perhaps you could find a little morsel of butter?"—"Yes, father; for I did not eat it all."—"My dear, we shall have an excellent flint soup."—It was indeed an excellent soup meagre, and the friar desired that the pebble might be preserved for another occasion.

NOBLE HOUSEKEEPING IN 1525.—When Henry the Eighth conferred upon Lord Clifford, the son of the shepherd Lord, the dignity of Earl of Cumberland, it was necessary for his Lordship to make a journey from Yorkshire to London. A curious account has been preserved of his expenses on the occasion.—It appears that the new Earl was attended on this expedition by thirty-three of his servants on horseback. How many days were occupied in travelling is not mentioned, but his expenses on the road are put down at 7*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* On his arrival in the capital, he was lodged at Derby place, now the Heralds' College; and we find from the first list of charges, that his expenditure in housekeeping for himself and his whole retinue, including horses, did not amount to more than 46*l.* 7*s.*, about nine pounds per week; a circumstance which will the less surprise us, when we read, under the same head, that his wine for five weeks amounted to the sum of three shillings, and his desserts, consisting of cherries, to twopence.—Mornings in Spring.—[This Earl, who in his youth had been leader of a troop of banditti, might have found means to travel at small expense; but that one who had led this lawless life should be thus moderate in wine, is strange enough, and is the more remarkable, as one of the items in the account is, "For bying Wyne to my Ladie, 1*l.*"]

GALILEO, NEAR THE CLOSE OF LIFE.—When Milton was at Florence, in the year 1639, he visited Galileo at his seat near Ancetri. The astronomer was then 75 years of age; he had been twice imprisoned by the Inquisition at Rome, for the supposed heresy of his philosophical opinions in defending the system of Copernicus, and his last liberation, in December 1633, after a confinement of nearly two years, was on the express condition of not departing, for the residue of his life, from the Duchy of Tuscany. * * * Not only was he suffering from the natural pressure of advancing years, but he was infirm from sickness, and had a very short time before Milton was admitted to his presence, become totally blind, from a too intense application to his telescope, and consequent exposure to the night air. Yet this, the greatest calamity which could have befallen a person thus engaged, he bore with christian fortitude, with the piety, indeed, of a saint, and the resignation of a philosopher. He permitted it not, in fact, either to break the vigour of his spirit, or to interrupt the course of his studies, supplying the defect, in a great measure, by constant meditation, and the use of an amanuensis. Nor, though the first astronomer and mathematician of any age or country, had he confined himself to those pursuits; his learning was general and extensive; both theoretically and practically he was an architect and designer; his fondness for poetry was enthusiastic, and he played upon the lute with exquisite skill and taste. To these varied acquisitions in science, literature, and art, were added the blessings of an amiable disposition; for, though keenly sensible of the injustice of his enemies, whose malevolence and oppression, indeed, have scarcely had a parallel, he was yet cheerful, affable, and open in his temper; and his aspect, we are told, was singularly venerable, mild, and intelligent. That such a man, though living in an age of extreme bigotry, should be an object of ardent attachment to those who best knew him, may be readily conceived. We shall not be surprised, therefore, to learn that he was enthusiastically beloved by his pupils, and that when visited by Milton, Vincenzo Viviani, his last and favourite disciple, then a youth of seventeen, was attending upon him with all the zeal of the most affectionate son. So great, indeed, was the veneration entertained for him by this young man, who subsequently became his biographer, and a mathematician of great celebrity, that he never, during the remainder of his life (and he reached the age of eighty-one, subscribed his name without the addition of the "Scholar of Galileo," and had constantly before him, in the room in which he studied, a bust of his revered master, with several inscriptions in his praise.—Mornings in Spring.

THE PLAY-GOER.

Yesterday, being ASH-WEDNESDAY, all the Theatres were closed.

SOCIETA ARMONICA.

TO THE TATLER.

DEAR MR TATLER,—The first Concert of this Society for the present season took place on Monday the 14th, at the Opera-room, and the rapid improvement in its performances, in the short space of two years (which was when I last attended these meetings), is a cheering proof of the progress of good music. I need only mention the names of Mori, Lindley, and Dragonetti, to convince you that there was something worth listening to; the vocal department was assigned to Miss Grant, David, and Lablache.

Beethoven's symphony in B flat, with its exquisite adagio, all tender complaint, and its grand climax at the close, where Dragonetti sits, like another Jupiter, launching forth his thunders, opened the concert. Compared with the Philharmonic band, this may be pronounced deficient in fulness and steadiness; but I own that whilst listening to such a delicious composition, my mind is too sweetly grateful to cavil with the performance for being less than perfect. Signor Lablache wasted his amazing powers on a very ineffective song of Paccini's. Oh! how I wished he had substituted 'Madamina,' or 'La Vendetta,' or even Rossini's copy of this latter.

Signor David, being a stranger in England, was cordially welcomed by the audience; but his singing has not caused me to alter the opinion I formed of him some years since, when I heard him at Vienna. His style is florid in the extreme; indeed his shake being very neat, and his falsetto the best part of his voice, he is almost constantly trembling in alt, like an octave flute in an ague. His natural voice in tone resembles an oboe; and as, whilst singing, his body is considerably distorted and bent, one cannot help pitying the poor man for the internal agony he seems to be enduring, which feeling is enforced by repeated catchings in his breath. I recollect Miss Grant some two or three years back, at Covent-Garden Theatre, and congratulate her upon the great improvement she has achieved since then. Her voice is not powerful, but her intonation last night was correct; and she executed the rival passages to Mori's obligato with much sweetness and finish. Hummel's grand military septett was very ably performed but I prefer his other in D minor.

Corelli is an old favourite of mine; his antique harmonies please me, even when played on the piano alone. Think then of the delight I enjoyed whilst listening to Lindley and Dragonetti,—the sweet voiced instrument of the one, blending with the grave deep tones of the latter, like the graceful and the grand in nature.

Mozart, dear Mozart, was not to be entirely overlooked in the selection, so his grandest overture (the one to the Zauberflöte) was beautifully played during the cloaking of ladies and shuffling of beaux; which made me almost regret that he was not altogether omitted, rather than heard with such an anomalous and discordant accompaniment;—but I will be thankful for the treat I received, merely protesting en passant against sundry loud and continued whisperings, principally of the dandies, during the whole performance; and end this notice by wishing the Società Amonica all possible success in their endeavours to promote the advancement of good music; and remain,

Dear Mr Tatler, your's very cordially,

MANTHELE.

AN ETERNAL GAME OF CHESS.—'The old Irish were so greatly addicted to chess,' says Dr Hyde, 'that amongst them the possession of good estates has been often decided by it, and there are some estates at this very time, the property whereof still depends upon the issue of a game at chess. For example, the heirs of two noble Irish families whom we could name (to say nothing of others) hold their lands upon this tenure:—that one of them shall encounter the other at chess in this manner, that whichever of them conquered should seize and possess the estate of the other. Therefore,' continues the doctor, 'I am told they manage the affair prudently among themselves: once a year they meet, by appointment, to play at chess; one of them makes a move, and the other says, "I will consider how to answer you next year." This being done, a public notary commits to writing the situation of the game; by which method a game that neither has won, has been, and will be, continued for some hundred years."—Vallancey's Irish Grammar.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Drama, (in Two Acts) called,

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]

Maria Grazie, Mrs W. BARRYMORE, Ottavia, Miss FAUCIT.
Prince Bianchi, Mr Younge, Nicolo, Mr Webster, Fabio, Mr Hughes,
Albert and Theodore, Mr H. WALLACK and Mr J. VINING,
Alessandro Massaroni, Mr WALLACK,
Rubaldo, Mr Bedford,
Spoletto, Mr Bland, Uberto, Mr Robinson, Carlotti. Mr Yarnold.

In the course of the Evening, Cherubini's Overture to "Les Abencerages," and Winter's Overture to "Mahomed."

After which, a Musical Piece, (in Two Acts) called

THE ILLUSTRIOUS STRANGER.

[By Mr KENNEY.]

Irza, Miss FAUCIT, Fatima, Mrs WAYLETT,
Aboulifar, Mr Thompson, Aman, Mr Bland. Alibajou, Mr Webster,
Bowbell, Mr LISTON, Gimbo, Mr HARLEY.

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses BARNETT and BASEKE.
Harlequin, Mr HOWELL, Pantaloon, Mr T. BLANCHARD,
Clowns, Messrs SOUTHBY and E. J. PARSLOE.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, A Grand Musical Performance.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

Will be revived, the Comedy of

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.

[By W. SHAKSPEARE.]

Hero, Miss TAYLOR. Beatrice, Miss FANNY KEMBLE.
Ursula, Mrs Daly. Margaret, Mrs Brown.
Benedick, Mr C. KEMBLE. Leonato, Mr WARDE.
Don Pedro, Mr G. BENNETT. Don John, Mr DIDDEAR.
Antonio, Mr BARTLEY. Count Claudio, Mr ABBOTT.
Dogberry, Mr BLANCHARD. Friar, Mr EVANS. Verges, Mr KEELEY.
Borachio, Mr Baker. Conrad, Mr Holl. Balthazar, Mr Henry.
Sexton, Mr Barnes. Seacoal, Mr Mears. Oatcake, Mr Turnour.
Lorenzo, Mr Irwin. Servants, Messrs Heath and Sutton.

In Act II. A MASQUERADE. And Stevens's Glee of "Sigh no more, Ladies."

To conclude with a New Operatic Drama, called

THE ROMANCE OF A DAY.

The Music, by H. R. Bishop.

Sophia Walstein, Miss FORDE. Liese, Miss E. TREE. Therèse, Miss P. Horton.
Widow Klaffen, Mrs GIBBS. Karoline Klaffen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Adolph, Count of Engleberg, Mr HUNT. General Kienwitz, Mr BARTLEY.
Colonel Francœur, Mr ABBOT. Nikel Unterhand, Mr G. PENSON.
Moritz, Mr BLANCHARD. Fritz Klaffen, Mr KEELEY.
Paul Richter, Miss TAYLOR. Hubert, Mr Irwin.

To-morrow there will be no Performance.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

In the course of the Season, the following Performers will appear for the first tim.
Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY, du Theâtre du Gymnase.
Madame ALBERT, du Theâtre des Nouveautés.
M. BRUNET, Artiste, du Theâtre des Variétés.
Fourth appearance of Mons. BOUFFE, who is engaged for 12 nights only.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

LE PAYSAN PICARD.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, de M. BRAZIER.

Eliza, Fille de Gercour, Mlle Cora. Matron, sa Femme de Chambre, Mlle. Eliza.
M. Gercour, ancien Négociant, M. Cloup. Ernest, son Neveu, M. Gamard.
St. Léon, Capitain de Hussards, amant d'Eliza, M. Paulin.
Frontin, Valet d'Ernest, M. Arnaud.

Suivi, a la Demande Général de MM. les Souscripteurs, de la 2de Représentation de

LE MARCHAND DE LA RUE SAINT DENIS.

Vaudeville nouveau en Trois Actes, de MM. BRAZIER et de VILLENEUVE.

Madame Dumont, Mme, Préval. Henriette, sa Fille, Mlle. Florval.
Séraphine, Nièce de Madame Dumont, Mlle. St. Ange.
Octavie, Fille de Beaupré, Mlle. Eliza. Marguerite, Gouvernante, Mlle. Emma.
Jeannette, Nourrice, Mlle. Corra.
M. BOUFFE remplira le Rôle de Théophile, (his original character).
D. Dumont, Marchand de Soiries, M. St. Aubert. Dorvilliers, Magistrat, M. Derval.
Edouard, son Fils, M. Alfred. Le Baron Beaupré, M. Cloup.
Le Maire, M. Paulin. Jocard, Garçon de Bureau, M. Préval.
Un Auvegnat, M. Granville. Un Garçon de Caisse, M. Arnaud.
Un Vétéan, M. Guenée.

Suivi de la Première Représentation de

PIERRE; OU, LE COUVREUR.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, en Cinq Tableaux, par MM. BRAZIER et Carmouche.

Jasmin, Jokey, Mlle. Eliza. La Comtesse de Beauford, Mme. Préval.
Herminie, sa Nièce, Mlle. Corra. Josephine, Bouquetière, Mme. Gamard.
Madame Loquet, Portière, Madame Baudin.
M. BOUFFE remplira le Rôle de Pierre, (his original character).
Le Duc de Beauford, M. St. Aubert. Octave, amoureux d'Herminie, M. Paulin
Bermont, Notaire, M. Préval. Bombardini, Chef d'Orchestre, M. Guenée.
Giraud, ami de Pierre, compagnon Couvreur, M. Gamard.
Un Clerc de Notaire, M. Arnaud. Un Gendarme, M. Granville.
Lafleur, Valet, M. Cloup.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

To conclude with a Domestic Burletta, in Two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.

Act I.—WINTER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mrs DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS.
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—SUMMER.

The Characters as in Act I.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A new Burletta, entitled

THE LOST SON.

[From the French of M. SCRIBE, by Mr AINSWORTH.]

Madame de Sainville, Mrs Knight. Henriette, Miss Nursey.
Leontine, Miss Sidney. Baron Von Neirstein, Mr Cooper.
M. La Roche, Mr W. VINING. Eugène de Nerseuil, Mr Raymond.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called

THE GRENADIER.

[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]

Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

After which, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called

MIS-APPREHENSION.

[By Mr C. DANCE.]

The Characters as before.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]

Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.

SURREY THEATRE.

The celebrated Drama, entitled

THE ITALIAN WIFE.

Bianca, Miss M. C. POOLE,
Marchesa Aldabella, Miss Scott, Clara, Miss Jordan.
Duke of Venice, Mr Dibdin Pitt, Gonsalvo, Mr Gough, Falsetto, Mr Honner,
Giraldi Fasio, Mr OSBALDISTON,
Bartolo, Mr Williams, Philario, Mr Almar, Antonio, Mr Young,

After which, a Drama, entitled

THE DIAMOND ARROW.

[By Mr W. T. MONCRIEFF.]

The Characters by Miss SOMERVILLE, Mrs VALE, Messrs VALE, EDWIN, &c.

To be succeeded by an entirely New Broad Farcical One Act Drama, entitled

"SWING."

[By J. ALFRED and C. Z. BARNETT.]

Principal Characters by Miss VINCENT, Miss RUMENS, Mr VALE,
Mr C. HILL, Mr HONNER, Mr WILLIAMS, Mr ROGERS, Mr GOUGH.

To conclude with a Comic Melo-Dramatic Entertainment, (in Two Acts) entitled

THE FEMALE MASSARONI.

Principal Characters by Miss M. C. POOLE, Miss VINCENT,
Miss SOMERVILLE, and Mlle. ROSIER.
Mr C. HILL, Mr D. PITT, Mr GOUGH, Mr VALE, and Mr ROGERS.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,

TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

A New Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called

TACT.

The Music, by J. A. Barnett.

The Characters by Miss STOHWASSER, Mrs HUMBY, Mr J. RUSSELL,
Mr Smith. Mr Munroe, Mr Tilbury, Mr Taylor, Mr J. Conquest,
Mr FORRESTER, and Mr GREEN.

After which, a New Operatic Piece, entitled

GALATEA.

From GAY'S Serenata. With HANDEL'S Music, arranged by Mr C. POTTER.
Principal Characters by Miss VERNON, Mrs GARRICK, and Mrs HUMBY.
Mr BENNETT. Mr J. RUSSELL. Mr SPENCER. Mr G. SMITH.
Mr MUNROE. Mr G. LEJEUNE. And Mr E. SEGUIN.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.

The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Maria.

In the course of the Evening, Mozart's Overture to "Figaro," and Winter's Overture to "Il Ratto di Proserpina."

To conclude with a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called

EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.

The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss Stohwasser. Miss Wells. Miss Garrick.
Miss Sinclair. Mr Smith. Mr Tilbury. Mr Munroe. Mr Roberts.
And Mr GREEN.

COBURG THEATRE.—De L'Orme—The Village Phantom—Neil Jagger's Cave.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck—The Gossip—The Robber of Epping Forest.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

№ 144.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

The Lives of the most eminent British Painters, Sculptors, and Architects. By Allan Cunningham. Vol. IV. (Containing the Lives of the Architects; and being the fifteenth volume of the Family Library). 12mo. pp. 352. Murray.

(Notice concluded.)

Little is known of the early life of Inigo Jones. He was born in the neighbourhood of St Paul's; is supposed to have been apprenticed to some humble business; travelled and studied in Italy; became the architect and theatrical machinist of the court, during which period he lived with splendour; found his fortunes decline with those of his master, Charles I, whose ruin is said to have hastened his death; died, 80 years of age, in June 1653, at Somerset House; and was buried in the church of St Bennett, Paul's Wharf. His Spanish name of Inigo originated in the family's being Catholics, and most likely connected with the Spaniards in the train of Philip, the husband of Mary.

'Neither friends nor foes,' observes Mr Cunningham, 'have preserved enough to satisfy us as to the domestic manners and personal character of this distinguished man. Of his looks we may judge by his portraits, which are amongst the finest that Vandyke painted; of his fortitude we have a specimen in his manly conduct before that fierce House of Commons, which trampled upon the Court and Crown; of the generosity of his nature, the country had the benefit when he resigned his salary to pay the debts of his predecessor; and, of his sumptuous spirit, let a princely income, spent in maintaining a state worthy of his talents, and in entertaining the learned, the gifted and the noble, be the proof. He was fond of distinction—vain of the countenance of the Court and the notice of the great; and by a certain stateliness of manners, splendour of dress, and free and generous mode of life, supported the station to which his genius had raised him. His doublet of velvet, and his embroidered cap, became him well; neither do we see much to censure in the airs which he affected in the management of the masques so well described by Jonson.

'He has
His whistle of command, seat of authority,
And verge to interpret, tipt with silver.'

The malicious dramatist helps us to some of Inigo's favourite phrases. Thus, during the planning of a masque, in the Tale of a Tub, Scriben says:—

'He'll do't alone, sir; In-and-in
Draws with no other in's project; he will tell you
It cannot else be feasible, or conduce.
Those are his ruling words.'

And In-and-in Medley himself, describing his method of forming a pageant says:—

'If I might see the place, and had surveyed it,
I could say more; for all invention, sir,
Comes by degrees, and on the view of nature;
A world of things concur in the design,
Which makes it feasible, if art conduce.'

'In these lines, Jones speaks like an artist, and wisely—to examine the localities, and then imagine such a structure as should be in harmony with them, is to do as an architect what Jonson did as a dramatist, when he considered his characters, settled the mode of their employment, and formed a work in strict keeping with his materials and his scene. The satire lies in the mimicry. It seems that Inigo was fearful that Jonson would commemorate their feud:—

'In some sharp verse,
Able to eat into his bones, and pierce
The marrow.'

'Upon which the poet indignantly exclaims:—

'Wretch, I quit thee of thy pain,
Thou'rt too ambitious, and dost fear in vain:
The Lybian lion hunts no butterflies.'

'But if we admit the dramatist as a witness to the peculiarities which detract from the dignity of the architect, we cannot deny Inigo the right of calling him to speak to his merits. This, the poet, as we have seen, has often done, and with a friendly feeling—and he also sometimes unconsciously commends him in the midst of his satire. In the character of In-and-in Medley, he allows him to speak modestly of his abilities, and when he had finished the masque, and Squire Tub exclaims:—

'Good i' faith,
You have shewn reading and antiquity here, sir.'

'Medley only replies,

'I have a little knowledge in design.'—P. 138.

But this verse may be as great a sneer as any. It may have been intended to convey an imputation of affected humility. The origin of the dispute between Inigo and Ben Jonson is unknown, but is naturally supposed to be traceable to their contests for superiority in the getting up of the court masques. Jonson is thought to have been disgusted with the title-page of his Masque of Chloridia, which proclaimed as the "Inventors, Ben Jonson and Inigo Jones."

'It must have been anything but flattering,' says Mr Cunningham, 'to the proud and sensitive Jonson, to be obliged to share the honour of the whole invention with the scene-maker and preparer of the pageant: he could not but feel that he had been condescending enough, and was not prepared to hear with patience that Inigo was not satisfied to be second, but was angry that he was not first. This charge against the vanity of the architect, however, is but too well supported by the title-page of Pan's Anniversary, printed after Jonson's death, wherein his name takes precedence of the poet's.

'"Whoever was the aggressor," says Walpole, "the turbulence and brutality of Jonson were sure to place him most in the wrong;" 'but this,' continues Mr Cunningham, with much good sense, 'is surely a sentiment in which few will concur: whoever was the aggressor was most in the wrong; he who resents insults or retaliates an injury may carry his indignation too far; but cannot well be most in the wrong. It is indeed inexpressibly mournful to think on the last days of the illustrious Jonson—a manly character, and in dramatic excellence second only to Shakspeare—neglected by the great—imprisoned in a miserable abode in an alley, by want and a fatal malady—the honours of his muse usurped by a manufacturer of pageants, and his place as a poet supplied by Aurelius Townsend! No wonder that he went down in sorrow to the grave. I may agree with Gifford that the magnanimity of Jones is as disputable as his humanity in this unhappy quarrel; but I can find no warrant for believing that "he persecuted the poet for the remainder of his existence with implacable malice."'—P. 124.

This is just a specimen of the common-place person here alluded to (Mr Gifford) a ridiculously over-rated writer, who had all the spleen without any of the genius of Ben Jonson, and with whom every man was god or devil, just as it suited his editorial credit to make him. Most likely there was a good deal of that mortified vanity on both sides, which too often affords a humiliating spectacle in the quarrels of men of genius; and as Jonson, being a writer, had the greatest power of annoyance in his hands, he was probably the chief assailant. Among the sources of information which Mr Cunningham has searched for respecting Jones's youth, in the verses of his antagonist, he appears to have overlooked a passage which accuses the architect of having commenced life with "thirty pounds in pipkins:"—

'Mr Surveyor, you that first began
From thirty pounds in pipkins, to the man
You are: from them leaped forth an architect,
Able to talk of Euclid, and correct
Both him and Archimede: damn Archytas,
The noblest engineer that ever was;" &c.

Ben Jonson's abuse of his rival is now more disgraceful to himself than to the architect. Inigo Jones, who has been called the reviver of classical architecture, and the British Vitruvius, is well known to the intelligent part of the London public, as the builder of the fine Banquetting-house at Whitehall, which, for the exquisite beauty of the proportions of the upper range of windows, is a treat for the passenger to look at. Mr Cunningham is mistaken, if we remember rightly, in saying that Charles the First stepped out of the middle window of this range to the scaffold. The second window from the north used to be the one, we believe, so 'marked by tradition; but it has latterly been understood, that he came out of a side northern door, since blocked up, on the same story, and so went round to the front.

Digitized by Google

Speaking of Wren and St Paul's cathedral, Mr Cunningham says, that there is perhaps no one part of it equal to the celebrated Corinthian portico of Inigo Jones (burnt with the old cathedral.)

'The merit of Wren,' he says, 'lay in observing the proprieties of art—he has few bold, masterly hits—few unlooked-for beauties; there is no little space in the pile on which he has, as it were, condensed his strength—his glory lies in the entire structure—in his unrivalled skill in balancing and combining all the members of his edifice into one consistent and harmonious whole. This is to have in architecture a genius of the epic order.'

By no means. The wonder of an epic consists in its being magnificent as a whole, and at the same time full of masterly hits and unlooked-for beauties. Does Mr Cunningham mean to say that there are few masterly hits in Homer and Milton? The general and just impression on the public mind respecting Wren is, we believe, that he was rather a correct and judicious architect than a very great one. The size of a building like St Paul's is apt to be confounded with its merits, and to produce an exaggerated sense of them, true as in many respects they may be. We were surprised to find, the other day, what Mr Cunningham has not mentioned, that the cupola of St Paul's, which seems to be of stone, is chiefly composed of brick. We know not whether this is the case with similar structures; but the knowledge of the circumstance considerably diminishes the mighty effect of the dome upon our imaginations, and detracts from a sense of the architect's difficulties and power.

One of the most amusing of these lives is that of Sir John Vanbrugh, who was a wit as well as architect, and wrote comedies that are still in possession of the stage. His structures have been pronounced heavy, but have been defended by Sir Joshua Reynolds and others, as grand, original, and picturesque. It is curious to see a comic writer excelling in grandeur of architecture. It becomes critics to be modest in speaking of arts with which they are unacquainted, otherwise this dignified success of Vanbrugh in the solemnities of architecture, together with the reputations acquired by Gibbs and Lord Burlington, and the comparatively late period of life at which Wren took up the study and the practice together, being invited to it upon the strength of his reputation for geometry, would almost lead us to conclude that the art was not so difficult a one as people imagine, especially when we consider the confined number of its orders, and the little variety which it has upon the whole exhibited. A comic genius, however, may have great gravity, and even melancholy, in the more serious part of him; and this might account for the grandeur of Sir John's architecture, though we hear nothing of such a contrast to his animal spirits from his biographers. He was, however, a man of great kindness and good-nature; which in a person who reflects at all, generally argues a power of reflecting deeply. Lady Wortley Montague, or Pope (we forget which) said, that he, Congreve, and Garth, were the three best-natured men of the Kit-Kat Club. This character might have helped Mr Cunningham to see a little further into the excesses of Vanbrugh's comedy, which are more traceable to the author's vivacity and animal spirits, than to any contempt for morals and decency. In fact, Vanbrugh was too good-hearted a man to think ill enough, perhaps, of the license he allowed himself; while many of his critics, in their vehement condemnation of it, were justly accused by him of erring on the other side, and having no feeling but for their own want of sympathy. "As for the saints," says Vanbrugh, "your thorough-paced ones I mean, with screwed faces and dry mouths, I despair of them, for they are friends to nobody; they love nothing but their altars and themselves; they have too much zeal to have any charity; they make debauches in piety, as sinners do in wine; and are as quarrelsome in their religion, as other people are in their drink."—P. 258.

Mr Cunningham reprobates this passage; but there is a great deal of truth in it. To make virtue beloved, we must make her liberal, and candid, and better able to indulge than to reproach. Good nature is itself a virtue, and no mean one, for it is the end of all virtue. The less fault we find, the less we make. The more excuses we discover, the sooner we do away with false virtues as well as with real vices, rescue error from irritation, and prevent spleen from confounding itself with rectitude, and from keeping up a world of confusion.

Swift, at one time, attacked Vanbrugh's architecture; for which the Dean was afterwards sorry. Mr Cunningham says, that "Vanbrugh took no notice of rhymes, which to him were harmless as the passing wind." But Swift, in one of his letters, gives us to understand that the Whig artist felt himself much hurt, and showed it in his countenance when they met; which he might reasonably do; for Vanbrugh, being a man of a social nature, would feel what others said of him; and Swift had no right to speak of him as he did. In mentioning the character of Sir John Brute,' in The Provoked Wife, Mr Cunningham quotes the opinion of one whom he designates as "Hazlitt, an acute and lively writer on theatrical subjects." Mr Hazlitt was a masterly writer on many subjects, of which theatricals were the least. It is from Mr Hazlitt's book on the Comic Writers, if we mistake not, that Mr Cunningham has selected a specimen of Vanbrugh's comedy, which presents a scene so exquisite that it may truly be ranked among the number of those passages "which cannot be too often repeated." Mr Hazlitt has given it in his book: Mr Cunningham has copied it into his; and we will now copy it into these pages, by way of concluding our criticism with a bocca dolce. The characters are the two adventurers in the Confederacy. One of them, the superior genius in point of leg and ambition, personates a colonel; the other, his pretended servant, is on a par with him in cunning and impudence. They are in the house of the citizen (as our author observes) with whose daughter the colonel is on the point of eloping. His friend Brass sees it is the time to secure a good bargain for himself; he knows if his companion carries off the prize, his own share will be but small, and feeling that he has all to hope from his comrade's present dread of discovery, and nothing from his honour, he thus goes to work:—

'Brass. How speaks young mistress's epistle—soft and tender?

'Dick. As pen can write.

'Brass. So you think all goes well there?

'Dick. As my heart can wish.

'Brass. Why then, ceremony aside, [putting on his hat,] you and I must have a little talk, Mr Amlet.

'Dick. Ah! Brass, what art thou going to do—wo't ruin me?

'Brass. Look you, Dick, few words—you are in a smooth way of making your fortune; I hope all will roll on; but how d'ye intend matters shall pass 'twixt you and me in this business?

'Dick. Death and Furies! what a time do'st thou take to talk out!—

'Brass. Good words, or I betray you—they have already heard of one Mr Amlet in this house. In short, look smooth, and be a good prince. I am your valet 'tis true, your footman sometimes, which I am enraged at; but you have always had the ascendant I confess; when we were schoolfellows, you made me carry your books, make your exercise, own your rogueries, and sometimes take a whipping for you. When we were fellow-apprentices, though I was your senior, you made me open the shop, clean my master's shoes, cut last at dinner, and eat all the crust. Nay, in our punishments, you still made good your part, for when once upon a time I was sentenced but to be whipped, I cannot deny but you were condemned to be hanged. In all times, I must confess, your inclinations have been greater and nobler than mine; however, I cannot consent that you should, at once, fix your fortune for life, and I dwell in my humilities for the rest of my days.

'Dick. Hark thee, Brass, if I do not most nobly by thee, I am a dog.

'Brass. And when?

'Dick. As soon as ever I am married.

'Brass. Ay—the plague take thee.

'Dick. Then you mistrust me?

'Brass. I do, by my faith. Look you, sir, some folks we mistrust because we don't know them—others we mistrust because we do know them—and for one of these reasons I desire there may be a bargain beforehand—if not, [raising his voice,] look ye, Dick Amlet—

'Dick. Soft, my dear friend and companion—(the dog will ruin me,) [aside,] say what is't will content thee—but how can'st thou be such a barbarian?

'Brass. I learnt it at Algiers.

'Dick. Come—make thy Turkish demand then.

'Brass. You know you gave me a bank bill this morning to receive for you.

'Dick. I did so; of fifty pounds: 'tis thine. So now thou art satisfied: all is fixed.

'Brass. It is not indeed. There's a diamond necklace you robbed your mother (a pawnbroker) of e'en now.

'Dick. Ah! you Jew!

'Brass. No words.

'Dick. My dear Brass!

'Brass. I insist.

'Dick. My old friend!

'Brass. Dick Amlet, [raising his voice,] I insist.

'Dick. Ah! the cormorant! [Aside.] Well, 'tis thine; thou'lt never thrive with it.

'Brass. When I find it begins to do me mischief, I'll give it you again.'

We may as well add a pleasant testimony of Rowe's to the social qualities of Vanbrugh. It is in a parody of Horace's dialogue with Lydia, in which Tonson, the bookseller, with an air of injured tenderness, complains that Congreve had left off coming to see him:—

'I'm in with Captain Vanbrugh at the present,
A most goodnatured gentleman, and pleasant:
He writes your comedies, draws, schemes, and models,
And builds Duke's houses upon very odd hills.'

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—The Brigand.—The Illustrious Stranger.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Much Ado About Nothing.—And the Romance of a Day.

COVENT-GARDEN.

Much Ado about Nothing was performed here last night to a full house, and given out for repetition with the greatest applause. The effect was rather languid in parts, the plot in truth being thin enough, and taking pains to make itself seen through: and in almost all SHAKSPEARE'S plays, wonderful as they are, there are some scenes, which argue either occasional failure of stage tact, or indifference to the level part of the story, or a singular compliment to the understandings of his audience; whom we are to suppose interested in delicate points of language and character, such as have excited little attention with audiences of later times. We must observe at the same time, that we think there is a very visible improvement in the critical faculties of the humblest play-goers of the present day, owing, we have no doubt, to the sharpening of the public wits in other matters, and to the diffusion of that "Two-penny Trash" which has turned out to be so formidable to actors on a greater stage. The interest of Much Ado about Nothing chiefly arises from the scenes in which Benedick and Beatrice are concerned; and not only did these obtain as great a share of attention as we ever knew them, but all the little points of wit and subtlety produced a general acknowledgment, to a degree we do not remember to have witnessed before, and in which the participation of the galleries was as plain as that of the pit.

Miss KEMBLE appeared in the character of Beatrice, for the first time. We always feel loth to criticise this young lady, because we have never recovered the disappointment occasioned us by the immoderate praises bestowed on her in the first instance, and which led us to rate her in imagination by a very high standard. Perhaps the standard we judge all performers by is in general higher, than their modesty or a sense of their interest would desire; but this is what we cannot help, nor can we consider it a fault; because the standard is such as SHAKSPEARE and the other geniuses of the stage suggest to us; and we are not to blame, if in having our enthusiasm strongly excited by the nature and beauty of the portraits they set before us, we expect the best possible similitude to them in those who claim to be their representatives. What notion of sweetness can be too great for such a character as Imogen? What perfect love and ingenuousness ought we not to look for in a Desdemona? What an union of cordiality with court shrewdness in Rosalind? What a retreating inward of the soul in Viola, watching nevertheless through the eye, when the beloved object was present and could not see it? What a round-cheeked, perpetual, laughing mixture of grace and malice in Beatrice, arising from health, and indulgence, and a good sovereign opinion of a wit for which she had evidently been praised from her childhood? We see she has ruled the nursery, and her father, and her gentle cousin, Hero, and has only escaped being disagreeable because of the sweetness of her blood. When SHAKSPEARE has made all these charming women talk in the most intellectual style, run riot at will in the most graceful fancies, in short, utter the best things in the best manner, and challenge our very imaginations to come up to them, how is the critic to be wondered at, who thinks he cannot estimate them at too high a rate, and feels himself compelled to judge the actress accordingly? If their "nature" is to be judged of, undoubtedly it must be the highest and most charming kind of nature. If their "grace," it ought to be the most graceful thing in the world. It becomes, above all, totally impossible to admit a theatrical manner, even the most perfect of its kind, as the style and habit of these delightful creatures.

Miss KEMBLE'S Beatrice is very clever. We look upon it as one of the very best of her characters,—certainly the one in which we should see her again with the most pleasure. It wants, we think, the flowing and perpetual giddy grace of Beatrice, who is like a girl at the top of her school, and whose movements ought to run on like her tongue. Mrs JORDAN gave more of this than Miss KEMBLE,—a great deal more; and her laugh and heartiness were always inimitable: but she wanted the air of good breeding. When Beatrice is sent to ask Benedick to come in to dinner, we do not think Miss KEMBLE ought to make so regular and ordinary a scene of it. She should hang at the side scene, as if she had just run thither, ask him carelessly to come, reply to his answer in the same quick indifferent manner, and telling him that he has "no stomach," or in other words, that she sees he does uot want to come, be off again on the wing. Hero describes her on one occasion, as coming along, running "close by the ground, like a lapwing." She was coming, it is true, to overhear her cousin talk; but this is a specimen of the extreme to which she ran in general. She did everything in the liveliest manner, and the fittest for the occasion. Miss KEMBLE'S sarcasm, as usual, was good; and she received great and deserved applause in the speech where she half good-humouredly, half peevishly, says and unsays her confession of love to Benedick, ending it abruptly with the tearful words, "I'm sorry for my cousin." This ebullition of the chief thought which she has at her heart at the moment, was excellently, admirably given; and made a great sensation. For the most part, Miss KEMBLE'S performance told in occasional hits, rather than as a whole. There was a balance in it, as usual, between the artificial and the natural manner; but the latter had a more than ordinary ascendancy: and with a few less peacock-like movements of the head and gait, and a little more abandonment of herself to Beatrice's animal spirits, the character, in her hands, would come very nearly in merit to that of her father's Benedick, which we have only left ourselves room to say is one of his most effective performances. His utterance of his grand final reason for marrying,—"The world must be peopled,"—with his hands linked behind him, a general elevation of his aspect, and a sort of look at the whole universe before him, as if he saw all the future generations that might depend on his verdict, was a bit of the right masterly gusto,—the true perception and relish of the thing, any discrepancy from which would have been a false reading.

☞

TO THE TATLER.

SIR,—I have invented a new and much easier kind of arithmetic, which I call the trinal method, because it turns upon the powers, positive and negative, of three, as the common way does on the powers of ten. I use but three figures, 0, 1, and 2. It answers every purpose both of common life and philosophy, as well as the denal.

The denal 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, is, by the trinal,
1, 2, 10, 11, 12, 20, 21, 22, 100.

The multiplication table is—

1	2	10
2	11	20
10	20	100

.2 is two-thirds; ,02 is two-ninths. The hyperb. log. of 2 is .200201021 The circ. arc of 45° is .2I0012111 The sine of 25° is .102102002

Your obedient servant,
RICHARD EDWARDS.

46 Cromer street, Feb, 7, 1831.

Sheridan, during his first widowhood, being advised to take a wife, said, "Very well; I will:—whose?"

— The character of covetousness is what a man generally acquires more through some niggardliness, or ill grace, in little and inconsiderable things, than in expenses of any consequence. A very few pounds a-year would ease that man of the scandal of avarice.

— The most positive men are the most credulous; since they most believe themselves, and advise most with the falsest flatterer, and worst enemy, their own self-love.

— The greatest things, and the most praiseworthy, that can be done for the public good, are not what require great parts, but great honesty; therefore for a King to make an amiable character, he needs only be a man of common honesty, well advised.

— To pardon those absurdities in ourselves which we cannot suffer in others, is neither better nor worse than to be more willing to be fools ourselves, than to have others so.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A Grand Miscellaneous

SELECTION OF MUSIC.

From the Works of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Marcello, C. M. Von Weber, Marschner, Lindpaintner, Guglielmi, Zingarelli, Rossini, Spontini, Dr Arne, Dr Pepusch, Avison, Attwood, &c. &c.

Conductor, Mr H. R. BISHOP.

PART I.

Grand Overture to 'Nurmahal.' - Spontini.
New National Hymn, (Dedicated by Permission to his Majesty) Miss HUGHES, Miss RUSSELL, Mr T. COOKE, Mr PHILLIPS. And Chorus.
The Poetry by T. H. BAYLY, Esq. - - Bishop.
Grand Coronation Anthem, 'I was Glad.' Attwood.
Duetto, Miss PATON and Mr BRAHAM, 'Quel Anelante.' - Mazzeda.
Selection from HAYDN'S 'Season's.'
Recit. Mr BEDFORD, 'Behold, where surly Winter flies.' Quartet, Mrs BEDFORD, Miss RUSSELL, Mr T. COOKE, and Mr BEDFORD, 'Come, gentle Spring,' and Chorus. Recit. Mr PHILLIPS, 'At last the bounteous Sun,' and Air, 'With joy the impatient Husbandman.'
Recit. and Air, Miss PATON, 'From mighty Kings,' (Judas Maccabeus.) Handel.
Recit. Mr BEDFORD, 'And God made the Firmament.'
Air, Miss HUGHES, 'The Marvellous Works,' and Chorus. 'And to the ethereal Vaults.' (Creation.) - - Haydn.
Luther's Hymn, Mr BRAHAM, and Chorus, (Trumpet Obligato, Mr Harper.)
Mozart's First Grand Mottetto, 'O God when thou appearest.' The Solos by Miss HUGHES, Miss RUSSELL, Mr T. COOKE, and Mr BEDFORD.
Air, Miss PEARSON, 'What tho' I trace.' (Solomon) Handel.
Recitative and Duet, Mr SINCLAIR and Mr PHILLIPS, 'Call her my Bride.' (Guglielmo Tell.) - Rossini.
The Hymn of Eve, Mrs WAYLETT. - - - - Dr Arne.
Grand Scene from Oberon, Mr BRAHAM, 'Oh! 'tis a Glorious Sight to See.' C. M. Von Weber.
The Grand Scene from Israel in Egypt. - - Handel.
Chorus, 'The Lord shall reign.' Recit. Mr BRAHAM, 'For the Host of Pharoah.' Solo, Miss PATON, 'Sing ye to the Lord.' Grand Double Chorus, 'The Horse and his Rider.'

At the End of the First Part, A Fantasia on the Violin, by Mr OURY.

PART II.

Grand Overture to 'Semiramide.' - - - Rossini.
Air, Miss BRUCE, 'Gratias agimus tibi.' - Guglielmi.
Clarinet Obligato, Mr WILLMAN.
Air, Miss S. PHILLIPS, 'Sweetly o'er the senses stealing.' - Zingarelli.
Aria, Mr HORN, 'Il mio tesoro.' - Mozart.
Air, Mrs WAYLETT, 'Alice Gray.'
Grand Scene from Der Frei-chutz, Miss PATON, 'Softly sighs the Voice of Evening.' - - C. M. Von Weber.
Air, Mr SINCLAIR, 'In Native Worth.' (Creation). - Haydn.
Trio, Miss PEARSON, Miss HARRINGTON, and Mr PHILLIPS, 'Sound the loud timbrel.' - - Avison.
Celebrated Cantata, Mr BRAHAM, (Alexis.) - - Dr Pepusch. Accompanied on the Violoncello, by Mr LINDLEY.
Terzetto, Miss BYFELD, Miss RUSSELL, and Mr SINCLAIR, 'Cruda Sorte.' (Ricciardo e Zoraide.) - - Rossini.
Air, Miss PEARSON, 'By the simplicity of Venus' Doves.' (Midsummer Night's Dream.) - - - Bishop.
German Bacchanalian Song, Mr PHILLIPS, 'Im Herbst da Muss man trinken.' (Der Vampyr.) - - Marschner.
Grand Chorus, 'Hallelujah.' (Mount of Olives) - - Beethoven.

PART III.

Grand Overture to 'Der Bergkonig.' - - F. Lindpaintner.
Air, Miss PATON, 'Should he upbraid.' - - Bishop.
Air, Mr BRAHAM, 'There was once a Golden Time,' (accompanied by himself on the Piano-forte) - - - Mrs H. Wilson.
Irish Ballad, 'Kate Kearney,' Mrs WAYLETT.
Tyrolean Quintet, [by Desire] Miss HARRINGTON, Mr ROBINSON, Mr BENEDICT, Mr C. TETT, and Mr BEDFORD. - - - Bishop.
Irish Melody, Miss PEARSON, 'Kathleen O'More.'
Air, Mr SINCLAIR, 'The spring time of year is coming.'
FINALE.—The National Anthem.—'God save the King.'

THEATRE ROYAL ADELPHI.

A Grand Miscellaneous PANTADISACORIA.

Comprising various features of Novelty, in Four Parts;—the First and Second Parts will consist of a Musical, Comical, Recitatory, Anecdotic, Descriptive, Imitative Entertainment, yclept

WILLIAMS'S MORSELS OF MIRTH! FOR MOMENTS OF MERRIMENT.

PART I, consists of the following Songs, &c.
'Heads and Tails.' 'Ancient Establishments and Modern Improvements.' 'Love at Limehouse.' 'Royal Visit to the City.'

PART II, consists of the following Songs, &c.
'The Rose and the Lily, or, Love in a Flower Bed.' 'The Nervous Family.'

PART III.

GRECIAN STATUES! OR, LIVING MODELS OF ANTIQUES.

I. Hercules struggling with the Nemean Lion, in the six well-known attitudes.—II. Achilles throwing the Discus or Quoit.—III. Cincinnatus, the Roman, fastening his Sandals.—IV. The Slave Emouleur (the Grinder) sharpening his Knife while overhearing the Conspirators.—V. The Fighting Gladiator in three beautiful Positions.—VI. The African alarmed at the Thunder.—VII. Ajax defying the Lightning.—VIII. Romulus, from David's Picture of the Sabines.—IX. Remus's Defence, from the same.—X. Hercules and Lichas. Hercules clothing himself in the fatal Vest which Dejanira has sent by the youthful Lichas. He seizes the unfortunate Boy by the sole of the Foot and hurls him into the Sea.—XI.—Horatius shielding his prostrate Brother from the uplifted Weapons of the opposing Curatii, the eldest of whom is afterwards pourtrayed in the act of aiming a deadly thrust at his adversary. To conclude with the famous positions of THE DYING GLADIATOR.

PART IV.

OPTICAL ILLUSIONS,

By Mr H. CHILDE, Inventor of the DISSOLVING VIEWS.

PERFORMANCES FOR TO-MORROW EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elisabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

To conclude with a Domestic Burletta, in Two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE.]
The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.
Act I.—WINTER.
Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mrs DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS.
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.
[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]
Act. II.—SUMMER.
The Characters as in Act I.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

An entirely New Burletta, to be called

THE GRENADIER.

[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]
The Overture and Two of the Songs, by Mr S. Nelson.
Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.
After which, a Comic Burletta, called

THE CHASTE SALUTE

[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]
The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Baroness de Blanchec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,
To which will be added, a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.
To conclude with a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called

MIS-APPREHENSION.

[By Mr C. DANCE.]
The Characters as before.

SURREY THEATRE.

The celebrated Drama, entitled

THE ITALIAN WIFE.

Bianca, Miss M. C. POOLE,
Marchesa Aldabella, Miss Scott, Clara, Miss Jordan.
Duke of Venice, Mr Dibdin Pitt, Gonsalvo, Mr Gough, Falsetto, Mr Honner,
Giraldi Fazio, Mr OSBALDISTON,
Bartolo, Mr Williams, Philario, Mr Almar, Antonio, Mr Young,
After which, the favourite Drama of

A HUSBAND AT SIGHT.

The Characters by Miss Somerville, Miss Vincent, Ma'ame Simon, Mr C. Hill, Mr Vale, Mr Williams, Mr Lee, Mr Boulanger, and Mr Grammer.
To be succeeded by an entirely New Broad Farcical One Act Drama, entitled

"SWING."

[By J. ALFRED and C. Z. BARNETT.]
Principal Characters by Miss VINCENT, Miss RUMENS, Mr VALE, Mr C. HILL, Mr HONNER, Mr WILLIAMS, Mr ROGERS, Mr GOUGH.
To conclude with a Comic Melo-Dramatic Entertainment, (in Two Acts) entitled

THE FEMALE MASSARONI.

Principal Characters by Miss M. C. POOLE, Miss VINCENT, Miss SOMERVILLE, and Mlle. ROSIER.
Mr C. HILL, Mr D. PITT, Mr GOUGH, Mr VALE, and Mr ROGERS.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,

TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

A New Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called

TACT.

[By M. BARNATT.]
The Music, by J. A. Barnett.
The Characters by Miss STOHWASSER, Mrs HUMBY, Mr J. RUSSELL, Mr Smith. Mr Munroe, Mr Tilbury, Mr Taylor, Mr J. Conquest, Mr FORRESTER, and Mr GREEN.
After which, a New Operatic Piece, entitled

GALATEA.

From GAY'S Serenata. With HANDEL'S Music, arranged by Mr C. POTTER.
Principal Characters by Miss VERNON, Mrs GARRICK, and Mrs HUMBY. Mr BENNETT. Mr J. RUSSELL. Mr SPENCER. Mr G. SMITH. Mr MUNROE. Mr G. LEJEUNE. And Mr E. SEGUIN.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.
The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Maria, In the course of the Evening, Mozart's Overture to "Figaro," and Winter's Overture to "Il Ratto di Proserpina."
To conclude with a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called

EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.

The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss Stohwasser. Miss Wells. Miss Garnick. Miss Sinclair. Mr Smith. Mr Tilbury. Mr Munroe. Mr Roberts. And Mr GREEN.

COBURG THEATRE.—De L'Orme—The Village Phantom—Neil Jagger's Cave.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck—The Gossip—The Robber of Epping Forest.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL.—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Pladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 145.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Thoughts on Man, his Nature, Productions, and Discoveries; interspersed with some particulars respecting the Author. By William Godwin. 8vo. Wilson. (Unpublished.)

THE BALLOT.

AMONG the Essays which are about to be published from the pen of Mr Godwin, there is one upon the Ballot, which contains the spirit of all that can be said against the adoption of that measure, and is the only paper we have seen upon the subject that appears to be worth answering. We differ entirely with Mr Godwin's conclusions; but they come to us in the shape of all others which bespeaks our respect,—that of a zeal for the love of truth. The paper goes to such length, that we can neither extract it all, nor make our remarks upon it in the present number; but we have taken the greater part, and have omitted no point of importance. The answer we must make by itself in our next.

We should not have made so many extracts from a work going through the press, had it not been understood among the booksellers, that the more a work is noticed in any way, even with the utmost copiousness of quotation, the better for the sale of it. Many readers, however interested in specimens, are content to do without the book; but the experience of the trade has come to the conclusion, that these and many more hear of the work, who would not otherwise have done so, and that sufficient curiosity is excited to render the curiosity highly desirable.

'The principle of the Ballot (says Mr Godwin) is to teach men to perform their best actions under the cloak of concealment. When I return from giving my vote in the choice of a legislative representative, I ought, if my mode of proceeding were regulated by the undebauched feelings of our nature, to feel somewhat proud that I had discharged this duty, uninfluenced, uncorrupted, in the sincere frame of a conscientious spirit. But the institution of Ballot instigates me carefully to conceal what I have done. If I am questioned respecting it, the proper reply which is, as it were, put into my mouth, is, "You have no right to ask me; and I shall not tell." But, as every man does not recollect the proper reply at the moment it is wanted, and most men feel abashed, when a direct question is put to them to which they know they are not to return a direct answer, many will stammer and feel confused, will perhaps insinuate a falsehood, while at the same time their manner, to a discerning eye, will, in spite of all their precautions, disclose the very truth.

'The institution of Ballot not only teaches us that our best actions are those which we ought most steadily to disavow, but carries distrust and suspicion into all our most familiar relations. The man I want to deceive, and throw out in the keenness of his hunting, is my landlord. But how shall I most effectually conceal the truth from him? May I be allowed to tell it to my wife or my child? I had better not. It is a known maxim of worldly prudence, that the truth which may be a source of serious injury to me, is safest when it is shut up in my own bosom. If I once let it out, there is no saying where the communication may stop. "Day unto day uttereth speech; and night unto night showeth forth knowledge."

'And is this the proud attitude of liberty, to which we are so eager to aspire? After all, there will be some ingenuous men in the community, who will not know how for ever to suppress what is dearest to their hearts. But at any rate this institution holds out a prize to him that shall be most secret and untraceable in his proceedings, that shall "shoe his horses with felt," and proceed in all his courses with silence and suspicion.

'The first principle of morality to social man is, that we act under the eye of our fellows. The truly virtuous man would do as he ought, though no eye observed him. Persons, it is true, who deport themselves merely as "men-pleasers," for ever considering how the by-standers will pronounce of their conduct, are entitled to small commendation. The good man, it is certain, will see

> "To do what virtue would, though sun and moon
> Were in the flat sea sunk."

But, imperfect creatures as we mortals usually are, these things act and re-act upon each other. A man of honourable intentions will demean himself justly, from the love of right. But he is confirmed in his just dealing by the approbation of his fellows; and, if he were tempted to step awry, he would be checked by the anticipation of their censure. Such is the nature of our moral education. It is with virtue, as it is with literary fame. If I write well, I can scarcely feel secure that I do so, till I obtain the suffrage of some competent judges, confirming the verdict which I was before tempted to pronounce in my own favour. This acting as in a theatre, where men and Gods are judges of my conduct, is the true destination of man; and we cannot violate the universal law under which we were born, without having reason to fear the most injurious effects.

'And is this mysterious and concealed way of proceeding one of the forms through which we are to pass in the school of liberty? The great end of all liberal institutions is, to make a man fearless, frank as the day, acting from a lively and earnest impulse, which will not be restrained, disdains all half-measures, and prompts us, as it were, to carry our hearts in our hands, for all men to challenge, and all men to comment on. It is true, that the devisers of liberal institutions will have foremost in their thoughts, how men shall be secure in their personal liberty, unrestrained in the execution of what their thoughts prompt them to do, and uncontrolled in the administration of the fruits of their industry. But the moral end of all is, that a man shall be worthy of the name, erect, independent of mind, spontaneous of decision, intrepid, overflowing with all good feelings, and open in the expression of the sentiments they inspire. If man is double in his weightiest purposes, full of ambiguity and concealment, and not daring to give words to the impulses of his soul, what matters it that he is free? We may pronounce of this man, that he is unworthy of the blessing that has fallen to his lot, and will never produce the fruits that should be engendered in the lap of liberty.

'There is however, it should seem, a short answer to all this. It is in vain to expatiate to us upon the mischief of lying, hypocrisy, and concealment, since it is only through them, as the way by which we are to march, that nations can be made free.

'This certainly is a fearful judgment awarded upon our species: but is it true?

'We are to begin, it seems, with concealing from our landlord, or our opulent neighbour, our political determinations; and so his corrupt influence will be broken, and the humblest individual will be safe in doing that which his honest and unbiassed feelings may prompt him to do.

'No: this is not the way in which the enemy of the souls of men is to be defeated. We must not begin with the confession of our faint-heartedness and our cowardice. A quiet, sober, unaltered frame of judgment, that insults no one, that has in it nothing violent, brutal, and defying, is the frame that becomes us. If I would teach another man, my superior in rank, how he ought to construe and decide upon the conduct I hold, I must begin by making that conduct explicit.

'It is not in morals, as it is in war. There stratagem is allowable, and to take the enemy by surprise. "Who enquires of an enemy, whether it is by fraud or heroic enterprise that he has gained the day?" But it is not so that the cause of liberty is to be vindicated in the civil career of life.

'The question is of reducing the higher ranks of society to admit the just immunities of their inferiors. I will not allow that they shall be cheated into it. No: no man was ever yet recovered to his senses in a question of morals, but by plain, honest, soul-commanding speech. Truth is omnipotent, if we do not violate its majesty by surrendering its outworks, and giving up that vantage-ground, of which if we deprive it, it ceases to be truth. It finds a responsive chord in every human bosom. Whoever hears its voice, at the same time recognises its power. However corrupt he may be, however steeped in the habits of vice, and hardened in the practices of tyranny, if it be mildly, distinctly, emphatically enunciated, the colour will forsake his cheek, his speech will falter and be broken, and he will feel himself unable to turn it off lightly, as a thing of no impression and validity. In this way the erroneous man, the man nursed in the house of luxury, a stranger to the genuine, unvarnished state of things, stands a fair chance of being corrected.

'But, if an opposite, and a truer way of thinking than that to which he is accustomed, is only brought to his observation by the reserve of him who entertains it, and who, while he entertains it, is reluctant to hold communion with his wealthier neighbour, who regards him as his adversary, and hardly admits him to be of the same common nature, there will be no general improvement. Under this discipline the two ranks of society will be perpetually more estranged, view each other with eye askance, and will be as two separate and hostile states, though inhabiting the same territory.

Digitized by Google

Is this the picture we desire to see of genuine liberty, philanthrophic, desirous of good to all, and overflowing with all generous emotions?

"I hate where vice can bolt her arguments,
And virtue has no tongue to check her pride."

The man who interests himself for his country and its cause, who acts bravely and independently, and knows that he runs some risk in doing so, must have a strange opinion of the sacredness of truth, if the very consciousness of having done nobly does not supply him with courage, and give him that simple, unostentatious firmness, which shall carry immediate conviction to the heart. It is a bitter lesson that the institution of Ballot teaches, while it says, "You have done well; therefore be silent; whisper it not to the winds; disclose it not to those who are most nearly allied to you; adopt the same conduct which would suggest itself to you, if you had perpetrated an atrocious crime."

'In no long time after the commencement of the war of the allies against France, certain acts were introduced into the English Parliament, declaring it penal by word or writing to utter anything that should tend to bring the Government into contempt; and these acts, by the mass of the adversaries of despotic power, were in way of contempt called the Gagging Acts. Little did I and my contemporaries of 1795 imagine, when we protested against these acts in the triumphant reign of William Pitt, that the soi-disant friends of liberty and radical reformers, when their turn of triumph came, would propose their Gagging Acts, recommending to the people to vote agreeably to their consciences, but forbidding them to give publicity to the honourable conduct they had been prevailed on to adopt!

'But all this reasoning is founded in an erroneous and groundlessly degrading opinion of human nature. The improvement of the general institutions of society, the correction of the gross inequalities of our representation, will operate towards the improvement of all the members of the community. While ninety-nine in an hundred of the inhabitants of England are carried forward in the scale of intellect and virtue, it would be absurd to suppose that the hundredth man will stand still, merely because he is rich. Patriotism is a liberal and a social impulse; its influence is irresistible; it is contagious, and is propagated by the touch; it is infectious, and mixes itself with the air that we breathe.

'Men are governed in their conduct in a surprising degree by the opinion of others. It was all very well, when noblemen were each of them satisfied of the equity and irresistible principle of their ascendancy, when the vulgar population felt convinced that passive obedience was entailed on them from their birth, when we were in a manner but just emancipated (illusorily emancipated!) from the state of serfs and villains. But a memorable melioration of the state of man will carry some degree of conviction to the hearts of all. The most corrupt will be made doubtful: many who had not gone so far in ill, will desert the banners of oppression.

'We see this already. What a shock was propagated through the island, when, the other day, a large proprietor, turning a considerable cluster of his tenants out of the houses and lands they occupied, because they refused to vote for a representative in Parliament implicitly as he bade them, urged in his own justification, "Shall I not do what I will with my own?" This was all sound morals and divinity perhaps at the period of his birth. Nobody disputed it; or, if any one did, he was set down by the oracles of the vicinage as a crack-brained visionary. This man, so confident in his own prerogatives, had slept for the last twenty years, and awoke totally unconscious of what had been going on in almost every corner of Europe in the interval. A few more such examples, and so broad and sweeping an assumption will no more be heard of, and it will remain in the records of history, as a thing for the reality of which we have sufficient evidence, but which common sense repudiates, and which seems to demand from us a certain degree of credulity to induce us to admit that it had ever been.

'The manners of society are by no means so unchanged and unalterable as many men suppose. It is here, as in the case of excessive drinking, which I had lately occasion to mention. In rude and barbarous times, men of the highest circles piqued themselves upon their power of swallowing excessive potations, and found pleasure in it. It is in this as in so many other vices, we follow implicitly where our elders lead the way. But the rage of drinking is now gone by; and you will with difficulty find a company of persons of respectable appearance, who assemble round a table for the purpose of making beasts of themselves. Formerly it was their glory; now, if any man unhappily retains the weakness, he hides it from his equals, as he would a loathsome disease. The same thing will happen as to Parliamentary corruption, and the absolute authority that was exercised by landlords over the consciences of their tenants. He that shall attempt to put into act what is then universally condemned, will be a marked man, and will be generally shunned by his fellows. The eye of the world will be upon him, as the murderer fancies himself followed by the eye of Omnipotence; and he will obey the general voice of the community, that he may be at peace with himself.

'Let us not then disgrace a period of memorable improvement, by combining it with an institution that should mark that we, the great body of the people, regard the more opulent members of the community as our foes. Let us hold out to them the right hand of fellowship; and they will meet us. They will be influenced, partly by ingenuous shame for the unworthy conduct which they and their fathers had so long pursued, and partly by sympathy for the genuine joy and expansion of heart that is spreading itself through the land. Scarcely any one can restrain himself from participating in the happiness of the great body of his countrymen; and, if they see that we treat them with generous confidence, and are unwilling to recur to the memory of former grievances, and that a spirit of philanthropy and unlimited good-will is the sentiment of the day, it can scarcely happen but that their conversion will be complete, and the harmony be made entire.

* * * * * *

'The very essence of this scheme is silence. And this silence is not merely like that which is prompted by a diffident temper, which by fits is practised by the modest and irresolute man, and by fits disappears before the sun of truth and through the energies of a temporary fortitude. It is uniform. It is not brought into act only, when the individual unhappily does not find in himself the firmness to play the adventurer. It becomes matter of system, and is felt as being recommended to us for a duty.

'Nor does the evil stop there. In the course of my ordinary communications with my fellow-men, I speak when I please, and I am silent when I please, and there is nothing specially to be remarked either way. If I speak, I am perhaps listened to; and, if I am silent, it is likely enough concluded that it is because I have nothing of importance to say. But in the question of ballot the case is far otherwise. There it is known that the voter has his secret. When I am silent upon a matter occurring in the usual intercourses of life where I might speak, nay, where we will suppose I ought to speak, I am at least guilty of dissimulation only. But the voter by ballot is strongly impelled to the practice of the more enormous sin of simulation. It is known, as I have said, that he has his secret. And he will often be driven to have recourse to various stratagems, that he may elude the enquirer, or that he may set at fault the sagacity of the silent observer. He has something that he might tell if he would, and he distorts himself in a thousand ways, that he may not betray the hoard which he is known to have in his custody. The institution of ballot is the fruitful parent of ambiguities, equivocations and lies without number.'

LINES

WRITTEN IN A LADY'S DIARY.

May cheerful thoughts that wait on health,
May self-respect—the bank of wealth
That feareth not detraction's stealth,
Be thine, my Mary!

May this day's record be the spring
Of all the year's delight, and bring
No mildew with its blossoming,
My wife—my Mary!

And when the summer days are gone
Of life, may our dear union
Shine like the frosty setting sun,
My own dear Mary!

1831. COR CAROLI.

It has been observed, that the proudest people are not nice in Love. In fact, they think they raise the object of their choice above every one else.—Hazlitt's Characteristics.

As we scorn those who scorn us, so the contempt of the world (not seldom) makes men proud.—Hazlitt's Characteristics.

A book is a letter written to all the unknown friends one has in the world.

SIMPLICITY.—The Curate of Lawton chapel, near Winwick, was lately catechising the children one Sunday afternoon; upon asking a girl the usual question of "What is your name?" another girl who was standing near her, immediately said, "Dinna tell him, Bet—he knows." This exhortation, delivered in a strong provincial accent, completely discomposed the gravity of the minister and congregation.

A GALLANT THIEF.—Some years since, a lady crossing a field in the neighbourhood of Islington, observed two very suspicious-looking fellows, who seemed watching an opportunity to rob her. Her alarm was increased by observing a fellow of a similar appearance in a pathway, at a little distance from her; but as the case did not admit of any hesitation, she beckoned to him to stop, and addressed him with an air of confidence—"Sir, you look like a gentleman: I do not like the appearance of those fellows behind us. I think they intend to rob me! Will you protect me?" "Madam," replied the man, "I will: take my arm, and I will attend you, till you are quite out of danger: you will see when I wave my handkerchief, the two men will sheer off: they are my companions; and we intended to rob you; but when confidence is reposed in me, I am not scoundrel enough to betray it." He attended until she came in sight of her own house, when she offered him a guinea as a reward for his protection; but he refused it, adding, he had more honour left, than to sink his character to the level of a lawyer's: "I am above taking a fee."

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—The Oratorios.

DRURY LANE.

We have usually had an unpleasant, heavy impression of Oratorios, partly no doubt on account of their presenting a sombre mixture both of audience and music, and partly for their making a pretence to something devotional without the reality. Last night they appeared to us better, perhaps because they are no longer called Oratorios, but Selections of Music; the consequences of which was, that the sacred pieces really had a more sacred effect, while the earthlier ones did not seem to have crept in upon tolerance, but took their station at once as things reasonable and innocent.

Miss PATON made her first appearance in London this season, and met with an enthusiastic welcome. We could not see how she looked at the hundred miles distance between the stage and the front boxes. We thought she sang with less power than usual, but more feeling; which is an improvement; for her power could bear diminishing, whereas her sensibility has not hitherto appeared to equal the beauty of her voice. The first time we heard CATALANI, which if we mistake not was on this very stage, and at the same distance, we remember the astonishment that seized us, when she seemed, by some magic power, as if she almost brandished her voice, and threw it at you like lightning. There was no such might in Miss PATON, forcible as she was above the others. Nor did we desire it, when we heard her beautiful tones, at once so rich and so delicate, with more touchingness in them than we expected, and

"One low, lovelier note, more sweet than all."

In a passage of one of her performances, the instruments left her voice by itself: and she repeated two or three bars, with that sort of avowed delight in their beauty which has such a peculiar charm in a singer of excellence,—fondling them, as it were, into more and more softness, and ending with a dulcet, inward, and most delicious shake, fit to be heard in the stillness of midnight, like a nightingale's.

She and Mr BRAHAM sang MARCELLO's divine duett of Qual anelante, which is truly a "panting after the water-brooks" (for that is the subject: it is an Italian version of the Psalm). The very rise on the word anelante seems the breathing out of a soul. We know not which is the more beautiful, the mixed fervour and weakness of the slow part of the duett, or that conclusion, in quicker time, which has been added from another of MARCELLO's compositions, and which would be almost too lovely and graceful for the words, if the words were not Italian, and that little plaintive cry upon the word mai were not repeated so touchingly. I loro piedi mai muoron passo, &c. The text is upon the feet that are "swift to shed blood." All the lovers of music who have not met with this duett, should procure it. It is easily found. MARCELLO was a Venetian Nobleman, whose name has survived the multitude of his haughty class, because he knew how to compose fine music. Their pride was buried in their sea. The sweet voice of the musician escaped to us, like the dove over the waters; and here it is still, immortal.

Mr BRAHAM's and Miss PATON's voices do not go well together. We cannot say we admire the quality of Mr BRAHAM's voice, nor the way in which he usually manages it. He has got a trick of opening it into mere loudness, like a sort of trumpet without tone; and there is a nasality of which he never gets quite rid. He has however great skill and power, sometimes considerable feeling; and he can practise so masterly a simplicity, that we get angry at his quackeries for the gallery. It is a great treat to hear his LUTHER's 'Hymn.' He sang it last night, with an obligato trumpet by Mr HARPER, which was as fine and well felt as the finest part of the singing. Mr HARPER's mode of softening and making touchingly distinct the three notes of his trumpet, when he repeats them for the third time, is wonderfully impressive. He feels admirably well the real nature of this composition of the great reformer's, which is no less affecting than grand; as all pictures, on a large scale, of death and life must be, however mixed up with superstition. The idea of the graves restoring their dead, never mind under what circumstances, absorbs us with the thought of those we have lost; and makes us at once see them again as if living, and feel all the bitterness of knowing the reverse.

The other principal singers were Miss HUGHES, Miss BRUCE, Mr SINCLAIR, Mr PHILLIPS, &c. We heard Mrs WAYLETT sing the 'Hymn of Eve;' but she seemed to do it uneasily, and to force her natural simplicity. We do not know how she succeeded afterwards, for the ballad she was to sing in Part II. did not take place where it should have done; and though we heard the greater part of the performance, we came away after hearing LINDLEY. It was Mrs WAYLETT's first appearence on these occasions, and perhaps she did not feel that they suited her.

Miss PEARSON also made her appearance as an oratorio singer for the first time, but did not succeed. Miss BRUCE obtained considerable and deserved applause in a duett (for so it may be called) with Mr WILLMAN's clarinet, who harmonized with her voice in a surprising manner, making the thirds as true as if he was playing both himself, though in rapid passages. Miss HUGHES deserves to be mentioned for the way in which she gave 'The marvellous works behold amazed;' though a little more force might have been warranted by the amazement. We cannot yet reconcile ourselves to the way in which Mr PHILLIPS's voice is intercepted and made fat by his throat, in its passage from the chest; but we hear him universally admired, and are willing to think we shall become sensible of his merits. We are told that we have not yet heard him on his best occasions. Mr OURY treated us with a fantasia on the violin, which was very clever, with its harmonics, &c.; but how far there was any great mastery of the soul of music in it, we cannot say. His style appeared to us of the gesticulating and convulsive order. But what a style is Mr LINDLEY's on the violoncello! He can play his tricks and prettinesses too when he chooses, and very pretty they are in their proper places, and as a fanciful variety; but then upon what a fine, simple, relishing style of truth he founds them. To his bow indeed the words of SHAKSPEARE belong: it "discourses excellent music;" talks with you, almost with the feeling of a human voice, in the lower and middle notes; and can rise, and rise again on the upper, and still rise, till you seem to hear the very tips of the flageolets of the fairies.—We thought it a high piece of taste in BRAHAM to subject his voice, as he did, to his accompanier's instrument, and to try to vie with its modulations in its own way.

"THE STAR SYSTEM."

TO THE TATLER.

GOOD MR TATLER,—There seems so much of "the milk of human kindness" in your composition, that I venture to point out a species of criticism in your amusing work, of which I think you are not aware; at least not of the extent of its effects on your readers, and on the feelings of those brief chronicles of the times, the poor players. I allude to the capitals of your play-bill columns, by which you hold up to particular observation certain players, typifying them as the capital actors of the houses to which they belong, whilst others are left in such visible obscurity as to be found out only with the aid of a glass, like the satellite of some planet.—I have always considered the histrionic art to have been planet-struck whenever the star system gained the ascendancy; and so averse am I to a periodical of so liberal a character as the Tatler being thought to dabble in invidious distinctions, or "palter with us in a double sense," that I hope you will look into the marrow of this bone of contention, and reform it altogether. The less notice these little-lettered gentry deserve, the more merit is in your bounty.

I am, good Sir, your Constant Reader,

Feb. 16th, 1831. PETER PENCIL.

P.S. "The Chaste Salute" is a literal translation of "Le Baiser au Porteur," by Scribe, Justin Gensoul, and de Courcy.

[In future, beginning with Monday's paper, we shall do what we can to remedy the evil so justly complained of by our correspondent. At all events, there will be no such distinctions in our play-bills, nor did they originate with us. We printed them as we found them. Names ought to be left to make their own way with the public, and not be subject to the caprices of managers. Indeed we should think that the better portion of the latter would be glad to avail themselves of an opportunity of putting an end to complaints and heart-burnings on this point. Some have handsomely followed our plan of putting the ladies' names first (by the way, we observe that Mr LEE has done it in his music-bills): let them complete their generous policy by adopting an impartial typography.]

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

A favorite Opera Seria, in Two Acts, entitled

RICCIARDO E ZORAIDE.

[By M. ROSSINI.]

Principal Characters by Madame SIGL VESPERMANN, Madame CASTELLI, Mademoiselle BECK, Signor CURIONI, Signor DEVILLE, Signor DE ANGELI, and Signor DAVID.

Between the Acts,

A NEW DIVERTISEMENT.

Principal Dancers. Madame MONTESSU, Mademoiselle CLARA, Mademoiselle PROCHE, and Mademoiselle BROCARD, Monsieur PAUL, Monsieur EMILE, and Monsieur LEFEBVRE.

After which, the Favorite Ballet, in Two Acts, of

LA SOMNAMBULE.

The Principal Characters by Madame MONTESSU, Mademoiselle KANIEL, Mlle. CLARA, Mlle. PROCHE, Mlle. DE VIS, and Mme. COPERE, Mesdames J. MERSIE, COUPOTTE, BESEKE, VEDY, GRIFFITHS, PITT, LAURA, LYDIA, CLARI, &c.
M. PAUL, M. EMILE, M. SIMON, M. EDOUARD, M. GEORGE, M. D'ALBERT, and M. LEFEBVRE.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Tragedy of

OTHELLO.

[By W. SHAKSPEARE.]

Desdemona, Miss PHILLIPS. Emilia, Mrs FAUCIT.
Duke of Venice, Mr THOMPSON. Brabantio, Mr YOUNGE.
Gratiano, Mr FENTON. Ludovico, Mr HAMMERTON.
Othello, Mr KEAN.
Montano, Mr J. VINING. Roderigo, Mr BALLS.
Iago, Mr WALLACK. Cassio, Mr COOPER.
Antonio, Mr CATHIE. Julio, Mr EATON. Marco, Mr STANLEY.
Paulo, Mr S. JONES. Giovanni, Mr CRAMER.
Luca, Mr WALSH. Messenger, Mr HONNER.

In the course of the Evening, (Second time in this Country) F. Kulau's Overture to the Opera entitled, "William Shakspeare," and Spontini's Overture to "Ferdinand Cortez."

To conclude with the Drama of

CHARLES THE TWELFTH.

[By J. R. PLANCHE.]

Eudiga, Miss S. Phillips. Ulrica, Miss Faucit.
Charles XII, Mr Farren. Adam Brock, Mr Liston. Major Vanberg, Mr Cooper.
Triptolemus Muddlewerk, Mr Harley.
Gustavus, Mr J. Vining. Colonel Reichel, Mr Cooke.

On Monday, King Richard III; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

Will be revived, the Comedy of

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.

[By W. SHAKSPEARE.]

Hero, Miss TAYLOR. Beatrice, Miss FANNY KEMBLE.
Ursula, Mrs DALY. Margaret, Mrs BROWN.
Benedick, Mr C. KEMBLE. Leonato, Mr WARDE.
Don Pedro, Mr G. BENNETT. Don John, Mr DIDDEAR.
Antonio, Mr BARTLEY. Count Claudio, Mr ABBOTT.
Dogberry, Mr BLANCHARD. Friar, Mr EVANS. Verges, Mr KEELEY.
Borachio. Mr BAKER. Conrad, Mr HOLL. Balthazar, Mr HENRY.
Sexton, Mr BARNES. Seacoal, Mr MEARS.
Oatcake, Mr TURNOUR. Lorenzo, Mr IRWIN.

In Act II. A MASQUERADE. And Stevens's Glee of "Sigh no more, Ladies."

Previous to the Comedy, Mozart's Overture to "Der Schauspieldirector."
Previous to 'Married Lovers,' an Overture by J. N. Hummel.
Previous to the 'Omnibus,' A. Romberg's Overture to "Scipio."

After which, a New Petite Comedy, called

MARRIED LOVERS.

[By Mr POWER.]

The Songs composed by Mr Barnett.

Duchess D'Orleans, Miss FORDE. Marchioness de Meneville, Miss TAYLOR.
Lady Ascot, Mrs CHATTERLEY. Annette, Miss PHILLIPS.
Duc D'Orleans, Mr ABBOTT. Marquis de Meneville, Mr BARTLEY.
Sir John Ascot, Mr WARDE. Colonel O'Dillon, Mr POWER.
Pierre, Mr IRWIN. Francis, Mr MEARS.

To conclude with the Farce of

THE OMNIBUS; OR, A CONVENIENT DISTANCE.

[By Mr TAIN.]

Julia Ledger, Miss Lawrence. Mrs Dobbs, Mrs Tayleure. Miss Damper, Mrs Daly.
Miss Jemima Damper, Miss Appleton. Mr Ledger, Mr Blanchard.
Mr Dobbs, Mr Bartley. Tom Dobbs, Mr Keeley. Pat Rooney, Mr Power.

On Monday, Fazio; Married Lovers; and Comrades and Friends.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

To conclude with a Domestic Burletta, in Two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.

Act I.—WINTER.

Alice, Mrs YATES, Bella, Mrs FITZWILLIAM,
Dame Barnard, Mrs DALY. Jemmy Starling, Mr BUCKSTONE,
Miles Barnard, Mr YATES, Walter Barnard, Mr HEMMINGS.
Captain Grampus, Mr O. SMITH, Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. REEVE.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—SUMMER.

The Characters as in Act I.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

An entirely New Burletta, to be called

THE GRENADIER.

[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]

The Overture and Two of the Songs, by Mr S. Nelson.
Fanny Bolton, Madame VESTRIS, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

After which, a Comic Burletta, called

THE CHASTE SALUTE

[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]

The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Baroness de Blancbec, Miss STUART. Lucille, Miss FITZWALTER.
Madame Thibaut, Miss SIDNEY.
Colonel Dorville, Mr. SPAGNOLETTI,

To which will be added, a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame VESTRIS.

To conclude with a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called

MIS-APPREHENSION.

[By Mr C. DANCE.]

The Characters as before.

SURREY THEATRE.

The celebrated Drama, entitled

THE ITALIAN WIFE.

Bianca, Miss M. C. POOLE,
Marchesa Aldabella, Miss Scott, Clara, Miss Jordan.
Duke of Venice, Mr Dibdin Pitt, Gonsalvo, Mr Gough, Falsetto, Mr Honner,
Giraldi Fazio, Mr OSBALDISTON,
Bartolo, Mr Williams, Philario, Mr Almar, Antonio, Mr Young,

After which, the favourite Drama of

A HUSBAND AT SIGHT.

The Characters by Miss Somerville, Miss Vincent, Ma'ame Simon, Mr C. Hill, Mr Vale, Mr Williams, Mr Lee, Mr Boulanger, and Mr Grammer.

To be succeeded by an entirely New Broad Farcical One Act Drama, entitled

"SWING."

[By J. ALFRED and C. Z. BARNETT.]

Principal Characters by Miss VINCENT, Miss RUMENS, Mr VALE, Mr C. HILL, Mr HONNER, Mr WILLIAMS, Mr ROGERS, Mr GOUGH.

To conclude with a Comic Melo-Dramatic Entertainment, (in Two Acts) entitled

THE FEMALE MASSARONI.

Principal Characters by Miss M. C. POOLE, Miss VINCENT, Miss SOMERVILLE, and Mlle. ROSIER.
Mr C. HILL, Mr D. PITT, Mr GOUGH, Mr VALE, and Mr ROGERS.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,

TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

A New Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called

TACT.

[By M. BARNETT.]

The Music, by J. A. Barnett.
The Characters by Miss STOHWASSER, Mrs HUMBY, Mr J. RUSSELL, Mr Smith. Mr Munroe, Mr Tilbury, Mr Taylor, Mr J. Conquest, Mr FORRESTER, and Mr GREEN.

After which, a New Operatic Piece, entitled

GALATEA.

From GAY'S Serenata. With HANDEL'S Music, arranged by Mr C. POTTER.
Principal Characters by Miss VERNON, Mrs GARRICK, and Mrs HUMBY.
Mr BENNETT. Mr J. RUSSELL. Mr SPENCER. Mr G. SMITH.
Mr MUNROE. Mr G. LEJEUNE. And Mr E. SEGUIN.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.
The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Maria.
In the course of the Evening, Mozart's Overture to "Figaro," and Winter's Overture to "Il Ratto di Proserpina."

To conclude with a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called

EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.

The Characters by Mrs GLOVER. Miss Stohwasser. Miss Wells. Miss Garrick.
Miss Sinclair. Mr Smith. Mr Tilbury. Mr Munroe. Mr Roberts.
And Mr GREEN.

COBURG THEATRE.—De L'Orme—The Village Phantom—Neil Jagger's Cave.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck—The Gossip—The Robber of Epping Forest.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL.—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

No. 146.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Thoughts on Man, his Nature, Productions, and Discoveries; interspersed with some particulars respecting the Author. By William Godwin. 8vo. Wilson. (Unpublished.)

THE BALLOT.

The ground of our answer to Mr Godwin is this;—that he argues the question as if it were one of peace instead of contest,—of choice and the love of cunning, instead of avowed necessity, and compelled, long-taught precaution. He pre-supposes a different state of things from that under which the Ballot is demanded; reasons as if the rich were as willing and able to receive a just moral conviction, as the poor to give it; and leaving out of the question the vice and misery occasioned by the present system of voting, assumes, that the right of secrecy must generate a world of lying, and leave the community worse in that respect than they have been made by all those mercenary and corrupt habits, which it is the object of the Ballot to do away.

It should seem, observes Mr Godwin, that there is a short answer to all which can be said against the Ballot. 'It is in vain to expatiate to us upon the mischiefs of lying, hypocrisy, and concealment, since it is only through them, as the way by which we are to march, that the nations are to be made free. This certainly is a fearful judgment awarded upon our species: but is it true? We are to begin, it seems, with concealing from our landlord or our opulent neighbour our political determinations; and so his corrupt influence will be broken, and the humblest individual will be safe in doing that, which his honest and unbiassed feelings will prompt him to do. No,' exclaims our author, 'this is not the way in which the enemy of the souls of men is to be defeated. We must not begin with a confession of our faint-heartedness and our cowardice.'

Now here we make our first stand against Mr Godwin's arguments; and we say, that we must make such a confession, if what we confess be true. Mr Godwin is for beginning with truth the second, instead of truth the first; and this it is which destroys his whole reasoning. The public do undoubtedly make a confession of comparative weakness in demanding the Ballot,—a confession of faint-heartedness and cowardice, if Mr Godwin so pleases; but such confessions are not apt to be made for a dishonourable purpose, while the avower is preparing for battle, and preparing for it with the very purpose of ultimately doing away his wants and infirmities. The community want armour, and they say so. The rich, the few, are well armed in power, and possession, and scorn, and habit, and precedent, and authority, and ignorance of their real interests, and contempt of those of the poor. The poor are naked, and feel that they fight at a disadvantage. They are afraid even of the bribery that may induce them to accept a little food and clothing at the expense of their nobler wants; and they say, 'No, we are now alive to the latter, which include all the rest; and we will begin by putting ourselves in a state to settle the dispute for ever. We will have the armour of secrecy, against all that armour of the rich: and when we say that we will have it, we begin the contest with a fairness, which shows in how just a spirit we make war, and how little we care for the vulgar ends of it.' Mr Godwin says, that 'it is not in morals, as in war,' when 'stratagem is allowable.' But not to repeat that the stratagem (if it is so to be called) is here avowed, the present case is a case both of morals and war; nor must it be concealed, that there is a good deal of demoralization on both sides; only the rich deny their's, while they secretly laugh at morals; and the poor have learnt the bitter wisdom of knowing how to lament their's, and are anxious to put an end to its consequences. Are they to do this by depriving themselves of their only resource, and walking up naked to the ranks of their enemies?

'Yes,' says Mr Godwin: 'a quiet, sober, unaltered frame of judgment, that insults no one, that has in it nothing violent, brutal, and defying, is the grace that becomes us. If I would teach another man, my superior in rank, how he ought to construe and decide upon the conduct I hold, I must begin by making that conduct explicit.' Well; this is the very thing we do. We only begin at the very beginning of explicitness, instead of pretending that we have nothing more to unfold.

'The question,' continues our author, 'is of reducing the higher ranks of society to admit the just immunities of their inferiors. I will not allow that they shall be cheated into it. No: no man was ever yet recovered to his senses in a question of morals, but by plain, honest, soul-commanding speech. Truth is omnipotent, if we do not violate its majesty by surrendering its outworks, and giving up that vantage-ground, of which if we deprive it, it ceases to be truth. It finds a responsive chord in every human bosom. Whoever hears its voice, at the same time recognises its power. However corrupt he may be, however steeped in the habits of vice, and hardened in the practices of tyranny, if it be mildly, distinctly, emphatically enunciated, the colour will forsake his cheek, his speech will alter and be broken, and he will feel himself unable to turn it off lightly, as a thing of no impression and validity. In this way the erroneous man, the man nursed in the house of luxury, a stranger to the genuine, unvarnished state of things, stands a fair chance of being corrected.'

As well might he say, that a poor half-naked Peruvian might have stepped out of the ranks of his countrymen during the Spanish invasion, and argued the matter with the ignorant and insulting band of Pizarro, who took themselves for gods.

Mr Godwin admits this arrogance in the succeeding paragraph, almost to the very same extent; and yet at the same argues as if the poor had the whole question placidly and peacefully in their hands.

'But,' says he, in continuation of the above remarks, 'if an opposite, and a truer way of thinking than that to which he is accustomed, is only brought to his observation by the reserve of him who entertains it, and who, while he entertains it, is reluctant to hold communication with his wealthier neighbour, who regards him as his adversary, and hardly admits him to be of the same common nature, there will be no general improvement. Under this discipline, the two ranks of society will be perpetually more estranged, view each other with eye askance, and be as two separate and hostile states, though inhabiting the same territory.'

As well might it be argued that any other battle if once entered upon, would never be terminated. The contest at present existing between the aristocracy and the people, (for nobody but our philosopher in his closet—and we use the word in all respectfulness—assumes for a moment that there is no contest) is, whether the aristocracy shall retain their enormous inequality of power, or whether the people shall not gain the portion belonging to them, in consequence of the new impulse given to their cause by the diffusion of knowledge and the late events in Paris. The aristocracy are not only unwilling to concede an inch, but from long sophistry and bad habit are unable to see the propriety of doing so; and were their opponents voluntarily to lay aside their new armour, and content themselves with discussing the question, the others would seize them and lock them under seven-fold chains. We grant that this state of things would not last: the progress of knowledge in any other part of the world would not allow it; the very measures now opposed by Mr Godwin would re-assert themselves, and make their way, precisely because they are of the first necessity, and because a bitter war upon one side, or an unjust exercise of power amounting to violence, can only be terminated by having recourse to the means of warfare upon the other. We give in to no cant about "natural enemies." We believe that there is no natural want of goodness in any class of society, but that all errors, whether of rich or poor, arise from circumstances, and are removeable by time and knowledge. We have often said so. But the people cannot pick and choose every mode of the removal during its progress. Mr Godwin says, that "a few more such examples" as those furnished by the silly Duke of Newcastle would do away with such enormities altogether. Granted: and a hundred more martyrdoms of individuals, and two hundred years more of bribery, corruption, intoxication, and all sorts of lying might possibly bring men round, by some point or other, to a general disgust at the want of a better state of things. But if knowledge is to do away the abuses in the meanwhile, it will go by the steps it is now taking, and not by supposing it possible for all the voters and pot-wallopers and miserable poor of the country, to become of themselves an argumentative self-sacrifice.

Digitized by Google

'The great end,' says Mr Godwin, 'of all liberal institutions, is to make a man fearless, frank as the day, acting from a lively and earnest impulse which will not be restrained, disdains all half-measures, and prompts us, as it were, to carry our hearts in our hands, for all men to challenge, and all men to comment on. It is true, (he continues) the devisers of liberal institutions will have foremost in their thoughts, how men shall be secure in their personal liberty, unrestrained in the execution of what their thoughts prompt them to do, and uncontrolled in the administration of the fruits of their industry. But the moral end of all is, that a man shall be worthy of the name, erect, independent of mind, spontaneous of decision, intrepid, overflowing with all good feelings, and open in the expression of the sentiments they inspire.'

Good; such is the end; but what are the means? The argument comes round in a circle. The means with Mr Godwin may be this frankness and fearlessness that he speaks of, this lively and earnest impulse, always disdaining half measures, and going up to the hustings openly to give its vote, independent of mind, and spontaneous of decision. This may be the means with a philosopher: though philosophers themselves have hung back in such cases for many years. It may be the means with a scholar: though it is not common at Oxford. It may, and ought to be, and sometimes is, with a solitary martyr to liberty, who gets persecuted for it half his life, and perhaps sneered at by the philosophers. But these martyrs themselves are the result of circumstances; and though they may think themselves bound to undergo their pains, and even to hazard the worldly good of their connexions, what right have they to expect that all the shopkeepers and suffering fathers in England should go to the same lengths, and not be allowed to adopt certain excellent half measures? Why must they must needs thrust in their teeth their scholarly virtues, and be angry that the best end is not obtained, and deferred, by the very best means? Mr Godwin speaks of "proud attitudes" of liberty, to which true men are "eager to aspire." But there is a little too much of this glorification of good things in his essays; and too great a forgetfulness of such things as do, and ought to reduce merit, as well as happiness, to a greater degree of equality. The object of true lovers of freedom is not to get at proud attitudes, but happy and healthy minds; and lovers of truth as we confess ourselves to be, to an extent which we can neither regret in ourselves, nor insist upon in others, and which we can trace as much to circumstances as anything in the character of another, we can see nothing else in the secrecy of the ballot than the ultimate downfall of corruption, and of the lying, because mercenary vices, which corruption maintains. Mr Godwin fears for the answers that will be made, when men are asked for whom they voted. No doubt there will be paltering here and there. How much is there not already? And what a mass of lying and worldliness, or of any other vice which he thinks convenient to him, is not that man prepared to be guilty of, who returns to his shop from a profligate vote on the hustings, which is notoriously against his conscience, but which he dared not give to another, because he could not openly say that his soul was his own? Mr Godwin tells us that he should say it openly: and it is very easy in Mr Godwin to say this. Perhaps it will be very easy in the community to say it a hundred years hence, when the ballot has obtained its end, and all classes are more honest. In the mean time, we do not believe that the majority will of necessity lie, because they are secret on this one point. We grant, that the more truth-loving a man is, the less tendency he has to be secret: yet nothing is more certain, than that the most conscientious lovers of truth are those who can keep a secret the best. And the reason is obvious: they are conscientious in this matter, because they are conscientious in the rest. But they can do it without paltering. Our author, in one part of his essays, remarks, that a man can know nothing of others, which is not derived from a knowledge of himself. Does he mean us to infer from what he has said on the ballot, that if he himself were asked what vote he had given, he should wince, and hum and haw, and tend to betray his secret? If this be the case, we have a right to speak from our own experience; and we can safely say, that nothing would get the secret out of us,—not four horses pulling four ways,—or as many special attornies. In the first place, it would be understood, we presume, all over the country, that such questions would not only be impertinences, but violations of the common expediencies and comfort of all: and if this were not the case, we suppose that a blabber on the subject would be held in the same contempt as a spy or a common informer. Men may tacitly agree to have what secret they please. It is the case already with certain family matters: the regulations of a man's household, his income, &c. And why should not this be added to the rest? If a man were to ask us what vote we had given, (unless we had previously intimated that we should proceed after our usual fashion of explicitness upon that matter as upon others), we should look upon it to be as great a piece of impertinence as if he asked us what income our wife brought us, or what was the secret of our daughter's heart. We should say that it was a secret we kept to ourselves, and our manner would shew that it would be idle to press it further. But would this warrant the questioner in concluding that we had injured our love of truth by keeping the secret? or would the Lord of the Manor have hopes that we should give into all sorts of lying? Would it injure our general frankness? Frankness implies a just freedom of any sort; and a man may be as frank in saying that he has a secret on one particular point, as in shewing that he dislikes secrecy in general. We think, for our parts, the world would be wiser and happier if it had no secrets at all; but it will not get the sooner at this state of beatitude, by waiving the power to enforce a greater degree of honesty.

The Freemasons have a secret. Are they reckoned the less good fellows for that? or have they not a greater reputation than most men for good fellowship, and the wish to advance it?

Are the Americans less patriotic than we for having enjoyed the ballot? Is their government worse? or is an inhabitant of Philadelphia less prepared to give one answer to all the world? In point of fact, are there any of those perplexities in America, between man and man, respecting the ballot, which our author fancies will take place in England?

And France, glorious France,—are there any such perplexities with her? Are the French people less lively, and good-humoured, and obliging, and sensible, and truth-telling, because they enjoy the ballot? Or did the Parisians, the other day, on account of this frightful Jack-in-the-box, omit to shew themselves in the frankest, and noblest, and most surprising light, to all the world; so that the hopes of man have been renewed, and the lovers of truth and liberty are almost content to let the world roll on as it pleases, secure that nothing can turn it back from its brighter prospect.

Virtue itself may be too nicely enquired into, if superfluous demands of it be set up. The point at present in request is, that the people should get into their hands a power which the aristocracy are anxious to keep out of it, and which, the worse and more tyrannical they are, increases the anxiety in proportion. This alone ought to show the conscientious opposers of the ballot, that virtue need fear nothing from an institution, which vice is so eager to prevent.

TO THE TATLER.

DEAR MR TATLER,—In your description of the Months in the 'Literary Pocket Book,' you have quoted a verse upon one of the four Seasons, adding,—"Thus sings the oldest English song extant, in a measure which is its own music." In endeavouring to complete the cycle in the quaint spirit of the original, I have not the vanity to suppose that your readers will not detect the new pieces which have been added to the fine old garment.

Your cordial well-wisher,

27th January 1831. ARVICOLA.

THE FOUR SEASONS.

Springé is ycomen in—
Dappled lark singe;
Snowe melteth,
Runnell pelteth,
Smelleth newe buddinge.

Summer is ycomen in—
Loude singe cuckoo;
Groweth seed,
Bloweth meade,
And springeth the weede newe

Autumn is ycomen in—
Ceres, fill horne;
Reaper swinketh,
Farmer drinketh,
Creaketh waine with corne.

Winter is ycomen in—
With stormie sad cheere;
By the paddock,
Whistle Ruddock,
Spark in the ded yeare.

Digitized by Google

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"I suppose." said a quack, while feeling the pulse of his patient, "that you think me a fool."—"Sir," replied the sick man, "I perceive you can discover a man's thoughts by his pulse."

ANTIQUITY OF BIRTH.—Francis the first having heard some speeches of Duchatel which had much pleased him, was curious to know whether he was a gentleman by birth. Duchatel answered: "I really do not know from which of the three who were in Noah's ark I am descended."

MONTAIGNE'S STYLE.—Balzac said of Montaigne:—"He is a guide who takes us out of our way, but who brings us into more agreeable countries than he promises."

—Garrick, wishing Sir Joshua Reynolds to make one of a party to dine at Hampstead, and finding some difficulty in persuading him, said, "Come say yes, and you shall chuse your dinner; and that is a privilege I would not grant to every one with such an insatiable, never-resting pallette as yours."

—Those that have loved longest love best; a sudden blaze of kindness may, by a single blast of coldness, be extinguished; but that fondness which length of time has connected with many circumstances and occasions, though it may be suppressed by disgust or resentment, with or without a cause, is hourly revived by accidental recollection. To those who have lived long together, every thing heard, and everything seen, recalls some pleasure communicated, or some benefit conferred, some petty quarrel, or some friendly endearment.—Dr Johnson.

VOLTAIRIANA.—Men of wit often endeavour to give point to their sayings by an infusion of paradox. The following instances are reported of Voltaire. On its being observed in depreciation of the merit of Virgil that he was so much indebted for his finest passages to the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer that he might be said to owe to the latter his poetical existence,—Voltaire replied—"If Homer made Virgil, it is his greatest work."—Delille's translation of Virgil's Georgics is estimated very highly for its spirit and elegance. Voltaire said of it, that it was the most original poem in the French language. This wit seems to have been but imperfectly sensible of the merits of Dante. Hence, making no allowance for the effects of time in diminishing the vividness of allusions to contemporaries and their circumstances, he said, that Dante owed half his fame to his obscurity. F. F.

THE THREE ESTATES OF AUTHORSHIP.—Godeau (a French author of the 17th century), used to say, that the Paradise of an author was when he composed his works; that his Purgatory was when he revised and retouched them; but that his Hell was when he corrected the proofs of the printer. [Godeau might have gone deeper into his subject if he had occasionally let the proofs go uncorrected, and deferred reading his works until they were in the hands of the general reader, whose sensations he might have fancied and partaken, as he encountered now and then some astounding blunder.] F. F.

MEDICINAL EFFECTS OF LAUGHTER.—Laughter has ever dissipated disease and preserved life, by a sudden effort of nature. We are told that Erasmus laughed so heartily at the satire by Reuchlin and Von Hutten, that he broke an imposthume, and recovered his health. In a singular treatise on laughter, Joubert gives two similar instances. A patient being very low, the physician, who had ordered a dose of rhubarb, countermanded the medicine, which was left on the table. A monkey in the room, jumping up, discovered the goblet, and having tasted, made a horrible grimace. Again putting his tongue to it, he perceived some sweetness of the disclosed manna, while the rhubarb had sunk to the bottom. Thus emboldened, he swallowed the whole, but found it such a nauseous potion, that after many strange and fantastic grimaces, he grinded his teeth in agony, and in a violent fury threw the goblet on the floor. The sick man burst into repeated peals of laughter, and the recovery of cheerfulness led to health.

A MAHOMETAN TRADITION.—During a holy war which was carried on in the happy time of the apostle of God, (on whom be peace!) a certain valiant champion of the enemy's army came out to offer single combat, and demanded that the glorious Ali should be opposed to him. Ali, well pleasing to God, having received the command of the Apostle, girded on his sword only, and immediately went forth alone to the place appointed for the combat. When the friend of the Most High met the infidel, he thus addressed him:—"I come on foot, having one sword; why come you out on horseback, having two swords and two bows? Let those things be so;—but I come out alone to give battle on our side, why do you bring another man, and come both together?" The infidel, at this question, looked behind him, believing that another man had followed him, when, at the same instant, the great Ali, in the twinkling of an eye, made the vile head of the reprobate fly off. The death of the said wicked person having been a source of joy to the followers of Islam, the excellent Alli, meeting the great prophet on his return, related to him the admirable stratagem by means of which he had slain that wretch. This holy tradition has been vouchsafed unto us.—From the Turkish. See Wilkinson's Wallachia, &c.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Othello.—Charles the Twelth.
COVENT GARDEN.—Much Ado About Nothing.—Married Lovers.—The Omnibus.

WE saw Mr KEAN last night in Othello, and regret to say that we saw a difference from old times, which we had not discovered in his Richard. The reason is, we suppose, that Othello is a much finer character than Richard, and demands a greater amount of thought and feeling; and Mr KEAN, whether from exhaustion, or immediate languor, or whatever other cause, may have been content to give it no greater attention. But certain it is, that it was not the Othello of old. There was more of that undulating, careless style of delivery, which we used to observe in his performance of characters that did not excite him; a speech, begun finely, would end poorly (which looks as if physical weakness was more concerned in it, than any other falling off); but what we missed more than all, was the famous passage—

"Had it pleased heav'n
To try me with affliction," &c.

which in Mr KEAN's mouth used to be the finest passage in the finest performance on the stage. We remember his standing apart, when he delivered it, alone, absorbed, as if he was left desolate, and then his voice rose with calm misery as though he had the tears in his eyes, and so he continued for several lines. Last night he neither commenced in this style, nor resumed it. It was a speech that others might have made. We thought of the exquisite delivery of old, and felt grateful, and sorry. We wish to speak on this occasion with every respect of Mr KEAN, both on account of the genius and sensibility which must have produced such performances as his, and because we understand he bears himself among his brother actors with a generosity and companionship worthy of his genius. No man after all could give us such an Othello as his is still. The delivery of another famous speech—

"O now for ever
Farewell the tranquil mind," was as beautiful as ever; perhaps had a still more touching melancholy. His repeated fare-wells, with the division of the syllables strongly marked,—

"Fare-well the tranquil mind! fare-well content!
Fare-well the plumed troop, &c."

were spoken in long, lingering tones, like the sound of a parting knell. The whole passage would have formed an admirable study for a young actor, in shewing him the beauty of sacrificing vocal painting to a pervading sentiment. It was right to give emphasis to the word Fare-well,—because the speaker is taking leave of all his felicities, and has the strongest sense of doing so: but Mr KEAN gave no vulgar importance to "the plumed troop" and the "big wars," as common-place actors do; because the melancholy overcomes all: it merges the particular images into one mass of regret.

Miss PHILLIPS's style of acting and personal manner have more of womanhood in them, than those of any other of our tragic actresses: nor do we think that any other Desdemona, on that account, would equal hers. She obtained great applause last night, when she fell on her knees, and protested that she had never been unfaithful. The point was well given: yet we preferred her gentler passages, and the natural way in which she wept her astonishment, and tried to laugh it away and to reassure herself, when she first becomes sensible of a change in her husband.

This character of Desdemona is one of the loveliest ever conceived. She has the heart of a child with all the feelings of a woman. She is generous, painstaking, patient, pleasurable, unweeting of ill. Her ruin comes of her goodness. Some gross commentators have delighted, by Iago's help, to discover that she was more sensitive than she need be, or at least not less so than the liveliest of her sex. Why should she be, if she was good and warm-hearted? She fell in love with Othello for his mind and soul first, and for all which he had gone through. True sympathy was the ground of her passion. If upon this, all the rest of her being followed, and we are to suppose that her love was a world of pleasure as well as pride to her, it only shews that she was in every respect the woman she ought to have been,—as perfect in body as in heart. Grossness is when there is no heart at all; and no just passion.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

KING RICHARD III.

[By SHAKSPEARE].

Elizabeth, Queen of Edward the Fourth, Mrs FAUCIT.
Lady Anne, Miss FAUCIT. Duchess of York, Mrs WEBSTER.
King Henry. Mr YOUNGE. Prince of Wales, Miss CHIKINI.
Duke of York, Miss POOLE. Duke of Norfolk, Mr THOMPSON.
Duke of Glo'ster, Mr KEAN.
Earl of Oxford, Mr HOWARD. Lord Stanley, Mr HAMMERTON.
Duke of Buckingham, Mr COOPER, Earl of Richmond, Mr WALLACK.
Lord Mayor, Mr ANDREWS. Sir Robert Brackenbury, Mr YARNOLD.
Sir William Catesby, Mr COOKE. Sir Richard Ratcliffe, Mr CATHIE.
Sir Walter Blunt, Mr EATON. Tressel, Mr J. VINING. Tyrrel, Mr HONNER.

Previous to the Tragedy, Second time in this Country, G. A. Schneider's Overture to "Richard the Third."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses Barnett and Baseke. Harlequin, Mr Howell,
Pantaloon, Mr T. Blanchard, Clowns, Messrs Southby and E. J. Parsloe.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, (By Command of their Majesties) The School for Scandle; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Tragedy of

FAZIO.

[By Mr MILMAN.]

Marchesa Aldabella, Miss TAYLOR, Clara, Miss PHILLIPS,
Bianca, Miss F. KEMBLE. Giraldi Fazio, Mr WARDE,
Duke of Florence, Mr EGERTON, Bartolo, Mr BLANCHARD,
Philario, Mr HENRY, Falsetto, Mr PARRY, Gonsalvo, Mr BAKER.

Previous to the Tragedy, a Grand MS. Overture, by F. Kuhlau.
Previous to the 'Married Lovers,' an Overture by J. N. Hummel.
Previous to 'Comrades and Friends,' Nicolo's Overture to "La Ruse Inutile,"

After which, a New Petite Comedy, called

MARRIED LOVERS.

[By Mr POWER.]

The Songs composed by Mr Barnett.
Duchess D'Orleans, Miss Lawrence. Marchioness de Meneville, Miss Taylor.
Lady Ascot, Mrs Chatterley. Annette, Miss Phillips.
Duc D'Orleans, Mr Abbott. Marquis de Meneville, Mr Bartley.
Sir John Ascot, Mr Warde. Colonel O'Dillon, Mr Power. Pierre, Mr Irwin.
Francis, Mr Mears.

To conclude with a New Drama, in Two Acts, to be called

COMRADES AND FRIENDS; OR, LIFE FOR LIFE.

[The Music selected and arranged by Mr G. Stansbury.]

Madame Derville, Mrs Chatterley, Madame Bertrand, Mrs Vining,
Nina, Miss Kendall, Eliza, Miss E. Kendall, Laurette, Miss Taylor.
Roland Duroc, Charles Valcour, } Sergeants of a French Regiment, { Mr Warde, Mr Abbott,
Morazzi (the Adjutant), Mr G. Bennett,
Henry (Commander of the Packet), Mr Duruset, La Mouche, Mr Turnour,
Dumont (Lieutenant of the Regiment), Mr Henry,
Adolphus (Son of Madame Derville), Miss Hunt, Joseph, Mr Fuller,
Valentine (an old Domestic) Mr Barnes, Paul, Mr Addison.
In Act II. A Dance of Peasantry.

To-morrow, Cinderella; and Married Lovers.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

In the course of the Season, the following Performers will appear for the first time
Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY, du Theâtre du Gymnase.
Madame ALBERT, du Theâtre des Nouveautés.
M. BRUNET, Artiste, du Theâtre des Variétés.

Fifth appearance of Mons. Bouffé, and First of Mademoiselle Jamin.
On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par la Première Représentation de

JEUNE ET VIEILLE.

Vaudeville nouveau on Deux Actes, de MM. SCRIBE, MELESVILLE et BAYARD.
Mlle. JAMIN remplire les Rôles de Rose, et de Madame Guichard.
Madame Beaumenil, Mme. PRFVAL. Angélique, Amie de Rose, Mlle. St. ANGE.
Emélie, Pupille de Guichard, Mademoiselle FLORVAL.
Nanette, Servante, Madame GAMARD.
Augustin, Fils de M. et Madame Guichard, Mlle. ELIZA.
M. Guichard, M. GAMARD. Brémont, M. LAPORTE.

Suivi de la Première Représentation de

ANDRE, LE CHANSONNIER, OU, LE PROSCRIT.

Drame en Deux Actes, Melé de Musique, par MM. FONTAN et C. DESNOYER.
Mademoiselle Jamin celui de Louise.
Emilie de Solange, Mlle. Florval. Thérèse, Mère d'André, Mme. Baudin.
Cyprien, Officier de Cavalerie, M. Derval.
La Salle, Représentant du Peuple, M. Cloup. Thomas, Payzan, M. Guenée.
Bernard, Père d'André et Concierge du Chateau de Soulanges, M. Préval.
Robert et Philippe, Soldats, MM. Arnaud et Granville.

On Finira par la Seconde Représentation de

QUONIAM.

Vaudeville Nouveau, en Deux Actes, de MM. JADIN et LAURENT.
Helène, Femme de Quoniam, Mlle. Florval. Ursule, sa Cousine, Mlle. St. Ange.
M. Bouffé remplira le Rôle de Quoniam, Cuisinier, (his original character).
Lambert, son Intendant, M. Préval.
Le Duc de Richelieu sous le nom de François au Premier Acte, M. Alfred.
Le Marquis, le Chevalier, Amis du Duc, MM. Paulin et Cloup.
Laroche, Valet de Chamber, M. Guenée. Un Cuisinier, M. Arnaud.
Sergent du Gué M. Granville.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

After which, a Domestic Burletta, in Two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.
Act I.—WINTER.
Alice, Mrs Yates. Bella, Mrs Fitzwilliam. Dame Barnard, Mrs Daly.
Jemmy Starling, Mr Buckstone. Miles Barnard, Mr Yates.
Walter Barnard, Mr Hemmings. Captain Grampus, Mr O. Smith.
Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. Reeve.
[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]
Act. II.—SUMMER.
The Characters as in Act I.

To conclude with the Comic Burletta of

FREAKS AND FOLLIES.

Ellen, Miss Daly. Sir William Franklin, Mr Downe. Doctor Growl, Mr Bayne.
Mr Franklin, Mr Hemmings. Tom Trippit.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

An Original Comic Burletta, in One Act, to be called

TAKEN BY SURPRISE.

The Characters by Miss FITZWALTER, Miss PINCOTT, Miss KABREY, Mr FREDERICKS, Mr COLLIER, Mr COOPER, Mr WORREL, Mr PAGET, Mr COOK, Mr BROWN, and Mr COATES.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called

THE GRENADIER.

[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]

The Overture and Two of the Songs, by Mr S. Nelson.
Fanny Bolton, Madame Vestris, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

To which will be added, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called

MIS-APPREHENSION.

[By Mr C. DANCE.]

The Characters as before.

To conclude with, a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame Vestris.

SURREY THEATRE.

An entirely new Romantic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

THE FIRE RAISER, OR THE HAUNTED MOOR.

The Characters by Miss SOMERVILLE, Miss M. C. POOLE, Miss JORDAN, Miss NICOL, Mr OSBALDISTON, Mr ALMAR, Mr WILLIAMS, Mr HONNER, Mr C. HILL, Mr GOUGH, Mr VALE, Mr EDWIN, Mr ROGERS, Mr ASBURY, Master F. CARBERY, Mr LEE, Mr HOBBS.

After which, an entirely New Broad Farcical One Act Drama, entitled

"SWING."

[By J. ALFRED and C. Z. BARNETT.]

Principal Characters by Miss Vincent, Miss Rumens, Mr Vale, Mr C. Hill, Mr Honner, Mr Williams, Mr Rogers, Mr Gough, Mr Asbury, Messrs. Young, &c.

To conclude with a Comic Melo-Dramatic Entertainment, (in Two Acts) entitled

THE FEMALE MASSARONI.

Principal Characters by Miss M. C. Poole, Miss Vincent, Miss Somerville, Mlle. Rosier. Mr C. Hill, Mr D. Pitt, Mr Gough, Mr Vale, and Mr Rogers.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,

TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

THE MERRY WIVES OF BARBICAN.

Principal Characters by Mrs HUMBY, and Mr J. RUSSELL,

After which, a New Musical Comedietta, in One Act, entitled

THREE TO ONE.

The Music, by Mr G. Cooke.
The Characters by Mrs Glover, Miss Wells, Miss Ayres, and Mr Forrester.

After which, a New Operatic Piece, entitled

GALATEA.

From GAY'S Serenata. With HANDEL'S Music, arranged by Mr C. POTTER.
Principal Characters by Miss Vernon, Mrs Garrick, Mrs Humby, Mr Bennett, Mr J. Rusuell, Mr Spencer, Mr G. Smith, Mr Muhroe, Mr G. Lejune, and Mr E. Seguin.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.
The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Maria.
In the course of the Evening, Mozart's Overture to "Figaro," and Winter's Overture to "Il Ratto di Proserpina."

To conclude with A New Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called

TACT.

[By M. BARNETT.]

The Music, by J. A. Barnett.
The Characters by Miss Stohwasser, Mrs Humby, Mr J. Russell, Mr Forrester, Mr Green, Mr Smith, Mr Munroe, Mr Tilbury, Mr Taylor, and Mr J. Conquest.

COBURG THEATRE.—De L'Orme—A Day at an Inn—The Black Forest.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck—A Divertissement—The Farmer.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 147.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

A Letter to a Minister of State, respecting Taxes on Knowledge. 8vo. pp. 16. [Not for sale.]

The object of this pamphlet (for which the unknown person is thanked, who sent it us) is to show that all the evils of the country have arisen from ignorance; to recommend, in consequence, the abolition of the stamp-duty on newspapers; and to prove, that the revenue, instead of being injured by it, would be at least tripled by the mere addition to the receipts of the post-office. He omits the tax upon paper, and all that part of the question. The letter is dated the 29th of January; since which a reduction of the duty has taken place, and a very laudable reduction. But for reasons not necessary to enter upon here, ministers seem afraid of an excess of laudability. They would do everything by degrees; and most likely there are several things which they would rather not do at all, however the progress of knowledge may seem to render them inevitable. There are some points, which we doubt whether they could bear to see mooted, at least taking them as a body, and with their present head; and we cannot help thinking they would fain put limits to the circulation of literature, out of an instinct that the entire freedom of it, and the mooting of those points, would follow together. We think them wrong; because we hold that nothing can prevent the discussion of all points, and because their own interests are not what they take them for, under any circumstances. But we have little room for remarks. We differ with the author in attributing all the late burnings to ignorance. Undoubtedly they are so attributable in the very largest sense, including the short-sighted and selfish policy of the upper classes; and nothing can stop them or prevent the recurrence of worse evils, but a general permission to discuss and publish what is best to be done. But we doubt exceedingly whether every man who set fire to a barn or a rick, was in a state of as much ignorance as those who should never have suffered the outrage to come into his head. Extreme adversity sometimes visits men with an awful amount of reflection. Necessity forces upon them a kind of intuition, or at all events a perfect knowledge of their wants and claims; and the extreme nature of that conviction, thus dreadfully produced, adds to the consciousness of right all the energy of passion. That many ignorant, and many bad men, were among the rioters, we have no doubt; but that pure despair, and hunger, and a ghastly forced knowledge, with terror in its hand, was there also, we cannot doubt. We are far from wishing to press this melancholy point, for many very melancholy reasons. It is enough, that no effects of it have been wanting. We heartily agree with the writer at the same time, in thinking that a removal of the general ignorance, to whomsoever the particular imputation attaches, is the only safeguard against these and more dreadful events. We believe, that had the stamp-duty been taken off six months ago, and all England been set communicating their thoughts to one another, with the consciousness that all must hear them, there would have been no such troubles. But then, say the Aristocracy, changes would have come. Yes, inevitably, and without convulsion. These changes will come, at all events: they have been coming, in spite of the efforts of the Tories; they are now partly upon us, and they will come on and on, with only this difference,—that if all can discuss them, and have food and knowledge enough to discuss them in good humour, they will come quietly;—if not, they will come with a vengeance. This is what the men whose eyes are "swollen with fatness" and with pride, cannot see. This is what our author, like an honest and sensible man, does see; and he is anxious, for the sake of all, to prevent the catastrophe.

'When a change commenced, and knowledge began to be spread abroad, Government, as well as the great men of the earth, should have anticipated the consequences of leaving the husbandry labourers in ignorance, and should have taken care that they were instructed. Had Mr Brougham's bill passed into a law, and had the press been unshackled, the country people would by this time have been in a very different state to that in which they now are, and we should have witnessed none of the evils we now daily witness. But even at that time, Government and the Great were themselves too ignorant to foresee consequences. It is not too much to say, that they were miserably ignorant, and so blinded by their pride, and the foolish desire to perpetuate their importance in the old way, that they could not themselves be taught; the very attempt to teach them was spurned at; and they who by any means endeavoured either to draw their attention to the necessity of a change, or to point out the consequences of their conduct, were treated with contempt; whilst they who busied themselves in teaching the people, were looked at with evil eyes, and talked of as persons whose purpose was mischief, and all sorts of means were resorted to, to counteract their proceedings. It is well known that the establishment of Lancasterian schools were opposed by the rich, and especially by the clergy; and that wherever it was found impossible wholly to suppress them, means the most disgraceful were used to prevent their increase; and these, it is lamentable to say, were but too often successful. The most effectual was the hypocritical pretence of a willingness to teach the people by the establishment of national schools. In many places, where a Lancasterian school was set up, a subscription for a national school was opened; and in places where the subscription was unequal to support two, and was yet divided between two, the Lancasterian school was generally ruined, and no school remained. In other places, no sooner was a subscription opened for a Lancasterian school, than another was commenced for a national school, and the consequence was, that money sufficient to establish a Lancasterian school was not collected, and no school of any sort was established. Lancasterian schools were, however, established in some large towns, and in these places to prevent the Dissenters wholly taking the teaching of the people into their own hands, national schools were established, and by means of the two, aided by the Sunday schools, and of the desire for information they excited, knowledge was imparted to a great number of persons; and the consequence, the inevitable consequence, the excellent and inestimable result was, that numbers, as they grew up, became examples to others, and gave the most perfect evidence of the good consequences resulting from even the small share of school learning they had received. Look at the difference between the manufacturing and husbandry population, mark the conduct of the two classes, and you will be convinced that the difference is as great as it can possibly be, between two classes of persons so nearly alike, as far as respects the means they have of earning a living in any country, at the same period. Look at the difference between the manufacturers now and the manufacturers only twenty-five years ago, and you will find it scarcely less than that between the manufacturers and the husbandry labourers now. Had there been an unshackled press, had the great men and the Clergy done their duty towards the common people, had they aided the projectors of Lancasterian schools, instead of obstructing them, the husbandry labourers would at the least have been as well informed as the manufacturers are, and the manufacturers would have been much better informed than they are. The husbandry labourers would not have entertained the general and deep-rooted hatred they now entertain for all around them, and none of the mischief now so rife would have taken place.

'The most marked and perfect evidence of the good consequences of even the small portion of knowledge imputed to the manufacturing population is now before us. More than a month ago, the owners of fifty-two cotton spinning-mills attempted to reduce the wages of their work-people; and on the people refusing to take lower wages, they shut up their mills, and thus deprived 60,000 men, women, and children of the wages on which they lived. This was done at the coldest season of the year; done to at a time when fires were blazing on the farms in many counties; and yet, notwithstanding the extraordinary state of excitement, which many circumstances had tended to produce all over the country, no act of outrage was committed, no attempt was made or has since been made, to destroy either the machinery or any other property of any man. Twenty-five years ago, had such circumstances occurred, not a mill would have been left standing. This proceeding of the masters against the work-people was extremely to be regretted, for it was done at a time of such feverish excitement, that nothing short of immediate outrage could have been expected; and that mischief was anticipated from this strike of the masters is well known; but mark, I pray you, the conduct of these poor oppressed persons—what did they do? They met in the open air, and were addressed by some of themselves, who advised them to observe a strict conformity to the law, they deprecated any destruction of property, and requested them to be particularly careful that their demeanour should be peaceable. And what has been the result? this—that excepting a trifling disturbance by some unruly boys, the peace has not been broken, no outrage has been committed, no machines have been destroyed, no property has been injured. What is it which has prevented the most extensive mischief? what but knowledge?—What but the very thing, so terribly, not to say, so horridly, alarming to the great, the rich, and the clergy? what but the deprecated, the ill-boded, acquisition of knowledge by the working people? nothing else: and no man who deserves to be attended to for a moment, can doubt, that similar causes, if brought into action on the husbandry labourers, would produce similar effects. The rich and great must either assist to teach the people or they must fight them, and the ultimate consequences of fighting them need not be stated.

Digitized by Google

'The stamp duties, and other restrictive laws, have confined the actually cheap publications to two descriptions of persons, namely, religious tract societies, and those who set the laws at defiance.

'The first description of persons have distributed millions of tracts, from which no good has resulted, and from which no good can result. Their tracts are nearly all of them dogmatical, containing much more in the style of command, than persuasion; even the foolish stories they tell are in such bad taste, that the mean cant is seen through; and so little indeed do the distributors of tracts understand the people, that both the matter and the manner of their publications are better calculated to do mischief than service. All their distributions have not prevented the burnings; and it is questionable whether they may not in some degree have tended to produce them. Cant and command will produce no good effects on the poorer sort of people; they want facts, useful facts, plainly set forth with clear and short expositions; but these, whilst the law remains as it is, they cannot have.

'They who would willingly assist to teach the people, will not break the laws; nor in any way subject themselves to the consequences of breaking the laws; and thus it has become impossible for them to teach the people.

'I have mentioned the twopenny-halfpenny tract which the Commissioners of stamps extinguished. I will now advert to another, to shew the evil consequences of the power they possess. A respectable person published a tract weekly, called "The Harlequin." It related solely to the theatres, and was sold for twopence. Nothing could be so harmless as this tract; but it gave the purchasers information and intelligence, matters forbidden by the act; and the Commissioners of Stamps put their interdict upon it, as the Number I inclose to you will show. The Commissioners have a power to deny to the King a dispensing power; they may permit or even authorise publications, or they may extinguish them: no one, except Parliament, can call them to account for anything of this kind; and even Parliament has not the power to control them without passing a new act for the purpose.

'The second description of persons, they who violate the laws, are, with some few exceptions, unprincipled and uninformed; most of their publications inculcate the grossest errors, and can do nothing but mischief; and some are intended solely for this purpose. The misfortune is, that multitudes of persons see no other publications; they know that they are published in defiance of the law; they cherish them because they think the law intends to withhold useful information from them. They confide in the evil notions they propagate; and as they never see anything which contradicts the assertions, or explains the erroneous statements contained in these papers, they necessarily receive them as sacred truths. This is a lamentable state of things; yet all the evils I have noticed would be at once mitigated, and at no very distant period be removed, if the stamp-duty be taken off newspapers.

'I have, I think, exposed evils enough, and pointed out consequences of sufficient importance, to claim your serious consideration. I could add largely to the facts, and could show you the immense advantages of instruction in many places; and more especially in the metropolis, as exhibited to every man's observation who is old enough to remember the state and condition of the housekeepers, the journeymen tradesmen, the labourers, and the servants, some thirty or forty years ago. To such persons, the greatly increased decency of conduct, the sobriety, the cleanliness, the reasonableness and civility of all these descriptions of persons, is remarkable; and I claim full evidence when I assure you, that the improvement in the working people of London has been so great within my own memory, as scarcely to be credited by those who are personally unacquainted with it, or any but the best evidence.

'Do then, I beseech you, urge on your colleagues to propose the total abolition of the stamp-duty on Newspapers; and pray do not neglect this the most of all important and pressing of duties, until the standing crops shall have been fired, and the dreadful consequences of the certain convulsion it will produce are upon us.

'I will now show you how the matter may be arranged, so as to increase the revenue. In the act which repeals the stamp-duty, or in a separate act, let it be enacted, that printed papers, not exceeding four or six ounces, shall be permitted to be sent by the general post.

'Take a sheet of printing demy paper, of ordinary quality, as the rule, and charge a postage of one halfpenny on it to any part of the United Kingdom. A demy sheet folds into eight leaves, or sixteen pages, and weighs less than an ounce. There would soon be an immense number of newspapers, or demy sheets, at the price of three halfpence; these would be sent by the post, and distributed all over the kingdom for twopence; others would be sold for twopence, and the present large-sized newspapers, I mean the daily would be sold for twopence-halfpenny. The Morning Chronicle is about the size of two demy sheets, and would, with postage, cost threepence-halfpenny, just half of the present price. The number of persons who would take a paper, which cost them only twopence, would be immense; it is the price a great many now pay for reading by the hour; it is less than the price many pay when two or three subscribe to take in a daily or a weekly paper, and nearly as much as four who thus subscribe for a paper. The number sent by the post would be all but enormous; I mean, not only from London, but from one part of the country to another, in every direction, and would, I doubt not, produce more money, as postage, than is received from the present stamp-duty. In cases in which the sheet was larger than a demy sheet, a rate of postage might be settled, by exhibiting the newspaper to the proper person at the post-office, and the postage be settled, once for all, according to the number of square inches the sheet contained. But newspapers would not alone be sent by post; pamphlets, essays, addresses, and other matters, on single sheets, or half sheets, and even on quarter-sheets, in great quantities, would be forwarded through the post-offices. Five sheets of printing-demy do not weigh more than four ounces, and an ordinary pamphlet can generally be printed on five or on a smaller number of sheets, and might be sent by the post. At present, from want of conveyance, and the expense of advertising, the sale of pamphlets, and more especially of small pamphlets, is limited to a very narrow circle, and seldom does more than pay expenses; the sale being thus limited, the printed matter is spread over a great many pages, to enable the publisher to charge a price which will cover expenses; but a man who prints a pamphlet and wishes it to be read, if it could be forwarded by the post at a cheap rate, the sale in many places would be more than quadrupled; pamphlets would be printed on thin paper, the matter would be contained in much less space, and they would be sold at the most distant places for less than half, and in many cases for one-third of their present price. Paper-making, printing, and every sort of employment relating thereto, would be greatly increased; and this, just now, would itself be of some importance.

'Newspapers, pamphlets, tracts, almanacks, essays of all sorts, poems, plays, prospectuses, and indeed almost every description of literature, would be sent by the post. I need not enumerate all the various productions; you, like every other person familiar with literary matters, to whom I have mentioned the subject, will at once be able to conceive the importance of this arrangement.

'I beg you to observe, that every piece of printed paper, not exceeding the size of a demy-sheet, would pay one halfpenny postage; and that newspapers as large as the Morning Chronicle would pay a penny, and that six small and three large papers would be equal to the present net amount of the stamp on a newspaper; and I think I do not exaggerate, when I estimate the number of sheets which would be sent by the post from all parts of the United Kingdom at fifty times the number of stamps issued for newspapers. Let us, however, take it at only eighteen times, and allowing nothing for large sheets paying double postage, and the revenue will be tripled. Loss of revenue is impossible; gain of revenue is certain; and it would, I think, be difficult to find reasons for not adopting so momentously important an arrangement. Still I know well enough that it will be opposed,—first by those who have power, and are so blinded by its possession as not to see the evil consequences of ignorance, not even by the light of the ricks and barns, and would not have been convinced by the light of the blazing crops, even though it should spread over the whole horizon. To these I have nothing to say. Second, by those persons who absurdly fear the increase of knowledge. To these I say, look at the consequences of ignorance, look at the advantages of knowledge, slightly as they have been noticed; make an effort to see through your fears, and your reason will soon lead you to the right conclusion. But to Ministers, to men intrusted with the government of such a nation as this is, a nation excelling in everything of moment all that is boasted of antiquity, all that at present exists, a nation progressing beyond all that has ever been predicated of it, a nation restrained in its course only by the too long continued barbarity of its laws; to Ministers I say, your duty is obvious, your course is clear as to this matter;—to Ministers I say, the two classes of objectors, however great and powerful some amongst them may be, you ought not for a single instant to be influenced by anything they can say, nor be deterred for a moment by anything they may do.'

— Another version of the same story:—Convinced that patience moderates every grief, the friend of a young widow, who the day before had lost her husband, conceived he could not better comfort her than by advising her to take patience. The widow having already within her own mind made choice of a second caro sposo, whose name was Patience, vivaciously asked, "What! has he mentioned it to you?"

— A certain Deacon belonging to a church in Rhode Island having the mifortune to lose his wife, attempted immediately after his spouse's exit to strike up a match with his maid, whose name was Patience. The priest of the village coming in soon after, to console the bereaved husband, told him he must have patience to support him in his trouble. "Ah," said the Deacon, "I have been trying her, but she seems to be rather off.—American Paper.

Digitized by Google

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

— Aristotle being reproached for giving alms to a bad man, answered, "I did not give it to the man; I gave it to humanity."

— Themistocles had a daughter. Two men making love to her, he preferred the virtuous man before the rich one, saying, he would would rather have a man without riches, than riches without a man.

— "If I had any voice in the government," said a French wag, "I would exterminate all the engineers and architects; for without them, there would be no forfaits," (crimes). As spoken, the word may also be understood forts faits, forts built.—French Homonymes.

— A Frenchman was dining with a friend, when a calf's liver and a goose were served up. "My faith," said he, "they shall not accuse me of having ni foi, ni loi" (neither law nor conscience)—playing upon the words ni foie ni l'oie, neither liver nor goose.—French Homonymes.

Every government which is not instituted wholly and solely for the interests of the governed, is a TYRANNY. C.

The learned Casaubon was a moderate Calvinist. One of his sons having embraced the Catholic religion, was about to become a member of a religious order (the Capuchins): before taking the vows, he went, by desire of the Superior, to ask the blessing of his father. Casaubon gave it to him heartily, and said to him, "My son, I do not condemn thee; do not thou condemn me: We shall both appear at the tribunal of our Lord."

SWIFT TRAVELLING.—The mode of travelling in the two principalities (Wallachia and Moldavia) is so expeditious, that, in this respect, it is not equalled in any other country. Their post establishments are well organised; there are post-houses in all directions, and they are abundantly provided with horses. Every idea of comfort must, however, be set aside by those who are willing to conform themselves to the common mode of travelling post. A kind of a vehicle is given, which is not unlike a very small crate for earthenware, fastened to four small wheels, by the means of wooden pegs, and altogether not higher than a common wheelbarrow. It is filled with straw, and the traveller sits in the middle of it, keeping the upper part of his body in an erect posture, and finding great difficulty to cram his legs within. Four horses are attached to it by cords, which form the whole harness; and, driven by one postillion on horseback, they set off at full speed, and neither stop, nor slacken their pace, until they reach the next post-house. Within the distance of half a mile from it, the postilion gives warning of his approach by a great and repeated cracking of his whip, so that by the time of arrival, another cart is got ready to receive the traveller.—Wilkinson's Account of Wallachia and Moldavia.

RUSSIAN MILITARY TACTICS.—In a war between the Turks and the Russians, during the reign of the Sultan Mustapha, the Turks had drawn together two hundred thousand unknown and undisciplined troops; the camp was in a state of great disorder, and by means of spies who were continually passing to and fro, the Russians were informed of all the secrets of their enemies. Thus they were frequently enabled to defeat their purposes, and effected more by wiles and stratagems than by strength of arms. Upon one occasion three poor men belonging to the assembly of Janissaries, having concerted together, went out to gain some information of the Russians, and, in the darkness of night, seized, on the Muscovite borders, an infidel employed in getting forage. Satisfied with their success, they were conducting him to the camp, when their prisoner said to them, "Sirs! if you set me at liberty, my father, who is a rich man, will reward you largely." They accordingly led him back to the Russian confines, where he soon found a man whom he called his father, and to whom they delivered him. This man professing great gratitude to the three men for bringing him back his son unharmed, gave them five ducats, and promised to show them a sight, which should be to them an additional recompense. So saying, he carried them in disguise into the Russian camp, and placed them at the entrance of a large tent, about which there was a great bustle, while several persons within were weighing gold and silver coin in a large balance, and then filling with it some casks placed near them. Several men in Mussulman dresses were in the tent, and the casks of money were distributed among them. The Russian then led the three men to his own tent, saying, "Part of the money you have seen is to go to your government, part to the Vizier, and other generals of your army. We have purchased your country; the sum just given is the price of Constantinople, which we have bought, and shall soon enter. I tell you this, that you may provide for your own safety. Lose no time, but return to your own country, that you may not be made prisoners; but keep the secret;—say not a word of this in your camp." The comrades returned to the Ottoman camp, and being not very wise, gave implicit credit to the falsehood contrived to deceive them. The secret was soon told to their acquaintances, by whom it was again repeated;—consternation was spread through the whole camp, and great numbers of the troops dispersed. The Russians not only availed themselves of their diminished numbers, but ceased not to indulge their mirth at the expence of their enemies, saying that, in order to disperse a Turkish army, they had only to weigh a little gold in the presence of three of their men, and let them go and inform their comrades of it.—Abridged from the Appendix to Wilkinson's Account of Wallachia and Moldavia.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Richard III.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Fazio.—Married Lovers.—Comrades and Friends.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.

MADAME VESTRIS throws such an air of gaiety and good-humour about her little theatre, and renders it so pleasant to turn our steps thither of an evening, that we almost as much dislike to find fault with anything there, as with an attempt to amuse us at a friend's house. The new piece, however, which was produced last night, called Taken by Surprise, is really so very trifling and dull, that we must caution her against it, lest she admit any more such. It is pure children's make-believe, and not worth criticism.—There is a disguised Count performing the part of a robber, in order to get back a paper; and soldiers sent for to seize him; and then his own soldiers come and release him; and then some real, right-earnest wicked robbers come into the house and seize the ladies; and there is a fight, and the robbers are conquered; and the pretended robber, the Count, is pardoned; and there is a cowardly innkeeper, who pretends to be very bold, and gets laughed at;—and so they all live very happy after. It is really just as if a parcel of boys had got the stage to themselves one evening, and said, "Now we'll have a game at sojers and robbers; and you shall be an Italian Count, and my name shall be "Ferocio;" and you and Blenkinsop shall be ladies; and then we'll make as if we seized you, and you shall pretend to be frightened; and Easy Sam here be the audience."

It is judicious in Madame VESTRIS to put these new pieces first. She knows that the audience come chiefly to see herself, and that they will be very indulgent to whatever precedes her. It is as if they came to see a pleasant hostess, and did not much care if a dull old lady was sent to entertain them in the drawing-room till she made her appearance. But she ought to have same regard for our willingness to be pleased, and not send us the dullest little child of the deaf butler.

There was a pleasant touch or so in the cowardly innkeeper, who gets into horrible frights, and throws himself upon "the protection of the ladies." But it could not leaven the whole lump.

Our publisher tells us, that we made a mistake in thinking that Mrs WAYLETT sang in the Oratorio the other night. It is said that she did not appear at all, though her name was in the bill. We remarked, in our criticism, the different style of singing from Mrs WAYLETT'S general manner, in the lady we took for her; and noticed also the non-performance of the air assigned her in the second part. We furthermore stated, that we could not see the faces of the singers at the distance at which we sat. Who then was the lady that sung the Hymn of Eve, assigned to Mrs WAYLETT in the first part? for sung it was, at least if it is the composition containing the lines,

"Should man, the great master of all,
The only insensible prove," &c.

The mistake is of no consequence; though we understand, that a simpleton who writes in a shabby paper, would fain make something of it; and intimates, that we had been criticising an entertainment we never saw. He flatters himself! Here is our truth; and there is his falsehood. Where is the likeness? ☞

SIGNOR VELLUTI.—The following anecdote shows how far musical enthusiasm extends in Italy: Signor Velluti, at a party given by an official personage at Florence, executed an air in so exquisite a manner, that the lady of the house arose from her seat, and rushing across the room, kissed the stranger's hand, in token of the delight she experienced.

SCOTCH LATIN.—Every nation pronounces the Latin according to the pronunciation of its own language: which gave occasion to Scaliger to say good-humouredly to a Scotch gentleman who addressed him in a Latin speech,—"You will pardon me, Sir, if I do not make yon a reply, for I do not understand Scotch."

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

A favorite Opera Buffa, in Two Acts, entitled

IL BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA.

[By ROSSINI.]

The Principal Characters by Madame SIGL VESPERMANN.

Madame CASTELLI. Signor LABLACHE. Signor CURIONI.
Signor DEVILLE. Signor DE ANGELI. and Signor DE BEGNIS.

After which, the Favorite Ballet, in Two Acts, of

LA SOMNAMBULE.

The Principal Characters by Madame Montessu, Mademoiselle Kaniel,
Mlle. Clara, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. De Vis, and Mme. Copere,
Mesdames J. Mersie, Coupotte, Beseke, Vedy, Griffiths, Pitt, Laura, Lydia, &c.
M. Paul, M. Emile, M. Simon, M. Edouard, M. George, M. D'Albert, and M. LEFEBVRE.

With an efficient and numerous Corps de Ballet.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

BY COMMAND OF THEIR

MAJESTIES.

The Comedy of

THE SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL.

[By Mr SHERIDAN.]

Lady Teazle, Miss CHESTER. Lady Sneerwell, Mrs FAUCIT.
Mrs Candour, Mrs ORGER. Maria, Miss FAUCIT. Maid, Mrs WEBSTER.
Sir Peter Teazle, Mr FARREN. Sir Oliver Surface, Mr DOWTON.
Joseph Surface, Mr MACREADY. Charles Surface, Mr WALLACK.
Sir Benjamin Backbite, Mr HARLEY. Crabtree, Mr W. BENNETT.
Careless, Mr YARNOLD. Rowley, Mr YOUNGE.
Moses, Mr WEBSTER. Trip, Mr BALLS. Snake, Mr THOMPSON
Sir Harry, (with a Song) Mr SINCLAIR.
John, Mr HONNER. William, Mr C. JONES.
First Gentleman, Mr EAST. Second Gentleman, Mr S. JONES.

In the course of the Evening, C. M. Von Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz."

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.

Columbines, Misses Barnett and Baseke. Harlequin, Mr Howell,

Pantaloon, Mr T. Blanchard, Clowns, Messrs Southby and E. J. Parsloe.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To-morrow, No Performance.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Opera of

CINDERELLA.

The Music, by Rossini.

Cinderella, Miss INVERARITY. Clorinda, Miss CAWSE.
Thisbe, Miss HUGHES. Fairy Queen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Felix, Mr HUNT. Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. PENSON.
Alidoro, Mr G. STANSBURY. Dandini, Mr MORLEY.
Pedro, Mr KEELEY.

Previous to 'Married Lovers,' an Overture by J. N. Hummel.

To conclude with a New Petite Comedy, called

MARRIED LOVERS.

[By Mr POWER.]

The Songs composed by Mr Barnett.

Duchess D'Orleans, Miss Lawrence. Marchioness de Meneville, Miss Taylor.
Lady Ascot, Mrs Chatterley. Annette, Miss Phillips.
Duc D'Orleans, Mr Abbott. Marquis de Meneville, Mr Bartley.
Sir John Ascot, Mr Warde. Colonel O'Dillon, Mr Power. Pierre, Mr Irwin.
Francis, Mr Mears.

To-morrow, The Sacred Oratorio of the Messiah.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

After which, a Domestic Burletta, in Two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.

Act I.—WINTER.

Alice, Mrs Yates. Bella, Mrs Fitzwilliam. Dame Barnard, Mrs Daly.
Jemmy Starling, Mr Buckstone. Miles Barnard, Mr Yates.
Walter Barnard, Mr Hemmings. Captain Grampus, Mr O. Smith.
Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. Reeve.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—SUMMER.

The Characters as in Act I.

To conclude with the Comic Burletta of

FREAKS AND FOLLIES.

Ellen, Miss Daly. Sir William Franklin, Mr Downe. Doctor Growl, Mr Bayne.
Mr Franklin, Mr Hemmings. Tom Trippit.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

An Original Comic Burletta, in One Act, to be called

TAKEN BY SURPRISE.

The Characters by Miss FITZWALTER, Miss PINCOTT, Miss KABREY, Mr FREDERICKS, Mr COLLIER, Mr COOPER, Mr WORREL, Mr PAGET, Mr COOK, Mr BROWN, and Mr COATES.

After which, an entirely New Burletta, to be called

THE GRENADIER.

[By H. BAYLY, Esq.]

The Overture and Two of the Songs, by Mr S. Nelson.

Fanny Bolton, Madame Vestris, in which she will sing, "O, they march'd through the Town," a Savoyard Song, and "Listen Dear Fanny."
Delia, Miss Pincott. Capt. Doughty, Mr Fredericks. Will Wilks, Mr Raymond.

To which will be added, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called

MIS-APPREHENSION.

[By Mr C. DANCE.]

The Characters as before.

To conclude with, a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]

Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.

Pandora, Madame Vestris.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Opera of

ROB ROY.

The Principal Characters by Miss SOMERVILLE, Miss M. C. POOLE, Mrs VALE, Miss RUMENS, Miss NICOL, Mr OSBALDISTON, Mr GOUGH, Mr D. PITT, Mr EDWIN, Mr WILLIAMS, Mr YOUNG, &c.

After which, the laughable Drama, entitled

LAW AND LIONS.

The Characters by Mrs Vale, Miss Vincent, Mr Williams, Mr C. Hill, Mr Honner, Mr Almar, Mr Gough, Mr Lee, Mr Rogers, and Mr Vale.

To conclude with the Melo-Drama of

FOREST OF BONDY! OR, THE DOG OF MONTARGIS.

The Characters by Madame Simon, Miss Vincent, Mr Almar, Mr Gough, Mr D. Pitt, Mr C. Hill, Mr Asbury, Mr Vale, and Mlle. Rosier.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,

TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

A Farcical Entertainment, entitled

THE MERRY WIVES OF BARBICAN.

The Music, by Mr Harroway.

Principal Characters by Mrs HUMBY, Miss WELLS, Miss GARRICK, Miss STOHWASSER, Miss AYRES, Mrs GARRICK, and Mr J. RUSSELL.

After which, a New Musical Comedietta, in One Act, entitled

THREE TO ONE.

The Music, by Mr G. Cooke.

The Characters by Mrs Glover, Miss Wells, Miss Ayres, and Mr Forrester.

After which, a New Operatic Piece, entitled

GALATEA.

From GAY'S Serenata. With HANDEL'S Music, arranged by Mr C. POTTER.

Principal Characters by Miss Vernon, Mrs Garrick, Mrs Humby, Mr Bennett, Mr J. Ruussell, Mr Spencer, Mr G. Smith, Mr Munroe, Mr G. Lejune, and Mr E. Seguin.

And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.

The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, Maria.

In the course of the Evening, Mozart's Overture to "Figaro," and Winter's Overture to "Il Ratto di Proserpina."

To conclude with A New Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called

TACT.

[By M. BARNETT.]

The Music, by J. A. Barnett.

The Characters by Miss Stohwasser, Mrs Humby, Mr J. Russell, Mr Forrester, Mr Green, Mr Smith, Mr Munroe, Mr Tilbury, Mr Taylor, and Mr J. Conquest.

COBURG THEATRE.—De L'Orme—A Day at an Inn,—The Black Forest.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck—A Divertissement—The Farmer.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL.—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº. 148.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Anecdotes of the French Revolution of 1830. By William Carpenter 12mo. pp. 282. Strange.

We again recommend this full and comprehensive little work to the notice of the public, for the purpose of saying a few words suggested by the glorious event which it records.

It is forbidden us by the Stamp Office to relate news. We must not say that fresh events are taking place in Paris, without going with a bag of gold in our hands to Somerset House, to ask permission; nor repeat the exposure of the noble paupers by Radical, in the Times newspaper, without contributing our quota to the riches of those paupers. The Duke of Wellington's mother, having a miserably poor son who can do nothing for her, must have two and sixpence of us, if we offer to mention that the Russians have entered Poland; and we cannot state that Bologna and other places in Italy have risen against the old authorities, or even praise a measure of Lord Althorpe's or Mr Brougham's, without contributing nine and twopence a-piece to Mr Croker and Mr Southey, to enable them to give themselves airs in the Quarterly. For every man, be it observed, has a right to suppose, that whatsoever he pays to the general stock of taxation, may go into the hands of certain persons. Some people's money must go there; and his particular contribution may go as well as any man's. It would be curious to make out a list on this assumption,—to bring in one's bill,—with the several items chargeable throughout the pension list: and perhaps we shall do it.

But if we may not tell what is now happening, we may guess what is to come. The future is a non-entity: it has no existence: it is nothing: and to relate nothing can be no violation of the law. It is possible that we may be even permitted to allude a little to the past. Our paper in general is so entirely literary and theatrical, or so occupied with matters which have long since been done with, that it may be pardoned us, if pressed, or rather squeezed on all sides by the great crowd of human interests, and by all that concerns the welfare of ourselves and others, we utter a cry now and then of grief or joy.

Above all, we are great hopers, and hope cannot help talking of the future. We look upon hope as a part of action. It is certainy no mean contributor to the event. We have done all we could ever since we have been writers, to make people hope. We used to express hopes of Reform, when the greatest part of the world thought its condition hopeless; and by this means we helped to keep up the little struggling torch in its favour, which is now blazing over England, and warming our hearts like another sun. We had hopes of Greece from the very first, and those hopes have been realized. We had hopes that a time would come before long, when men would be able to indulge the most liberal speculations on all points, without obloquy and persecution, provided they did it in a liberal manner; and we have even lived to see that day,—an event, we confess, which we had not equally looked for. Nay, we did hope, that the very events which have lately taken place in France, or at least the spirit and effect of them, would take place in the course of some hundred years or so; though we certainly had no suspicion that so great and glorious a triumph of humanity could have been brought about sooner; nor perhaps could it have been so, but for the cunning stupidity of the legitimate.

Having these hopes then, we may be allowed, as matter of sanguine expectation, to make a few guesses at what we think likely to occur, without having them charged upon us as a presumption: and we must begin by saying, that we expect France before long to become a Republic. We do not mean a republican monarchy, with a Citizen King, but a Republic such as that of the United States, with no King at all, and with a cheap, rational, and sufficing government. We confess, we are now sorry that this did not take place at once; and we should be more so, if it had not enabled the Parisians, after their noble victory, to prove even an excess of their good feelings, and of their willingness to think the best. But perhaps there was something of insincerity in the sincerest congratulations of the Republicans towards their new King,—something of a misgiving, and of a consciousness that they were acting upon ordinary grounds of expediency; and expediencies are apt to turn out the most inexpedient of all things. We confess we had a misgiving ourselves. There were several things about the new King, that tended to make us doubt whether he, or kingship at all, was good for France under this real opportunity of regeneration. We were dissatisfied at the accounts of his parsimony. We could not but feel disappointed with his face and aspect in his portraits: yet these rumours and these portraits might have done him injustice. His retaining, however, the fleur-de-lis in his coat of arms, was a strong evidence with us of old Royalism and Bourbonism; and we felt surprised and grieved that it was permitted. We soon began to perceive, from the nature of the Chamber of Deputies, that they were not in accordance with the events of July. The people, we think, had a right to be displeased with the mode in which the lives of Polignac and the others were saved, and the smuggling through of their trial. We are entire enemies of capital punishment, which we look upon as unjust to the individual, who is what society have made him; and worse than useless to society, whom it deprives of his services, interests in his misfortunes, and does not deter by his example. We therefore, would not have had a hair of Polignac's head touched. We can understand how a nation not so far advanced as our illustrious neighbours in knowledge and goodness, may put a king or a bad minister to death, and find excuses for it with the reflecting. But France can see farther than the necessity: there is no reason to believe that the populace of Paris, could not see as far in this matter as any one, especially under the influence and pride of a conduct, of which the superior classes in society, (as they call themselves), had certainly not set the example: and we verily believe, that had a republican government taken place, and Lafayette had presented the captive ministers to the people, at once delivering them up to their justice, and implying that he expected them to act as nobly in this instance as the rest, the Parisians would have spared their lives on the spot. The Chambers have continued leaning more and more to the side of old power. Lafayette has thought it fit to have no concern with them; and the Belgium question became mixed up with the "House of Orleans," and the family and personal feelings of the King of the French, with all which the French nation have nothing to do. Thus individuals and families were again made of importance, when balanced with the interests of a country; and thus is one of the most monstrous spectacles which is presented by the arrogation of the few in contradistinction to the rights of the many. No house and no family ought to have been of a moment's importance to France after the events of July: and we believe that a conviction on this point alone will speedily be found to be sufficient for changing the new form of government. We believe that Lafayette will then again come into power; or if the world should be unfortunate enough to lose him, (which is perhaps not very likely, notwithstanding Louis Philip's kind hint on that subject; for Lafayette has a temperate and a cheerful aspect, and may possibly outlive even his Majesty), then some younger spirits will most likely come into play, together with one or two better known friends of the illustrious patriot. This is our guess the first. We suspect, in short, that Louis Philip is contented to be too much on sufferance with his fellow kings; that the maintenance of his dynasty is of equal importance to him with his care for France; that this is not so much his fault as that of royalty, and that the French will not much longer render themselves liable to the chances of such a confusion of ideas.

As guess the second, we venture to think that the Poles will succeed, and that they will set up a monarchy as nearly resembling the present one of the French as possible. The Russians are greatly superior in numerical force; but it has been ascertained of late years, that numerical force meets a formidable antagonist in moral, which not seldom outweighs it. Moral force is against the Russians in this question: desperation is against them: the seat of war is against them: the season is against them: right is against them: opinion is against them. The Russian soldiery may think little of right and opinion; but the officers, the generals, the emperor, will not be able to help thinking of them, and this will serve to perplex their operations, just as a man is perplexed in common life, who is sensible that he is going to commit an action, unjust in itself, and looked upon as outrageous by others. Such a man may go down the street in a furious passion; he may resolve to wreak his vengeance on the offending, because injured party, and the party may be physically weak in comparison. But he will excite enmity as he goes; he will perceive it: he will discern symptoms of opposition preparing against him in other quarters: finally, he is a man though a tyrant, and is not insensible to what is thought of him, even by reason of his very pride: and all this shall put doubt in his heart, and weakness in his arm. It is not as it was, when the infamous partition of Poland took place, and when a few patriots and philosophers, here and there, raised up their voices against it, themselves half bribed into acquiescence by the flatteries of the able woman who reigned in Russia, and the pretended brother philosopher who ruled at Potsdam. Knowledge was not diffused as it is now: the people had not grown up into legislators: the press was not everywhere, putting forth its myriads of magic leaves, like the tongues in trees that we read of in romance. Public opinion, in short, did not exist in its present solid state, nor did its expression reach and influence all quarters of the community. Russia can only attack the Poles now, because it is semi-barbarous; but then it is only semi-barbarous; half its brute force is taken out of it; and kings themselves are jealous of the remainder. We have little doubt that there will soon be a native prince in Poland, reigning by the common consent of kings and nations; of nations, because it is just; and of kings, because they think it will be the best thing they can do for themselves.

Digitized by Google

For the same reason, we have a strong suspicion that the old sovereigns will make as great efforts to place Donna Maria on the throne of Portugal, as they have hitherto made secret ones to keep her out of it. It was very well to try and uphold Don Miguel, as long as pure despotism had any chance, and while they had no fears for legitimacy in other quarters: but, if the latter is endangered, even the brother despot will be sacrificed without mercy. Nay, a cunning merit will be made of putting him down, as an usurper and violator of legitimacy; and the golden opportunity seized of translating the popular wish into a call for the rightful sovereign.

In Spain, we should not be surprised to hear that Ferdinand had had his head cut off, as an incorrigible offender who had been pardoned over and over again, and was no longer to be trusted; but this conjecture supposes that the question would again be put openly at issue between him and the Patriots, and that he has not in the mean time been rendering himself more popular than he used to be, in contrast with others of his family, who have been doing their best to render themselves odious. Besides, Spain lies out of the highway of Europe. One does not know exactly what is doing there, or what has lately been done. The priests are very powerful, and arguments by which we can reason respecting the rest of Europe are hardly applicable to Spain; but still it will be impossible that she can help feeling the effects of the great European movement; and in addition to the old disadvantages of Ferdinand, should the Patriots get a-head, he will have the odium of Bourbonism against him, and they the strong countenance of the anti-Bourbonites in France.

But it is in Italy that we look for the most unexpected event. The Italian patriots have long despaired of doing anything for their country, except by means of a common union, and electing a common sovereign. They see that nothing can be done against foreigners by their petty States: they hate the yoke of the Austrian Emperor, who hates them in return, and keeps as many of them as he can locked up in his prisons. They despise the Court of Naples, are indifferent to the Pope, are angry with the King of Sardinia, and hate the Duke of Modena, whom they have expelled from his capital. On the other hand, they like the French, who, however short they stopped of giving them enough liberty, elevated the people upon the whole; left marks wherever they went of an attention to their comforts (as in giving them public walks, for instance, adorned with trees,) and made such a pleasant impression upon them individually, with their cheerfulness and good-humour, that it has been a common saying—"The Italians like the French better, though they come as enemies, than the English when they come as friends." Furthermore, be it recollected, that Napoleon was an Italian: and not only so, but an Italian in name, aspect, and nature; and that some of the most stirring Patriots at the present moment were officers in his Italian regiments. We do not believe that these men care more for Napoleon than for liberty: we believe the reverse: but the association of ideas just mentioned is something, nevertheless; and were it nothing at all, and offered no facilities for a future settlement of the country, in reference to France as well as Italy, we believe that the period is approaching, when the Emperor of Austria, as a last hope, and for the sake of smoothing his defeat, and of detaining seeming possession of Italy through the medium of his daughter, when his own hold upon it shall be utterly beaten away, will bring forward his daughter's Son, as a harmonizer of the question, and be glad, instead of seeing a republic and losing all power of counteraction to France, to proclaim Napoleon the Second, King of Italy.

The reader will take these guesses for no more than they are worth, nor do we desire that he should. It is not easy to predict anything, even when circumstances appear to set in for it: but what we look upon certain is,—

1. That the people will soon gain the ascendancy in all the most civilized countries.

2. That the monarchs will be happy to compromise matters, in a very different spirit from that which appears to actuate them now.

3. That the aristocracy will not retain what they think they shall.

4. That the goods and comforts of the world will be more reasonably shared by all classes; and knowledge, and the means of improvement, wonderfully increase from day to day.

[To-morrow, a notice of the Poems of Messrs Alfred and Charles Tennyson.]

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

An Unexpected Question.—When Casaubon first entered the Sorbonne it had not then been rebuilt. Some one observed: here is a hall where disputations have been carried on for four hundred years. Casaubon enquired,—What has been decided?

Strong Impressions.—There are no ideas strike more forcibly upon our imaginations than those which are raised from reflections upon the exits of great and excellent men.—Steele.

Wisdom will not be too Wise.—If we consider the frequent reliefs we receive from laughter, and how often it breaks the gloom which is apt to depress the mind, one would take care not to grow too wise for so great a pleasure of life.—Addison.

— The use of your humble servant came first into England on the marriage of Queen Mary, daughter of Henry IV of France, which is derived from votres tres humble serviteur. The usual salutation before that time was—"God help you," "God be with you," and amongst the vulgar, "How dost do," with a thump on the shoulder.

— Lady Townshend was very affected. She had a great deal of wit, which was seldom delicate, and had turned Jacobite on some disregard from the Duke of Cumberland. One day, that she was very severe on the Royal Family, Margaret Cecil, Lady Brown, said to her, "Lady Townshend, it was very well while you were only affected; but now you are disaffected, it is intolerable." A famous bon-mot of Lady Townshend on the Royal Family was occasioned by seeing them often at Ranelagh: she said, "This is the cheapest family to see, and the dearest to keep, that ever was."—Horace Walpole.

Plain Dealing.—Marriages, it is said, are made in heaven; but Spence, in his Anecdotes, tells us of one made in a bookseller's shop, at Bath, or Tunbridge, where Wycherley, the dramatic writer, happened to be when Lady Drogheda, came in and enquired for "The Plain Dealer." A friend of Wycherley's (the author of that play) who stood by him, pushed him towards the Dowager, and said, "There's the Plain Dealer, madam, if you want him!" Wycherley made his excuses; but Lady Drogheda said, that she loved Plain Dealing best. He afterwards visited and shortly married the Countess.

The Graces.—Three pretty women travelling post, were advised to name the driver Benedicite, because Benedicite (prayer before meals) precedes les Grâces, which may be understood as thanks after meat, or as the Graces. The French are fond of this mode of playing upon words, and it is said that M. Godeau owed the bishopric of Grasse to a pun of the Cardinal de Richelieu. M. Godeau had presented him with a paraphrase in verse of the Benedicite of Daniel, which the Cardinal admired. Sometime after, he said to M. Godeau, "Sir, you have given me Benedicite, and I give you grâces." The word grâces might signify grace after meat, thanks for the verses, or—as spoken,—Grasse, of which he then gave him the bishopric.—French Homonymes.

Digitized by Google

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

FIRST CONCERT, MONDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1831.

ACT I.

Sinfonia Eroica	Beethoven.
Duetto, Madame Stockhausen and Mr Phillips (Der Berggeist) "Calma, O bella"	Spohr.
Military Septetto, Piano Forte, Violin, Violoncello, Contra Basso, Flute, Clarinet, and Trumpet, Mrs Anderson, Messrs Mori, Lindley, Dragonetti, Nicholson, Willman, and Harper	Hummel.
Scena, Mr Phillips, "Ah dove mai" (Euryanthe)	C. M. von Weber.
Overture, Euryanthe	C. M. von Weber.

ACT II.

Sinfonia, Letter V.	Haydn.
Scena, Madame Stockhausen, "Mi sospinge" (Zemira e Azor)	Spohr.
Double Quartetto, four Violins, two Violas, Violoncello, and Contra Basso, Messrs Mori, Spagnoletti, Moralt, Lindley, Watts, A. Griesbach, Lyon, and Dragonetti (Op. 65)	Spohr.
Terzetto, Madame Stockhausen, Signor Curioni, and Mr Phillips, "Tremate"	Beethoven.
Overture, Il Don Giovanni	Mozart.

Leader, Mr F. Cramer.—Conductor, Mr Cramer.

The first of this Society's series of concerts for the present season took place on Monday evening. The scheme of the performance will show how well worthy was the selection to display the energies of the finest orchestra in the world; and indeed, as a sweeping observation, we may say that we do not remember to have heard in the course of one evening a finer, or more equalized assortment of first-rate compositions. The "Sinfonia Eroica" is in some respects the grandest of Beethoven's writings of this class: many admirers however (and those too, who from their devotion to his genius, as well as from their own science and nicely balanced judgment, are entitled to speak) are of opinion that not only are the first and last movements too extended, (masterly as they are in construction), but, that they may be said to be even wire-drawn. This opinion we conceive is not wholly unfounded, presumptuous as would be deemed the hand that could approach that noble plant with the pruning knife. The listener, however, who could hear the Marcia funebre of that symphony with unmoved feeling, may reasonably question his love of music. In the course of this movement, Beethoven has in the most vivid style pictured the subject which gave occasion to the title of his composition. First, we hear the funeral procession with its grave and epic tones of lofty sorrow; and when the train is supposed to have entered the cathedral, this is succeeded by a grand and finely wrought fugue, in the true church character; and this again subsides into the original funeral strain, which gradually fades into shadowy indistinctness, as the last hushing ceremony proceeds, which draws a barrier between the dead and the living. After the custom of military funerals, this solemnity being concluded, it is broken in upon by a lively movement (or Scherzo), which, but for its being perfectly in keeping, would impress the hearer with the idea of being flippant and common-place. This is not so, however; for the subject is treated, and dispersed about among the stringed and the wind instruments, with admirable ingenuity and effect.

In the duet from Spohr's opera, Der Berggeist, Mr Phillips was at times a little flat; and indeed in the three several pieces in which he was engaged this evening, he did not sing with his accustomed truth of intonation. The solo from Euryanthe is not a favourite with us. It is a strenuous toiling after effect, without any adequate result being produced; besides being deficient in definite subject or melody worth listening to.

Madame Stockhausen has greatly improved both in style and execution. She sings not only like a tasteful musician, but with sufficient neatness and facility for whatever may be required of her; while the quality of her voice is both pure and sweet, and she is rarely, we might almost say never, to be caught tripping in her intonation. She amply merited all the applause that was bestowed upon her, for the polished and delightful manner in which she sang the scena from the Zemira è Azor; and the composition itself, both in the melodies and the scoring, is worthy of any master.

The terzetto by Beethoven was injured by the injudicious shouting of Signor Curioni; who has neither the power nor the tone of Donzelli, yet endeavours to rival him. He never can succeed; and as regards his efforts in the former accomplishment, the fable of the frog and the ox may remind, and at the same time rescue him from a fatal catastrophe.

The two rich treats of the evening, as well from their novelty as their beauty, were the military septett by Hummel; and the double quartett by Spohr. In alluding to the performance of the former, it may appear unjust to individualize, where in the aggregate we can award nothing but praise; yet the tones and exquisitely chaste playing of Mr Willman have so clung to us, that the remaining silent would burthen us like a troublesome secret. The last of the movements in this septett is the most musician-like; in it, unless we are deceived, three subjects are working together; the one, a kind of corale, the other a playful, dance-like melody, and the third an elaborate fugue; and these are combined with masterly effect.

The Larghetto in the double quartett (in the key of B flat, if we recollect) is indeed a perfect combination of melody, enriched by the most refined harmonies. No one of the movements, superior as they all are, made the impression upon us that this did. The specimens of Spohr's talent we heard on Monday evening, added to those parts of his Faust and Jessonda with which we have been long intimate, warrant us in estimating him, as a various and profound musician, second only to Mozart. He would have been perfectly satisfied with the style in which his quartett was played upon the present occasion. Signor Dragonetti, who, if there be anything worth picking out in the bass, is sure to make the most of it, quite delighted us; and so indeed did Mori, Spagnoletti, and Lindley. They all played to a mute and admiring audience, knowing the gratification they were distributing, and evidently feeling the merit of what they were executing, or they could scarcely have done so well.

In justice, the Overture to the Don Giovanni should have taken the place of that to Euryanthe, and not have been the piece to play the audience out: as it was, however, we could not but feel pleased in perceiving how small a portion quitted their seats, and how justly the remainder appreciated that noble composition.

If the selection of this first evening be an earnest of what the Directors intend in future to present their subscribers, we beg individually to offer them our perfect satisfaction and thanks. C.

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

Drury Lane.—School for Scandal.—And the Pantomime.
Covent Garden.—Cinderella.—And the Married Lovers.

Queen's Theatre.

In going to see the Merry Wives of Barbican, which was produced here last night, we thought we should find a refucimento of some old English comedy, Barbican having been once a great place of resort, even for gallants from the west end; not to mention that the Nobility had houses in the neighbourhood, up to the time of James II; and that there were clubs of wits in it, and theatres great and small, one of them a nursery for young actors,—

"Where infant queans their tender voices try,
And little Maximins the gods defy."

Lord Shaftsbury, who boasted that the London apprentices would rise for him at the lifting of his little finger, had a house in Barbican, the old pilastered front of which is to be seen yet.* Those rooms have had Algernon Sydney in them, and Locke. Milton lived at one time in Jewin street; and Ben Jonson had a theatre in the neighbourhood. But we must not be led away by these pleasing recollections.

If the new piece is from an old play, we are sorry to say it has nothing of the old style and wit. But it is short, and not altogether destitute of agreeableness. The chief faults of it are, that the dialogue is no more than it can well help, thin and thread-bare; and that the plot, after raising the expectation, ends in a few practical jokes, of that kind which seems to call upon us to laugh out of pity. So we do laugh, and become good-natured, because good-nature is claimed of us; but the impression left is not pleasant, and the piece will hardly stand any ground.

The story is quickly told. Mr John Ogle, the Handsome Turner (Mr J. Russell), is a gallant personage of that profession, residing in an alley in Barbican, and making love to all his fair neighbours. Miss Darning, the Fair Stocking-mender (Mrs Humby), is one of them; but not being a married woman, does not think it right even to pretend to like him, though he has made an impression on her heart. Some of the married ladies conspire to quench his gallantries, and at the same time forward the chaste flame of the spinster. Accordingly, one of them, the butcher's wife, says her husband is absent, and invites him to dinner, to a cutlet; another, on the same ground, invites him to tea, and a third to supper, all on the same day. Quale portentum neque militaris. Something prodigious seems as if it must ensue: but the simple catastrophe is, that he does not get in at any of the doors, and that one lady drops a mutton-bone upon him, another some flour, and a third a flood of soap-suds. The wives then all come forth with sticks: he takes refuge in the shop of Miss Darning, and then they lecture him, and upon his promise of being a good man and taking the spinster to wife, he is pardoned.—Mr Russell is a lively and useful actor, but he is not one of an order good enough to enrich a poor piece with humour not its own. He and Mrs Humby sang two or three songs, the words of which were indifferent, and the music more agreeable than new.

The King went to Drury Lane last night, to see the School for Scandal; but as we have spoken more than once of that piece, and also of his Majesty's appearance on these occasions, we can only express our pleasure at seeing the royal regard for these entertainments, and hope he may enjoy them long.

* Part of it is now some Dispensary. It is on the east side of the way, and is easily distinguished.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

Sacred Oratorio,

THE MESSIAH.

[By G. F. HANDEL.]

With additional Accompaniments, by Mozart.

Conductor, Mr H. R. BISHOP.

PART I.—Overture.

Recitative, Mr BRAHAM, 'Comfort ye my people.' Air, 'Every Valley.' Chorus, 'And the Glory of the Lord.'

Recitative, Mr PHILLIPS, 'Thus saith the Lord.' Air, 'But who may abide.' Chorus, 'And he shall purify.'

Recit. Miss RUSSELL, 'Behold! a virgin.' Air and Chorus, 'Oh! thou that tellest.'

Recitative, Mr PHILLIPS, 'For, behold! darkness.' Air, 'The people that walked in darkness.' Grand Chorus, 'For unto us a Child is born.'

Pastoral Symphony.

Recitative, Miss PATON, 'There were shepherds.' Chorus, 'Glory to God.'

Air, Miss PATON, 'Rejoice greatly.'

Recitative, Miss BRUCE, 'Then shall the eyes.' Air, 'He shall feed his flock.'

Air, Miss HUGHES, 'Come unto him.' Chorus, 'His yoke is easy.'

PART II.

Chorus, 'Behold the Lamb of God.'

Air, Miss RUSSELL, 'He was despised.' Chorus, 'Surely he hath borne our griefs.'

Recit. Mr BRAHAM, 'All they that see him.' Chorus, 'He trusted in God.'

Recitative, Mr BRAHAM, 'Thy rebuke.' Air, 'Behold and see.'

Recitative, Miss PATON, 'He was cut off.' Air, 'But thou didst not leave.'

Semi-Chorus, (the principal Singers), 'Lift up your heads.'

Recitative, Mr HORN, 'Unto which of the angels.' Chorus, 'Let all the angels.'

Air, Miss BYFELD, 'How beautiful are the feet.'

Quartett, Miss BYFELD, Messrs ROBINSON, HORN, and BEDFORD, and Chorus, 'Their sound.'

Air, Mr PHILLIPS, 'Why do the nations.'

Chorus, 'Let us break their bonds asunder.'

Recitative, Mr BRAHAM, 'He that dwelleth in heaven.' Air, 'Thou shalt break them.'

Grand Chorus, 'Hallelujah.'

At the End of the First Part, A New MS. Fantasia on the Flute, by Mr NICHOLSON.

PART III.

Air, Miss PATON, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth.'

Quartett, (the principal Singers) "Since by man came death."

Recitative, Mr PHILLIPS, 'Behold! I tell you a mystery.'

Trumpet Obligato, Mr HARPER.

Recitative, Miss RUSSELL, "Then shall be brought to pass."

Duet, Miss RUSSELL and Mr HORN, 'O Death.' Chorus, 'But thanks be to God.'

Air, Miss BRUCE, 'If God be for us.'

Grand Chorus, 'Worthy is the Lamb.'

THEATRE ROYAL ADELPHI.

A Grand Miscellaneous PANTADISACORIA.

Comprising various features of Novelty, in Four Parts;—the First and Second Parts will consist of a Musical, Comical, Recitatory, Anecdotic, Descriptive, Imitative Entertainment, yclept

WILLIAMS'S MORSELS OF MIRTH! FOR MOMENTS OF MERRIMENT.

PART I, consists of the following Songs, &c.

'Heads and Tails.' 'Ancient Establishments and Modern Improvements.' 'Love at Limehouse.' 'Royal Visit to the City.'

PART II, consists of the following Songs, &c.

'The Rose and the Lily, or, Love in a Flower Bed.' 'The Nervous Family.'

PART III.

GRECIAN STATUES! OR, LIVING MODELS OF ANTIQUES.

I. Hercules struggling with the Nemean Lion, in the six well-known attitudes.—II. Achilles throwing the Discus or Quoit.—III. Cincinnatus, the Roman, fastening his Sandals.—IV. The Slave Emouleur (the Grinder) sharpening his Knife while overhearing the Conspirators.—V. The Fighting Gladiator in three beautiful Positions.—VI. The African alarmed at the Thunder.—VII. Ajax defying the Lightning.—VIII. Romulus, from David's Picture of the Sabines.—IX. Remus's Defence, from the same.—X. Hercules and Lichas. Hercules clothing himself in the fatal Vest which Dejanira has sent by the youthful Lichas. He seizes the unfortunate Boy by the sole of the Foot and hurls him into the Sea.—XI.—Horatius shielding his prostrate Brother from the uplifted Weapons of the opposing Curatii, the eldest of whom is afterwards pourtrayed in the act of aiming a deadly thrust at his adversary. To conclude with the famous positions of THE DYING GLADIATOR.

PART IV.

OPTICAL ILLUSIONS,

By Mr H. CHILDE, Inventor of the DISSOLVING VIEWS.

PERFORMANCES FOR TO-MORROW EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Comedy of

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.

[By W. SHAKSPEARE.]

Hero, Miss TAYLOR. Beatrice, Miss FANNY KEMBLE.
Ursula, Mrs DALY. Margaret, Mrs BROWN.
Benedick, Mr C. KEMBLE. Leonato, Mr WARDE.
Don Pedro, Mr G. BENNETT. Don John, Mr DIDDEAR.
Antonio, Mr BARTLEY. Count Claudio, Mr ABBOTT.
Dogberry, Mr BLANCHARD. Friar, Mr EVANS. Verges, Mr KEELEY.
Borachio, Mr BAKER. Conrad, Mr HOLL. Balthazar, Mr HENRY.
Sexton, Mr BARNES. Seacoal, Mr MEARS.
Oatcake, Mr TURNOUR. Lorenzo, Mr IRWIN.

In Act II. A MASQUERADE. And Stevens's Glee of "Sigh no more, Ladies."

Previous to the Comedy, Mozart's Overture to "Der Schauspieldirector."

To conclude with a New Operatic Drama, called

THE ROMANCE OF A DAY.

The Music, by H. R. Bishop.

Sophia Walstein, Miss FORDE. Liese, Miss E. TREE. Therese, Miss P. Horton.
Widow Klaffen, Mrs GIBBS. Karoline Klaffen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Adolph, Count of Engleberg, Mr HUNT. General Kienwitz, Mr BARTLEY.
Colonel Francœur, Mr ABBOT. Nikel Unterhand, Mr G. PENSON.
Moritz, Mr BLANCHARD. Fritz Klaffen, Mr KEELEY.
Paul Richter, Miss TAYLOR. Hubert, Mr Irwin.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Drama, (in Two Acts) called,

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr PLANCHE.]

Maria Grazie, Mrs W. BARRYMORE, Ottavia, Miss FAUCIT.
Prince Bianchi, Mr Younge, Nicolo, Mr Webster, Fabio, Mr Hughes,
Albert and Theodore, Mr H. WALLACK and Mr J. VINING,
Alessandro Massaroni, Mr WALLACK,
Rubaldo, Mr Bedford,
Spoletto, Mr Bland, Uberto, Mr Robinson, Carlotti. Mr Yarnold.

In the Course of the Evening, Rossini's Overture to 'Semiramide,' and Mozart's Overture to 'Die Entfurung aus dem Serail.'

After which, a Musical Piece, (in Two Acts) called

THE ILLUSTRIOUS STRANGER.

[By Mr KENNEY.]

Irza, Miss FAUCIT, Fatima, Mrs WAYLETT,
Aboulifar, Mr Thompson, Aman, Mr Bland. Alibajou, Mr Webster,
Bowbell, Mr LISTON, Gimbo, Mr HARLEY.

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.

Columbines, Misses Barnett and Baseke. Harlequin, Mr Howell,

Pantaloon, Mr T. Blanchard, Clowns, Messrs Southby and E. J. Paraloe.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs Daly.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

After which, a Domestic Burletta, in Two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.

Act I.—WINTER.

Alice, Mrs Yates. Bella, Mrs Fitzwilliam. Dame Barnard, Mrs Daly.
Jemmy Starling, Mr Buckstone. Miles Barnard, Mr Yates.
Walter Barnard, Mr Hemmings. Captain Grampus, Mr O. Smith.
Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. Reeve.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—SUMMER.

The Characters as in Act I.

And other ENTERTAINMENTS.

SURREY THEATRE.

An entirely new Romantic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

THE FIRE RAISER, OR THE HAUNTED MOOR.

The Characters by Miss SOMERVILLE, Miss M. C. POOLE, Miss JORDAN, Miss NICOL, Mr OSBALDISTON, Mr ALMAR, Mr WILLIAMS, Mr HONNER, Mr C. HILL, Mr GOUGH, Mr VALE, Mr EDWIN, Mr ROGERS, Mr ASBURY, Master F. CARBERY, Mr LEE, Mr HOBBS.

After which, an entirely New Broad Farcical One Act Drama, entitled

"SWING."

[By J. ALFRED and C. Z. BARNETT.]

Principal Characters by Miss Vincent, Miss Rumens, Mr Vale, Mr C. Hill, Mr Honner, Mr Williams, Mr Rogers, Mr Gough, Mr Asbury, Messrs. Young, &c.

The Spanish Hercules, Monsieur Louis VALLI, will go through his Gymnastic Exercises.

To conclude with a Comic Melo-Dramatic Entertainment, (in Two Acts) entitled

THE FEMALE MASSARONI.

Principal Characters by Miss M. C. Poole, Miss Vincent, Miss Somerville, Mlle. Rosier. Mr C. Hill, Mr D. Pitt, Mr Gough, Mr Vale, and Mr Rogers

COBURG THEATRE.—De L'Orme—A Day at an Inn,—The Black Forest.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck—A Divertissement—The Farmer.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

No. 149.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Poems, chiefly Lyrical. By Alfred Tennyson. 12mo. pp. 154. Effingham Wilson.

Sonnets and Fugitive Pieces. By Charles Tennyson, Trin. Coll. 12mo. pp. 83. Richardson.

We are late with our notice of these volumes, which were published last year; but we did not see them till the other day. They are not of a description to grow stale. We have great pleasure in stating, that we have seen no such poetical writing since the last volume of Mr Keats; and that the authors, who are both young men, we believe, at college, may take their stand at once among the first poets of the day. We mean, that Mr Wordsworth and Mr Coleridge may give them the right hand of fellowship; and that all who love genuine poetry, will read them, and quote them, and feel personally interested about them, and like to live in the world of their thoughts. How seldom is it, that the readers of the great poets,—of Chaucer, Spenser, &c.,—meet with a fresh book, into which they no sooner enter, than they feel as in a new district of their old territory, and turn the first leaf as if they closed the portal behind them, and were left alone with nature and a new friend! Here are two, both genuine, both on the borders of the great country, both in full receipt of its airs, and odours, and visions, and most human voices, and all the congenial helps of a common soil and climate; and both possessing trees of their own, that promise to be mighty, and haunted with the sound of young angelic wings. If we speak with some enthusiasm on the occasion, it is because it is difficult, in common critical prose, to do justice to the least glimpses of such truth and beauty as it is the nature of genuine poetry to disclose. Let the poet say what he will, even of a common beautiful cheek, or an affectionate eye, and he knows that there is something in its sweet mystery that leaves an inequality in his best description of it: and it is the same with lovers of poetry, when they speak of its successful cultivation. Sympathy and gratitude combine to exalt their words: the sense of pleasure seizes upon the strongest expressions.

We envy these young men the seasonableness of the time in which they make their appearance, and the circumstances under which they write: that is to say, supposing that the worldly advantages of them will not be too great for their unworldly spirit. They do not appear likely to be diverted from their pursuits, either by narrow wants or painful hostilities. It is not now as in the days of Mr Shelley and Mr Keats, though the period is so little distant. The Tennysons have come at a happier time, when they need not fight against worldly assumption, nor become martyrs to the faith in truth and beauty. That creed, by the diffusion of knowledge, but more immediately and most unexpectedly by the movement of some of its humblest champions, has elevated its golden letters in the sunshine not to the destruction of any better creed, but to the better construction and illustration of the best, and a displacing of the means by the end. Beneficence worshipped is Christianity successful.

As the Messrs Tennyson are brothers, and make their appearance at the same hour, it is natural in readers to ask, which of the young poets is the greater one. We are happy for our own sakes, (for it would not be pleasant to give any other answer), to say that we really cannot make up our minds as to which is the superior. We had our opinion when we first read the books; but it diminished more and more on becoming further acquainted with them; till at length we knew not which to prefer. Alfred Tennyson seemed to have the more exuberant fancy; but then Charles might have been better able to master his; so that his fancy would be no less, but his judgment greater. On the other hand, Alfred possessed full as much imagination as Charles, and seemed to have undergone a greater range of feeling. Yet again, Charles might have had a more limited range in this respect, because his sensations were healthier; and it is a great point to find out which of two poets, supposing them to be otherwise on a par, will ultimately excel the other; he whose feelings are over-subtle, from a greater delicacy of organization, and who possesses the experiences of sickness as well as health, or he, who with sufficient delicacy of perception to express what he pleases on all healthy occasions, may be supposed to retain a greater force or equanimity for the production of a longer work. It will be guessed, perhaps, by these observations, that we look upon Alfred Tennyson as knowing more at present than Charles; perhaps on that account feeling more; while on the other hand, Charles we might think able to turn his knowledge and sensibility (which are both very great) to more consistent and ample account. But in looking, and re-looking from one volume to the other, we find ourselves baffled in making a judgment, and only remain sensible of the rich promise visible in both. We must add, that we have no knowledge whatsoever of these gentlemen, and that their friends will probably smile at the guesses into which their volumes have thrown us. We feel ourselves bound to say in conclusion, that Mr Alfred Tennyson, while he has poems in his volume, that would seem to mark a younger man than his brother, and which the latter, had he written them, might have excluded from his own, has others which are both longer and superior to any in Charles's. And yet, notwithstanding this, we cannot read the best productions of Charles, and not think his natural capacity as great as his brother's. The whole mystery might be explained to us, if we had the least knowledge of the gentlemen. In the meantime, we can only express our thanks to both for the great pleasure they have afforded us, and proceed to lay specimens of their genius before the reader.

We shall begin with Alfred's volume first, as we believe it was first published. Some poets are entirely for the fanciful, others for the imaginative, others for the abstract and sentimental, others for the sensual: some for pure fiction; and some for real life: for poetry is the flower of any sort of experience; which is the reason why there are poets of so many distinct classes, all of them worthy of the name, though very different in rank and power. We pay a compliment to the Messrs Tennyson not less deserved and rare, when we say that they appear to us equally to feel the charms of thought and of sociality; they are sensible that they have flesh and blood creatures to deal with, as well as spiritual ones: and will not render themselves liable to the charge, either of seeming never to have quitted a solitude, or of clogging themselves with too gross a body corporate. We begin with a charming portrait, in which the sympathy with sense and sentiment is equally obvious. The reader will observe some compound epithets in it, printed in a novel manner, which is peculiar to Alfred Tennyson's volume, and struck us as one of the marks of his being liable to be run away with by a conceit. But it is not affectation. It is only a strong sense of the idea he is impressed with, and a strong wish to make others equally sensible of it: but it might have been as well for him to suppose, both for his own sake and the reader's, that others could become sensible of the beauty, without its being pressed upon them after so unusual a fashion. We are not bound to give our compound epithets an "un-in-one-breath-utterable" look, because the Greeks did; not to mention that hyphens give the words, to our eyes, a more musical aspect, such as Mr Tennyson ought to love; for his ear is very beautiful:—

LILIAN.

'Airy, fairy Lilian,
Flitting, fairy Lilian,
When I ask her if she love me,
Claps her tiny hands above me,
Laughing all she can;
She'll not tell me if she love me,
Cruel, little Lilian.
When my passion seeks
Pleasance in lovesighs,
She, looking through and through me,
Thoroughly to undo me,
Smiling, never speaks;

Digitized by Google

So innocent-arch, so cunning-simple,
From beneath her purfled wimple,
Glancing with blackbeaded eyes,
Till the lightning laughters dimple
The baby-roses in her cheeks,
Then away she flies.

Pr'ythee weep, May Lilian!
Gaiety without eclipse
Wearieth me, May Lilian:
Through my very heart it thrilleth,
When from crimsonthreaded lips
Silvertreble laughter trilleth:
Pr'ythee weep, May Lilian:
Praying all I can,
If prayers will not hush thee,
Airy Lilian,
Like a roseleaf I will crush thee,
Fairy Lilian.'

In the poem that we next proceed to extract, the author has done a very pleasing thing for the readers of Shakspeare. He has spoken upon a hint of the great poet, and introduced us to the house and the daily life of poor Mariana, who had been deserted by Angelo, and who is described as residing in a desolate manner in a "moated grange." See 'Measure for Measure,' act. 3, scene 1. If the reader would rather have had a less painful impression left upon him at the conclusion of the poem, he may recollect that the story has a happy ending in Shakspeare. We hold that nothing can be better painted, than the scenery in these verses. They have the homely truth of Crabbe, with the relief of a far higher power of sentiment:—

MARIANA.

"Mariana in the moated grange."—Measure for Measure.

'With blackest moss the flower-pots
Were thickly crusted, one and all,
The rusted nails fell from the knots
That held the peach to the garden wall.
The broken sheds looked sad and strange,
Unlifted was the clinking latch,
Weeded and worn the ancient thatch
Upon the lonely moated grange.
She only said, "My life is dreary,
He cometh not," she said;
She said "I am aweary, aweary;
I would that I were dead!"

II.

'Her tears fell with the dews at even,
Her tears fell ere the dews were dried,
She could not look on the sweet heaven,
Either at morn or eventide.
After the flitting of the bats,
When thickest dark did trance the sky,
She drew her casement curtain by,
And glanced athwart the glooming flats.
She only said "The night is dreary,
He cometh not," she said:
She said "I am aweary, aweary,
I would that I were dead!"

III.

'Upon the middle of the night,
Waking she heard the nightfowl crow:
The cock sang out an hour ere light:
From the dark fen the oxen's low
Came to her: without hope of change,
In sleep she seemed to walk forlorn,
Till cold winds woke the grey-eyed morn
About the lonely moated grange.
She only said, "The day is dreary,
He cometh not," she said;
She said, "I am aweary, aweary,
I would that I were dead!"

IV.

About a stonecast from the wall,
A sluice with blackened waters slept,
And o'er it many, round and small,
The clustered marishmosses crept.
Hard by a poplar shook alway,
All silvergreen with gnarled bark;
For leagues no other tree did dark
The level waste, the rounding grey.
She only said, "My life is dreary,
He cometh not," she said;
She said, "I am aweary, aweary,
I would that I were dead!"

V.

'And ever when the moon was low,
And the shrill winds were up and away,
In the white curtain, to and fro,
She saw the gusty shadow sway.
But when the moon was very low,
And wild winds bound within their cell,
The shadow of the poplar fell
Upon her bed, across her brow.
She only said, "The night is dreary,
He cometh not," she said;
She said, "I am aweary, aweary,
I would that I were dead!"

VI.

'All day within the dreamy house,
The doors upon their hinges creaked;
The blue fly sung i' the pane; the mouse
Behind the mouldering wainscot shrieked,
Or from the crevice peered about.
Old faces glimmered through the doors,
Old footsteps trod the upper floors,
Old voices called her from without.
She only said, "My life is dreary,
He cometh not," she said;
She said, "I am aweary, aweary,
I would that I were dead!"

VII.

'The sparrows chirrup on the roof,
The slow clock ticking, and the sound
Which to the wooing wind aloof
The poplar made, did all confound
Her sense; but most she loathed the hour,
When the thick-moated sun-beam lay
Athwart the chambers, and the day
Downsloped was westering in his bower.
Then said she, "I am very dreary,
He will not come," she said;
She wept, "I am aweary, aweary,
Oh God, that I were dead!"'

At page 11, is a piece of perplexity called the "How and the Why," which the uninitiated readers of Mr Wordsworth's "Moods" would think puerile, as they did some of those; but it is man's writing. We only hope that it is not sick writing, and that the author, in these mystifications of himself, only feels the pleasure of a healthy wonderment. If not, we shall answer his How and his Why, by telling him to get on horseback and ride for it, till he comes, by a short cut, to the palace of a sage enchantress, hight Reasonable Indifference. He had better not wait

'For years that bring the philosophic mind.'

The two poems, entitled the 'Merman' and the 'Mermaid,' rather disappointed us; but this was only because our expectations had been so raised by the preceding ones. They are full of elasticity and life. We like the gay, buoyant spirit of the beginnings of them, with their Christmas-game style:—

THE MERMAN.

'Who would be
A Merman bold,
Sitting alone,
Singing alone,
Under the sea,
With a crown of gold,
On a throne.

I would be a Merman bold;
I would sit and sing the whole of the day: &c.

THE MERMAID.

'Who would be
A Mermaid fair,
Singing alone,
Combing her hair
Under the sea
In a golden curl,
With a comb of pearl,
On a throne?

I would be a Mermaid fair;
I would sing to myself the whole of the day: &c.'

The following passage from the Merman poem is like a corner in one of the pictures of Giulio Romano, or Raphael:—

'I would be a Merman bold;
I would sit and sing the whole of the day;
I would fill the seahalls with a voice of power;
But at night I would roam abroad and play
With the Mermaids in and out of the rocks,
Dressing their hair with the white seaflower;
And holding them back by their flowing locks
I would kiss them often under the sea,
And kiss them again till they kissed me
Laughingly, laughingly;
And then we would wander away, away
To the pale green seagroves straight and high,
Chasing each other merrily.'

[As we have made but small way with this volume, and find that we shall be tempted to give more than one or two further notices of these new poets, we must alternate them with other subjects. To-morrow we shall pay attention to an interesting pamphlet just published, on Military Flogging; and next day return to our poetical luxuries.]

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

COVENT GARDEN.—Oratorio, the Messiah.

COVENT-GARDEN.

THE performance of the Messiah last night, at this theatre, though we are great admirers of HANDEL, did not please us so much as the Selection of Music at Drury-Lane; doubtless because the effect upon the whole was more sombre and unvaried, and the mind occupied with a succession of thoughts more painful than befits an evening's music. Music is a pleasurable art, even in its melancholy, and should not deal with many continuous thoughts more painful than amount to pensiveness. The more we feel it, the less we like to have it rendered the medium of repeating to us all the sorrows and agonies of the divine heart, which this Oratorio records, however invested as it may be with unearthly grandeur, exalted with trumpets, or deified with choral shouts. HANDEL is, to be sure, a prodigious musician. "He strikes you, whenever he chuses," said Mozart, "with a thunderbolt." We could like a selection of his thunderbolts very well: the very finest pieces of his Messiah brought together, and none else, we should not complain of, as a burden of solemn beauty. But even HANDEL has his comparatively common matter, not only of an old fashion, but of a heavy weight; and there is something too much of this in a whole oratorio devoted to one subject. In short, the Oratorio was upon us too much last night, in its old shape and shadow. The audience looked as melancholy in their faces as their habiliments; the singers looked melancholy as they went in and out; and the orchestra, mounted above one another on their benches, presented the old melancholy, middle-aged, solemn, and somewhat stiff-looking hierarchy in black coats, whose bows and viols cut rather a different figure from those of the Saint Cecilias in the pictures of the Correggios and Domenichinos.

When HANDEL however is at his finest, there is no desiring anything better. Music has no greater than his (to speak in the noble language of Mr WORDSWORTH): nor did sorrow ever receive a sweeter and more affecting pity. The blasts of his trumpets upon the word Wonderful ("His name shall be called Wonderful") naturally make us repeat the epithet, in delighted astonishment. They issue immediately from the preceding notes, and from a level with them, as if the trumpets blew directly at us, and we beheld their mighty mouths. (ROUBILIAC seems to have been inspired by one of these passages, when he placed the mouth of the trumpet right before us by the side of HANDEL's statue,—a fine stroke of genius, and a singular union of letter with spirit.) Then what a truly pastoral simplicity there is in the Recitative, 'There were shepherds abiding in the fields!' What a pure tenderness in 'He shall feed his flock,' with its caressing accompaniment! And what an excess of pity in 'He was despised and rejected of men!'—'Thy rebuke hath broken his heart' is of the same perfect class of the pathetic, and was admirably sung by Mr BRAHAM, who seemed resolved last night to show how pure and masterly could be his style. We must confess, that we do not think his expression could have been mended. His tones had a trembling tenderness, without hurting their manhood. Miss PATON was in greater force than on the preceding night; but did not strike us altogether as having to sing airs so well suited to her. However, we did not hear them all. Miss RUSSELL does not throw out her voice enough; but she sang 'He was despised' better than we had looked for; and here the lowness of tones was less objectionable. Miss BRUCE obtained considerable applause in 'He shall feed his flock:" and we must not forget, that we never heard Mr PHILLIPS to such advantage, in our opinion, as in 'The people that walked in darkness.' His voice seemed to be less in his throat than usual, and he gave excellent expression to the words that speak of the "great light." The singers in these oratorios would do well in general to put a little more of the dramatic spirit into their performances, as Mr PHILLIPS and Mr BRAHAM do. They turn their music-books over, for the most part, with an air of grave nothingness, and preteud to read them, in order to have something to do with their hands and eyes. It would be better to think of the meaning of what they are singing, and do their utmost to express it.

"Pomp and threatening harmony"

Between the first two acts, Mr NICHOLSON performed, with great applause, a Fantasia on the flute. This gentleman is an example of the difference between a clever and a fine player. He is a very clever player on the instrument, but he does not apprehend the spirit of music. He is all for the letter, and tosses about his alphabet marvellously, but he never gets really beyond the gamut. All his sforzandos, and crescendos, and appogiaturas, do not get at the soul of what he is about. His is not the art

"Dead things with inbreath'd sense able to pierce."

He fetches out of his flute all that mere breath and skill can do, but he puts no heart and mind in it: he excites no feeling but that of a sense of his cleverness. If Sir THOMAS URQUHART, the translator of RABELAIS, could have heard him, he would have described him as one who trills, intonates, tips, tongues, tootletoos, plunges, pifferates, peck-o'-peppers, gamutifies, whiffles, and wambles his flute, "now careering it, and now caracoling it," and all marvellously; but for the music, it is as if a man should say, "Let us shew how we can do without it."

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS.—Alcibiades came to Pericles, and staid awhile ere he was admitted. When he came in, Pericles civilly excused it, and said, "I was studying how to give my account." But Alcibiades said to him, "If you will be ruled by me, study rather how to give no account."—Bacon.

A BIT OF REAL CHRISTIANITY.—[From the Persian of Jami.]—One night the great mosque in Egypt took fire and was burnt down. The Musselmans suspecting the Christians had done it, set fire to their houses in retaliation. . . . . The sultan of Egypt seized those who had burnt the houses of the Christians, and having collected them together in one place, ordered that as many tickets should be written as there were offenders. Upon some were written that they should be put to death; upon others that they should have a hand cut off; and upon others that they should be whipped. And those lots being cast among them, each suffered according to his respective chance. A lot which inflicted death fell upon one, who said, "It is not on my own account that I am afraid to suffer death; but I have a mother, who, excepting me, has no one to support and protect her." By the side of him stood another whose ticket ordered him only a whipping, and he exchanged lots with him saying, "I have no mother;"—and he suffered death in place of the other, who received the whipping.

ITALIAN REPUBLIC OF 1797.—A general federation of the National Guards and the Authorities of the new Republic took place at the Lazaretto of Milan. On the 14th of July, 30,000 National Guards, with the Deputies from the Departments, took an oath of fraternity, and swore to use their utmost efforts to revive the liberty of Italy, and make her once more a nation. The keys of Milan and of the fortresses were delivered by the French to the Cisalpine officers. The army left the States of the Republic, and went into cantonments in the territory of Venice. From this period may be dated the first formation of the Italian army which afterwards acquired so great a share of glory. The manners of the Italians underwent a striking change. The cassock, the fashionable dress for youth, gave place to regimentals; instead of passing their time at the feet of women, the young Italians now frequented the riding and fencing schools and places of exercise: the children no longer played at chapel, but had regiments armed with tin guns, and mimicked the occurrences of war in their favourite games. In their comedies and street-farces, there had always been an Italian, who was represented as a very cowardly though witty fellow, and a kind of bullying captain, sometimes a Frenchman, but more frequently a German, a very powerful, brave, and brutal character, who never failed to conclude with caning the Italian, to the great satisfaction and applause of the spectators. But such allusions were now no longer endured by the populace, who insisted on seeing valiant Italians introduced on the stage, putting foreigners to flight, and defending themselves with resolution and boldness. A national spirit had arisen; Italy had her patriotic and warlike songs; and the women contemptuously repulsed those suitors who affected effeminate manners in order to please them.—Hazlitt's Life of Napoleon.

ERRATUM.—In the theatrical article yesterday, instead of Barbican, it should have been said that Lord Shaftesbury lived in Aldersgate street.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

A favorite Opera Seria, in Two Acts, entitled

RICCIARDO E ZORAIDE.

[By M. Rossini.]

Principal Characters by Madame SIGL VESPERMANN, Madame CASTELLI, Mademoiselle BECK, Signor CURIONI, Signor DEVILLE, Signor DE ANGELI, and Signor DAVID.

After which, a Favorite Ballet, in One Act, entitled

ŒNONE ET PARIS.

[By M. Gardel.]

The Principal Characters by Madame Montessu, Mademoiselle Kaniel, Mlle. Clara, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. De Vis, and Mlle. Brocard, Mesdames J. Mersic, Coupotte, Beseke, Vedy, Griffiths, Pitt, Laura, Lydia, &c. M. Paul, M. Emile, M. Simon, M. Edouard, M. George, M. D'Albert, and M. LEFEBVRE.

With an efficient and numerous Corps de Ballet.

At the End of the Opera, the whole of the Company will sing in "God save the King."

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Drama, (in Two Acts) called,

THE BRIGAND.

[By Mr Planche.]

Maria Grazie, Mrs W. BARRYMORE, Ottavia, Miss FAUCIT. Prince Bianchi, Mr YOUNGE, Nicolo, Mr WEBSTER, Fabio, Mr HUGHES, Albert and Theodore, Mr H. WALLACK and Mr J. VINING, Alessandro Massaroni, Mr WALLACK, Rubaldo, Mr BEDFORD, Spoletto, Mr BLAND, Uberto, Mr ROBINSON, Carlotti. Mr YARNOLD.

In the Course of the Evening, Rossini's Overture to 'Semiramide,' and Mozart's Overture to 'Die Entfurung aus dem Serail.'

After which, a Musical Piece, (in Two Acts) called

THE ILLUSTRIOUS STRANGER.

[By Mr Kenney.]

Irza, Miss Faucit, Fatima, Mrs Waylett, Aboulifar, Mr Thompson, Aman, Mr Bland. Alibajou, Mr Webster, Bowbell, Mr Liston, Gimbo, Mr Harley.

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. Barrymore.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.

Columbines, Misses Barnett and Baseke. Harlequin, Mr Howell, Pantaloon, Mr T. Blanchard, Clowns, Messrs Southby and E. J. Parsloe.

To-morrow, A Grand Musical Performance.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Comedy of

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.

[By W. Shakspeare.]

Hero, Miss TAYLOR. Beatrice, Miss FANNY KEMBLE. Ursula, Mrs DALY. Margaret, Mrs BROWN. Benedick, Mr C. KEMBLE. Leonato, Mr WARDE. Don Pedro, Mr G. BENNETT. Don John, Mr DIDDEAR. Antonio, Mr BARTLEY. Count Claudio, Mr ABBOTT. Dogberry, Mr BLANCHARD. Friar, Mr EVANS. Verges, Mr KEELEY. Borachio, Mr BAKER. Conrad, Mr HOLL. Balthazar, Mr HENRY.

In Act II. A MASQUERADE. And Stevens's Glee of "Sigh no more, Ladies."

Previous to the Comedy, Mozart's Overture to "Der Schauspieldirector."

To conclude with a New Operatic Drama, called

THE ROMANCE OF A DAY.

The Music, by H. R. Bishop.

Sophia Walstein, Miss FORDE. Liese, Miss E. TREE. Therèse, Miss P. Horton. Widow Klaffen, Mrs GIBBS. Karoline Klaffen, Miss H. CAWSE. Adolph, Count of Engleberg, Mr HUNT. General Kienwitz, Mr BARTLEY. Colonel Francœur, Mr ABBOT. Nikel Unterhand, Mr G. PENSON. Moritz, Mr BLANCHARD. Fritz Klaffen, Mr KEELEY. Paul Richter, Miss TAYLOR. Hubert, Mr Irwin.

To-morrow, No Performance.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

In the course of the Season, the following Performers will appear for the first time

Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY, du Theâtre du Gymnase.
Madame ALBERT, du Theâtre des Nouveautés.
M. BRUNET, Artiste, du Theâtre des Variétés.

Sixth appearance of Mons. BOUFFE, who will perform in Three Pieces.

Spectacle Généralement Demandé.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par

LE FUTUR DE LA GRAND'MAMAN.

Vaudeville nouveau en Un Acte, de M. Dartois.

Madame Darbel, jeune Veuve, Mlle. ELIZA.
La Comtesse Emilie, Mme. PAULIN.
Marianne, Femme de Mignot, Nourrice chez le Comte, Mlle. ST ANGE.
M. BOUFFE remplira le Rôle de Mignot, (his original character.)
M. DERVAL celui de Delmare, futur de la Grand'Maman.
Le Comte Adolphe, M. ALFRED.

Suivi de la Première Représentation de

VOLTAIRE CHEZ LES CAPUCINS.

Comédie Anecdote Mêlée de Chant, par MM. Duvert, Desvergers et Varin.

Madame Delban, jeune Veuve, Mlle. Eliza.
Jeannette, Femme de Bruno, Mademoiselle Emma.
M. Bouffé remplira le Rôle de Voltaire.
Père Pancrase, Gardien des Capucins, M. St Aubert.
Frère Loup, Pourvoyeur, M. Préval. Frère Jacques, Portier, M. Guenée.
Frère Fiacre Sonneur, M. Granville. Théodore, Novice, M. Paulin.
Bruno, Jardinier du Convent, M. Gamard.
M. Lambert, vieux Bourgeois, M. Cloup. Un Paysan, M. Arnaud.

On Finira par

JEAN.

Pièce en Quatre Parties Mêlée de Chant, par MM. Theaulon et A. Signol.

Madame de Ligny, Mlle. Florval. Madame de Sirval, Mlle. Eliza.
La Marquise d'Olban, amie de Madame de Ligny, Madame Paulin.
Madame veuve Chopin, Limonadière, Mme. Préval.
Adelaide, sa Fille, Mlle. St. Ange. Louise, Femme de Chambre, Mme. Gamard.
M. Bouffé remplira le Rôle de Rigolard, (his original character.)
M. Derval celui de Jean.
M. de Walbruck, et M. D'Offenn, Attachés à l'Ambassade, M. Paulin et M. Guenée.
Un Garçon d'estaminet, M. Arnaud. Un Valet, M. Granville.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES. Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs DALY. Astragalus, Mr YATES. John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE. Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE. Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called

KIND INTENTIONS.

Mrs Rosemore, Miss Daly. Charlotte, Miss M. Glover. Henry, Mr Hemmings. Latitat, Mr S. Smith. Timothy, Mr Wilkinson. Mr Meanwell, Mr Mathews.

To conclude with, a Domestic Burletta, in Two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

[By Mr Buckstone.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.

Act I.—Winter.

Alice, Mrs Yates. Bella, Mrs Fitzwilliam. Dame Barnard, Mrs Daly. Jemmy Starling, Mr Buckstone. Miles Barnard, Mr Yates. Walter Barnard, Mr Hemmings. Captain Grampus, Mr O. Smith. Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. Reeve.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—Summer.

The Characters as in Act I.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,

TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

A Farcical Entertainment, entitled

THE MERRY WIVES OF BARBICAN.

The Music, by Mr Harroway.

Principal Characters by Mrs HUMBY, Miss WELLS, Miss GARRICK, Miss STOHWASSER, Miss AYRES, Mrs GARRICK, and Mr J. RUSSELL.

After which, a New Musical Comedietta, in One Act, entitled

THREE TO ONE.

The Music, by Mr G. Cooke.

The Characters by Mrs Glover, Miss Wells, Miss Ayres, and Mr Forrester.

To which will be added, a Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called

EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.

The Characters by Mrs Glover, Miss Sinclair, Miss Garrick, Miss Stohwasser, Miss Wells, Miss Laws, Mr Smith, Mr Tilbury, Mr Munroe, Mr Barnett, and Mr Green.

And (in honour of Her Majesty's Birth-Day) will be presented,

A LOYAL TRIBUTE TO THE QUEEN.

Consisting of Song, Dance, and Allegory, by the whole of the Company. In which will be introduced the 'National Anthem,' newly arranged.

To conclude with a New Operatic Piece, entitled

GALATEA.

From Gay's Serenata. With Handel's Music, arranged by Mr C. Potter.

Principal Characters by Miss Vernon, Mrs Garrick, Mrs Humby, Mr Bennett, Mr J. Ruussell, Mr Spencer, Mr G. Smith, Mr Munroe, Mr G. Lejune, and Mr E. Seguin.

And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.

The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, &c.

In the course of the Evening, (First time in this Country) F. Schneider's Triumphal Overture in honour of the King of England, and Weber's Overture to 'Euryanthe.'

SURREY THEATRE.

An entirely new Romantic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

THE FIRE RAISER, OR THE HAUNTED MOOR.

The Characters by Miss SOMERVILLE, Miss M. C. POOLE, Miss JORDAN, Miss NICOL, Mr OSBALDISTON, Mr ALMAR, Mr WILLIAMS, Mr HONNER, Mr C. HILL, Mr GOUGH, Mr VALE, Mr EDWIN, Mr ROGERS, Mr ASBURY, Master F. CARBERY, Mr LEE, Mr HOBBS.

The Spanish Hercules, Monsieur Louis VALLI, will go through his Gymnastic Exercises.

After which, an entirely New Broad Farcical One Act Drama, entitled

"SWING."

[By J. Alfred and C. Z. Barnett.]

Principal Characters by Miss Vincent, Miss Rumens, Mr Vale, Mr G. Hill, Mr Honner, Mr Williams, Mr Rogers, Mr Gough, Mr Asbury, Messrs. Young, &c.

To conclude with a Comic Melo-Dramatic Entertainment, (in Two Acts) entitled

THE FEMALE MASSARONI.

Principal Characters by Miss M. C. Poole, Miss Vincent, Miss Somerville, Mlle. Rosier. Mr C. Hill, Mr D. Pitt, Mr Gough, Mr Vale, and Mr Rogers.

Coburg Theatre.—De L'Orme—A Day at an Inn,—The Black Forest.

Sadler's Wells Theatre.—The Wreck—A Divertissement—The Farmer.

Published by J. Onwhyn, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. Chappel,—Effingham Wilson, Royal Exchange; A. Hays, 165 Regent street; J. Field, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; Marsh, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at Ebers's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. Reynell, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 150.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Flogging and its Substitute. A Voice from the Ranks; or, a Letter to Sir Francis Burdett, on the Barbarous and Degrading System of Flogging Soldiers and Sailors. By John Shipp, late Lieutenant in his Majesty's 87th Foot, Author of Memoirs of an Extraordinary Military Career, and the Military Bijou. 8vo. pp. 30. Whittaker, Treacher, and Co.

THE author of this seasonable and painfully interesting pamphlet is well known to the public as a gallant soldier who has written an account of his extraordinary military career, and who, if his authorship presented an aspect somewhat "bearded like the pard," and challenging admiration, was allowed on all hands to deserve what he challenged, and to have his plain speaking attributed to a habit of truth and openness. Our publication did not appear early enough for the notice of Mr Shipp's autobiography; but we read it with great interest, and are glad of the opportunity of adding our testimony to its merits. Mr Shipp is not much of a writer: perhaps it would be better if he aspired to be less; for his images are not very new, nor his metaphors very consistent. But a little better education would have done for him in this matter, what it has done for thousands who have not a tithe of his spirit and good sense. He has acted in life for himself: he has bled, and suffered, and gained distinction, and lost it, and gained it again; all which has sharpened his natural perception and made him think; and it is hard if such a man may not tell us everything he thinks and feels, though nobody has given him a hint about figures of rhetoric.

Mr Shipp has an especial right to speak on the subject before us. Indeed there is probably no man in the kingdom who has a greater, unless it would be possible to meet with one of the sufferers from military flogging whose nature had surmounted its baneful effects, and could impress us with the same sense of his veracity. Mr Shipp has twice risen from the ranks to the degree of lieutenant, (having re-entered them for want of money): he is thoroughly acquainted with the feelings and capabilities of the privates, which he says are greatly underrated by those who have not had the same opportunities of knowing them: finally, he tells us, that for a period of eight years, beginning with the day on which he entered the service as drum-boy, it was his "disgusting duty to flog men at least three times a week." This is an office, with the execution of which it is very painful to associate the idea of the brave John Shipp; but as he commenced his military life with a high sense of the necessity of performing its duties, and says he nevertheless felt disgust and degradation in being compelled to this unworthy task, from which it was thought there was no soldierly way of escaping, to say nothing of the consequences of attempting to do so, this part of his experience has in a singular manner completed his right to speak on the subject. The pamphlet contains a variety of distressing cases, alone sufficient, we should think, to settle the question for ever; and we do believe that Mr Shipp will have had no mean hand in facilitating the settlement of it. We will begin with a description of the punishment itself,—an infernal picture, which, in a second edition of his book, we would recommend Mr Shipp to transfer from the twentieth page to the commencement:—

'When the infliction is ordered to commence, each drum-boy, in rotation, is obliged to strip, for the purpose of administering five-and-twenty lashes (slowly counted by the drum-major) with freedom and vigour. In this practice of stripping, there always appeared to me something so unnatural, inhuman, and butcher-like, that I have often felt most acutely my own degradation in being compelled to conform to it. After a poor fellow had received about a hundred lashes, the blood would flow down his back in streams, and fly about in all directions with every additional blow of the instrument of torture; so that, by the time he had received three hundred, I have found my clothes all over blood from the knees to the crown of my head, and have looked as though I had just emerged from a slaughter-house. Horrified at my disgusting appearance, immediately after parade I have ran into the barrack-room, to escape from the observation of the soldiers, and to rid my clothes and person of my comrade's blood. Here I have picked and washed off my clothes pieces of skin and flesh that had been cut from the poor sufferer's back. What the flogging in Newgate or Bridewell may be I do not know; but this is military flogging.

'I am ignorant what kind of Cats were used when this pernicious system was first introduced into the army, but they are now, I believe, very different in different regiments; and, indeed, there is sometimes a variety kept in the same corps. Those which I have seen and used were made of a thick and strong kind of whipcord: and in each lash, nine in number, and generally about two feet long, were tied three large knots, so that a poor wretch who was doomed to receive one thousand lashes, had twenty-seven thousand knots cutting into his back; and men have declared to me that the sensation experienced at each lash was as though the talons of a hawk were tearing the flesh off their bones.

'Have the advocates for the continuance of this barbarous system ever handled one of these savage instruments? Have they ever poised the Cat in their hands, when clotted with a soldier's blood after punishment has been inflicted? If not, let me inform them, that it has then almost weight enough to stun an ox, and requires the greatest exertion and dexterity in the drummer to wield it. I have heard poor fellows declare that, in this state, it falls like a mass of lead upon their backs. . . . . Often have I been agonised to see the skin torn off the poor sufferer's wrists and legs, by lugging him up to the triangles, as you would the vilest miscreant of the land, and afterwards an inexperienced drum-boy flogging him over the face and eyes. I have heard men beg for a drop of water to cool their parched mouths and burning tongues, which has been denied them.'

The cases, from which we shall now select the most striking, are taken, Mr Shipp informs us, out of at least a hundred which came under his notice:—

CASE THE FIRST.—'On my return home one evening, after having attended the funeral of a soldier belonging to my own company, I got into conversation with the Sergeant, relative to the deceased. The Sergeant, who was quite an illiterate man, said, "the people in the hospital say he died of an in*f*ormation in his side, but he knowed the real cause of his death. That ere man never did no good since the time he was flogged for being drunk 'fore guard. He knowed the man well; he was a fine high-spirited youth. Bless you, sir! before his punishment there was not a smarter or finer-looking soldier in the King's army; but, after he was flogged, he never did no more good; but became a dirty slovenly fellow, and was never sober if he had the means of getting liquor. I have heard him declare, that his heart was broken, and that, if liquor did not soon close his miserable life, he would take some more speedy means." This last desperate alternative was never necessary, for he died of drunkenness ere he had attained the age of twenty-six, adding to the long catalogue of those whose buoyant spirits could not brook the degradation of the Cat.'

CASE THE SECOND.—'When I was orderly officer of the main-guard at Cawnpore, several men were condemned to be punished. Among the rest was a youth not more than twenty years of age. The morning on which the punishment was to be inflicted, I visited the prisoners early, and such was the change observable in this poor young fellow, from reflecting during the night on his approaching degradation, that he looked like one whose constitution had, in a few hours, undergone all the diseases incident to the country. His eyes were glassy and inexpressive, his cheeks sunk, and his deportment stooping and loose. Altogether he looked the very picture of woe, and his extreme dejection was so obvious, that I could not refrain from asking him if he was unwell. "No," replied he, "but I am one of those who are to be flogged this morning," and he wept bitterly. "Come, come," said I (and it was as much as I dared to say), "keep up your spirits; your extreme youth, and the fact that this is the first time you have been brought to a court-martial, may probably obtain your pardon." He shook his head, but said nothing in reply. I regret to be obliged to add, that this poor fellow received a hundred and fifty lashes; and, from the day he was flogged until the period of his death, I can venture to assert, that he was never two hours sober. He sold all his own things to purchase liquor, and then stole those of others; and at lost he died in the hospital from drunkenness.'

CASE THE THIRD.—'The following is a melancholy instance, of the same character as the foregoing, in which it is my painful duty to attest the utter ruin of another promising young soldier, by the odious system, the existence of which I deplore. Two men were brought to court-martial. The one was an old and hardened offender, whose offence was being drunk on guard, and who was sentenced to receive three hundred lashes; the other, a youth, who, for his first offence, absenting himself from evening parade, was condemned to one hundred lashes. The former was admonished by his commanding-officer, his corporal punishment remitted, and his sentence commuted to fourteen days' solitary confinement. This proposal, however, the hardended delinquent rejected with indignation, professing that he would rather take 1,400 lashes, than suffer fourteen days' solitary confinement in the black-hole. He accordingly received his punishment, without moving a muscle, and afterwards, on leaving the square, strutted off, muttering something like, "D—d hoax," or "fudge." The conduct of this depraved fellow nettled the commanding-officer, and he ordered the youth to strip, and receive his punishment. The poor fellow threw himself on his knees, and implored forgiveness in the most earnest and pathetic manner, or that, in preference to the degradation of flogging, his punishment might be commuted to solitary confinement, if even for six months. But, no; the officer was irritated, and the unhappy youth received every lash, after which he left the square sobbing most piteously. During the infliction of the punishment, many a tear did I see that morning stealing down the cheeks of the commiserating comrades of this ill-fated youth, for they well knew that his prospects as a soldier were irretrievably blighted. From this time forth, day after day, and week after week, might this sad victim of "discipline," be seen prowling about (when not in the guard-room for subsequent misconduct, which after this event was constantly the case), with a dejected and care-worn countenance, pensive and gloomy, as though he had lost some dear relative or other; perhaps, as though he had committed an act on account of which he dared not look an honest man in the face. The disgrace he had endured had sunk deep into his heart; a leprosy pervaded his mind; and, in despair, he sought consolation from drink, which soon brought to a termination both his troubles and his life.'

Digitized by Google

Case the Fourth.—'One wintry morning, when the bleak wind whistled along the ranks of a regiment paraded to see corporal punishment inflicted, every eye was turned in pity towards the delinquent, until the commanding-officer, with Stentorian lungs, pronounced the awful words, "Strip, sir." The morning was bitterly cold; the black clouds rolled along in quick succession; and the weather altogether was such, that the mere exposure of a man's naked body was of itself a severe punishment. The crime of this man was repeated drunkenness, of which he had, undoubtedly, been guilty; but what was the cause of this constant inebriety? Let us trace the evil to its source. It was the sad recollection of his former disgrace by flogging, to which the course of intoxication that he now pursued might justly have been attributed. When the offender was tied, or rather hung up by the hands, his back, from intense cold and the effects of previous floggings, exhibited a complete blue and black appearance. On the first lash the blood spirted out some yards, and, after he had received fifty, his back, from the neck to the waist, was one continued stream of blood. The sufferer flinched not a jot, neither did he utter a single murmur, but bore the whole of his punishment with a degree of indifference bordering upon insensibility, chewing, all the while, what I was afterwards informed was a piece of lead or a bullet. When the poor fellow was taken down, he staggered and fell to the ground. His legs and arms, owing to the intense cold and the long period they had remained in one position, still continued distended, and he was obliged to be conveyed to the hospital in a dooly, a kind of palanquin in which sick soldiers are carried. This unfortunate creature shot himself in his barrack-room, in a sad state of intoxication, and was borne to his solitary pit, and hurled in like a dog. No inquiries were made as to the causes to which this rash act might have been assigned. If any such investigation had been deemed requisite, ample attestations might have been produced, from which it would have appeared that this poor wretch had scarcely ever looked up from the date of his first flogging; that his prospects as a soldier had been utterly destroyed; and that his degradation had been so acutely felt by him as to paralyze his best efforts towards amendment, and at length to sink him into a state of worthlessness and despair.'

Case the Fifth.—'In the experimental corps in which I commenced my military career, I recollect two boys being sentenced to be flogged for desertion. They were brothers, and the elder was not more than thirteen years of age. They had deserted together, and probably intended to have gone home again, not much relishing their new mode of life. The elder boy was tied up first, and, having received about six dozen lashes, he was ordered down, and it became the turn of his younger brother to occupy his place. Afflicted by the idea of what his poor little brother was about to suffer, the senior boy begged, in the most earnest manner, that he might be permitted to take his brother's punishment, protesting, most solemnly, that he was the sole cause of his desertion. When this was refused, and the younger one was ordered to strip, the shrieks of the two rent the air. They flew into each other's arms, clung together, and, when they were torn asunder, the tear of pity started to the eyes of all around. The little fellow received every lash to which he had been sentenced: and in little more than a year after there were not two greater reprobates or vagabonds in the whole corps. The elder boy soon died. Of the fate of the younger I cannot speak with certainty; but I think he was found drowned in Table Bay, at the Cape of Good Hope.'

There are several more cases in the pamphlet: but has not the reader's heart, understanding, and common humanity "had enough?" We can answer for the readers of the Tatler,—for the readers of books and plays, and all the humanities they teach; and we think we can answer for everybody who shall read this pamphlet, now that the system has so diminished in repute, and many gallant officers have declared against it, and the soldiers themselves begin to cry out upon it, in spite of subordination. But it will be defended still. There are many men, who feel such a selfish tendency to think the worst of their fellow-creatures, in order that they may warrant their oppression of them, that they will pretend to see in any advancement of right nothing but a conspiracy to do wrong; but knowledge, opinion, and the glorious Three Days will still settle all.

Some of Mr Shipp's anecdotes would go to show, that men who receive this odious punishment, sometimes become both morally and physically callous; and he says that it has been doubted whether, after receiving a hundred lashes, the pain is any further perceived. Indeed, he says he has heard soldiers declare as much, though he has known pieces afterwards cut out of their backs as big as a pea. This admission will probably be turned against him by hypocrites and half-arguers, who will triumphantly exclaim, "What then becomes of your thousand lashes, and your twenty-seven thousand cuts of the knots?" But not to mention, that by a beneficent provision of nature, it is impossible for extreme pain to be endured beyond a certain pitch, and that the flesh either becomes callous or the sufferers faint, it will depend very much on the constitutions of individuals for how long or how short a period they can endure agony. And who can tell the effects, which the continuing to beat upon the bleeding anvil of a human back may have upon the constitution? How can the juices be expected to circulate properly afterwards in that mass of weals? and who can say, that it does not contribute to that despondency of mind as well as physical deterioration, which is generally observable afterwards in the sufferers? Who cay say that it may not reasonably be supposed to add to their propensity to drinking? This propensity, be it observed, almost invariably takes place; and the sense of degradation, the most terrible effect of all, and the great point insisted upon, both by the opponents of flogging and the sufferers from it, is sure to take place, even when it appears to do otherwise: we mean, when the branded man appears reckless and gay, and even insensible to his shame: for this is nothing but despair, or at any rate implies a habit of mind which the scourge is incompetent to reclaim.

Mr Shipp talks very sensibly on this part of his subject, and proposes some good substitutes for flogging, particularly solitary confinement, and forfeiture of pay,—the money to be returned after a certain lapse of time, provided the delinquent behaves well (which we think an excellent proposition), or applied to the purchase of a substitute, in case he does not; the man to be secretly marked on his person on being dismissed, so that he could not enter the service again, though there would be nothing in his appearance to hinder his getting an honest living. Our observant and generous author very rightly proposes, that whatever the punishment might be, officers should make it their business to become more acquainted than they are with the characters of the men under their command, and apportion the degrees of punishment accordingly, taking care not to injure the nature of one person by giving him punishment fit only for another; and also not to thrust a set of men under accusation indiscriminately together, to get polluted by the contagion of different manners and the general despair. Every officer in the service, and every Member of Parliament, ought to read this pamphlet.

The fact is, that substitutes for flogging would be numerous and easy, and we have no doubt will be found so, when they are compelled to be found. Flogging, at all times, and under any circumstances of life, is apt to originate much more in the faults of the inflictors than of the sufferers. It is a temptation to the violent to save themselves time and trouble, and becomes proportioned in its severity, not to the offence punished, but to the offence punishing. Ignorance is the ground of this, as of all other mistakes. We will undertake to assert, without knowing them, that the officers who are against the system, are those most respected for their attainments and information: and if the English soldiery had been as well instructed in reading and writing as the French are, the less informed part of the officers would no more have darud to keep it up than the privates would have borne it. Shame, and the natural reason of the question, would have done it away. Flogging may speedily be done away, and we have no doubt will be so. Thanks to Mr Shipp and all truly gallant men. But what the other men will most hate to see the soldiery acquire, is knowledge, and the terrible art of reading and writing; and unless steps are taken to secure them this amelioration at the same time, all improvements will be incomplete, and the just state of things between officer and soldier insecure.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—The Brigand.—The Illustrious Stranger.—And the Pantomime.
COVENT GARDEN.—Much Ado About Nothing.—And the Romance of a Day.

ADELPHI.

A LITTLE Marplot story, amusing enough, by the help of MATHEWS's acting, was produced here last night, under the title of Kind Intentions. A lady of the name of Rosemore (Miss DALY) has been separated from her husband for some time. She has a daughter Charlotte (Miss GLOVER), who has a lover (Mr HEMMINGS); and the lovers are a little jealous. To the party thus situated, Mr Meanwell (MATHEWS), a most kind-hearted but over anxious gentleman, who "encumbers with help," suddenly comes in post haste, with the news of Mr Rosemore's death, and of his having left a large fortune to the widow. The widow shocks him with the excess of her affliction, and in running for a glass of water to the china cupboard, a smash is heard. This is blunder the first. He then runs for the doctor. The doctor, who happens to have a penchant for the young lady, is no sooner brought in (Mrs Rosemore having in the mean time left the room), than the lover flies in a passion of jealousy, and the young lady is obliged to pacify him, by saying that Mr Meanwell has misrepresented the matter, and that there is no need of medical assistance. The doctor, upon this, expresses indignation against the officious old gentleman for causing his intrusion, for which he apologizes to Miss Charlotte, telling her, as he makes his exit, that he hopes to be less unwelcome another time. At these words, the lover gets into a fresh paroxysm of impatience, and after venting his spleen both on his mistress and the old gentleman, quits the house in a fury. The young lady, vexed and irritated, says some petulant things in her turn, and poor Mr Meanwell is left to lament over blunder the second. Anxious to repair his error, he goes after the young gentleman; and, returning, to tell Charlotte that he is coming to make it up with her, informs her that he has found him in a house where it seems she did not wish him to be. Endeavouring to get out of this scrape, he tells one little "white lie" after another, which only makes matters worse; and accordingly, when the lover makes his appearance, he finds jealousy lit up on the other side, and is received with a fire of reproaches. He asks, in the name of wonder, who has calumniated him; and hears, to his astonishment, that Mr Meanwell has told a story of his being in a house with somebody's daughter. On this the poor old gentleman is fairly charged with being a mischief-maker and a bad-hearted man; which shocks him exceedingly: and matters are not mended on the young lady's hearing that he had told some "white lie" about herself to the lover. Seized with an agony of perplexity, he labours hard to restore peace, and has just succeeded in making the lovers embrace, when the mother comes in, and catches them in the unauthorized fact, for which she expresses her surprise at her visitor. The will is now discoursed about, as a great peace-maker; and after much ado, the widow is persuaded to let Mr Meanwell fetch the lawyer who drew it up. The lawer is brought; all the parties, including Timothy the old footman (Mr WILKINSON) take chairs: the old gentleman declares he never was so happy in his life,—a topic on which he expatiates at some length; and the will is read. Mrs Rosemore is declared sole legatee to a large fortune; and Mr Meanwell again launches out into his good fortune, saying how delighted he is, and how luckily he has repaired all blunders. The lawyer resumes after this interruption, to say that there is a little codicil,—a few lines. He reads. The codicil purports, that the lady is not to have a penny of the fortune, if she consents to let the will be opened within twenty-four hours after her husband's decease. Unfortunately this has been done. The old gentleman receives the execrations of the party, and thinks he shall go mad.

This is a good dramatic point. What shall he do? After tumbling and tossing about alone, on the sopha (which MATHEWS did very well, occasionally half stifling himself with one of the pillows) he sits up on the sudden, exulting in a happy thought, calls them all back, and setting the lawyer to work, makes a gift of all he possesses to the astonished widow. She refuses to receive it; he begs and prays, goes down on his knees, and hearing her say, that she would accept such an obligation from no man but a husband, proposes to marry her. She falls into tears at the memory of her beloved though mistaken husband. Mr Meanwell thinks, that as his friend is dead, it can do no harm to further the marriage proposal with another little white lie; and accordingly he is in the act of assuring her, that her husband did not care for her, and had lived with another woman, when he is indignantly clapped on the shoulder by the husband himself! The dead man, it seems, is not dead. This last blunder is speedily set to rights; and the piece is ended.

Mr WILKINSON has little to do, but what little he has, he does well, after his usual quaint fashion. He looks like a man made to hang his face sideways, and utter proverbs. Mr HEMMINGS is a useful actor at this house, not without perceptions of truth and nature, which he has hardly force enough to put into shape. It is a pity he cannot lower his shoulders a little. Miss M. GLOVER seems to improve somewhat upon her stiffness. Her countenance, though different from her mother's, is not without some of its good-natured expression; which makes us wish her well.

By the bye, the author of Kind Intentions is not aware of the real moral of his piece. He gives it as a lesson against "excess,"—all excess, he tells us, being bad, even in a virtue. There is a commonplace to this effect, which BACON has contradicted. The great philosopher tells us, that "in charity there can be no excess." However, we must not bring great philosophy in against a farce. But it may be as well to observe, that the real moral of Kind Intentions is against being in too great a hurry, and attempting to get out of difficulties by little falsehoods. These are useful morals to inculcate, especially the latter. Excess of kindness we may safely leave to do its worst.

— There are several persons who have many pleasures and entertainments in their possession that they do not enjoy. It is therefore a kind and good office to acquaint them with their own happiness.—Steele.

— No one of the sons of Adam ought to think himself exempt from labour or industry; those to whom birth or fortune may seem to make such an application unnecessary, ought to find out some calling or profession, that they may not be as a burthen upon the species.—Addison.

— Credulity is the common failing of inexperienced virtue, and he who is spontaneously suspicious, may be justly charged with radical corruption.—Johnson.

— Turgot having enquired of M. Bièvre what he thought of the author of a pamphlet entitled, "The Inconvenience of Feudal Rights," he replied, "C'est un fou, mais non pas un fou fieffé:" which might mean, "He is a fool, but not an arrant fool;" or, "He is a fool, but a fool who has no fief."—French Homonymes.

HEAD-SHAKING INSTEAD OF ARGUMENT.—Many men, especially such as affect gravity, have a manner after other men's speech, to shake their heads. Sir Lionel Cranfield would say, "It was as men shake a bottle, to see if there was any wit in their head or no."—Bacon's Apophthegms. [We suspect that no very great reasoner ever gave into this practice; and that some intelligent persons, who do, would leave it off, if they knew what it implied. It is, in fact, an assumption of argument, in default of having any, and has the ungracefulness of a personal assumption besides. It is saying to another, "All which you do say, is not worth two-pence to what I could say;" thus pretending, that a lack of argument implies the possession of it, and vice versa. A strong reasoner, it is true, may hear a person talk absurdly, and think it not worth his while to answer him; but on the same account he will abstain from the gratuitous triumph of shaking his head.]

NEW VERSION OF THE SIXTY-SEVENTH PSALM.—A young lady in the West of England named Grace Lord, had from her great accomplishments become the object of attention to numerous suitors. The young lady constantly referred them to her father, who being of a whimsical temper as well as being much attached to the society of his daughter, for a long time gave no one a favourable reception. At length, a young man, who had remarked that the father was a humourist, after experiencing a refusal, addressed him in the following words, from the version of the 67th Psalm:

"Have mercy on me, Lord,
"And grant to me thy Grace."

The expedient succeeded: he obtained the young lady with the paternal consent.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

A Grand Miscellaneous

SELECTION OF MUSIC.

From the Works of Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, C. M. Von Weber, Marschner, Lindpaintner, Rossini, Callcott, &c.

Conductor, Mr H. R. BISHOP.

PART I.

Grand Overture to 'Der Vampyr.' - H. Marschner.

Beethoven's Grand Chorus, 'Glory to God.'

The Solo parts by Miss BRUCE, Mr T. COOKE, Mr ROBINSON, and Mr PHILLIPS.

Recitative, Mr BRAHAM, 'Deeper and deeper still,' and Air, 'Waft her angels. (Jephtha). - - Handel.

Haydn's Grand Mottetto, 'The arm of the Lord.' (From the Oratorio of Judah.)

The Solo parts by Mrs BEDFORD, Miss RUSSELL, Mr T. COOKE, and Mr BEDFORD.

Air, Miss PATON, 'With verdure clad.' (Creation.) - - - - Haydn.

Eybler's Offertorium, 'O Lord be merciful.' The Solo part by Miss BYFELD.

Recit. and Air, Mr PHILLIPS, 'Angel of Life.' (Bassoon Obligato, Mr Godfrey.) Callcott.

Recit. and Air, Mrs WAYLETT, 'Angels ever Bright and Fair.' (Theodora.) Handel.

Grand Scene, Mr BRAHAM, 'The Battle of the Angels.' (Milton's Paradise Lost.) - - Bishop.

Air, Miss PEARSON, 'Wise Men Flattering.' (Judas Maccabeus.) Handel.

Air, Mr SINCLAIR, 'Lord Remember David.' - Handel.

From 'Mose in Egitto.'

Preghiera, Miss BYFELD, Mr T. COOKE, Mr ROBINSON, Mr PHILLIPS, and Chorus, 'O Thou whose Power Tremendous.' (Harp Obligato, Mr Chipp.) Rossini.

Air, Miss BRUCE, 'On mighty Joys.' - Haydn.

Grand Scene from the 'Creation.' - Haydn

Recit. Mr BRAHAM, 'In splendour bright.' Chorus, 'The Heaven's are telling.'

The Solo parts by Miss BRUCE, Mr BRAHAM, and Mr PHILLIPS.

At the End of the First Part, a Fantasia on the Piano-forte, by Mrs ANDERSON.

PART II.

Grand Overture, 'Der Vampyr.' - - P. Lindpaintner.

Recit. and Air, Miss HUGHES, 'Tune your Harps.' - - Handel.

Ballad, Miss S. PHILLIPS, 'Come, smiling Hope.' - Auber.

Scena, Mr BRAHAM, 'Through the Forest.' (Der Freischutz.) C. M. Von Weber.

Irish Air, Mrs WAYLETT, 'Kate Kearney.'

Terzetto, Mr HORN, Mr T. COOKE, and Mr PHILLIPS, 'La mia Dorabella.' Cosi fan tutte. - - - Mozart.

Air, Miss PATON, 'Let the bright Seraphim.' (Trumpet Obligato, Mr Harper.) (Samson.) - - Handel.

Grand Selection from Rossini's 'Guillaume Tell.'

Chorus, 'Fair as a Bride.'

Quartet, Miss BYFELD, Miss RUSSELL, Mr SINCLAIR, and Mr PHILLIPS, 'The stream is softly flowing.'

Quintet, Miss HUGHES, Miss RUSSELL, Mr SINCLAIR, Mr BEDFORD, and Mr PHILLIPS, and Chorus, 'From the Hills to the Valley.'

Tyrolean Duet, Miss PEARSON and Miss RUSSELL, 'At close of Day.'

Duetto, Miss PATON and Mr SINCLAIR, 'Ricciardo che Veggo.' - - Rossini.

German Bacchanalian Song, [By Desire] Mr PHILLIPS, 'Im Herbst da Muss man trinken.' (Der Vampyr) - - Marschner.

Chorus, 'Awake the Harp.' - - Haydn.

PART III.

Grand Overture, 'Guillaume Tell.' - - Rossini.

Aria, Miss PATON, 'Di Piacer.' (La Gazza Ladra.) - - Rossini.

Air, Mr BRAHAM, 'The Bay of Biscay.'

New Glee, Mr ROBINSON, Mr T. COOKE, and Mr PHILLIPS, 'Here's a Health to the King and the Queen.' - - Bishop.

Scotch Ballad, Miss PEARSON, 'John Anderson my Jo.'

Air, Mr SINCLAIR, 'My Roses bloom in Winter.' - - A. Lee.

Glee, Miss PEARSON, Miss RUSSELL, Mr ROBINSON, Mr HORN, and Mr BEDFORD, 'O by Rivers.' - - Saville and Dr Wilson.

FINALE. 'Tu è Ver.' The Solos by the principal Singers. (La Clemenza di Tito.) - - - - - Mozart.

THEATRE ROYAL ADELPHI.

A Grand Miscellaneous PANTADISACORIA.

Comprising various features of Novelty, in Four Parts;—the First and Second Parts will consist of a Musical, Comical, Recitatory, Anecdotic, Descriptive, Imitative Entertainment, yclept

WILLIAMS'S MORSELS OF MIRTH! FOR MOMENTS OF MERRIMENT.

PART I, consists of the following Songs, &c.

'Heads and Tails.' 'Ancient Establishments and Modern Improvements.' 'Love at Limehouse.' 'Royal Visit to the City.'

PART II, consists of the following Songs, &c.

'The Rose and the Lily, or, Love in a Flower Bed.' 'The Nervous Family.'

PART III.

GRECIAN STATUES! OR, LIVING MODELS OF ANTIQUES.

I. Hercules struggling with the Nemean Lion, in the six well-known attitudes.—II. Achilles throwing the Discus or Quoit.—III. Cincinnatus, the Roman, fastening his Sandals.—IV. The Slave Emouleur (the Grinder) sharpening his Knife while overhearing the Conspirators.—V. The Fighting Gladiator in three beautiful Positions.—VI. The African alarmed at the Thunder.—VII. Ajax defying the Lightning.—VIII. Romulus, from David's Picture of the Sabines.—IX. Remus's Defence, from the same.—X. Hercules and Lichas. Hercules clothing himself in the fatal Vest which Dejanira has sent by the youthful Lichas. He seizes the unfortunate Boy by the sole of the Foot and hurls him into the Sea.—XI.—Horatius shielding his prostrate Brother from the uplifted Weapons of the opposing Curatii, the eldest of whom is afterwards pourtrayed in the act of aiming a deadly thrust at his adversary. To conclude with the famous positions of THE DYING GLADIATOR.

PART IV.

OPTICAL ILLUSIONS,

By Mr H. CHILDE, Inventor of the DISSOLVING VIEWS.

PERFORMANCES FOR TO-MORROW EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Play of

WILLIAM TELL.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]

Emma, Miss HUDDART. Anneli, Miss RUSSELL. Agnes, Miss FAUCIT.
Gesler, Mr H. WALLACK. Sarnem, Mr THOMPSON.
Struth, Mr W. BENNETT. Rodolph, Mr HOWARD.
Lufold, Mr HOWELL. Braun, Mr ROSS.
William Tell, Mr MACREADY.
Albert, Miss POOLE. Melchtal, Mr YOUNGE. Erni, Mr CATHIE.
Furst, Mr FENTON. Verner, Mr COOKE. Waldman, Mr HUGHES.
Michael, Mr COOPER. Jagheli, Mr J. VINING.
Pierre, Mr EATON. Theodore, Mr HONNER.
Savoyards—Miss CRAWFORD, Mr PRICE, and Mr S. JONES.

In the course of the Evening, Rossini's Overture to "Guillaume Tell," and Weber' Overture to "Der Freischutz."

After which will be Exhibited the New and Splendid DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands.

To conclude with a New Melo-Dramatic Opera, in Two Acts, called

THE DEVIL'S BROTHER.

[Adapted to the English Stage, by A. LEE.]

Lady Pamela Goslington, Mrs Orger. Zerlina, Mrs Waylett.

The Concerted Music, by Misses Byfeld, Bruce, S. Phillips, Russell, and Mrs Bedford.

Fra Diavolo, Mr Wallack. Sir Gregory Goslington, Mr Harley.
Lorenzo, Mr Sinclair. Lucro, Mr Webster.
Banditti—Beppo, Mr Latham. Giacomo, Mr Bedford. 1st Carabineer, Mr Bland.
Postilion, Mr Honner. Francisco, Mr Eaton.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Comedy of

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.

[By W. SHAKSPEARE.]

Hero, Miss TAYLOR. Beatrice, Miss FANNY KEMBLE.
Ursula, Mrs DALY. Margaret, Mrs BROWN.
Benedick, Mr C. KEMBLE. Leonato, Mr WARDE.
Don Pedro, Mr G. BENNETT. Don John, Mr DIDDEAR.
Antonio, Mr BARTLEY. Count Claudio, Mr ABBOTT.
Dogberry, Mr BLANCHARD. Friar, Mr EVANS. Verges, Mr KEELEY.
Borachio, Mr BAKER. Conrad, Mr HOLL. Balthazar, Mr HENRY.
Sexton, Mr BARNES. Seacoal, Mr MEARS.
Oatcake, Mr TURNOUR. Lorenzo, Mr IRWIN.

In Act II. A MASQUERADE. And Stevens's Glee of "Sigh no more, Ladies."

Previous to the Comedy, Mozart's Overture to "Der Schauspieldirector."

After which a New Petite Comedy, called

MARRIED LOVERS.

[By Mr POWER.]

The Songs composed by Mr Barnett.

Duchess D'Orleans, Miss Lawrence. Marchioness de Meneville, Miss Taylor.
Lady Ascot, Mrs Chatterley. Annette, Miss Phillips.
Duc D'Orleans, Mr Abbott. Marquis de Meneville, Mr Bartley.
Sir John Ascot, Mr Warde. Colonel O'Dillon, Mr Power. Pierre, Mr Irwin.
Francis, Mr Mears.

To conclude with the Farce of

THE OMNIBUS; OR, A CONVENIENT DISTANCE.

[By Mr TAIN.]

Julia Ledger, Miss Lawrence. Mrs Dobbs, Mrs Fayleure. Miss Damper, Mrs Daly.
Miss Jemima Damper, Miss Appleton. Mr Ledger, Mr Blanchard.
Mr Dobbs, Mr Bartley. Tom Dobbs, Mr Keeley. Pat Rooney, Mr Power.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs DALY.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called

KIND INTENTIONS.

Mrs Rosemore, Miss Daly. Charlotte, Miss M. Glover. Henry, Mr Hemmings.
Latitat, Mr S. Smith. Timothy, Mr Wilkinson. Mr Meanwell, Mr Mathews.

To conclude with, a Domestic Burletta, in Two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.

Act I.—WINTER.

Alice, Mrs Yates. Bella, Mrs Fitzwilliam. Dame Barnard, Mrs Daly.
Jemmy Starling, Mr Buckstone. Miles Barnard, Mr Yates.
Walter Barnard, Mr Hemmings. Captain Grampus, Mr O. Smith.
Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. Reeve.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—SUMMER.

The Characters as in Act I.

COBURG THEATRE.—De L'Orme—A Day at an Inn—The Black Forest.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck—A Divertissement—The Farmer.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL.—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 151.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Poems, chiefly Lyrical. By Alfred Tennyson. 12mo. pp. 154. Effingham Wilson.

Stanzis and Fugitive Pieces. By Charles Tennyson, Trin. Coll. 12mo. pp. 88. Richardson.

[Continued from No. 149.]

It is the greater pleasure to us to meet with poetry that we can praise, inasmuch as our standard being high, and very few likely to come up to it, we have sometimes books sent to us, to which we can measure out no approbation worth having: the consequence of which is, that we are perplexed between the impossibility of saying anything, and the discourteous appearance of our silence towards the author; especially if (as sometimes happens to be the case) he is the person who sends us the work. We can then only hope, that his amiableness is equal to the other graceful turn of his mind, which has induced him to write verses (for all love of verse is a grace); and that we shall not have made an enemy of him, for hazarding his ill opinion in order to spare his feelings. As to "cutting up" books, except in answer to cuttings up, and where our warfare is open and avowed (and even then it is a task which reflection would willingly dispense with), we have no pleasure in it. It is a bad pleasure and an unjust profit; and ends with hurting the nature both of critic and reader. It is no crime to write an indifferent book, nor can any harm come of it, unless superfluous notoriety and vexation be given to the author. And the reputation and utility of the periodical that indulges in the practice is ultimately hurt by it. Its pages are filled with matter, the zest of which becomes obsolete; so that a reader who takes up the volume, meets with heaps of extracts that are not worth preserving, and a spirit of animadversion upon them that disgusts him with its unseasonable levity,—the echo of laughter a year old, which was not worth much at the time, and becomes revolting in thus revisiting us from a distance. One of the great objects of the literary notices of the Tatler, is to supply the reader with a succession of passages from new publications, interesting either by their subject or their execution, and likely to remain so: by which means the volumes will be rendered worth something during a lapse of years, and nobody will dip into them at random, without being pretty certain of finding extracts worth reading.

So to return to our pleasant task. The poem we next come to, of Mr Alfred Tennyson's (with whose volume we are still occupied) is a very striking one, entitled, Supposed Confessions of a Second-rate Sensitive Mind not in unity with itself. It is such as Crashaw might have written in a moment of scepticism, had he possessed vigour enough. Or Andrew Marvel might have written it, when he was midway between his early opinions and his later. We quote from it some lines on the state of infancy, in order that they may precede some others touching a lamb, a very infant personage, and one that requires a nice consideration of the difference between his face and the human aspect, to render the short work made of his life endurable:—

'Thrice happy state again to be
The trustful infant on the knee!
Who lets his waxen fingers play
About his mother's neck, and knows
Nothing beyond his mother's eyes.
They comfort him by night and day,
They light his little life alway;
He hath no thought of coming woes;
He hath no care of life or death;
Scarce outward signs of joy arise,
Because the Spirit of happiness
And perfect rest so inward is.'

The picture of the slaughtered lamb must be introduced by that of the ox, whom we seem to hear upon a noon in August.

'The ox
Feeds in the herb, and sleeps, or fills
The hornéd valleys all about,
And hollows of the fringed hills
In summerheats, with placid lows
Unfearing, till his own blood flows
About his hoof. And in the flocks
The lamb rejoiceth in the year,
And raceth freely with his fere,
And answers to his mother's calls
From the flowered furrow. In a time
Of which he wots not, run short pains
Through his warm heart; and then, from whence
He knows not, on his light there falls
A shadow; and his native slope,
Where he was wont to leap and climb,
Floats from his sick and filmed eyes,
And something in the darkness draws
His forehead earthward, and he dies.'

The lines entitled the Burial of Love, especially in the one containing the classical superlative,

'With languor of most hateful smiles,'

remind us of Mr Shelley; except that there is talk in it of Love having his "revenge." Mr Shelley, for what may be called the material creation of a poem, had not so severe and discriminating a taste of nature as Mr Keats; but no man surpassed, perhaps ever equalled him, in a point which it is to be wished poets would more attend to; we mean, in the rejection of all incompatible moral assumptions, and figments not to be granted.

The burden of the first Owl-song is very good and wondrous;—

'Alone and warming his five wits,
The white owl in the belfry sits.'

The Recollections of the Arabian Nights highly disappointed us.

'High-walled gardens, green and old,'

are good, and so is the luxury of some of the stanzas; but there should have been more flesh and blood in them, and vicissitude, and magic. And "good Haroun Alraschid" will hardly be thought to deserve his epithet, even by the youngest of our brother Arabian Night readers.

The following passage in an Ode to Memory shews a taste for nature singularly true and masterly, to have been written "very early in life."

'Pour round mine years the livelong bleat
Of the thickfleecéd sheep from wattled folds,
Upon the ridgéd wolds,
When the first matinsong hath wakéd loud
Over the dark dewy earth forlorn,
What time the amber morn
Forth gushes from beneath a lowhung cloud.'

The poem, entitled A Character, the whole of which we lay before the reader, is surely one of the latest of the author's productions. At any rate, it shows a subtle apprehension of the natures he meets with. We could not but fancy, when we read it, that we had seen the individual it describes, and heard him talk within his marble circle.

A CHARACTER.

I.

'With a half glance upon the sky
At night he said, "The wanderings
Of this most intricate universe
Teach me the nothingness of things."
Yet could not all creation pierce
Beyond the bottom of his eye.

II.

He spake of beauty: that the dull
Saw no divinity in grass,
Life in dead stones, or spirit in air;
Then looking as 'twere in a glass,
He smoothed his chin and sleeked his hair,
And said the earth was beautiful.

Digitized by Google

III.

He spake of virtue: not the gods
More purely, when they wish to charm
Pallas and Juno sitting by:
And with a sweeping of the arm,
And a lacklustre deadblue eye,
Devolved his rounded periods.

IV.

Most delicately, hour by hour,
He canvassed human mysteries,
And trod on silk, as if the winds
Blew his own praises in his eyes,
And stood aloof from other minds
In impotence of fancied power.

V.

With lips depressed as he were meek,
Himself unto himself he sold:
Upon himself himself did feed:
Quiet, dispassionate, and cold,
And other than his form of creed,
With chiselled features clear and sleek.

In the compositions entitled The Poet, The Poet's Mind, and The Mystic, we cannot but think that we see allusions to other individuals. The applicability is at all events remarkable, and need not be pointed out to those who have been let into the interior of poetical reading. In The Mystic is a sublime line:

'He, often lying broad awake, and yet
Remaining from the body, and apart
In intellect and power and will, hath heard
Time flowing in the middle of the night.'

From the first of these three poems, which is

'In linked sweetness long drawn out'—

we are tempted to quote largely, but cannot do it at present. We must give, however, the first stanza.

'The poet in a golden clime was born,
With golden stars above,
Dowered with the hate of hate, the scorn of scorn,
The love of love.'

How fitly these words fall in, and with what a beautiful decision! We must quote a little further:—

'He saw through life and death, through good and ill,
He saw through his own soul.
The marvel of the everlasting will,
An open scroll,
Before him lay: with echoing feet he threaded
The secret'st walks of fame.
The viewless arrows of his thoughts were headed
And winged with flame,
Like Indian reeds blown from his silver tongue.

If this and the rest (which see) is not a portrait of Mr Shelley, then the deities of Mythology are not known by their symbols.

If Mr Keats had seen the next composition, The Poet's Mind, he would have felt it as a magic circle, drawn round him to repulse the assaults of worldliness and folly. The image of the enchanted fountain on the lawn, and its shrinking into the ground at the aspect of foul intruder, is a beautiful fancy.

The little poem entitled Nothing will Die, is justly followed by All Things will Die. It wanted that relief. And yet Death in the latter is not welcome. He strikes us into the most melancholy of negations. Here follows a most affecting picture of a dead body, well entitled

THE DESERTED HOUSE.

'Life and thought have gone away,
Side by side,
Leaving doors and windows wide:
Careless tenants they!

All within is dark as night:
In the windows is no light;
And no murmur at the door,
So frequent on its hinge before.'

Close the doors, the shutters close,
Or through the windows we shall see
The nakedness and vacancy
Of the dark deserted house.

Come away: no more of mirth
Is here, or merrymaking sound.
The house was builded of the earth,
And shall fall again to ground.

Come away: for Life and Thought
Here no longer dwell;
But in a city glorious—
A great and distant city—have bought
A mansion incorruptible.
Would they could have stayed with us!'

The Tears of Heaven is a conceit, not founded in natural, and therefore not in poetical truth. Love and Sorrow is a pleasanter one, more wilfully artificial, yet better grounded. The author must have been reading Donne, when he wrote it. It might pass for a leaf out of his book.

'Thou art my heart's sun in love's chrystalline:
Yet on both sides at once thou canst not shine:
Thine is the bright side of my heart, and thine
My heart's day; but the shadow of my heart,
Issue of its own substance, my heart's night,
Thou canst not lighten even with thy light,' &c.

This is the very Analogical Doctor' come back again. In the Ballad of Oriana, the name seems too often repeated. We hold the National Song to be naught, and are therefore glad that it may be considered no longer national; which is a "preferment" for this and all other nations. Our author has the universal and loving eye of a true poet, and must not condescend to pretend otherwise.

But we must escape from the rest of his book; otherwise we shall be quoting the poem on Love, and the Kraken, and the Sonnet to J. M. K.; and the printer will be coming down upon us with a face of pathetic impossibility.

On Tuesday we shall have the pleasure of bringing our readers acquainted with the volume of Mr Charles Tennyson.

WRITINGS OF MR HAZLITT.

TO THE TATLER.

Mr Tatler,—For the information of Mr Cunningham, and those of his readers who may partake of his ignorance of the writings of the man, I send you a list (so far as my memory serves me) of the works of the late Mr Hazlitt. For Mr C. to designate him as "an acute and lively writer on theatrical subjects," reminds one of the man who knew Sir Isaac Newton only as Master of the Mint. You have answered Mr Cunningham most properly: besides which, you might have added, that in matters connected with art (Mr C.'s own ground) Hazlitt has written with a gusto and knowledge, that the biographer of the Painters of England can never hope to attain: for he was himself a fine artist; and had he but had faith in his own powers, with less impetuosity, he would have become a great one.

Your sincere well-wisher. C.

An English Grammar. 1 vol.
An Essay on the Disinterestedness of Human Action. 1 vol.
Eloquence of the British Senate; with Critical Remarks upon the Orators. 2 vols.
Table-Talk; a Collection of Essays. 2 vols.
The Round Table; ditto. 2 vols.
Characters of Shakspeare's Plays. 1 vol.
Lectures on the British Poets. 1 vol.
Ditto on the Comic Writers. 1 vol.
Ditto on the Writers of the Elizabethan Age. 1 vol.
Political Essays; with Sketches of Public Characters. 1 vol.
Notes of a Journey through France and Italy. 1 vol.
Plain Speaker; a Collection of Essays. 2 vols.
Spirit of the Age; or Contemporary Portraits. 1 vol.
Liber Amoris; or the New Pygmalion.
Characteristics, in the manner of Rochefoucault's Maxims. 1 vol.
The Picture Galleries of England. 1 vol.
The Life of Napoleon Buonaparte (his last work). 4 vols.

I do not include his Letter to Gifford; or his 'Conversations of Northcote;' or the 'Life of Titian' by the same Artist, and which Hazlitt superintended.

Game Laws and Orthodoxy.—Monsieur de Chabriant stopped the Prince of Conti (going to mass) to request his orders relative to a poacher just apprehended. "A hundred blows and three months' imprisonment," said the Prince, and then pursued his way with the most tranquil air possible. What a transition, from the barbarous punishment of the poacher, to the altar of a mild and beneficent Saviour!—Madame de Genlis.—[If this is not making game of religion we know not what is. Who is to wonder, that such hard-hearted tyrants underwent a dreadful retribution?]

Vows fulfilled in Miniature.—The priests are generally very active in obtaining rich bequests from their dying penitents, but now and then they are paid in their own coin. An instance of this kind has just come to our knowledge, at which I confess I am wicked enough to laugh very heartily:—A sick gentleman of considerable property thinking himself at the last extremity, called in two of these reverend advisers, who persuaded him, during a violent paroxysm of pain, to vow a pair of silver candlesticks to St Antonio (their patron) in case he should recover. Shortly afterwards he got well, and was duly reminded of his promise. "Certainly," said he, "it is already fulfilled;—it was the first step I took on recovering my health: look here." Then, leading them to a table, he pointed out a pair of silver candlesticks, about two inches in height, and not thicker than a straw, which were placed before a miniature of St Antonio, which he himself possessed.—Baillie's Lisbon in 1821, &c.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Selection of Music.

DRURY-LANE.

THERE is so much inequality in the best Oratorios, or Selections of Music, sometimes even in the best pieces themselves, and always among the singers,—and the best singers, to say the truth, so often fail in coming up to the beauty of the finest passages,—that we find an act or so of the entertainment quite enough for one evening. If we sat longer, neither critic nor reader would be the better for it,—

Sleepy ourselves, to give our readers sleep.

If all the compositions were as fine as 'In splendour bright,' or 'La Mia Dorabella,' and all the executions of them as much to the purpose as Mr BRAHAM'S and Mr PHILLIPS'S, in those two, we know not how long we should be tempted to stop: but in that case, we suppose, pleasure would perform the effect of dullness, and set us to sleep at the end. Music acts upon the senses more than any other art, and produces the natural consequences of over-excitement. We could never sit out an opera, even of MOZART'S, the least unequal of all composers, without being tired before it was over.

Mr BRAHAM was very fine last night in the scene from the Creation, containing the above recitative, 'In splendour bright.' And a beautiful scene it is,—truly so called. You behold the sun rising in his strength, and see the rays in the music. HAYDN has hit this point to a nicety. The long, thin, sharp, trembling extatic notes, growing and diffusing themselves, seem radiant at once with splendour and harmony; nor would a Platonical, or even an experimental philosopher, fail to tell us, perhaps, that there was more in the identity than we supposed, light and music being equally traceable to vibrations of the air, and colour having a scale analogous to the gamut. But we must not be carried away by these refinements. It may be a less hazardous one to observe, that if HAYDN is sometimes too literal in his musical pictures (as when he makes his horses gallop, and his "healing plant" go wrapping you about like a bandage) his literalities, curiously enough, suit his grandest occasions the best. We like to hear him make his light grow, and see him lift up the orb of his sun; whereas the other illustrations are offensive. We take the reason to be, that we feel as if nothing too much could be done to subserve to the images of things so exalted (Nature in her greatest moods knowing no distinction of littleness); while on the other hand, the imitation of a horse's gallop is an easy trick, and a condescension.

The ballad of 'Kate Kearney' comes rather oddly among the science and grandeurs of these Oratorio Selections; somewhat like a peasant-girl brought into fine company. But it is not vulgar, as some might suppose it. It is as much the reverse as nature and real feeling can make it; and Mrs WAYLETT sang it very sweetly too, and with great applause. She was encored. Her notes, without much richness, are neat and clear; and she modulates them, at the close, into a cadence of extreme delicacy and softness.

We had the pleasure of helping MOZART'S delightful trio, 'La Mia Dorabella, to an encore, notwithstanding the opposition of some profane persons, one or two of whom were so abandoned to a reprobate non-perception, as to hiss! It was sung by Messrs HORN, T. COOKE, and PHILLIPS,—by the last admirably. We take this opportunity of doing away all that we have hitherto said in doubt of him. We certainly never heard him sing so completely to the purpose before; but seeing what he can do, we can now have no doubt of his having done many things as well. His inability to help laughing, on the words 'Mi fa di ridere,' was admirably given; and so indeed was all the rest of his part: and we thought that the fatness of sound, which is sometimes too perceptible in his throat, was altogether sensibly diminished. Perhaps he has indulged it, as thinking it rich and of good effect: but the more clearly the voice comes from the chest, surely it is the better. Messrs HORN and T. COOKE joined with good proper heartiness in the choral laugh. Mr HORN would do well to give more openness to his Italian vowels. A, in Italian, is not the English A, afraid of opening his mouth, for fear of the coldness of the atmosphere; but a fine broad happy fellow, loud in the sunshine.

We stopped to hear Miss PATON sing 'Let the Bright Seraphim,' with Mr HARPER'S Trumpet Obligato. The lady (though we missed a due degree of power) sang well, and Mr HARPER'S trumpet 'spake' well;* but has HANDEL composed such words to a solitary trumpet, and an occasional second one, with a viol or two?

'Let the bright seraphim, in burning row,
Their loud uplifted angel trumpets blow.'

These are the words. Can such, however fine, be the music? We have not the music book to refer to. Where are the 'loud trumpets?' and where the 'burning row.?' The more the singer desired the seraphim to begin, the more they seemed to refuse; and to those who thought of the words, Mr HARPER'S trumpet, with all its beauty, had an affect the reverse of exalting.

* 'The trumpet spake not to the armed throng.'—Milton.

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

— Not to laugh when nature prompts, is but a knavish hypocritical way of making a mask of one's face.—Pope.

— The man who scruples not breaking his word in little things, would not suffer in his own conscience so great pain for failures of consequence, as he who thinks every little offence against truth and justice a disparagement.—Steele.

— It is the duty of every man who would be true to himself, to obtain if possible a disposition to be pleased.—Steele

— A man selling a horse, said "Ce cheval boit et mange bien. Faites le voir, je le garantis sans defaut." (This horse eats and drinks well. See him, I warrant him free from fault.) But some of these words would bear a different interpretation. The horse proved blind, and the purchaser wished to make the dealer take him back again. "You cannot do that," said he, "for I warned you of his blindness, when I said, "Faites le voir. (Make him see.)—French Homonymes.

A RIVER FOR DR. KITCHENER.—At one of the seats of a Portuguese family, not far from Coimbra, the kitchen is very curious and remarkable, not only for its dimensions and the superb manner in which it is appointed, but from a river which flows through the midst of it, from which it is the practice of the cooks to catch the fish as it is wanted for use.—Baillie's Lisbon in 1821, &c.

LISBON ETIQUETTE.—In Lisbon every master has an arrangement with his servants relative to the arrival of the guests; if a carriage with one gentleman in it appears in the court-yard, the porter rings a sonorous bell once, the master hears it, but perhaps does not rise from his seat, as it announces only the arrival of an individual, who is not considered to be a man of any particular consequence; if the bell sounds twice, he will generally rise, for this means that a grandee is coming; but when the warning stroke is thrice repeated, he always leaves the room to meet the visitor at the door of the house, for then it is a lady who arrives.—Baillie's Lisbon in 1821, &c.

FRENCH CLASSICALITY UNDER THE OLD REGIME.—Madam de Genlis relates that on one occasion her mother gave a grand theatrical fête à la Française, to welcome her husband's return into the country from Paris. The play was Racine's Iphigenia. All the chambermaids were put into requisition, "My mother was Clytemnestra, and I was Iphigenia. Dr Piriot took the part of Agamennon, and his son, aged 18, was prodigiously applauded as the fiery Achilles; and in truth he was fiery enough. My dress (in the prologue) was rose-colour under point-lace, ornamented with little artificial flowers of all colours; it reached only to my knee, and I had little boots, straw colour and silver, my long hair flowing, and azure wings. My dress as Iphigenia, over a large hoop, was of China silk, cherry colour and silver, trimmed with sables. As my mother had no diamonds, she ordered a prodigious quantity of false stones, to complete our magnificent dresses." Iphigenia, with a cherry-coloured silk over a large hoop!

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

An Opera Buffa, in Two Acts, entitled

IL MATRIMONIO SEGRETO.

[By CIMAROSA.]

Principal Characters by Madame SIGL VESPERMANN, Miss FANNY AYTON, Signor DAVID, Mr E. SEGUIN, and Signor LABLACHE.

After which, a Favorite Ballet, in One Act, entitled

ŒNONE ET PARIS.

[By M. GARDEL.]

The Principal Characters by Madame Montessu, Mademoiselle Kaniel, Mlle. Clara, Mlle. Proche, Mlle. De Vis, and Mlle. Brocard, Mesdames J. Mersie, Coupotte, Beseke, Vedy, Griffiths, Pitt, Laura, Lydia, &c. M. Paul, M. Emile, M. Simon, M. Edouard, M. George, M. D'Albert, and M. LEFEBVRE.

With an efficient and numerous Corps de Ballet.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Play of

WILLIAM TELL.

[By Mr KNOWLES.]

Emma, Miss HUDDART. Anneli, Miss RUSSELL. Agnes, Miss FAUCIT.
Gesler, Mr H. WALLACK. Sarnem, Mr THOMPSON.
Struth, Mr W. BENNETT. Rodolph, Mr HOWARD.
Lufold, Mr HOWELL. Brann, Mr ROSS.
William Tell, Mr MACREADY.
Albert, Miss POOLE. Melchtal, Mr YOUNGE. Erni, Mr CATHIE.
Furst, Mr FENTON. Verner, Mr COOKE. Waldman, Mr HUGHES.
Michael, Mr COOPER. Jagheli, Mr J. VINING.
Pierre, Mr EATON. Theodore, Mr HONNER.
Savoyards—Miss CRAWFORD, Mr PRICE, and Mr S. JONES.

In the course of the Evening, Spontini's Overture to 'Ferdinand Cortez,' and Winter's Overture to 'Maria di Montalban,' and Auber's Overture to 'Fra Diavolo.'

After which will be Exhibited the New and Splendid

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Borromean Islands.

To conclude with a New Melo-Dramatic Opera, in Two Acts, called

THE DEVIL'S BROTHER.

[Adapted to the English Stage, by A. LEE.]

Lady Pamela Goslington, Mrs Orger. Zerlina, Mrs Waylett.
The Concerted Music, by Misses Byfield, Bruce, S. Phillips, Russell, and Mrs Bedford.
Fra Diavolo, Mr Wallack. Sir Gregory Goslington, Mr Harley.
Lorenzo, Mr Sinclair. Lucro, Mr Webster.
Banditti—Beppo, Mr Latham. Giacomo, Mr Bedford. 1st Carabineer, Mr Bland.
Postilion, Mr Honner. Francisco, Mr Eaton.

On Monday, Brutus; Perfection; and Masaniello.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Comedy of

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.

[By W. SHAKSPEARE.]

Hero, Miss TAYLOR. Beatrice, Miss FANNY KEMBLE.
Ursula, Mrs DALY. Margaret, Mrs BROWN.
Benedick, Mr C. KEMBLE. Leonato, Mr WARDE.
Don Pedro, Mr G. BENNETT. Don John, Mr DIDDEAR.
Antonio, Mr BARTLEY. Count Claudio, Mr ABBOTT.
Dogberry, Mr BLANCHARD. Friar, Mr EVANS. Verges, Mr KEELEY.
Borachio, Mr BAKER. Conrad, Mr HOLL. Balthazar, Mr HENRY.
Sexton, Mr BARNES. Seacoal, Mr MEARS.
Oatcake, Mr TURNOUR. Lorenzo, Mr IRWIN.

In Act II. A MASQUERADE. And Stevens's Glee of "Sigh no more, Ladies."

Previous to the Comedy, Mozart's Overture to "Der Schauspieldirector."
Previous to 'Married Lovers,' an Overture by J. N. Hummel.
Previous to the 'Omnibus,' A. Romberg's Overture to "Scipio."

After which a New Petite Comedy, called

MARRIED LOVERS.

[By Mr POWER.]

The Songs composed by Mr Barnett.

Duchess D'Orleans, Miss Lawrence. Marchioness de Meneville, Miss Taylor.
Lady Ascot, Mrs Chatterley. Annette, Miss Phillips.
Duc D'Orleans, Mr Abbott. Marquis de Meneville, Mr Bartley.
Sir John Ascot, Mr Warde. Colonel O'Dillon, Mr Power. Pierre, Mr Irwin.
Francis, Mr Mears.

To conclude with the Farce of

THE OMNIBUS; OR, A CONVENIENT DISTANCE.

[By Mr TAIN.]

Julia Ledger, Miss Lawrence. Mrs Dobbs, Mrs Tayleure. Miss Damper, Mrs Daly.
Miss Jemima Damper, Miss Appleton. Mr Ledger, Mr Blanchard.
Mr Dobbs, Mr Bartley. Tom Dobbs, Mr Keeley. Pat Rooney, Mr Power.

On Monday, Fazio; Married Lovers; and Comrades and Friends.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elisabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs DALY.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called

KIND INTENTIONS.

Mrs Rosemore, Miss Daly. Charlotte, Miss M. Glover. Henry, Mr Hemmings.
Latitat, Mr S. Smith. Timothy, Mr Wilkinson. Mr Meanwell, Mr Mathews.

To conclude with, a Domestic Burletta, in Two Acts, called

THE WRECK ASHORE.

[By Mr BUCKSTONE.]

The Overture and the whole of the Music, by Mr G. H. Rodwell.

Act I.—WINTER.

Alice, Mrs Yates. Bella, Mrs Fitzwilliam. Dame Barnard, Mrs Daly.
Jemmy Starling, Mr Buckstone. Miles Barnard, Mr Yates.
Walter Barnard, Mr Hemmings. Captain Grampus, Mr O. Smith.
Marmaduke Magog, Mr J. Reeve.

[A lapse of Five Years is supposed to occur between each Act.]

Act. II.—SUMMER.

The Characters as in Act I.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, in one Act, called

MIS-APPREHENSION.

[By Mr C. DANCE.]

Miss Clementina Bramble, Miss STUART. Fanny, Miss PINCOTT.
Ellen, Miss KABREY. Miss Bramble's Maid, Miss BERRESFORD.
Frank Hartley, Mr RAYMOND. Thomas, Mr COOPER.
Money, Mr W. VINING. Mr Williams, Mr COATES.
Police Officer, Mr WORRELL. Shopmen, Messrs YOUNG and HITCHINSON.

After which, an entirely new Burletta, in One Act, called

DUKE FOR A DAY.

The principal part of the Music adapted from Boieldieu's Opera of 'Le Nouveau Seigneur.'

Aline, Miss Sidney. The Duke de Valmont, Mr Hodges. Julian, Madame Vestris.
The Seneschal, Mr W. Vining. Antoine, Mr Newcombe.
Blaize, Mr Cooper. Jerome, Mr Worrell. Servants, Retainers, &c.

To which will be added, a Comic Burletta, in One Act, called

TAKEN BY SURPRISE.

The Characters by Miss Fitzwalter, Miss Pincott, Miss Kabrey, Mr Fredericks, Mr Collier, Mr Cooper, Mr Worrel, Mr Paget, Mr Cook, Mr Brown, and Mr Coates.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]

Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.

Pandora, Madame Vestris.

SURREY THEATRE.

An entirely new Romantic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

THE FIRE RAISER, OR THE HAUNTED MOOR.

The Characters by Miss SOMERVILLE, Miss M. C. POOLE, Miss JORDAN, Miss NICOL, Mr OSBALDISTON, Mr ALMAR, Mr WILLIAMS, Mr HONNER, Mr C. HILL, Mr GOUGH, Mr VALE, Mr EDWIN, Mr ROGERS, Mr ASBURY, Master P. CARBERY, Mr LEE, Mr HOBBS.

The Spanish Hercules, Monsieur Louis VALLI, will go through his Gymnastic Exercises.

To conclude with an entirely new Nautical Melo-Drama, to be called

THE WATER WITCH.

The Music by Mr Blewitt.

The Characters by Miss Somerville, Miss M. C. Poole, Mr Osbaldiston, Mr Williams, Mr Vale, Mr Honner, Mr Rogers, Mr Ransford, Messrs Hobbs, Boulanger, Grammer, Woolf, Tully, &c.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,

TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

A Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called

EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.

The Characters by Mrs GLOVER, Miss SINCLAIR, Miss GARRICK, Miss STOHWASSER, Miss WELLS, Miss LAWS, Mr SMITH, Mr TILBURY, Mr MUNROE, Mr BARNETT, and Mr GREEN.

After which, a Farcical Entertainment, entitled

THE MERRY WIVES OF BARBICAN.

The Music, by Mr Harroway.

The Characters by Mrs Humby, Miss Wells, Miss Garrick, Miss Stohwasser, Miss Brothers, Mrs Garrick, and Mr J. Russell.

To which will be added, the admired Musical Comedietta, in One Act, entitled

THREE TO ONE.

The Music, by Mr G. Cooke.

The Characters by Mrs Glover, Miss Wells, Miss Ayres, and Mr Forrester.

A DIVERTISEMENT, by Mr Edgar, and the Corps de Ballet, terminating with THE LOYAL TRIBUTE TO THE QUEEN.

To conclude with A New Comic Piece, in Two Acts, called

TACT.

[By M. BARNETT.]

The Music, by J. A. Barnett.

The Characters by Miss Stohwasser, Mrs Humby, Mr J. Russell, Mr Forrester, Mr Green, Mr Smith, Mr Munroe, Mr Tilbury, Mr Taylor, and Mr J. Conquest.

In the course of the Evening, (2nd time in this Country) F. Schneider's Triumphal Overture in honour of the King of England, and Weber's Overture to 'Euryanthe.'

COBURG THEATRE.—De L'Orme—A Day at an Inn—The Black Forest.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—The Wreck—A Divertisement—The Farmer.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL.—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

Nº 152.] [PRICE TWOPENCE.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

THE EXTRAORDINARY BLACK BOOK: an Exposition of the United Church of England and Ireland; Civil List and Crown Revenues; Incomes, Privileges, and Power, of the Aristocracy; Privy Council, Diplomatic and Consular Establishments; Law and Judicial Administration; Representation and Prospects of Reform under the New Ministry; Profits, Influence, and Monopoly of the Bank of England and East India Company, with Strictures on the Renewal of the Charters; Debt and Funding System; Salaries, Fees, and Emoluments in Courts of Justice, Public Offices, and Colonies; Lists of Pluralists, Placemen, Pensioners, and Sinecurists: the whole corrected from the latest Official Returns, and presenting a complete View of the Expenditure, Patronage, Influence, and Abuses of the Government, in Church, State, Law, and Representation. By the original Editor. 8vo. pp. 576. Effingham Wilson.

[The introduction to this article has unfortunately been mislaid in the printing-office. The extract supplies an interesting account of French and English Constituency, and of the various descriptions of Boroughs.]

'THE boroughs which return members are of three sorts; first, the close, pocket, or marketable boroughs, in which the power of returning the members is exercised by one or two individuals; secondly, the corporation boroughs, in which the members are returned by a dozen or two of self-elected corporators; thirdly, the open boroughs, in which the members are returned by voters, varying in number from 500 to 8 or 10,000.

'Although the number of voters in the several descriptions of boroughs is so different, there are in fact, with the exception of London, and perhaps one or two more places, only two mediums through which the members obtain their seats; namely, from personal connection with the patron, and open or indirect purchase by money or money's worth. In this consists the glaring and unequal defect of our representative system, and which renders it immeasurably inferior to that of a neighbouring kingdom.

'In France the number of electors amounts to 80,000; the new law proposes to double this number, which is much too narrow a basis long to satisfy the people of that country. In England, the number of electors who actually voted for members of the House of Commons, in 1830, has been calculated to amount to 87,000, which is rather more than the number of Electors in France; but mark the difference in the two systems of representation. What class, interest, or section of society do the English electors represent? None: not a single social element, either of property, number, or intelligence. For the most part they are in the lowest state of indigence, non-resident, and the hireling tools of the candidates. Contrast these with the conditions under which the French constituency exercise their suffrages. First, the BALLOT excludes corruption and intimidation; and every elector, according to his judgment, may be supposed to vote for the man best qualified to advance the general interests: he can have no other motive; his only grounds for preferring one person to another must be public, not personal to himself, like those of the English elector. Secondly, the French electors comprise nearly the entire proprietary and intelligence of the community; they consist of householders, retailors, shop-keepers, and of the classes more opulent than these: hence they embody, either directly or through dependence on the working classes, the chief interests of the community.

'But these are not the only points of contrast between the two countries: in France there is no richly-endowed Church nor Aristocracy to make head against; there are no interests like the Bank, or East India Company, or West India planters, or brewers, or old chartered corporations, to counterpoise. The constitution of society is essentially democratic; there is no monied aristocracy, nor landed interest: having no primogeniture or entail laws, property is more equally divided. Hence it is that a much smaller body of electors in France would adequately represent and sustain the interests of the community than would be adequate to similar purposes in England: for it must be borne in mind, that the excellence of any system of representation does not consist in the number of voters, but in the unbiassed and incorrupt exercise of their suffrages, and in their being sufficiently numerous to touch on, and constitute a fair and aliquot proportion of every social interest.

'After duly considering the points we have indicated, the reader will not be at a loss to account for the different results presented in the history of the French Chamber of Deputies and the English House of Commons, though both deriving their origin from an elective basis of similar extent, but differently constituted, differentferently exercised, and with widely different interests to contend against. To these discrepances in the two countries we have thought it expedient to advert, because it is highly probable that reference would be made to the limited constitution of France, as an argument for a contracted plan of Parliamentary Reform, which would be neither suited to the peculiarities of our domestic organization, nor adequate to meet the just expectation of the people.'

'Let us now return to the boroughs; and, first, of the absolutely rotten ones, such as the following, out of scores more, present an example:

	Population.
Old Sarum	about 6
Bramber	98
Gatton	135
Newton	about 200
St Michael's	178
Castle Rising	254
Berealston	about 200
Dunwich	about 200
St Mawes	about 300
Ludgershall	477
East Looe	770
Corfe Castle	823
Bossiney	877
West Looe	953

'These, no doubt, were formerly the metropolitan towns of the country, the hives of industry and population, which have exchanged condition with Manchester, Leeds, and Liverpool. The population mentioned above is generally that of the entire parish; the borough which exercises the right of returning the two members being seldom more than a few miserable huts. There is in all these cases but one real voter, the patron, who is generally the Lord of the Manor; in some instances, as Gatton and Old Sarum, there are literally no inhabitants beyond the bailiff or steward of the estate; and in others, though the population may amount to a few hundreds, the nominal voters seldom exceed twenty,—creatures of the proprietor.

'About disfranchising such places there cannot exist the smallest hesitation; such ghosts and mockeries of towns and cities ought long ago to have been struck out of the national representation, which has been the case with others that formerly sent members to parliament. But it is alleged by some, the proprietors—usurpers or robbers would be a more appropriate term—ought first to receive compensation. A borough is reckoned to produce its owner about 3,000*l*. a year, the seats being worth 1,500*l*. per annum. About 60,000*l*. therefore, might be the value of the franchise to the patron. And at this rate it is proposed to buy up, out of the produce of the taxes, all the decayed boroughs in the kingdom.

'What a suggestion! The Boroughmongers have been realizing three thousand per annum by the exercise of the franchises of the people; from the same cause, they and their families and connexions have long been in the annual receipt of immense sums, in pensions, salaries, and sinecures; and now they wish to sell the fee simple of their robberies, and receive a full equivalent for the plunder they may hereafter lose by the interruption of their depredations. In lieu of compensation, ought they not to refund? What compensation did the thieves and cut-purses of the metropolis receive for the losses sustained by the introduction of the new police? To buy the boroughs—the people's rights, would be to consecrate the vilest injustice, and quite as pernicious in principle as the ancient black mail, or compounding with the purloiners of bankers' parcels.

'What compensation has any other class of society received for losses sustained by the progress of social improvement? Here is a great measure of national reform about to be introduced, and certain individuals will be damnified thereby. Very well; similar vicissitudes have befallen other sections of the community, and what compensation have they received? What compensation has been awarded to the hundreds of thousands plunged in distress and penury by the introduction of machinery? What compensation has been awarded to the sufferers by the Bank Restriction Act, and the restoration of the currency? What compensation have the publicans obtained for losses incurred by the opening of the beer trade? What compensation has the poor Irish peasantry received, ejected from their homes under the operation of the Subletting Act? None, none; neither would we grant any compensation to the rotocracy. We would award to them the same act of grace and mercy that we would award the West-India slave-holders, they should have a bill of indemnity for past crimes, and they ought to be truly thankful for it.

Digitized by Google

'Next, let us advert to the CORPORATION BOROUGHS, in which the franchise is monopolized by a small corporation, consisting generally of less than twenty-four persons. Many of these corporations have become possessed of the elective right to the exclusion of the great bulk of their fellow townsmen, by nothing less than direct usurpation. In the time of Charles II, when a design to establish despotism was entertained, the rights of these towns were taken away by a manœuvre. A book was written by Dr Brady, to prove that the word commonality in a charter, meant corporation; and in pursuance of this new doctrine, the committees of the House of Commons, in the course of about twenty years, deprived the inhabitants of a great number of boroughs of their elective rights, limiting them to the select corporation in each town.

'As the members of such corporations were generally tradesmen of the place, they have been easily subdued by the influence of a neighbouring peer, or wealthy commoner, upon whose support they depended. Friends and relatives, in some cases persons in the lowest condition of life, and even menial servants have been elected members of such corporations; and these have, in their turn, elected other creatures of their patron, to succeed to vacant places. There are many corporations of this kind which appear to have been instituted as a convenient machinery, by which the elective interest of a patron might be securely managed; the greater number of their members residing at a distance, and visiting the place only to make members of Parliament. When the right is vested in freemen, chosen by these corporations, the case is very little altered; as the freedom is seldom conferred upon any individual on whose support the influential party cannot depend. Even plain right has often been arbitrarily denied; and should the favoured persons incline to change their opinions a host of freemen are admitted on the spur of the occasion to counterbalance their number. Where the right of election has extended beyond these narrow limits to the inhabitants paying scot and lot, the right of persons unfavourable to the influential party has been successfully defeated by omitting to rate them to the parish taxes, and friendly magistrates have been found to sanction the omission, though the rejected persons formed the most wealthy portion of the parish. Attempts have been made from time to time to open these boroughs, by petitioning the house of Commons, but the enormous expense of the prosecution of a petition, places redress out of the reach of poor persons.

'In dealing with these little nests of corruption, there can certainly exist as little hesitation, as in blotting out of the representation the pocket boroughs of peers and rich commoners. The elective franchise ought to be restored to the inhabitants generally, and the same course ought to be pursued in respect to those boroughs in themselves populous, but in which the franchise is absurdly confined to the holders of BURGAGE TENURES, mostly few in number, but conferring the only right of voting that exists in the place.

'In very early times, all the burgesses who held houses or lands within the borough were entitled to vote. This has been gradually abridged under various pretexts, but chiefly through parliamentary decisions, and the intrigues of corporations. As the right of sending representatives has been for some centuries regarded as an immunity, it has been restricted to the ancient limits of the place which originally enjoyed it; these limits being often very narrow, wealthy individuals easily acquired the entire real property of the borough; and if the suffrage was confined to burgage-holds, controlled the exercise of it, by conferring on their friends, relatives, and dependents, the right of property during the election. All such boroughs must necessarily be included in the condemned list, and be either totally disfranchised, or the franchise spread over a wider basis.

'The last class of boroughs is, those termed "OPEN," such as Bristol and Liverpool. These are, assuredly, the vilest parts of our representation, exhibiting, every election, the most revolting spectacles of venality, drunkenness, riot, and licentiousness. Money is the chief influence, and expended in every possible form of bribery —in treating, in buying freedoms, in idle pageantry, in the fees of legal agents,—in the conveyance of voters from distant places, in maintaining them while absent, and reconveying them to their homes with the profits of their bartered franchises. There are not half a dozen places in the kingdom, where an honest man, of known competency and character, can hope to be successful in a contest with a man who will expend a fortune to succeed. Thus it is that rich men, or men who are likely to have places and offices to dispose of, are mostly returned for those places; and it is observable, that the open boroughs have returned a smaller proportion of members, than any other class, distinguished for probity, intelligence, and devotion to popular rights.

'The original intent of the charters given to the cities and boroughs of England cannot be mistaken. Unquestionably it was meant that the inhabitants of the places so chartered should elect for themselves representatives in parliament. It was not, however, intended that this should be done by any indiscriminate scheme of representation; because the franchise is always found to be vested in some definite class,—in the freemen, or the free burgesses, or the free barons,—clearly shewing that the vassal, menial, or vagrant should not be eligible to the exercise of the elective function; therefore, it was stipulated that the elector should have acquired his freedom, which generally rendered a certain servitude necessary, and ensured his being an inhabitant, and really interested in the prosperity of the town.

'Circumstances have intervened to defeat entirely the spirit and intent of this arrangement. The intelligent and independent part of the population of open boroughs are mostly ineligible to vote, while the franchise is exercised almost exclusively by the non-residents, by the illiterate, the destitute and profligate, whom the accident of birth, servitude or marriage has qualified. Dispersed throughout the kingdom, the electors have often no subsisting connection with the place in respect of which they vote, except that which enables them to take a drunken journey thither whenever they can wind up some unhappy "third man," to the perilous determination "of giving every freeman an opportunity of exercising his franchise."

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

AN AUKWARD MISTAKE.—A reverend father confessor was one day gravely seated in his confesional, listening to the peccadilloes of a poor negress, whose chief failing was that of drunkenness. She was rather prolix, the confessor took the opportunity of going very comfortably to sleep, secure in his snug retreat, of not being observed by any prying or profane eye. The negress having ceased to speak, and waited a considerable time, in the hope of receiving absolution, at last concluded that the holy father was too much shocked at her enormities to speak, and, with a deep sigh, she quietly withdrew. At the same moment the young and handsome wife of one of the richest merchants in the country took possession of the vacant space, and began to confess her sins to the same worthy auditor; when the latter suddenly awoke, and supposing the negress to be still at the grate, commenced a severe reprimand upon the subject of her drunken propensities: nothing could equal the indignation of the Senhora: conceiving herself to be the person really addressed, she launched forth in the most outrageous manner, venting her wrath at what she called the infamous calumnies of the priest, in language too gross to repeat. —Mrs Baillies's Lisbon in 1821, &c. [The coarseness of the lady's language might excite a suspicion that the priest's reprimand was not an unjust one.]

PARENTAL SEVERITY, ITS REACTION ON THE PARENT—Montaigne everywhere insists on mildness being exercised by fathers towards their children. He relates on this subject, that a friend of his having lost in the army an only son of whom he cherished great expectations, said to him: "My greatest grief is that I brought up my son with a severity so strict, that it has always veiled from him, as it were, the tenderness I had for him; and I reproach myself unceasingly for never having fully disclosed to him the strength of my paternal love: my grief is so much the more well founded, that I feel sure that he has died with the impression that I loved him but feebly."—[There is something so touching in this confession of the error of a good man, that one cannot help thinking that his severity could hardly have been as great as the natural kindness of his heart, rendered more susceptible by his recent loss, led him to consider it, and that most likely his son had had glimpses of his latent tenderness sufficient to save him from this painful impression which his father supposed him to die possessed of.] F. F.

NEWSPAPER WONDERS.—The newspapers have a peculiar method of exciting the astonishment of their readers, by egregious statements respecting the ages of persons assembled at some recent wedding, or other fatality. They tell us, for instance, that the united ages of the bride and bridegroom, together with those of their fathers and mothers, amounted to no less an aggregate than 266 years! a number of so prodigious an aspect, that, stated to us as a matter of wonder, we involuntarily lose sight of particulars, and begin to stare, in obedience to the demand made on our love of the marvellous. Analyse the matter, and the wonder ceases. The ages of the parents we may reasonably suppose to average 55; that will give us 220 years; and we have then only 46 years to divide between the bridegroom and bride, of which, allotting 26 to the former and 20 to the latter, we have the 266 years complete. But leaving these absurdities, let us attend to facts equally surprising, and which have escaped the attention of the newspapers, for whose facility in making up 'copy' I am induced to relate them. The Messrs. Simson were three brothers. They all held situations in public offices, and justly considering that exercise was good for their health, they judiciously resided a few miles from town, that they might have the advantage of a good walk. One July these three young gentlemen commenced a course of walking, in which they persevered regardless of all contingencies in the weather; and they had when, I called on them (I find by my diary it was on the 29th) walked not less than 870 miles, without appearing at all the worse for it, or expressing the least feeling of fatigue. The reader will not suppose that this exertion was sustained by fasting. On the contrary, it is proper to state that their appetites had been in a very flourishing condition, and that they had consumed while they rested 154½ pounds of meat, with proportionate quantities of bread and vegetables, and drank about 30 gallons of porter besides a few quart bottles of wine, wine-merchant measure. I should not do them justice if I did not add that I saw nothing in their appearance denoting a tendency to gluttony, and that they were not in the least intoxicated. F.F.

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF SATURDAY NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—William Tell; The Diorama; and the Devil's Brother.
COVENT GARDEN.—Much ado about Nothing.—Married Lovers.—And the Omnibus.

KING'S THEATRE.

ALTHOUGH we had been present three times last season at the performance of CIMAROSA's lovely opera, "Il Matrimonio Segreto," it was with a slight tinge of selfish gratulation that we found the duty had devolved upon us on Saturday evening of giving an account of its first representation this year. CIMAROSA was the most popular composer for the theatre that arose after the death of MOZART; and no wonder; for the merit of that astonishing genius (when it could no longer be exerted) began to be appreciated; and a young spirit succeeding, who had evidently formed the model for his melodies, and the construction of his harmonies upon his illustrious predecessor, was sure to be acceptable. So highly, and at the same time deservedly was the opera of "Il Matrimonio Segreto" admired at its first representation, that the Emperor ordered all the performers refreshment, with a reasonable breathing time, and then a complete encore of the performance. Happy CIMAROSA! It is unquestionably the most perfect composition of the gay and graceful class that has appeared since the comic operas of MOZART. The spirits never flag, and the attention never slumbers: every scene is stored with delight; melody after melody arises, and as these move on, we are constantly directed to some lovely effects from the orchestral accompaniments. There is no lack of beauty,—no poverty of invention in any part. From the first and opening duet between the young couple, and which is sweetness and tenderness itself, down to the famous air, 'Pria che spunti dal ciel l'aurora,' the heart is kept in a constant flutter of excitement. It is an opera composed to exhibit music itself, in all its features, to the best advantage, and not a piece of mountebank work, to show off the unmeaning contortions of one or two spoiled singers. The orchestra is raised to as high importance as these, and that is as it should be. Hence we get at the secret of the singers (the ignorant ones—and their name is Legion) hating such composers as MOZART; because the attention of the audience is unavoidably divided between the part allotted to them, and the instruments. We verily believe that half these exacting people imagine that an accompaniment should own no other function than be-lackey their heels, to prevent their stumbling out of the key.

From among this conceited crew we should assuredly except Signor LABLACHE. He sings like a musician, and always as if his profession were his pastime. With what spirit of revelry did he both sing and perform on Saturday evening: how perfectly true his intonation! how independent, and yet how correct in his time! his humour, too, is always that of a mind that condescends to it—yet, con amore; but you feel that it is still subservient to his other accomplishments. When he sings, he sings with zeal, and as if he loved music for itself; when he personates, he never for one moment forgets his character: he is not thinking of his audience, and what they think of him; but how old Signor Geronymo would act under certain impressions; and so carefully does he supply the small touches of light and relief in his figure, that it may be pronounced a perfect performance. He is always deaf; his eyes are eternally wandering from one speaker to another to catch the subject of discourse: and like a deaf man, and an old one, he repeats his words, and his sentences are succeeded by little indistinct noises; how complete too is the hopelessness of his countenance when all have been trying in vain to give him information; and his intentness of observing the speakers' faces, affords him yet no better clue.—"By Jove! not a word can I make out!" Then his last scene of weeping, and anger, when he discovers the marriage of his daughter;—how naturally the ebullition, with the half-uttered "maladet ——!" subsides into the convulsive sobbing, and sullen feeling of self-abasement, incident to wilful and wayward old children. He lies in the chair swelling and catching his breath like a Brobdignagian baby that has been whipped. He is the finest actor and singer both, that we have seen since the glorious days of AMBROGETTI; and in the latter qualification, for voice, style, and accomplishment in his art, he leaves that clever performer leagues in his wake.

We heard Signor DAVID for the first time this evening since his appearance in this country. From the various reports that had reached us, we went prepared to dislike his singing. It is therefore with pleasure we acknowledge our partial disappointment. His style is much too florid to give us pleasure; and although his expression is frequently judicious, it is redundant. The quality of his voice has been, we conjecture, better than it now is; his falsetto, which is both good and extensive, remains unimpaired, and to this he constantly resorts: though generally admired, however, we cannot say it afforded us any gratification: but his natural tones, when unforced, and delivered in the smooth cantabile style, appeared to the best advantage. He should be urged to use his sforzando with moderation, for it frequently resolves into a painful cry. We can believe that his zeal upon these occasions runs away with him; and hence, he spoiled the fine air, 'Pria che spunti;' to which defect must be added, that, in our judgment, he overlaid it with ornament. He seems in earnest, however; and this alone would lead us to pass lightly the faults alluded to; also that display of sensitiveness, which may not unreasonably be mistaken for affectation.

Mr E. SEGUIN undertook the part of Il Conte Robinsone at the short notice of two days: indulgence was therefore requested of the audience in his behalf, and the hint shall not be lost upon us. If the opera be repeated he will no doubt improve the performance, which he must do to maintain his credit. He is a clever young singer and actor.

It is with reluctance that we confirm the suspicion we entertained of Madame SIGL VESPERMANN upon her first appearance under the disadvantage of a cold. Her style is meretricious, her intonation frequently false, and the quality of her voice is at times so painful that we could fain be well rid of it. The best designation, perhaps, of her manner is, that she is a peevish singer. Her high notes, and when forced, are a succession of squeals.

We have little better compliment to bestow on Miss AYTON. The opinion may appear harsh, but we must say that in the single item of intonation, she is the most uncertain singer we ever heard in public; and as an actress one of the least attractive. Her manner is brusque, vehement, and unnecessarily confident.

Had we remained to see the new ballet of "Œnone et Paris" we should have little space left to describe it. Let us venture the criticism that it is not inferior to the ordinary run of these classical calcitrations.

C.

A SEASONABLE SORT OF TRUTH, SELDOM UTTERED.—A person "respectably" dressed pushing violently through one of the crowds assembled to witness the illuminations the other night, a gentleman laid his hand upon his arm, as he was advancing, and administered the following placid reproof; the effect of which was not diminished by a tone somewhat resembling Lord Foppington's:—"Compose yourself, sir, compose yourself, sir; you are a man of a disgusting irritability."

A "PARTICUAR DOG."—Lekain was the contemporary of Garrick, and like him, in his own country, the greatest actor of his day; they were excellent friends, and each fancied the other his superior. One day Garrick and Lekain amused themselves in the Champs Elysées, at Paris, by counterfeiting drunkenness, to the great amusement of a crowd of bystanders: Lekain, at length, said, "Well, my friend, do I perform it well?"—"Yes, replied Garrick, hiccuping, "very well, you are drunk all over except your left leg."—Dramatic Table-Talk.

PROMPT OBEDIENCE.—Foote was in the habit of imitating the peculiar manners of General Smith, whom he introduced into his comedy of 'The Nabob,' under the name of Sir Matthew Mite. One day the General sent for Foote: "Sir," said he, "I hear you have an excellent turn for mimicry, and I find that I, among others, have been the subject of your ridicule."—"Oh," said Foote, gaily, "I take all my acquaintance off at times,—and what is more wonderful, I often take myself off"—"Pray let us have a specimen," said the General. Foote put on his hat and gloves, took his cane, made a short bow, and retreated from the house, without uttering another word.—Dramatic Table-Talk.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Tragedy of

BRUTUS; OR THE FALL OF TARQUIN.

[By HOWARD PAYNE.]

Tullia, Mrs FAUCIT. Tarquinia, Miss FAUCIT. Lucretia, Mrs NEWCOMBE.
Priestess of Rhea's Temple, Mrs WEBSTER. Vestal, Mrs EAST.
Lavinia, Miss CRAWFORD.
Titus, Mr COOPER. Sextus Tarquin, Mr YOUNGE. Arums, Mr J. VINING.
Lucius Junius, Mr KEAN.
Collatinus, Mr H. WALLACK. Claudius, Mr COOKE.
Valerius, Mr THOMPSON. Lucretius, Mr HAMMERTON.
Horatius, Mr YARNOLD. Celius, Mr EATON.
Flavius Corunna, Mr FENTON. Centurion, Mr C. JONES.
Messenger, Mr HONNER. First Roman, Mr DOWSING.
Second Roman, Mr S. JONES. Third Roman, Mr BISHOP.

In the course of the Evening, Beethoven's Overture to 'Coriolan,' and an Overture, chiefly adapted from Irish Airs, and Auber's Overture to 'La Muette de Portici.'

After which,

PERFECTION.

Susan, Mrs Orger, Kate O'Brien, Mrs Waylett, in which she will sing, 'My own Blue Bell,' (A. Lee) and the Irish Ballad of 'Kate Kearney.'
Charles Paragon, Mr Vining. Sir Lawrence Paragon, Mr W. Bennett.
Sam, Mr Webster.

To conclude with the Grand Opera of

MASANIELLO.

[By M. AUBER.]

Elvira, Miss Byfeld. Fenella, Mrs Barrymore. Inis, Miss Chikini.
Masaniello, Mr Sinclair. Don Alphonso, Mr T. Cooke. Pietro, Mr Bedford.
Ruffino, Mr Bland. Lorenzo, Mr Howard. Moreno, Mr Yarnold.

To-morrow, School for Scandal; a Ballet; and the Pantomime.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Tragedy of

FAZIO.

[By Mr MILMAN.]

Marchesa Aldabella, Miss TAYLOR, Clara, Miss PHILLIPS,
Bianca, Miss F. KEMBLE, Giraldi Fazio, Mr WARDE,
Duke of Florence, Mr EGERTON, Bartolo, Mr BLANCHARD,
Philario, Mr HENRY, Falsetto, Mr PARRY, Gonsalvo, Mr BAKER.

Previous to the Tragedy, a Grand MS. Overture, by F. Kuhlau.
Previous to the 'Married Lovers,' an Overture by J. N. Hummel.
Previous to 'Comrades and Friends,' Nicolo's Overture to "La Ruse Inutile,"

After which a New Petite Comedy, called

MARRIED LOVERS.

[By Mr POWER.]

The Songs composed by Mr Barnett.
Duchess D'Orleans, Miss Lawrence. Marchioness de Meneville, Miss Taylor.
Lady Ascot, Mrs Chatterley. Annette, Miss Phillips.
Duc D'Orleans, Mr Abbott. Marquis de Meneville, Mr Bartley.
Sir John Ascot, Mr Warde. Colonel O'Dillon, Mr Power. Pierre, Mr Irwin.
Francis, Mr Mears.

To conclude with a New Drama, in Two Acts, to be called

COMRADES AND FRIENDS; OR, LIFE FOR LIFE.

[The Music selected and arranged by Mr G. Stansbury.]
Madame Derville, Mrs Chatterley, Madame Bertrand, Mrs Vining,
Nina, Miss Kendall, Eliza, Miss E. Kendall, Laurette, Miss Taylor.
Roland Duroc, Charles Valcour, } Sergeants of a French Regiment, { Mr Warde, Mr Abbott,
Morazzi (the Adjutant), Mr G. Bennett,
Henry (Commander of the Packet), Mr Duruset, La Mouche, Mr Turnour,
Dumont (Lieutenant of the Regiment), Mr Henry,
Adolphus (Son of Madame Derville), Miss Hunt, Joseph, Mr Fuller,
Valentine (an old Domestic) Mr Barnes, Paul, Mr Addison.
In Act II. A Dance of Peasantry.

To-morrow, Cinderella; Hide and Seek; and Teddy the Tiler.

FRENCH PLAYS, THEATRE ROYAL, HAYMARKET.

In the course of the Season, the following Performers will appear for the first time.
Mademoiselle LEONTINE FAY, du Theâtre du Gymnase.
Madame ALBERT, du Theâtre des Nouveautés.
M. BRUNET, Artiste, du Theâtre des Variétés.

Seventh appearance of Mons. BOUFFE, and Second of Mlle. JAMIN.

On commencera à Sept Heures et demie par la Première Représentation de

LA FAMILLE DE RIQUEBOURG.

Vaudeville nouveau en Un Acte, de M. SCRIBE.
Mademoiselle JAMIN remplira le Rôle de Hortense de Riquebourg.
Elise, Nièce de Riquebourg, Mlle. FLORVAL.
M. Riquebourg, Négociant, M. DERVAL. George, son Neveu, M. PAULIN.
Le Vicomte D'Heremberg, M. ALFRED.
Lapierre, Domestique de Riquebourg, M. ARNAUD.

Suivi de

ANTOINE; OU, LES TROIS GENERATIONS.

Pièce en Trois Epoques, Mêlé de Chant, par MM. MELESVILLE et BRAZIER.
Léon, Fils du Marquis de St. Valler, et Jules, son petit Fils, Mlle St Ange.
La Marquise de St. Valler, Madame Préval.
Clémentine, sa Nièce, Mlle. Florval. La Comtesse de Moirmont, Mme. Baudin.
La Baronne de Lorges, Mademoiselle Eliza.
Henriette, Fille de Leblanc fils, Mademoiselle Herminie.
Madeleine, Nièce d'Antoine, Mme. Gamard.
M. Bouffé remplira le Rôle d'Antoine. Le Marquis de St Valier, M. St Aubert.
Le Vicomte de Chailly, Col. de Chevaux Légers, M. Laporte.
Leblanc Père, Fermier, M. Préval. Le Président de Chatenay, M. Arnaud.
Le Consolier, M. Alfred. Le Chevalier de Mirecourt, M. Paulin.
Un Valet, M. Granville. Placide, Provincial, M. Gamard.
Bertrand, Concierge, M. Pelissié. François, M. Guenée.
Leblanc Fils, Manufacturier, M. Cloup.

Suivi de la Seconde Représentation de

PIERRE; OU, LE COUVREUR.

Vaudeville en Un Acte, en Cinq Tableaux, par MM. BRAZIER et CARMOUCHE.
Jasmin, Jokey, Mlle. Eliza. La Comtesse de Beauford, Mme. Préval.
Herminie, sa Nièce, Mlle. Corra. Josephine, Bouquetière, Mme. Gamard.
Madame Loquet, Portière, Madame Baudin.
M. Bouffé remplira le Rôle de Pierre, (his original character.)
Le Duc de Beauford, M. St. Aubert. Octave, amoureux d'Herminie, M. Paulin.
Bermont, Notaire, M. Préval. Bombardini, Chef d'Orchestre, M. Guenée.
Giraud, ami de Pierre, compagnon Couvreur, M. Gamard.
Un Clerc de Notaire, M. Arnaud. Un Gendarme, M. Granville.
Laffeur, Valet, M. Cloup.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elisabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs DALY.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called

KIND INTENTIONS.

Mrs Rosemore, Miss Daly. Charlotte, Miss M. Glover. Henry, Mr Hemmings.
Latitat, Mr S. Smith. Timothy, Mr Wilkinson. Mr Meanwell, Mr Mathews.

To conclude with, an entirely New Vaudeville, in Six Stages, and 2 Acts, called

BRINGING HOME THE BRIDE.

The Music arranged by Mr G. H. Rodwell.
The Characters by Mrs Fitzwilliam, Miss M. Glover, Mrs Beaumont,
Mr Yates, Mr Downe, Mr J. Reeve, Mr Sanders, Mr Charles, Mr Wisp,
Mr Wilson, Mr Morris, Mr Childe, Mr Fry, Mr Chapman, Mr Paule,
Mr Brown, Mr Mordaunt, Mr V. Webster, Mr S. Smith.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, in one Act, called

MIS-APPREHENSION.

[By Mr C. DANCE.]

Miss Clementina Bramble, Miss STUART. Fanny, Miss PINCOTT.
Ellen, Miss KABREY. Miss Bramble's Maid, Miss BERRESFORD.
Frank Hartley, Mr RAYMOND. Thomas. Mr COOPER.
Money, Mr W. VINING. Mr Williams, Mr COATES.
Police Officer, Mr WORRELL. Shopmen, Messrs YOUNG and HITCHINSON.

After which, an entirely new Burletta, in One Act, called

DUKE FOR A DAY.

The Music by B. Livius, Esq.
Aline, Miss Sidney. The Duke de Valmont, Mr Hodges. Julian, Madame Vestris.
The Seneschal, Mr W. Vining. Antoine, Mr Newcombe.
Blaise, Mr Cooper. Jerome, Mr Worrell. Servants, Retainers, &c.

After which, a Comic Burletta, called

THE CHASTE SALUTE

[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]

The Music, by C. E. Horn.
The Characters by Miss Stuart, Miss Fitzwalter, Miss Sidney,
Mr Spagnoletti, Mr Newcombe, and Mr Collier.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]
Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.
Pandora, Madame Vestris.

SURREY THEATRE.

The Spanish Hercules, Monsieur Louis VALLI, will go through his Gymnastic Exercises.

After which, an entirely New Romantic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

THE FIRE RAISER, OR THE HAUNTED MOOR.

The Characters by Miss SOMERVILLE, Miss M. C. POOLE, Miss JORDAN,
Miss NICOL, Mr OSBALDISTON, Mr ALMAR, Mr WILLIAMS, Mr HONNER,
Mr C. HILL, Mr GOUGH, Mr VALE, Mr EDWIN, Mr ROGERS,
Mr ASBURY, Master F. CARBERY, Mr LEE, Mr HOBBS.

To conclude with an entirely new Nautical Melo-Drama, to be called

THE WATER WITCH.

The Music by Mr Blewitt.
The Characters by Miss Somerville, Miss M. C. Poole, Mr Osbaldiston,
Mr Williams, Mr Vale, Mr Honner, Mr Rogers, Mr Ransford,
Messrs Hobbs, Boulanger, Grammer, Woolf, Tully, &c.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,

TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

A Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called

EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.

The Characters by Mrs GLOVER, Miss SINCLAIR, Miss GARRICK,
Miss STOHWASSER, Miss WELLS, Miss LAWS, Mr SMITH, Mr TILBURY,
Mr MUNROE, Mr BARNETT, and Mr GREEN.

After which, a Farcical Entertainment, entitled

THE MERRY WIVES OF BARBICAN.

The Music, by Mr Harroway.
The Characters by Mrs Humby, Miss Wells, Miss Garrick, Miss Stohwasser,
Miss Brothers, Mrs Garrick, and Mr J. Russell.

To which will be added, a New Comic Piece, in Two Acts, entitled

TACT.

[By M. BARNETT.]

The Music, by J. A. Barnett.
The Characters by Miss Stohwasser, Mrs Humby, Mr Smith, Mr Munroe, Mr Spencer, Mr Forrester, Mr Tilbury, Mr Taylor, Mr J. Conquest, and Mr J. Russell.

To conclude with a New Operatic Piece, entitled

GALATEA.

From GAY'S Serenata. With HANDEL'S Music, arranged by Mr C. POTTER.
Principal Characters by Miss Vernon, Mrs Garrick, Mrs Humby, Mr Bennett,
Mr J. Ruussell, Mr Spencer, Mr G. Smith, Mr Munroe,
Mr G. Lejune, and Mr E. Seguin.
And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.
The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, &c.

COBURG THEATRE.—De L'Orme—The Old Oak Chest.
—The Death of Christophe.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.—Richard III.—The Tale of Mystery.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL,—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EARLS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.
C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

№ 153.] [Price Twopence.

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

TUESDAY, MARCH 1, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

Sonnets and Fugitive Pieces. By Charles Tennyson, Trin. Coll. 12mo. pp. 83. Richardson.

Poems, chiefly Lyrical. By Alfred Tennyson. 12mo. pp. 154. Effingham Wilson.

[Continued from No. 151.]

Mr Charles Tennyson's volume is occupied chiefly with Sonnets; on which account he modestly quotes in his title-page part of a line in Wordsworth.—

'The Sonnet's humble plot of ground.'

It is a plot that may contain many pretty things, like Chaucer's "green-closet," in the Bower and the Leaf; or a Persian's little bit of pet garden, an inch of lawn, amid a lump of roses and plane trees, which he wins from the mountain waste, and makes a nest for a mistress and a guitar. This is an image that would vindicate the illegitimacy of Mr Tennyson's Sonnets, which are not according to the arbitrary rule of the master he has quoted, and of the Italians. They consist of fourteen lines, but the rhymes of the octave are not according to rule: the rhyme is varied. It is not of much consequence; though undoubtedly the greater the difficulty, the greater the mastery, provided the current of the poet's words be natural and unimpeded. The greater or less indifference to the legitimate structure of sonnet during the age of Shakspeare, when almost all the great writers of that day contributed their portion to the stock, and Italian poetry was in vogue, is not unworthy of remark. Shakspeare's Sonnets, which are numerous, are all illegitimate. He does not seem to have cared to avail himself of any of the details of Italian literature within his reach, with the exception of what Paynter's collection of stories furnished him for his plots. He calls Roméo, Rómeo, and Desdémona, Desdemóna: and so familiar has he made us with those pronunciations, that we almost think the Italian the wrong ones. The Sonnets of Daniel, who married a sister of John Florio, author of the Italian Dictionary, are as illegitimate as Shakspeare's. Sir Philip Sydney's are legitimate. Drummond's are partly so, and partly otherwise. Spenser (and Drummond too sometimes) has made a sort of compromise with the legitimacy of the Italian, by repeating one of the rhymes of the octave, though not the other. Shakspeare's Sonnets, however, are in one respect of the most legitimate kind. They are evidently written under the impulses of the moment: which is probably one of the reasons why he would not stop to consider the arbitrary construction. It has been doubted whether that construction suits the genius of the English language: but the doubt is anterior to the publication of Mr Wordsworth's sonnets, and after those it would be difficult to repeat it. The honour, whatever it may be, of overcoming the difficulty, is greater in English than Italian: while on the other hand, the pleasure of the perusal is likely perhaps to be less; rhymes being so much more numerous in Italian, and having probably been multiplied in the sonnet for that reason, in order that so small a poem might contain some reasonable difficulty of execution. We certainly think that a great deal of genuine harmony, and a result peculiar to itself, are perceptible in the illegitimate structure of the English sonnet, when written by a masterly hand. It may be remarked by the way, as a matter of curiosity, that among the sonnets of Milton, which are all written after strict rule, agreably to his Italian scholarship, there is a comic one, fashioned upon the principle recognised in such cases; to wit, with a coda, or tail to it. It begins

'Because you have thrown off your prelate lord;'

and is erroneously put by the editors among his miscellanies.

Mr Charles Tennyson dedicates his volume to his "sister Mary" in a sonnet ending with an address to the critics, half playful, and half serious, in a very fraternal style, which takes us much:—

'Critics! be your dispraise from harshness free
And scornful gibe, nor give me cause to grieve;
For, if ye sternly say I cannot sing,
My Sister's name is on a shamed thing!'

We have the pleasure of saying, that the name is upon a volume fit to be bound like a casket, and to be laid among the most honoured elegancies of the boudoir. We hope we have thus propitiated the Grace that presides over fraternal compliments, (a rare piety, and much to be cultivated). On first looking at the dedication, we felt ourselves threatened with some new aspect of Nemesis, and began to consider what goddess there was in the household list of the ancients, whose business it should be to avenge the læsa majestas of the young lady.

The author has scarcely turned over a new leaf, when he presents us with a sonnet on a kiss, not of the fraternal order. Its beginning is much to the purpose, and not to be mended:—

'When lovers' lips from kissing disunite
With sound as soft as mellow fruitage breaking,
They loathe to quit what was so sweet in taking,
So fraught with breathless magical delight.'

This is beautiful. But the close of the next quatrain is not orthodox. It is not in the interior of love's religion:—

'The scent of flowers is long before it fade,
Long dwells upon the gale the vesper-tone,
Far floats the wake the lightest skiff has made,
The closest kiss when once imprest is gone.'

We venture to say that there are many female lips, (it may not be so easy to predicate it of male), which retain the impression of a kiss for many hours afterwards; aye, or even of an arm round the waist, or a kiss on the hand. But these are the delicacies of a faith not lightly to be discussed.

It is well said, in the Sonnet to the Lark,

'Peace dwells with thee for ever, not the peace
Of cool reflection, but redundant glee.'

A similar point,—the calmness of excessive motion, and of a rapid whirl of the life within us, like that of an infant's blood, or what we may suppose of the planets, is finely touched upon in the following sonnet, which is nobly written. The two last lines we omit as inferior to the others:—

'Vexation waits on passion's changeful glow,
But the intellect may rove a thousand ways
And yet be calm while fluctuating so:
The dew-drop shakes not to its shifting rays,
And transits of soft light—be bold to choose
This never satiate freedom of delight
Before the fiery bowl and red carouse,
And task for joy thy soul's majestic might:
So for the sensual will be rarer need;
So will thy mind a giant's force assume,
Strong as the centre of the deep Maelstroom,
When flung into the calm of sightless speed.'

Mr Charles Tennyson, like his brother, is a genuine lover of nature, but seems to prefer the hour of evening for his landscapes. Our impression from the other is, that he prefers to begin with the very beginning of morning, and to have all the day before him. The one seems to wish to be exercising his powers, the other to have arrived at the end of them. We extract a series of landscapes from Charles's volume, in which this propensity to the decline of the day is beautifully observable. In Sonnet 46, there is mention of the morning; but it is characterized by the pealing of the huntsman's horn, and by the first reflection of wood in water, as the twilight clears away; which latter circumstance is new and striking. The succeeding lines, however, descriptive of evening, are far better, especially the last one, which we have marked in Italics; though "busy" is not a good word:—

— 'When cool eve is busy on thy shores,
With trails of purple shadow from the west,
Or dushing in the wake of tardy oars.'

SONNET XL.

(A Summer's Evening.)

'It is a summer's gloaming, faint and sweet,
A gloaming brightened by an infant moon,
Fraught with the fairest light of middle June;
The garden path rings hard beneath my feet,

Digitized by Google

And hark, O hear I not the gentle dews
Fretting the silent forest in his sleep?
Or does the stir of housing insects creep
Thus faintly on mine ear? day's many hues
Wan'd with the paling light, and are no more,
And none but drowsy pinions beat the air;
The bat is circling softly by my door,
And silent as the snow-flake* leaves his lair,
In the dark twilight flitting here and there,
Wheeling the self-same circuit o'er and o'er.'

SONNET XIX.

(Evening.)

'See'st thou how clear and sharp the shadows are Among the cattle on yon ridgy field;
So softly glooming amid light so fair:
Yon mighty trees no blasts may dare to wield;
The things that own most motion and most sound
Are trunced and silent in a golden swound;
Where is the wind? Not in yon glassy sky—
Not in the trees—what deep tranquillity
Has hushed his voice? Methinks so calm should fall
The eve before the great millenial morn,
Before the first of those high days is born,
Whose placid tenor shall be peace to all:
Sink deeply in my thought, surpassing scene!
And be thy memory clear, for I would live therein.'

SONNET XLVIII.

(An Evening Sun and Shower.)

'Hung on the show'r that fronts the golden west
The rainbow bursts like magic on mine eyes,
In hues of olden promise there imprest,
Frail in its date, eternal in its guise—
The vision is so lovely that I feel
My heart endued with beauty like its own,
And taking an indissoluble seal
From what is here a moment, and is gone;
It lies so soft on the full-breasted storm,
New born o'the middle air, and dewy-pure,
And tricked in nature's choicest garniture;
What can be seen of lovelier dye or form?
While all the groves assume a ghastly stain,
Caught from the leaden rack and shining rain.'

TO FORESTS.

'Ye mighty forests, deep and old,
With knotty stems and towering shade,
That, where the lordly streams are rolled,
A dense and matted gloom have made:

Your arms are rife with germs of life,
Your heads receive the rushing wind:
With lingering sweeps the night-breeze creeps
O'er your thick robes and wrinkled rind:

Ye stand like shrouds before the clouds,
That hold the sunset of mid-June—
And darker still, when o'er the hill
Creeps the pale dawning of the moon.

O then the soft suffusion clear
Peers over your enormous screen,
The skies are white with silver light,
How grand the shade! how sweet the sheen!

And when the sun's first rosy line
Is drawn i'th'east—thro' every glade
A glow with golden dews ye shine,
And orange tints your depths pervade.'

[To be concluded.]

* We must object to the simile of the snow-flake, as not harmonious and seasonable.

A FALSE POSITION.—Marcel was a dancing-master, and the first posture-master of his day. He used to say that none but the English possessed dignity enough for dancing well. He was so wrapt up in the sublimity of his art, that he would not pardon the least inelegance of posture. In his latter days, he was in very reduced circumstances, and severely afflicted with the gout. A young lady, who had been one of his pupils, prevailed with her father to obtain him a pension from the king, and she was deputed to present it to him. She ran up to his chair, her eyes sparkling with joy, and put it into his hand. He immediately threw it from him, and said, "Go, and take it up, Mademoiselle, and present it to me, as I taught you." She burst into tears, and obeyed. "I consent to take it now, and thank you; but your elbow was not quite rounded enough."—Dramatic Table-Talk.—[This is the way in which the graces of nature are destroyed by the formality of art, and women are first rendered artificial, and then censured for not being natural. M. Marcel, who was so desirous of a theatrical presentation of his pension, deserved to have it in theatrical coin; and however faulty might be the position of the young lady's elbow, one cannot help thinking that her heart was in the right place.]

CHAT AND MISCELLANIES.

"The little and short sayings of wise and excellent men are of great value, like the dust of gold, or the least sparks of diamonds."—Tillotson.

PROPERTY TAX.—It is said, that the Venetians had a property-tax of ten per cent, many centuries ago.

SLIGHT TENURE OF FRIENDSHIP.—A word ill taken obliterates ten years' merit. The last action carries it: not the best and most frequent offices, but the most recent and present do the work.—Montaigne.

— The reason of a thing is not to be enquired after till you are sure the thing itself be so. We commonly are at "What's the reason of it?" before we are sure of the thing. It was an excellent question of my Lady Cotton, when Sir Robert Cotton was magnifying of a shoe, which was Moses's or Noah's, and wondering at the strange shape and fashion of it, "But, Mr Cotton," says she, "are you sure it is a shoe?"—Selden.

AN ECCLESIASTICAL PARADISE.—From thence I proceeded to Bonn, a pleasant town near the Rhine, about twelve miles south-east of Cologne. The palace, which is spacious and superb, has from every part of the front a view from the Rhine, at a distance of about two miles, across a delightful garden both extensive and magnificent, lost to the right and left in the expanse of a level fruitful country. Beyond the Rhine appears a sweep of very high hills, dispersed and retiring in noble disorder, covered with trees, verdure, and, in appearance, round towers, and the ruins of great buildings. To the rear, there is nothing to be seen but the town, about a couple of miles in circumference, well enough built, and a country full of trees and corn. The present Elector is Maximilian, the Emperor's brother. The world, and that enchanting seat weighed more with him than the pleasures of a nuptial bed; for you know the electors of Bonn are always ecclesiastics. I stayed but one day there. The morning we left it, we saw him at a distance in the gardens,—a book in his hand—I suppose reading his morning breviary,—with some fine-looking women. He saw at once we were strangers, approached, and addressed us with that familiar easy politeness that so eminently marks his character. He was in his usual dress (black), quite plain and simple; his size about five feet eight inches; pretty fat; his face long, ruddy, and an aquiline nose. He is lower and grosser than the Emperor; but a family likewise is discernible. His revenue is very inconsiderable; and keeps in pay no more than about fifty soldiers; but he is sincerely beloved by his subjects, for his simplicity, benevolence, and justice. His affability led him to ask many questions about England, the Royal Family, Ireland, &c. He pressed Captain Hall and me to dine with him; but our engagement had been fixed with a public carriage, and we were obliged to leave himself and his ladies in full enjoyment of their Paradise, in order to proceed to Coblentz —Descriptive Journey, &c. by a Young Nobleman. 1786.

CHRISTIAN HUMILITY.—The King of Portugal upon his first arrival at Queluz, observed some chairs placed in one of the state apartments. "What is all this?" said he, "What is all this? How came these chairs here?" The attendants replying that they were intended for the use of the Cortes, when they came to pay their duty to their Majesty, he quickly rejoined, "The Cortes! Take them away instantly! No person shall ever use a chair in my presence!" All the Royal Family have hitherto been approached on the knee only; and a Portuguese lady and her daughters, in rather delicate health, complained to me very lately, that it was always so great a fatigue to them to pay a visit to the Queen and Princesses in their own apartments, that they usually went to bed immediately after their return from the royal presence, and this in consequence of their being obliged to remain kneeling the whole time that these high personages chose to prolong the conversation!—Mrs Baillie's Letters from Lisbon in 1821, 1822, and 1823.

THE WRONG TRIUMPHANT—FOR A TIME.—The thesis which Ramus maintained in order to obtain his degree of Master of Arts, gave great offence to the world. He proposed to maintain this proposition, 'That the doctrines of Aristotle were false.' His success in this dispute emboldened him, and inspired him with the desire to probe to the bottom the philosophy of Aristotle, and to combat it vigorously. The first two works he published on this matter caused great broils in the university of Paris. He was cited before the criminal court, as a man who wished to overturn both religion and science. Francis the First must needs meddle in the dispute; after a very partial examination of the doctrine of Ramus, his books were interdicted throughout the kingdom, and he was condemned to abstain from teaching philosophy any more. His enemies manifested their joy in the most surprising manner. The taking of a great city, or the gaining of an important battle could not have caused more ado. At the theatre even, Ramus was ridiculed in a variety of ways, amidst the acclamations and applauses of the Peripatetics.—[Peter Ramus was born in the year 1515 and died in 1573. Not many years after, the celebrated Lord Bacon gave the death-blow to the ascendancy of Aristotle; and it is a curious circumstance, and no less instructive to majorities than encouraging to those who may happen to be in a small minority on questions of importance, that Ramus is now believed to have been right, and might now, in the same city, maintain his doctrines without even an opponent.—F. F.]

Digitized by Google

THE PLAY-GOER.

BY THE ORIGINAL THEATRICAL CRITIC IN THE EXAMINER.

PERFORMANCES OF LAST NIGHT.

DRURY LANE.—Brutus; Perfection; and Masaniello.
COVENT GARDEN.—Paulo.—Married Lovers.—And Comrades and Friends.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.

We are sorry to be again under the necessity of finding fault with a new piece at this pleasant little theatre; but we have no praise to bestow on the Duke for a Day, except that some parts of the music are pretty. Its best support is in Madame VESTRIS's legs. The piece, it seems by the play-bills, is taken from a French opera entitled Le Nouveau Seigneur, the music of which is by BOIELDIEU. Mr LIVIUS has adapted the music, and added an overture and other music of his own composition and adaptation. "Which is which" we cannot decide; for the bill is somewhat obscure on this head; and the overture, we are sorry to say, we missed.—[To those, by the way, who object to our making these confessions, we can only observe, that they will at least serve to shew the conscience with which we criticize what we do see." To which we may add, that we feel it right for the author or other persons concerned to have the benefit of such confessions.] We repeat, therefore, that some of the music is very pretty: indeed, the whole of it, that we heard, may be so characterized. Two or three of the passages have even an air of pleasing novelty, not unworthy the name of the French composer. Whether Mr LIVIUS had any share in these or not, we cannot say, as we met with no book of the songs; but at all events, the music is creditable to his taste.

For the rest we have not a syllable of approbation. Amicus Livius, amica Vestris; at magis amica Veritas. If the Duke for a Day is taken from Le Nouveau Seigneur, words as well as music, and the original piece is a good one, then the translator in his abridgment (for the French piece is called an "opera") must by some unfortunate accident have left out all the vivacity and retained the dullness. The plot is told in few words, and there is no dialogue worth speaking of. A young Duke (Mr HODGES) is going to visit a seat of his ancestors, where he has never been before, and is preceded by his page (Madame VESTRIS) who takes it into his head to personate his master. The Page is accordingly honoured in that character: he receives the homage of the Seneschal and the villagers; gives a dinner; and takes likings to the pretty girls. The real Duke meanwhile arrives in secret, and watches him; and one or two equivoques take place between him and his unconscious tenants. The Seneschal has two nephews, one of the name of Antoine, a reasonable proper fellow (Mr NEWCOMBE) who loves and is beloved by Aline (Miss SYDNEY); the other, Blaize (Mr COOPER) a ninny and a butt, who loves her in vain. Antoine has the disguised Duke's good-will for his marriage; but the Page, who has taken a liking to Aline, thinks proper to prefer Blaize for her husband. The reader naturally thinks that something might be made of all this in the dialogue; but there is nothing. The page is a little bit of a Don Juan; that is all; and he is performed by Madame VESTRIS, which is much: but it will not do. The matter is not mended by a payment of gold, which the Seneschal comes to pay to the pretended Duke, and which mightily tempts his Grace to be a thief. Dukes have been thieves before now, and pages too; but people do not go to a theatre to learn humanities no higher than the contempt of stealing; and we are ashamed for the gallant Page, both when he is tempted, and when he overcomes the temptation. To conclude, the Duke makes his appearance in the middle of the dinner given by his mimic; and the due fright and forgiveness terminate in a chorus.

Madame VESTRIS looks, acts, and sings in her usual pleasing manner;—she has a pretty page's dress, and a cap with a feather curling round behind it and caressing the back part of her neck in a most refined fashion; and then we need not say, how meritorious is her leg. It was the first time, by the way, for some years, that we had seen her leg; and after the late noise made about it in the sculptors' shops, the sight had all the intensity of a first vision. It is a most gracefully turned piece of nature's workmanship, there is no doubt; though we may suggest to the fair proprietor, that dark-laced boots do not set it off so well, as if the shoe and the legging were of one colour. Nature has not given the ladies fair calves, and inky feet and ancles. A leg, to be seen at its best, should appear all of one hue, like the real leg, or that of a statue. A white shoe, with a white rose in it, we take to be the foot plus ultra.

Good, however, as the singing and acting of Madame VESTRIS is, and exemplary her leg, we must caution her how she bestows them upon dull pieces. She is always sure of a certain degree of applause, especially when she asks for it at the fall of the curtain; but the impression she leaves, on occasions like the present, is that she has been helping an indifferent production, not that the production has added to her stock; and this is not to the advantage of her theatre.

☞

TALMA ON THEATRICAL COSTUME.—"Every actor ought to be his own tutor," says Talma. "If he has not in himself the necessary faculties for expressing the passions, and painting characters, all the lessons in the world cannot give them to him."—After some remarks on the importance of correct costume on the stage, this tragedian observes,—"The theatre ought to offer to youth, in some measure, a course of living history; and does not this negligence [of costume] give him entirely false notions of the habits and manners of the historical characters whom tragedy revives? I remember very well that, in my youth, the reading of history presented to my imagination the kings and princes, as I had seen them on the stage; I figured to myself Bayard elegantly dressed in a chamois-coloured coat, without a beard, and powdered and frizzed like a petit-maitre of the eighteenth century: Cæsar I pictured to my mind, tightly buttoned in a white satin coat, and his long flowing locks tied with rosettes of riband."

GAMING is said to have been invented by the Lydians, when under the pressure of great famine: to divert themselves from their sufferings, they contrived dice, balls, tables, &c. "More likely," says a learned censor, "the passage ought to be otherwise translated, 'the Lydians, having contrived dice, balls, and tables, were reduced to great famine, and to extreme sufferings, &c.'"—Montaigne seems to be well aware of the evils of gaming, and gives us the reason why he relinquished it. "I used (says he) to like formerly games of chance with cards and dice; but of that folly I have long been cured, merely because I found that whatever good countenance I put on when I lost, I did not feel my vexation the less."—Father le Compte, in his Travels in China, says, "Gaming is equally prohibited among the common people and the mandarins, and yet this does not hinder their playing, and frequently losing all they have—their lands, houses, children, and even their wives, which are all sometimes laid on a single card."—Shakspeare says, "Keep a gamester from the dice, and a good student from his book, and it is wonderful."—Lord Bacon, says, "A gamester, the greater master he is of his art, the worse man he is."—And Addison says, "Could we look into the mind of a common gamester; we should see it full of nothing but trumps and matadores; his slumbers haunted with kings, queens, and knaves."

THE LANGUAGE OF PRECIOUS STONES.—In Poland every individual is supposed to be born under the influence of some particular destiny or fate, which it is impossible for him to avoid. The month of his nativity has a mysterious connection with one of the known precious stones, and when a person wishes to make the object of his affections an acceptable present, a ring is invariably given, composed of the jewel by which the fate of that object is imagined to be determined and described. For instance, if a woman is born in January, her ring must be a jacynth or a garnet, for these stones belong to that peculiar month of the year, and express constancy and fidelity. I saw a list of them all, which was given by a Polander to a lady who allowed me to copy it:—

January -	Jacynth or Garnet.—Constancy and fidelity in every engagement.
February -	Amethyst.—This month and stone preserves mortals from strong passions, and ensures them peace of mind.
March -	Bloodstone.—Courage and success in dangers and hazardous enterprises.
April - -	Sapphire or Diamond.—Repentance and innocence.
May - -	Emerald.—Success in love.
June - -	Agate.—Long life and health.
July - -	Cornelian or Ruby.—The forgetfulness or the cure of evils springing from friendship or love.
August -	Sardonyx.—Conjugal fidelity.
September	Chrysolite.—Preserves from, or cures folly.
October -	Acquamarine, or Opal.—Misfortune and hope.
November	Topaz.—Fidelity and friendship.
December	Turquoise, or Malakite.—The most brilliant success and happiness in every circumstance of life; the turquoise has also the property of securing friendly regard;—hence the old saying, that "he who possesses a turquoise, will always be sure of friends."—Baillie's Lisbon in 1821, &c.

Digitized by Google

PERFORMANCES FOR THIS EVENING.

KING'S THEATRE.

An Opera Buffa, in Two Acts, entitled

IL MATRIMONIO SEGRETO.

[By CIMAROSA.]

Principal Characters by Madame SIGL VESPERMANN, Miss FANNY AYTON, Mademoiselle FILIANI, Signor DAVID, Mr E. SEGUIN, and Signor LABLACHE.

After which, a New Grand Ballet, founded on Sir WALTER SCOTT'S Novel of KENILWORTH.

[By M. DESHAYES.]

The Music by Signor Costa.

The Principal Characters by Mademoiselle Brocard, Mademoiselle Kaniel, Mademoiselle Clara, Mademoiselle Proche, Mademoiselle Zoe Beaufere, and Madame Montessu, Mesdames J. Mersie, De Vis, Coupotte, Beseke, Vedy, Griffiths, Pitt, Laura, Lydia, Clari, &c.

M. Lefebvre, M. Simon, M. Emile, M. Gouriet, M. Venafra, M. O'Brien, M. Edouard, M. George, M. D'Albert, M. Bertram, M. Hunt, and M. Paul.

With an efficient and numerous Corps de Ballet.

THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE.

The Comedy of

THE SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL.

[By Mr SHERIDAN.]

Lady Teazle, Miss CHESTER. Lady Sneerwell, Mrs FAUCIT.
Mrs Candour, Mrs ORGER. Maria, Miss FAUCIT. Maid, Mrs WEBSTER.
Sir Peter Teazle, Mr FARREN. Sir Oliver Surface, Mr DOWTON.
Joseph Surface, Mr MACREADY. Charles Surface, Mr WALLACK.
Sir Benjamin Backbite, Mr HARLEY. Crabtree, Mr W. BENNETT
Careless, Mr YARNOLD. Rowley, Mr YOUNGE.
Moses, Mr WEBSTER. Trip, Mr BALLS. Snake, Mr THOMPSON
Sir Harry, (with a Song) Mr SINCLAIR.
John, Mr HONNER. William, Mr C. JONES.
First Gentleman, Mr EAST. Second Gentleman, Mr S. JONES.

Previous to the Comedy, G. Onslow's Overture to 'Alcade de La Vega.'

After which,

A DIVERTISEMENT.

Principal Dancers, Mademoiselles Celeste and Constance, Miss Baseke, Miss Barnett, and Madlle. R. Guet.
Misses Ballin, Lane, M'Henry, Lydia.
Mesdames, Gear, Vallancey, Willmott, Griffiths, A. Jones, Claire, Webster.
Mr Gilbert,
Messrs. Bartlett, Baker, Wieland, Chikini, Downe, Stanley, Roffey, and Burdett

To conclude with the New Splendid Christmas Comic Pantomime, called

DAVY JONES.

[By Mr W. BARRYMORE.]

The Overture and Music, by Mr R. Hughes.
Columbines, Misses Barnett and Baseke. Harlequin, Mr Howell,
Pantaloon, Mr T. Blanchard, Clowns, Messrs Southby and E. J. Parsloe.

THE ORDER OF THE SCENERY.

Scene I.—The North Foreland, with Light House.—II. Mother Carey's Refectory, and Coral Cave in the Deep, Deep Sea.—III. Quarter-Deck of the Spanker.—IV. Susan's Cottage, by Moonlight.—V. The Bilboes.—VI. The Sun's Watery Bed.—VII. Farm House, Sunrise.—VIII. Ruins of the Argyle Rooms the Night after the Fire.—IX. Belle Vue Cottage and surrounding Neighbourhood.—X. The Brighton Archway, Erected in Honour of their Majesties' Visit to Brighton, August 30th, 1830. With a New Nautical Ballet.—XI. Commercial Dock Canal.—XII. Nursery for Pet Children.—XIII. Outside of Upholsterers.—XIV. The Diorama.—XV. Grand Hydraulic Temple, Illustrative of the Union of the Waters.

DIORAMA, Designed and Painted, by Mr STANFIELD.

The Various Views will Display, the Stupendous and Extraordinary Military PASS OF THE SIMPLON.

Town of Sion (in the Valois).—Valley of the Rhone.—Brieg.—The Simplon.—The Schalbet, by Moonlight.—Village of the Simplon.—Gallery of Algaby (with the Effects of a Storm).—The Grand Gallery! cut through a solid rock 596 ft. long.—Crevola.—Domo D'Ossola.—Fariolo.—Lago Maggiore, with the Boromean Islands

To-morrow, no Performance.

THEATRE ROYAL, COVENT GARDEN.

The Opera of

CINDERELLA.

The Music, by Rossini.

Cinderella, Miss INVERARITY. Clorinda, Miss CAWSE.
Thisbe, Miss HUGHES. Fairy Queen, Miss H. CAWSE.
Felix, Mr HUNT. Baron Pumpolino, Mr G. PENSON.
Alidoro, Mr G. STANSBURY. Dandini, Mr MORLEY.
Pedro, Mr KEELEY.

After the Opera, Mozart's Overture to 'La Clemenza di Tito.'
Previous to 'Teddy the Tiler,' Mozart's Overture to 'Zauberflote.'

After which, an Interlude, called

HIDE AND SEEK.

[By Mr LUNN.]

Mrs Mordaunt, Miss E. Tree, Charlotte, Miss Lawrence.
Mordaunt, Mr Diddear, Merton, Mr Duruset, Moses, Mr Keeley.

To conclude with the Farce of

TEDDY THE TILER.

Lady Dunderford, Mrs Daly, Oriel, Miss Lawrence,
Flora, Miss Nelson, Julia, Mrs Brown, Ladies, Mesds. Perry and Appleton.
Lord Dunderford, Mr Evans, Henry, Mr Duruset,
Frederick, Mr Baker, Bombardine, Mr Henry, Mr Scrivener, Mr Turnour,
Teddy Mulowney, the Tiler, Mr Power,
Tim, Mr Addison, Stiff, Mr Mears, Apewell, Mr Irwin, Constable, Mr Fuller, Richard, Mr Heath.

To-morrow, A Grand Musical Performance.

THEATRE ROYAL, ADELPHI.

An entirely New Serio-Magical and Moral Burletta, to be called

THE KING OF THE ALPS AND THE MISANTHROPE.

Mrs Rappelkoff, Miss DALY. Amelia, Mrs YATES.
Elizabeth, Mrs FITZWILLIAM. Sabina, Mrs DALY.
Astragalus, Mr YATES.
John Rappelkoff, Mr MATHEWS. Abel Grimm, Mr BUCKSTONE.
Augustus, Mr HEMMINGS. Christopher Glowworm, Mr J. REEVE.
Hans, Mr O. SMITH.

After which, a New Comic Burletta, called

KIND INTENTIONS.

Mrs Rosemore, Miss Daly. Charlotte, Miss M. Glover. Henry, Mr Hemmings.
Latitat, Mr S. Smith. Timothy, Mr Wilkinson. Mr Meanwell, Mr Mathews.

To conclude with, an entirely New Vaudeville, in Six Stages, and 2 Acts, called

BRINGING HOME THE BRIDE.

The Music arranged by Mr G. H. Rodwell.

The Characters by Mrs Fitzwilliam, Miss M. Glover, Mrs Beaumont, Mr Yates, Mr Downe, Mr J. Reeve, Mr Sanders, Mr Charles, Mr Wisp, Mr Wilson, Mr Morris, Mr Childe, Mr Fry, Mr Chapman, Mr Paulo, Mr Brown, Mr Mordaunt, Mr V. Webster, Mr S. Smith.

ROYAL OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A Comic Burletta, called

THE CHASTE SALUTE

[From M. SCRIBE'S "BAISER AU PORTEUR."]

The Music, by C. E. Horn.

The Characters by Miss STUART, Miss FITZWALTER, Miss SIDNEY, Mr SPAGNOLETTI, Mr NEWCOMBE, and Mr COLLIER.

After which, an entirely new Burletta, in One Act, called

DUKE FOR A DAY.

The Music by B. Livius, Esq.

Aline, Miss Sidney. The Duke de Valmont, Mr Hodges. Julian, Madame Vestris.
The Seneschal, Mr W. Vining. Antoine, Mr Newcombe.
Blaise, Mr Cooper. Jerome, Mr Worrell. Servants, Retainers, &c.

To which will be added, a Comic Burletta, in one Act, called

MIS-APPREHENSION.

[By Mr C. DANCE.]

The Characters by Miss Stuart, Miss Pincott, Miss Kabrey, Miss Berresford, Mr Raymond, Mr Cooper, Mr W. Vining, Mr Coates, and Mr Worrell.
Mr Young, and Mr Hitchinson.

To conclude with a Grand Allegorical Burletta, in One Act, entitled

OLYMPIC REVELS.

[Adapted from a burlesque of COLMAN'S, by Mr PLANCHE and Mr C. DANCE.]

Previous to which, an Overture, by J. N. Hummel.

Pandora, Madame Vestris.

SURREY THEATRE.

An entirely New Romantic Drama, in Two Acts, entitled

THE FIRE RAISER, OR THE HAUNTED MOOR.

The Characters by Miss SOMERVILLE, Miss M. C. POOLE, Miss JORDAN, Miss NICOL, Mr OSBALDISTON, Mr ALMAR, Mr WILLIAMS, Mr HONNER, Mr C. HILL, Mr GOUGH, Mr VALE, Mr EDWIN, Mr ROGERS, Mr ASBURY, Master F. CARBERY, Mr LEE, Mr HOBBS.

After which, an entirely New Broad Farcical One Act Drama, entitled

"SWING."

[By J. ALFRED and C. Z. BARNETT.]

Principal Characters by Miss Vincent, Miss Rumens, Mr Vale, Mr C. Hill, Mr Honner, Mr Williams, Mr Rogers, Mr Gough, Mr Asbury, Messrs. Young, &c.

To conclude with an entirely new Nautical Melo-Drama, to be called

THE WATER WITCH.

The Music by Mr Blewitt.

The Characters by Miss Somerville, Miss M. C. Poole, Mr Osbaldiston, Mr Williams, Mr Vale, Mr Honner, Mr Rogers, Mr Ransford, Messrs Hobbs, Boulanger, Grammer, Woolf, Tully, &c.

QUEEN'S THEATRE,

TOTTENHAM STREET, FITZROY SQUARE.

A Comic Entertainment, in One Act, called

EVERY BODY'S HUSBAND.

The Characters by Mrs GLOVER, Miss SINCLAIR, Miss GARRICK, Miss STOHWASSER, Miss WELLS, Miss LAWS, Mr SMITH, Mr TILBURY, Mr MUNROE, Mr BARNETT, and Mr GREEN.

After which, a Farcical Entertainment, entitled

THE MERRY WIVES OF BARBICAN.

The Music, by Mr Harroway.

The Characters by Mrs Humby, Miss Wells, Miss Garrick, Miss Stohwasser, Miss Brothers, Mrs Garrick, and Mr J. Russell.

To which will be added, a New Comic Piece, in Two Acts, entitled

TACT.

[By M. BARNETT.]

The Music, by J. A. Barnett.

The Characters by Miss Stohwasser, Mrs Humby, Mr Smith, Mr Munroe, Mr Spencer, Mr Forrester, Mr Tilbury, Mr Taylor, Mr J. Conquest, and Mr J. Russell.

To conclude with a New Operatic Piece, entitled

GALATEA.

From GAY'S Serenata. With HANDEL'S Music, arranged by Mr C. POTTER.

Principal Characters by Miss Vernon, Mrs Garrick, Mrs Humby, Mr Bennett, Mr J. Russell, Mr Spencer, Mr G. Smith, Mr Munroe, Mr G. Lejune, and Mr E. Seguin.

And a Chorus of Twenty Voices.

The Incidental Dances by Misses Gilbert, Forster, Ward, Hutton, Cadwell, &c.

COBURG THEATRE.—De L'Orme—The Old Oak Chest.—The Death of Christophe.

Published by J. ONWHYN, 4 Catherine street, Strand, (to whom all books, parcels, and communications for the Editor, are to be addressed); sold by J. CHAPPEL.—EFFINGHAM WILSON, Royal Exchange; A. HAYS, 165 Regent street; J. FIELD, 16 Air street, Piccadilly; MARSH, 145 Oxford street, next door to Fladong's Hotel; at EBERS's Library, Old Bond street; and by all Book-sellers and Newsmen.

C. and W. REYNELL, Printers, Broad street, Golden square.

Digitized by Google

No. 154.] [Price Twopence

THE TATLER.

A DAILY JOURNAL OF LITERATURE AND THE STAGE.

VERITAS ET VARIETAS.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2, 1831.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

THE EXTRAORDINARY BLACK BOOK: an Exposition of the United Church of England and Ireland; Civil List and Crown Revenues; Incomes, Privileges, and Power, of the Aristocracy; Privy Council, Diplomatic and Consular Establishments; Law and Judicial Administration; Representation and Prospects of Reform under the New Ministry; Profits, Influence, and Monopoly of the Bank of England and East India Company, with Strictures on the Renewal of the Charters; Debt and Funding System; Salaries, Fees, and Emoluments in Courts of Justice, Public Offices, and Colonies; Lists of Pluralities, Placemen, Pensioners, and Sinecurists: the whole corrected from the latest official Returns, and presenting a complete View of the Expenditure, Patronage, Influence, and Abuses of the Government, in Church, State, Law, and Representation. By the Original Editor. 8vo. pp. 576. Effingham Wilson.

WE copied out the whole of this title-page the other day, and we now repeat it, partly by way of joke for its voluminousness, but chiefly to let the reader see how important that voluminousness is. This publication, the advertisement tells us, has been rewritten and newly arranged, so as to become an entirely new work, and is sold at two-thirds of the price of former editions. It has sometimes been called The Black Book, and oftener The Reformers' Bible.

It is a Bible we shall often have occasion to preach from. We do not agree with all the positions of the Editor; but we do, heartily, with most of them; and (not to speak it profanely) think his Bible calculated to make the community "wise unto their salvation." Never was a more seasonable book; and never was the instant for it more fitted than the one at which we are now writing these words,—yes, this very instant,—at which we can hardly look towards a certain quarter in the western part of the metropolis, and not expect to see a fire burst out of it, like that of a great hay-rick.

Reader. Your words are alarming, Mr Editor. What! Do you mean set on fire by one of the rick-burners?

Far from it, dear Reader. We mean, set on fire by its own fretting heart and improper composition. What will be the result of the fermentation going on at this moment? What will be the aspect of the matter by the time this paper comes into the reader's hands? We are not allowed to write upon it: we cannot help thinking about it: we are sure of the end of it. But what will be the nature of the progress? What will be the progress all over Europe; for every quarter of it is concerned. That stone thrown into the waters on the 27th of July made a circle which will extend to its whole circumference. We have a strong personal inclination to think the best of some of the present Ministry. We like the natural candour of Lord Althorp, and pity it for the dangers by which it is beset. We feel grateful to Lord Brougham. We entertain a high opinion of his talents. We are not astonished at what he is doing in the Court of Chancery; for we know him to be a greater-minded man than people are accustomed to see in office, and of an ambition suitable to his intellect. In short, we confess that we grudge the Aristocracy their possession of him. But will he save all that they expect him to save for them? Or will they let him save the greater part in the only feasible way of doing it, if it can be done? We are sure he cannot do the one, even if he wishes it, which we trust is doubtful. We are almost as sure, that they would not allow the other. In a word, we find it impossible to associate two such ideas together, as a proper reform, and a reform headed by the Aristocracy. Were we to find ourselves mistaken, we should turn round, and be ready to worship public virtue in its most surprising shape: but we know of but one who has hitherto shewn an incarnation of that sort, and that is Lafayette. He is the only born aristocrat we are acquainted with, among the leaders of the world, who has no taint of exclusiveness.*

* We know one other born aristocrat, to whom the same character applies; but though an influential as well as excellent man, he is not a public man, in the ordinary sense of the word; and of him we dare not trust ourselves to speak at present.

We cannot help seizing this opportunity of adding a word or two to our "guesses." The opinion is increasing, we see, that France will speedily have a republic. It is said that the Italians will have a republic also. They will, if they are wise; but whatever may be the termination of their struggle, still we cannot help thinking that the Emperor of Austria, as a forlorn hope, will throw young Napoleon among them, both as a chance for a last hold, and out of spite to the French. We would have nothing to do with young Napoleon, if we were Italians, and could avoid it; nor with young Murat; nor with any king or kinglet, whole or half legitimate; because in all of them there is an instinct different from that of the public good. It is only by a miracle that we ever have such a thing as a truly great and good Sovereign, or even a truly good-humoured one,—an Alfred or William the Fourth. And even in the latter case, parties will be raising the most formidable rumours, and giving the public to understand how impossible they consider it for a King and his people to think alike.

But we detain the reader from his book. Our business with it at present is simply to give him some pungent tastes of its quality, in choice bits out of its list of places and pensions, &c.

'Bathurst, Earl, Teller of his Majesty's Exchequer	-	£2,700
Clerk of the Crown in Chancery	-	1,105
Bathurst, Charlotte, Pension on Civil List, 1823	-	600
Pension on Civil List, 1825	-	200
Pension on Civil List, 1829	-	100
Bathurst, Mary, Pension on Civil List, 1826	-	250
Bathurst, Hon. Charles, Pension on Civil List, 1826	-	350
Commissioner of Bankrupts and Receiver of Duchy Court of Lancaster	-	850
Bathurst, Hon. W., Deputy Teller, Exchequer	-	1,000
Clerk in Privy Council Office	-	2,000
